The Edito Princeps of the De Officiis is one of the oldest specimens of classical typography in existence, having been printed along with the Paradysos by Pust and Schoffer at Mayence in 1465 and again in 1469, both in small folio. Thus are not of excessive rarity, and occur more frequently upon vellum than upon paper. Next comes an edition in 4to, without date or name of place or of printer, but generally recognised as from the press of Ulric Zell, at Cologne, about 1467, which were followed by that of Ulric Hain, fol., Rome, 1468-9, also without date or name, that of Sweynheym and Pandartz, Rome, fol., 1469, of Vindelin de Spin, Venice, fol., 1470, and of Egggeutzen, Strasbourg, 4to., 1470. Many of these have given rise to lengthened controversies among bibliographers, the substance of which will be found in Dibdin's "Introduction to the Classics," Lond. 1837. Among the almost countless editions which have appeared since the end of the 15th century, it is sufficient to specify those of Heusinger, Brunswick, 8vo., 1783, which first presented a really pure text and has been repeatedly reprinted; of Gernhard, Leipzig, 8vo., 1811; and of Beier, 2 vols. 8vo., Leipzig, 1820-21, which may be considered as the best.

2. De Virtutibus.

This little tract, drawn up at the end of n. c. 45 or the commencement of n. c. 44, for the purpose of pointing out how the burden of old age may be most easily supported, is addressed to Atticus, who was now in his sixty-eighth year, while Cicero himself was in his sixty-second or sixty-third. It is first found written from Puteoli on the 11th of May, n. c. 44 (ad Att. xiv. 21, comp. xvii. 11), and is there spoken of as already in the hands of his friend. In the short introductory dialogue, Selicio Aemilianus and Luellus are supposed to have paid a visit during the consulsip of T. Quintius Flamininus and M. Acilius Balbus (n. c. 180; see c. 5 and 10) to Cato the censor, at that time 84 years old. Beholding with admiration the activity of body and cheerfulness of mind which he displayed, they request him to point out by what means the weight of increasing years may be most easily borne. Cato willingly complies, and announces a dissertation in which he seeks to demonstrate how unreasonable are the complaints usually urged regarding the miseries which attend the close of a protracted life. The four principal objections are stated and refuted in regular succession. It is held that old age is wretched, 1. Because it incapacitates men for active business; 2. Because it renders the body feeble; 3. Because it deprives them of the enjoyment of almost all pleasures; 4. Because it heralds the near approach of death. The first three are met by producing examples of many illustrious personages in whom old age was not attended by any of these evils, by arguing that such privations are not real but imaginary misfortunes, and that if the relish for some pleasures is lost, other delights of a more desirable and substantial character are substituted. The fourth objection is encountered still more boldly, by an eloquent declaration that the chief happiness of old age in the eyes of the philosopher arises from the conviction, that it indicates the near approach of death, that is, the near approach of the period when the soul shall be released from its degrading connexion with the body, and enter unfettered upon the path of immortality. This piece has always been deservedly esteemed as one of the most graceful moral essays bequeathed to us by antiquity. The purity of the language, the liveliness of the illustrations, the dignity of the sentiments, and the tact with which the character of the strong-minded but self-satisfied and garrulous old man is maintained, have excited universal applause. But however pleasing the picture here presented to us, every one must perceive that it is a fancy sketch, not the faithful copy of a scene.
from nature. In fact the whole treatise is a tissue of special pleading on a question which is discussed in the same tone of extravagance on the opposite side by Juvenal in his tenth satire. The logic also is bad, for in several instances general propositions are attacked by a few specious particular cases which are mere exceptions to the rule. No one can doubt the truth of the assertions, that old age does incapacitate us for active business, that it does render the body feeble, and that it does blunt the keenness of our senses; but while it is a perfectly fair style of argument to maintain that these effects render the body feeble, and that it does blunt the keenness of our senses; but while it is a perfectly fair style of argument to maintain that these ills, it is utterly absurd to deny their existence, because history affords a few instances of healthy individuals who have been exempted from their influence.

Cicero appears to have been indebted for the idea, if not for the plan, of this work to Aristo of Chios, a Stoic philosopher (c. 1); much has been translated almost literally from the Republic of Plato (see cc. 2, 3, 14), and more freely from the Oeconomics and Cyropaedia of Xenophon. The passage with regard to the immortality of the soul is derived from the Timaeus, the Phaedon, the Phaedrus, and the Menon (see Kühner, p. 110), and some editors have traced the observations upon the diseases of young men (c. 19) to Hippocrates. It must be remarked, that although Cato was a rigid follower of the Porch, the doctrines here pronounced have little of the austerity of that sect, but savour more of the gentle and easy discipline of the Peripatetics. (Kühner, l. c.)

The five earliest editions of the Cato Major were all printed at Cologne, the first three by Ulric Zoll, the fourth by Winter de Homborch, the fifth by Arnold Therhoern. The best modern editions are those of Gernhard, which include the Paradoxa also, Leipzig, 8vo., 1819, and of Otto, Leipzig, 1830.

4. Laelius s. De Amicitia.

This dialogue was written after the preceding, to which it may be considered as forming a companion. Just as the dissertation upon old age was placed in the mouth of Cato because he had been distinguished for energy of mind and body preserved entire to the very close of a long life, so the treatise upon friendship which existed between Scipio and Laelius pointed out the latter as a person peculiarly fitted to enlarge upon the advantages of friendship and the mode in which it might best be cultivated. To no one could Cicero dedicate such a treatise with more propriety than to Atticus, the only individual among his contemporaries to whom he gave his whole heart.

The imaginary conversation is supposed to have taken place between Laelius and his two sons-in-law, C. Fannius and Q. Mucius Scaevola, a few days after the death of Africanus (c. 129), and to have been repeated, in after times, by Scaevola to Cicero. Laelius begins by a panegyric on his friend. Then, at the request of the young men, he explains his own sentiments with regard to the origin, nature, limits, and value of friendship; traces its connexion with the higher moral virtues, and lays down the rules which ought to be observed in order to render it permanent and mutually advantageous. The most pleasing feature in this essay is the simple sincerity with which it is impressed. The author casts aside the affectation of learning, and the reader feels convinced throughout that he is speaking from his heart. In giving full expression to the most amiable feelings, his experience, knowledge of human nature, and sound sense, enabled him to avoid all fantastic exaggeration, and, without sacrificing his dignified tone, or pitching his standard too low, he brings down the subject to the level of ordinary comprehension, and sets before us a model which all may imitate.

The exordium is taken from the Theaetetus, and in the 8th chapter we detect a correspondence with a passage in the Lysis of Plato; the Ethics of Aristotle, and the Memorabilia of Socrates by Xenophon afforded some suggestions; a strong resemblance can be traced in the fragments of Theophrastus ηπι φλαρς, and some hints are supposed to have been taken from Chrysippus ηπι φλαρς and ηπι τοι διανεμειν. (Kühner, p. 118.)

The Edictio Princcps was printed at Cologne by Joh. Goldenshaff, the second, which includes the Paradoxa, at the same place by Ulric Zoll; neither bears a date, but both are older than the collection of the philosophical works printed at Rome in 2 vols. fol. by Sweynheym and Pannartz, 1471, which contains the Laelius. The best modern editions are those of Gernhard, Leipzig, 8vo. 1825, and of Beier, Leipzig, 12mo. 1828.

6. De Gloria Libri II.

Cicero completed a work under the above title, in two books dedicated to Atticus, on the 4th of July, b. c. 44. A few words only having been preserved, we have no means of determining the manner or tone in which the subject was handled. Petrarcl was in possession of a MS. of the De Gloria, which afterwards passed into the hands of Bernardo Giustiniani, a Venetian, and then disappeared. Paulus Manutius and Jovius circulated a story that it had been destroyed by Petrus Alyconius, who had stolen numerous passages and inserted them in his own treatise De Estico; but this calumny has been refuted by Timotheus in his history of Italian literature. (See Orelli's Cicero, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 487: Cic. de Off. ii. 9, ad Att. xv. 27, xvi. 2.)

D. SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY.

1. Academiconurn Libri II.

The history of this work before it finally quitted the hands of its author is exceedingly curious and somewhat obscure, but must be clearly understood before we can explain the relative position of those portions of it which have been transmitted to modern times. By comparing carefully a series of letters written to Atticus in the course of B.C. 45 (ad Att. xiii. 32, 12-14, 16, 18, 19, 21-23, 25, 35, 44), we find that Cicero had drawn up a treatise upon the Academic Philosophy in the form of a dialogue between Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius, and that it was comprised in two books, the first bearing the name of Catulus, the second that of Lucullus. A copy was sent to Atticus, and soon after it had reached him, two new introductions were composed, the one in praise of Catulus, the other in praise of Lucullus. Scarcely had this been done, when Cicero, from a conviction that Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius, although men of highly cultivated minds, and well acquainted with general literature, were known to have been little conversant with the subtle arguments of abstract philosophy, determined to withdraw them altogether, and accordingly substituted Cato and Brutus in their place. (Ad. Att. xiii. 16.) Immediately after this change had been introduced, he received a communication from Atticus representing that Varro was much offended by being passed over in the discussion of topics in which he was deeply versed. Thereupon, Cicero, catching eagerly at the idea thus suggested, resolved to recast the whole piece, and quickly produced, under the old title, a new and highly improved edition, divided into four books instead of two, dedicating the whole to Varro, to whom was assigned the task of defending the tenets of Antiochus of Ascalon, while the author himself undertook to support the views of Philo, Atticus also taking a share in the conversation. But although these alterations were effected with great rapidity, the copy originally sent to Atticus had in the meantime been repeatedly transcribed: hence both editions passed into circulation, and a part of each has been preserved.

One section, containing 12 chapters, is a short narrative of the rise and progress of the Academic Philosophy, to point out the various modifications introduced by successive professors, and to demonstrate the superiority of the principles of the New Academy, as taught by Philo, over those of the Old Academy, as advocated by Antiochus of Ascalon. It is manifestly impossible, under existing circumstances, to determine with certainty the amount of difference between the two editions. That there was a considerable difference is certain, for, although Cicero was in the first instance introduced to depart from his plan merely because he considered the topics discussed out of keeping with the character of the individuals who were represented as discussing them, still the division of the two books into four necessarily implies some important change in the arrangement if not in the substance of the subject-matter. We are, moreover, expressly informed, that many things were omitted, and that the four books of the second edition, although more concise than the two of the first, were at the same time better and more brilliant (splendida et breviaer, meliora). It is probable that the alteration of the first book of the first edition, after giving a sketch of the leading principles of the different branches of the Academy as they grew out of each other in succession, was occupied with a detailed investigation of the speculations of Carneades, just as those of Philo, which were adopted to a certain extent by Cicero himself, form the leading theme of the second. What remains of the first book of the second edition enables us to discover that it was devoted to the history of Academic opinions from the time of Socrates and Plato, who were regarded as the fathers of the sect, down to Antiochus, from whom Cicero himself had in his youth received instruction while residing at Athens. The second book may have been set apart for an inquiry into the theories of Ariosilas, who, although the real founder of the New Academy, appears to have been alluded to in the former edition only in an incidental and cursory manner; while the third and fourth books would embrace the full and clear development and illustration of his pregnant though obscure doctrines, as explained in the elegant disquisitions of Carneades and Philo. Such is the opinion of Goerenz, and although it does not admit of strict proof, yet it is highly plausible in itself, and is fully corroborated by the hints and indications which occur in those portions of the dialogue now extant.

The scene of the Cataulus was the villa of that statesman at Cumae, while the Lucullus is supposed to have been held at the mansion of Hortensius near Baalii. The dialogues of the second edition commence at the Cumaenum of Varro; but, as we learn from a fragment of the third book quoted by Nonius Marcellus, the parties repaired during the course of the conference to the shores of the Lucrine lake.

The Editio Prima is included in the collection of Cicero's philosophical works printed in 2 vols. fol. by Swayneheym and Pannartz, Rome, 1471, see above, p. 719, b. The edition of Davis, Camb. 8vo. 1725, was frequently reprinted, and for a long period remained the standard, but is now superseded by those of Goerzen, Leipzig, 8vo. 1819, forming the first volume of his edition of the philosophical works of Cicero; and of Orelli, Zurich, 8vo. 1827.
A series of dialogues dedicated to M. Brutus, in which the opinions of the Grecian schools, especially of the Epicureans, the Stoics, and the Peripatetics, on the Supreme Good, that is, the finis, object, or end, towards which all our thoughts, desires, and actions are or ought to be directed,—the kernel, as it were, of practical wisdom,—are expounded, compared, and discussed. The style is throughout perspicuous and highly polished, the doctrines of the different sects are stated with accurate impartiality according to the representations contained in accredited authorities; but, from the abstruse nature of many of the points investigated, and the subtlety of the arguments by which the different positions are defended, this treatise must be regarded as the most difficult, while it is the most perfect and finished, of all the philosophical performances of Cicero.

These conversations are not supposed to have been all held at the same period, nor in the same place, nor between the same parties. They agree in this, that, after the fashion of Aristotle (ad Att. xiii. 19), the author throughout assumes the most prominent place, and that the rest of the actors, at least those to whom important parts are assigned, were dead at the time of publication—a precaution taken to avoid giving umbrage to living men by exciting jealousy in reference to the characters which they are respectively represented as supporting (διήρωτωσε, ut fore patuam, ad Att. l. c.), but the time, the scene, and the performers are twice changed. In the third and fourth books they are different from those in the first and second, and in the fifth from those in any of the preceding.

The first book opens with an apology for the study of philosophy; after which Cicero relates, for the information of Brutus, a debate which took place at his Cumamum, in the presence of C. Valerius Triarius, between Cicero himself and L. Manlius Torquatus, who is represented as being prae tor elect and just about to enter upon his office—a circumstance which fixes this imaginary colloquy at the close of the year B.C. 50, a date agreeing perfectly with the allusion (ii. 18) to the excessive power then wielded by Pompey. Cicero, being chosen by Torquatus to state his objections to the discipline of Epicurus, briefly impugns in general terms his system of physics, his imperfect logic, and, above all, the dogma that the Supreme Good is Pleasure, and the Supreme Evil, Pain. This elicits from Torquatus a lengthened explanation of the sentiments really entertained by Epicurus and the worthiest of his followers respecting ηθισμος, sentiments which he contends had been misunderstood and misrepresented, but whose truth he undertakes to demonstrate in a series of propositions; in opposition to which Cicero, in the second book, sets in array the reasonings by which the Stoics assailed the whole system. In the third book we find ourselves in the library of young Lucullus in his Tuscan villa, to which Cicero had repaired for the purpose of consulting a work of Aristotle, and there meets Cato, immersed in study and surrounded by the books of the Stoics. In this way a controversy arises, in which Cicero maintains, that there was no real discordance between the ethics of the Porch and those previously promulgated by the Old Academy and the Peripatetics; that the differences were merely verbal, and that Zeno had no excuse for breaking off from Plato and Aristotle, and establishing a new school, which presented the same truths in a worse form. These assertions are vigorously combated by Cato, who argues, that the principles of his sect were essentially distinct, and despises with great energy on the superior purity and majesty of their ideas concerning the Supreme Good; in reply to which Cicero, in the fourth book, employs the weapons with which the New Academy attacked the Stoics. The second discourse is supposed to have been held in B.C. 52, for we find a reference (vi. 1) to the famous provision for limiting the length of speeches at the bar contained in a law passed by Pompey against bribery in his second consulsipship, an enactment here spoken of as having recently come into force. This was the year also in which L. Lucullus the elder died and left his son under the guardianship of Cato.

In the fifth book we are carried back to B.C. 79 and transported from Italy to Athens, where Cicero was at that time prosecuting his studies. [See above, p. 709, b.] The dramatis personae are Cicero himself, his brother Quintus, his cousin Lucius, Pompeius Atticus, and M. Pupius Piso. These friends having met in the Academia, the genius of the place calls up the recollection of the mighty spirits who had once trod that holy ground, and Piso, at the request of his companion, enters into a full exposition of the precepts inculcated by Aristotle and his successors on the Summum Bonum, the whole being wound up by a statement on the part of Cicerò of the objections of the Stoics, and a reply from Piso. The reason which induced Cicero to publish these conversations was that throughout, the author abstains entirely from pronouncing any judgment of his own. The opinions of the Epicureans are first distinctly explained, then follows the refutation by the Stoics; the opinions of the Stoics are next explained, then follows the refutation by the New Academy; in the third place, the opinions of the Peripatetics are explained, then follows the refutation by the Stoics. In setting forth the opinions of Epicurus, in addition to the writings of that sage enumerated by Diogenes Leibinus, much use seems to have been made of his epistle to Menocles and his περί της σοφίας, and not unfrequently the very words of the original Greek have been literally translated; while the lectures of Phaedrus and Zeno [see above, p. 709] would supply accurate information as to the changes and additions introduced by the successive teachers of the Garden after the death of its master. The Stoic refutation of Epicurus, in book second, was probably derived from Chrysippus περί του καλου καὶ της σοφιας and from the writings and oral communications of Posidonius [see above, p. 708, b.]; the Stoical doctrines in book 2. De Finibus Bonorum et Malorum Libri V.
third were taken from Zeno, from Diogenes, and from Chrysippus ἡ ζήτησις; the refutation of the Stoics in book fourth probably proceeds from Carneades. The Peripatetic doctrines in book fifth are from Aristotle and Theophrastus, as explained and enlarged by Antiochus of Ascalon; while the Stoical objections are in all probability due to Diodota [see above p. 709, n.], who, we are told else¬where, was strongly opposed to Antiochus. (Acad. ii. 36.)

In determining the precise date at which the work before us was completed and published, we cannot agree with Goergen, that the expression "duo magna στοιχεία αυτοῦ" (ad Att. xii. 45, 11th June, b. c. 45) can with certainty be made to comprehend both the De Finibus and the Academica. No distinct notice of the former occurs until the 27th of June, when, in a letter to Atticus, (xiii. 32), we find "Τυρκαντος Ροραοετας έτεκεν." Miai ut ιτι διατύχει, where Torquatus denotes the first book. On the 24th of July (ad Att. xiii. 12), the treatise is spoken of as finished. "Νυν illam ἡ ζήτησις συντάξεως, sane μηδε προ¬βατα με, Οτρίον γιλουθα τονδα, έσποιανται," Again, on the 30th of the same month, "Ιτα καταφεραμεν επίσημα λόγια ἡ ζήτησις, ut Epicurea L. Torquato, Stoica M. Catoni, περιτομημένα M. Pisoni daret." After this, as we learn from the epistle, despatched only two days afterwards (ad Att. xiii. 21, comp. 22), that it had been sent in some time in the hands of Atticus, through whom Balbus had obtained a copy of the fifth book, while the widow Caerellia, in her philosophical zeal, had contrived by some means to get possession of the whole. Cicero complains of this for two reasons; first, because it was but fitting that since the work was dedicated to Brutus it should be presented to him before it became trite and stale, and in the second place, because he had made some changes in it before finally dismissing it from his hands. It is not unlikely that the formal presentation to Brutus took place about the middle of August, when he paid a visit to Cicero at his Tusculum, (ad Att. xiii. 44), and that two editions of the fifth book, differing in some respects from each other, may have gone abroad, which will account for some singular varia¬tions and interpolations which have long exercised the ingenuity of editors. (See Goergen, note p. xiv.)

The Editio Princeps in 4to. is without date, name of place or printer, but is believed to have appeared at Cologne, from the press of Ulric Zell, about 1467, and was followed by the edition of Joannes ex Colonia, 4to. Venice, 1471. The edition of Davis, 8vo., Cambridge, 1728, was long in the hands of publishers, being examined in turn, and weighed against the tenets of Zeno, found wanting. The numerous band of philosophers, belonging to different schools, who agreed that pain was an evil, although not the greatest of evils. Here everything is taken from the Stoics.

In the third book it is proved that a wise man is insensible to sorrow; and the doctrines of the Peripatetics, of Epicurus, of the Cyrenaics, and of the Semantics, being examined in turn, and weighed against the tenets of Zeno, are found wanting. The authorities chiefly consulted appear to have been Chrysippus, Cleanthes, Cleitomachus, Antiochus of Ascalon, Carneades, and Epicurus ἡ τάξεως. The thesis supported in the fourth book, which forms a continuation to the preceding, is, that the wise man is absolutely free from all mental distress (ανίμα περικρατίων). We have first a curious classification of perfections in which the terms sorrow, joy, necessity, and a host of others, are carefully analysed and defined according to the discipline of the Porch; and, after a few remarks upon the main proposition, we find a long essay on Six favourite Paradoxes of the Stoics explained in familiar language, defended by popular arguments, and illustrated occasionally by examples derived from contemporary history, by which means they are made the vehicles for covert attacks upon Crassus, Hortensius, and Lucullus, and for vehement declamation against Clodius. This must not be viewed as a serious work, or one which the author viewed in any other light than that of a mere jeu d'esprit (*Ego vero, illa ipse, quae vix in gymnasio et in stoic Stoici probant, ludens con- jecit in commune locos, praef. '); for the propositions are mere philosophical quibbles, and the arguments by which they are supported are palpably unsatisfactory and illogical, resolving themselves into a jingle with words, or into induction resting upon one or two particular cases. The theorems enunciated for demonstration are, 1. That which is morally fair (*tò eaxòs) is alone good (dyeëdrò). 2. Virtue alone is requisite to secure happiness. 3. Good and evil deeds admit of no degrees, i.e. all crimes are equally heinous, all virtuous actions equally meritorious. 4. Every fool is a madman. 5. The wise man alone is free, and therefore every man not wise is a slave. 6. The wise man abounds in riches.

The preface, which is addressed to M. Brutus, must have been written early in n. 46, for Cato is spoken of in such terms that we cannot doubt that he was still alive, or at all events that intelligence of his fate had not yet reached Italy, and there is also a distinct allusion to the Do Claris Oratoribus as already published. But although the offering now presented is called a "parvum opusculum," the result of studies prosecuted during the shorter nights which followed the long watchings in which the Brutus had been prepared, it is equally certain that the fourth paradox bears decisive evidence of having been composed before the death of Clodius (n. c. 52), and the sixth before the death of Crassus (n. c. 53). Hence we must conclude that Cicero, soon after his arrival at Rome from Brundusium, amused himself by adding to a series of rhetorical trifles commenced some years before, and then despatched the entire collection to his friend.

The Editio Princeps of the Paradoxa was printed along with the De Officiis, by Fust and Schoffer, at Mayence, 4to., 1465, and reprinted at the same place by Fust and Gersonheim, fol., 1466. They were published along with the De Officiis, De Amicitia, and De Senectute, by Swoynheym and Pannartz, 4to., Rome, 1469; and the same, with the addition of the Sommiwn Scipionis, by Vindein de Spin, Venice, 4to., 1470; besides which there are a very great number of other editions belonging to the 15th century. The most useful editions are those of Wetzel, 8vo., Lignizas, 1808, and of Gernhard, 8vo., Leipz. 1819, the former containing also the De Senectute and the De Amicitia, the latter the De Senectute. The Paradoxa were published separately by Borgers, 8vo., Leyden, 1829.

CICERO.

by Q. Lutatius Catulus, L. Licinius Lucullus, Balbus the Stoic, Cicero himself, and perhaps other personages. The work was composed and published in c. 45, immediately before the Academica, but the imaginary conversation must have been supposed to have been held at some period earlier than n. c. 60, the year in which Catulus died. A considerable number of unimportant fragments have been preserved by St. Augustin, whose admiration is expressed in language profanely hyperbolical, and by the grammarians. These have been carefully collected and arranged by Nobbe, and are given in Orelli's Cicero, vol iv. pt. ii. pp. 479—495. (Cic. de Divin. ii. 1, Tuscul. ii. 2.)

6. Timaeus s. De Universo.

We possess a fragment of a translation of Plato's Timaeus, executed after the completion of the Academica, as we learn from the prooemium. It extends from p. 22, ed. Bekker, with occasional blanks as far as p. 54, and affords a curious specimen of the careless and inaccurate style in which Cicero was wont to represent the meaning of his Greek originals. It was first printed in the edition of Swinnyaun and Pannartz, 1471, and is a commentary by G. Valle, at Venice, in 1485. It is given in Orelli's Cicero, vol iv. pt. ii. pp. 495—513.

7. Protagoras ex Platon.] A translation of the Protagoras of Plato into Latin. At what period this was executed we cannot determine, but it is generally believed to have been an exercise undertaken in early youth. A few words seem to have been preserved by Priscian on Donatus, which will be found in Orelli's Cicero, vol. ii. pt. ii. p. 477. (Comp. Cic. de Off. ii. 2; Quint. x. 5. § 2.)

E. THEOLOGY.

1. De Natura Deorum Libri III.

Three dialogues dedicated to M. Brutus, in which the speculations of the Epicureans and the Stoics on the existence, attributes, and providence of a Divine Being are fully stated and discussed at length, the debate being illustrated and diversified by frequent references to the opinions entertained upon these topics by the most celebrated philosophers. The number of sects and of individuals enumerated is so great, and the field of philosophic research thrown open is so wide, that we can scarcely believe that Cicero could have had recourse to original sources for the whole mass of information which he lavishes so profusely on his subject, but must conclude that he made use of some useful manual or summary, such as were doubtless compiled by the preceptors of those days for the use of their pupils, containing a view of the tenets of different schools presented in a condensed form. Be that as it may, in no production do we more admire the vigorous understanding and varied learning of the author, in none does he display a greater command over appropriate language, in none are liveliness and grace more happily blended with lucid arrangement and brilliant eloquence. Although the materials may have been collected by degrees, they were certainly moulded into shape with extraordinary rapidity, for we know that this work was published immediately after the Tusculan Disputations, and immediately before the De Divinatione (de Divin. ii. 1), and that the whole three appeared in the early part of n. c. 44. The imaginary conversation is supposed to have been held in the presence of Cicero, somewhere about the year n. c. 76, at the house of C. Aurelius Cotta, the pontifex maximus (consul n. c. 75), who well sustains the part of a New Academician, attacking and overthrowing the doctrines of others without advancing any dogma of his own, while the discipline of the Peripatetic, mixed up however with much that belongs rather to Plato and Aristotle, is developed with great earnestness and power by Q. Lucilius Balbus, the pupil of Pannætius, and the doctrines of the Garden are playfully supported by Velleius (trib. pleb. n. c. 50), who occupies himself more in ridiculing the speculations of different schools than in any laboured defence of those espoused by himself. Accordingly, in the first book he opens with an attack upon Plato and the Stoics; he then advert briefly to the theories of no less than 12 of the most famous philosophers, commencing with Thales of Miletus and ending with Diogenes of Babylon, characterizing them, in many cases not unjustly, as little superior to the dreams of madmen, the fables of poets, or the superstitions of the vulgar. Passing on from this motley crew to Epicurus, he pronounces him worthy of all praise, first, because he alone placed the argument for the existence of gods upon its proper and only firm basis,—the belief implanted by nature in the hearts of all mankind; secondly, because he assigned to them their real attributes, happiness, immortality, apathy; representing them as dwelling within themselves, susceptible of neither pleasure nor pain from without, bestowing no benefits and inflicting no evils on men, but fit objects of honour and worship on account of their essential excellence, a series of propositions which are carefully elucidated by an inquiry into the form, the mode of existence, and the mental constitution of divine beings. Cotta now comes forward, takes up each point in succession, and overturns the whole fabric piecemeal. He first pursues the reason assigned by Epicurus for the existence of gods is utterly inadequate; secondly, that, granting their existence, nothing can be less dignified than the form and attributes ascribed to them; and thirdly, granting these forms and qualities, nothing more absurd than that men should render homage or feel gratitude to those from whom they have not received and do not hope to receive any benefits.

The second book contains an investigation of the question by Balbus, according to the principles of the Stoics, who divided the subject into four heads. 1. The existence of gods. 2. Their nature. 3. Their government of the world. 4. Their watchful care of human affairs (providence), which is in reality included under the third head. The existence of gods is advocated chiefly a. From the universal belief of mankind; b. From the well-authenticated accounts of their appearances upon earth; c. From prophecies, presentiments, omens, and auguries; d. From the evident proofs of design, and of the adaptation of means to a beneficent end, everywhere visible in the arrangements of the material world; e. From the nature of man himself and his mental constitution; f. From certain physical considerations which tend clearly and unequivocally to the establishment of a system of pantheism, the introduction of which is somewhat curious in this place, since, if admitted, it would at once destroy all the preceding arguments; g. From the gradual upward progression in the works of creation, from plants to animals and from the lower animals to man, which leads us to infer that the series ascends from man to beings absolutely perfect. In treating of the nature of the gods, the pantheistic principle is again broadly asserted,—God is the Universe and the Universe is God,—whence is derived the conclusion that the Deity must be spherical in form, because the sphere is the most perfect of figures. But while the Universe is God as a whole, it contains within its parts many gods, among the number of whom are the heavenly bodies. Then follows a curious digression on the origin of the Greek and Roman Pantheon, and on the causes which led men to commit the folly of picturing to themselves gods differing in shape, in age, and in apparel; of assigning to them the relationships of domestic life, and of ascribing to them the desires and passions by which mortals are agitated. Lastly, the government and providence of the gods is deduced from three considerations: (a) From their existence, which being granted, it necessarily follows, that they must rule the world. (b) From the admitted truth, that all things are subject to the laws of Nature; but Nature, when properly defined and understood, is another name for God. (c) From the beauty, harmony, wisdom, and benevolence, manifested in the works of creation. This last section is handled with great skill and effect; the absurdity of the doctrine which taught that the world was produced by a fortuitous concourse of atoms is forcibly exposed, while the arguments derived from astronomy, from the structure of plants, of fishes, of terrestrial animals, and of the human frame, form a most interesting essay on natural theology. The whole is wound up by demonstrating that all things serviceable to man were made for his use, and that the Deity watches over the safety and welfare, not only of the whole human race collectively, but of every individual member of the family.

In the third book Cotta resumes the discourse for the purpose not of absolutely demolishing what has been advanced by Baebius, but of setting forth, after the fashion of the Sceptics, that the reasonings employed by the last speaker were unsatisfactory and not calculated to produce conviction. In following his course over the different divisions in order, we find two remarkable blanks in the text. By the first we lose the criticism upon the evidence for the visible appearances of the gods on earth; the second leaves us in ignorance of the doubts cast upon the belief of a general ruling Providence. We have no means of discovering how these deficiencies arose; but it has been conjectured, that the chapters were omitted by some early Christian transcriber, who conceived that they might be quoted for a special purpose by the enemies of revealed religion.

The authorities followed in these books, in so far as they can be ascertained, appear to have been, for the Epicurean doctrines, the numerous works of Epicurus himself, whose very words are sometimes quoted, and the lectures of his distinguished follower Zeno, which Cicero had attended while residing at Athens; in the development of the Stoic principles much was derived from Cleanthes, from Chrysippus, from Antipater of Tarsus, and from Posidonius ἀπὸ δὲ Χρύσιππου, ἀπὸ Ἀντιπάτου τοῦ Ταρσοῦ, καὶ ἀπὸ Ποσιδώνου ἐπὶ δὲ Χρύσιππου, while in the dexterous and subtle logic of Cotta we may unquestionably trace the master-spirit of Carneades as represented in the writings of his disciple Clito-machus. (Kühner, p. 98.)

The Editiones Princeps is included in the collection of the philosophical works of Cicero printed by Sweeneyhym and Pammartz, in 2 vols. fol., Rome, 1471. [See above, p. 719, b.] The edition of Davis, Camb. 8vo., 1718, long held the first place, and has been often reprinted; but that of Moer and Creuzer, 8vo., Leipzig, 1813, must now be regarded as the best. The pretended 4th book published by Seraphinus at Bologna, 8vo., 1811, is an absurd forgery, if indeed the author ever intended or hoped to deceive, which seems doubtful.

2. De Divinatione Libri III.

This is intended as a continuation of the preceding work, out of which the inquiry naturally springs. We are here presented with an exposition of the conflicting opinions of the Porch and the Academy upon the reality of the science of divination, and the degree of confidence which ought to be reposed in its professors. In the first book the doctrines of the Stoics are defended by Q. Cicero, who begins by dividing divination into two branches. 1. The divination of Nature. 2. The divination of Art. To the first belong dreams, inward presages, and presentiments, and the ecstatic phrenzy, during which the mind inspired by a god discerns the secrets of the future, and pours forth its conceptions in prophetic words; in the second are comprehended the indications yielded by the entrails of the slaughtered victim, by the flight, the cries, and the feeding of birds, by thunder and lightning, by lots, by astrology, and by all those strange sights and sounds which were regarded as the shadows cast before by coming events. A cloud of examples is brought to establish the certainty of each of the various methods, cases of failure being explained away by supposing an error in the interpretation of the sign, while the truth of the general principles is confirmed by an appeal to the concurrent belief of philosophers, poets, and mankind at large. Hence Quintus maintains, that we are justified in concluding that the future is revealed to us both from within and from without, and that the information proceeds from the Gods, from Fate, or from Nature; having, however, previously insisted that he was not bound to explain how each circumstance came to pass, it being sufficient for his purpose if he could prove that it actually did come to pass.

In the second book Cicero himself brings forward the arguments of Carneades, who held that divination was altogether a delusion, and that the knowledge which it pretends to convey, if real, would be a curse rather than a blessing to men. He then proceeds to confute each of the propositions enunciated by his antagonist, and winds up by urging the necessity of upholding and extending the influence of true religion, and of waging a vigorous war in every quarter against superstition under every form.

Although many modern writers may be and probably are quite correct in their assertion, that the whole religious system of the Romans was a mere engine of government, that it was a deliberate cheat, in which men of education were the deluders and the ignorant populace the dupes, yet we have no right in the present instance, and the same remark extends to all the philosophical writings, to pronounce that the reasonings employed by Cicero are to be taken as the expression of his own views. Here and elsewhere he always carefully guards himself against such an imputation; his avowed object in every matter of controversy was merely to assist the judgment of the reader by stating fairly the strong points upon both sides. Thus Cicero fully guards himself against such an imputation; his avowed object in every matter of controversy was merely to assist the judgment of the reader by stating fairly the strong points upon both sides.

The scene of the conversation is the Lyceum in the Tusculanum of Cicero. The tract was composed after the death of Caesar, for that event is spoken of in the course of the debate.

Cicero appears to have consulted Chrysippus, who wrote several works upon this subject, especially a book entitled ... to have derived some assistance from Cratippus, Antipater, Plato, and Aristotle. In the second book he avowedly followed Carneades, and there is a reference (ii. 47) to Panactius also. (See Kühner, p. 100.)

The Edito Princeps is included in the collection of Cicero's philosophical works, printed in 2 vols. fol., by Sweynheym and Pannartz, Rome, 1471. The edition of Davis, Camb. 8vo., 1721, containing the De Fato also, was for a long period the standard, but has now given way to that of Rath, Hal. 8vo., 1807, and especially to that superintended by Crenzler, Kayser, and Moser, 8vo., Frankf. 1828, which is superior to every other.

A dialogue to complete the series upon speculative theology, of which the De Natura Deorum and the De Divinatione form the first two parts. (De Divin., ii. 1.) It is a confused and mutilated fragment on the subject of all others the most perplexing to unaided reason, the doctrine of predestination and its compatibility with free-will. The beginning and the end are wanting, and one if not more clauses break the continuity of what remains.

We find it generally stated that the work consisted of two books, and that the whole or the greater portion of what has been preserved belongs to the second; but there is no evidence whatever to prove in what manner it was originally divided, nor do we know whether it was ever finished, although, judging from the careless style of the composition, we are led to infer that the author left his task incomplete. It would appear to have contained, or to have been intended to contain, a review of the opinions held by the chief philosophical sects upon Fate, or Destiny, the most prominent place being assigned to the Stoics—who maintained that Fate, or Destiny, was the great ruling power of the Universe, the Δίκη or θησεσια mundi; in other words, the Divine Essence from which all impulses were derived—and to the Academicians, who conceived that the movements of the mind were voluntary, and independent of, or at least not necessarily subject to, external control.

The scene of conversation is the Puteolanum of Cicero, where he spent the months of April and May after the death of Caesar, the speakers being Cicero himself, and Hirtius, at that time consul.

The De Fato has generally been published along with the De Divinatione; all the editions of the latter, mentioned above contain it, and the same remarks apply.

Charisius quotes three words from a work of Cicero under the former title, Servius refers apparently to the same under the latter designation. We know nothing more upon the subject. (Charisius, i. p. 98, comp. p. 112; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. v. 737.)

2. SPEECHES.

In oratory Cicero held a position very different from that which he occupied in relation to philosophy, whether we consider the amount of exertion and toil bestowed on each pursuit respectively, or the obstacles external and internal which impeded his advancement. Philosophy was originally viewed by him merely as an instrument which might prove useful in fabricating weapons for the strife of the bar, and in bestowing a more graceful form on his compositions. Even after he had learned to prize more fully the study of mental science, it was regarded simply as an intellectual pastime. But the cultivation of eloquence constituted the main business of his whole life. It was by the aid of eloquence alone that he could hope to emerge from obscurity, and to rise to wealth and honour. Upon eloquence, therefore, all his energies were concentrated, and eloquence must be held as the most perfect fruit of his talents.

Cicero was peculiarly fortunate in flourishing during the only epoch in the history of his country which could have witnessed the full development of his intellectual strength; had he lived fifty years earlier public taste would not have been sufficiently refined to appreciate his accomplishments, fifty years later the motive for exertion would have ceased to exist. In estimating the degree of excellence to which Cicero attained, we must by no means confine ourselves, as in the case of the philosophical works, to a critical examination of the speeches in reference to the matter which they contain, and the style in which they are expressed, for in an art so eminently practical the result gained is a most important element in the computation. Even had the orations which have come down to us appeared poor and spiritless, we should nevertheless have been justified in concluding, that the man who unquestionably obtained a mastery over the minds of his hearers, and who worked his way to the first offices of state by the aid of eloquence alone, must have been a great orator; while, on the other hand, we could not have pronounced such an opinion with confidence from a mere perusal of his orations, however perfect they may appear as writings, unless we possessed the assurance, that they were always suited to the ears of those who listened to them, and generally produced the effect desired. This being premised, we may very briefly glance at the merits of these works as literary compositions, and then consider their characteristics with reference to the class to which they severally belong, and the audiences to whom they were addressed; as deliberative or judicial; delivered in the senate, from the rostra, or before the tribunal of a judge.

Every one must at once be struck by the absolute command which Cicero had over the resources of his native tongue. His words seem to gush forth without an effort in an ample stream; and the sustained dignity of his phraseology is preserved from pompous stiffness by the lively sailes of a ready wit and a vivid imagination, while the happy variety which he communicated to his cadences prevents the music of his carefully-measured periods from falling on the ear with cloying monotony. It is a style which attracts without startling, which fixes without fatiguing the attention. It presents a happy medium between the meagre dryness which Calvus, Brutus, and their followers mistook for Attic terseness and vigour. But this beauty, although admirably calculated to produce a powerful impression for the moment, loses somewhat of its charm as soon as the eye is able to look steadily upon its fascinations. It is too evidently a work of art, the straining after effect is too manifest, solidity is too often sacrificed for show, melody too often substituted for rough strength; the orator, passing into a rhetorician, seeks rather to please the fancy than to convince the understanding; the declaimer usurps the place of the practical man of business.

The audiences which Cicero addressed were either the senate, the persons entrusted with the administration of the laws, or the whole body of the people convened in their public meetings. In the senate, during the last days of the Republic, eloquence was for the most part thrown away. The spirit of faction was so strong that in public, eloquence was for the most part thrown away. The spirit of faction was so strong that in public, eloquence was for the most part thrown away. We perpetually discover that he is no less eager to recommend the advocate than the cause to his judges.

We perpetually discover that he is no less eager to recommend the advocate than the cause to his judges.

Although the criterion of success must be applied with caution to the two classes of oratory which we have just reviewed, it may be employed without hesitation to all dealings with popular assemblies. We must admit that those who shall be the first among the greatest of orators will boldly oppose the prejudices and passions of the vulgar, and, by the force of his eloquence, will induce them to abandon their most cherished projects. This Cicero frequently did. We pass over his oration for the Manilian law, for here he had the people completely on his side; but when, two years afterwards, he came forward to oppose the Agrarian law of the tribune Rullus, he had to struggle with the prejudices, interests, and passions of the people. The two speeches delivered on this occasion have come down to us, and are triumphs of art. Nothing can be more dexterous than the tact with which he identifies himself with his hearers, reminds them that he was the creature of their bounty, then lulls all suspicion to sleep by a warm eulogy on the Gracchi, declares that he was far from being opposed to the principle of such measures, although strongly opposed to the present enactment, which was in fact a disguised plot against their liberties, and then cunningly taking advantage of some inadvertence in the wording of the law, contrives to kindle their indignation by representing it as a studied insult to their favourite Pompey, and through him to them. selves. Not less remarkable is the ingenuity with which, in the second address, he turns the tables upon his adversary, who had sought to excite the multitude by accusing Cicero of being a supporter of Sulla, and demonstrates that Rullus was the real partisan of the late dictator, since certain clauses in the new rogation would have the effect of ratifying some of his most obnoxious acts. The defenders of the scheme were forced to abandon their design, and left the consil master of the field, who boasted not unreasonably, that no one had ever carried a popular assembly more completely with him when arguing in favour of an Agrarian law, than he had done for the equestrian order. His next exhibition was, if possible, still more marvellous. The love of public amusements which has always formed a strong feature in the Italian character, had gradually become an engrossing passion with the Romans. At first the spectators in the theatres occupied the seats without distinction of rank or fortune. The elder Scipio, however, introduced an ordinance by which the front benches in the orche-

In order to avoid repetition, an account of each oration is given separately with the biography of the individual principally concerned. The following table presents a view of all the speeches whose titles have been preserved. As before, those which have totally perished are printed in italics; those to which two asterisks are prefixed survive only in a few mutilated fragments; those with one asterisk are imperfect, but enough is left to convey a clear idea of the work.

to have published with large additions after the death of his patron. (Ad Att. xvi. 5, comp. ad Fam. xvi. 17.) We now have in all upwards of eight hundred, undoubtedly genuine, extending over a space of 26 years, and commonly arranged in the following manner:

1. "Epistolae ad Familiares s. Epistolae ad Diversos Libri XVI," titles which have been permitted to keep their ground, although the former conveys an inaccurate idea of thecontents, and the latter is bad Latin. The volume contains a series of 426 epistles, commencing with a formal congratulation to Pompey on his success in the Mithridatic war, written in the course of B. c. 62, and terminating with a note to Cassius, despatched about the beginning of July, B. c. 45, announcing that Lepidus had been declared a public enemy by the senate, in consequence of having gone over to Antony. They are not placed in chronological order, but those addressed to the same individuals, with their replies, where these exist, are grouped together without reference to the date of the rest. Thus the whole of those in the third book are addressed to Appius Pulcher, his predecessor in the government of Cilicia; those of the fourteenth to Terentia; those of the fifteenth to Tiro; those of the four to Sulpicius, Marcellus, and Figulus, with replies from the two former; while the whole of those in the eighth are from M. Casius Rufus, most of them transmitted to Cicero while in his province, containing full particulars of all the political and social gossip of the metropolis.

2. "Epistolae ad T. Pomponium Atticum Libri XVI." A series of 398 epistles addressed to Atticus, of which eleven were written in the year B. c. 67, 66, and 65, the latter being addressed after the end of B. c. 63, and the last in Nov. B. c. 44. (Ad Att. xvi. 15.) They are for the most part in chronological order, although dislocations occur here and there. Occasionally, copies of letters received from or sent to others—from Caesar, Antony, Balbus, Hirtius, Oppius, to Dolabella, Plancus, &c., are included; and to the 16th of the last book no less than six are subjoined, to Plancus, Capito, and Cupiennius.

3. "Epistolae ad Q. Fratrem Libri III." A series of 29 epistles addressed to his brother, the first written in B. c. 59, while Quintus was still propretor of Asia, containing an admirable summary of the duties and obligations of a provincial governor; the last towards the end of B. c. 54.

4. We find in most editions "Epistolae ad Brutum Liber," a series of eighteen epistles all written after the death of Caesar, eleven from Cicero to Brutus, six from Brutus to Cicero, and one from Brutus to Atticus. To these are added eight more, first published by Cratander, five from Cicero to Brutus, three from Brutus to Cicero. The genuineness of these two books has proved a fruitful source of controversy, and the question cannot be said to be even now fully decided, although the majority of scholars incline to believe them spurious. (Brutus, No. 21.)

5. In addition to the above, collections of letters by Cicero are quoted by various authors and grammarians, but little has been preserved except the name. There can trace that there must have once existed two books to Cornelius Nepos, three books to Caesar, three books to Pansa, nine books to Hirtius, eight books to M. Brutus, two books to young M. Cicero, more than one book to Calvus, more than one book to Q. Axius, single letters to M. Titinius, to Cato, to Caecerilla, and, under the title of "Epistula ad Pompeium," a lengthened narrative of the events of his consulship. (Ascon. ad Orat. pro Flacc. c. 31, pro Sull. c. 24.)

Notwithstanding the manifold attractions offered by the other works of Cicero, we believe that the man of taste, the historian, the antiquary, and the student of human nature, would willingly resign them all rather than be deprived of the Epistles. Greece can furnish us with more profound philosophy, and with superior oratory; but the ancient world has left us nothing that could supply the place of these letters. Whether we regard them as mere specimens of style, at one time reflecting the conversational tone of familiar every-day life in its most graceful form, at another sparkling with wit, at another claiming applause as works of art belonging to the highest class, at another couched in all the stilt courtesy of diplomatic reserve; or whether we consider the ample materials, derived from the purest and most inaccessible sources, which they supply for a history of the Roman constitution during its last struggles, affording a deep insight into the personal dispositions and motives of the chief leaders,—or, finally, seek and find in them a complete key to the character of Cicero himself, unlocking as they do the most hidden secrets of his thoughts, revealing the whole man in all his greatness and all his meanness,—their value is altogether inestimable. To attempt to give any idea of their contents would be to analyze each individually.

The Epitoma Princpum of the Epistolae ad Familiores was printed in 1467, 4to., being the first work which issued from the press of Sweynheym and Pannartz at Rome. A second edition of it was published by these typographers in 1469, fol., under the inspection of Andrew of Alcius, and two others were produced in the same year at Venice by Jo. de Spira.

Editions of the Epistolae ad Atticen, ad M. Brutum, ad Q. Fratrem, were printed in 1470 at Rome by Sweynheym and Pannartz, and at Venice by Nic. Jenson, both in folio; they are taken from different MSS., and bibliographers cannot decide to which precedence is due. The first which exhibited a tolerable text was that of P. Victorins, Florence, 1571, which follows the MS. copy made by Petrarch. The commentaries of P. Manutius, Florence, 1548, and frequently reprinted, are very valuable.

The most useful edition is that of Schütz, 6 vols. 8vo., Hal. 1809-12, containing the whole of the Epistles, except those to Brutus, arranged in chronological order and illustrated with explanatory notes. The student may add to these the translation into French of the letters to Atticus by Mon- gault, Paris, 1738, and into German of all the letters by Wieland, Hanov. 1835.

4. POETICAL WORKS.

Cicero appears to have acquired a taste for poetical composition while prosecuting his studies under Archias. Most of his essays in this department belong to his earlier years; they must be regarded as exercises undertaken for improvement or amusement, and they certainly in no way increased his reputation.

1. Versus Homiceri. Translations from Homer. (See de Fin. v. 18.) The lines which are found de Dica, ii. 30, Tacitus, iii. 26, 9, de Fin. v. 18; Augustin, de Civ. Dei, v. 0, amounting in all to 46 hexameters, may be held as specimens.

2. Ardei Planeutum.

3. Ardei Prognostica.

About two-thirds of the former, amounting to upwards of five hundred hexameter lines, of which 470 are nearly continuous, have been preserved, while twenty-seven only of the latter remain. The translation is for the most part very close—the dull copy of a dull original. Both pieces were juvenile efforts, although subsequently corrected and embellished. (De Nat. Deor. ii. 41, comp. ad Att. ii. 1.) [ARATUS, AVENUS, GERMANUS.]

4. Alygones. Capitulinus (Gardian. 3) mentions a poem under this name ascribed to Cicero, of which nearly two lines are quoted by Nonius. (s.v. Proverba.)

5. Usurai.

6. Nilus. See Capitulinus, l.c.

7. Limon. Four hexameter lines in praise of Terence from this poem, the general subject of which is unknown, are quoted by Suetonius. (Vit. Tarent. 5.)

8. Marius. Written before the year n. c. 32. (De Leg. i. 1; Vell. Pat. ii. 26.) A spirited fragment of thirteen hexameter lines, describing a prodigy witnessed by Marius and interpreted by him as an omen of success, is quoted in de Divinatio, (i. 47), a single line in the de Legibus (i. 1), and another by Isidorus. (Orig. xix. 1.)

9. De Rebus in Consulatu pesto. Cicero wrote a history of his own consulship, first in Greek verse, which he finished before the month of June, n. c. 60 (ad Att. ii. 1), and soon afterwards a Latin poem on the same subject, divided, it would seem, into three parts. A fragment consisting of seventy-eight hexameters, is quoted from the second book in the de Divinatio, (i. 11-13), three lines from the third in a letter to Atticus (ii. 8), and one verse by Nonius. (s.v. Eventus.)

10. De meis Temporibus. We are informed by Cicero in a letter belonging to n. c. 54 (ad Pomp. i. 9), that he had written three books in verse upon his own times, including, as we gather from his words, an account of his exile, his sufferings, and his recall—the whole being probably a continuation of the piece last mentioned. Four disjointed lines only remain (Quintil. xi. 1 § 24, ix. 4 § 41), one of which is, "Cedant arma tene condecat laura lingua," and the other, the unlucky jingle so well known to us from Juvenal (x. 129), "O fortunatum natam me consule Romani." But several others are quoted by Servius on Virgil. (Ecl. i. 58.)

11. Tumelastis. An elegy upon some unknown theme. One line and a word are found in the commentary of Servius on Virgil. (Ecl. i. 58.)

12. Libellus Jocularis. Our acquaintance with this is derived solely from Quintilian (viii. 6 § 73), who quotes a punning couplet as the words of Cicero "in quodam joculare libello."

13. Ponsit Genues. Plutarch tells us that Cicero, while yet a boy, wrote a little poem in tetrameters with the above title. The subject is unknown. (Plut. Cic. 2.)

14. Episcopus in Terrae. Mentioned by Pliny (Ep. vii. 4.)

The poetical and other fragments of Cicero are given in their most accurate form, with useful in-

5. HISTORICAL AND MISCELLANEOUS WORKS.

1. * * De meis Consiliis s. Morum Consiliorum Expositio. We find from Asconius and St. Augustin that Cicero published a work under some such title, in justification of his own policy, at the period when he feared that he might lose his election for the consulship, in consequence of the opposition and intrigues of Crassus and Caesar. A few sentences only remain. (Ascon. ad Orat. in Toj. Cons.; Augustin. c. Julian. Pelag. v. 5; Pronto, Exc. Eccles.)

2. De Consulatibus (νεπε τῆς δικταρίας). The only purely historical work of Cicero was a commentary on his own consulship, written in Greek and published before the month of June, b. c. 60, not one word of which has been saved. (Ad Att. ii. 1; Plut. Cæs. 8; Dion Cass. xvi. 21; comp. ad Fam. v. 12.)

3. De Laude Caesaris. It is clear from the commencement of a letter to Atticus (iv. 5; 10th April, b. c. 56), that Cicero had written a book or pamphlet in praise of Caesar. He does not give the title, and was evidently not a little ashamed of his performance.

4.  M. Cato s. Lavis M. Catonis. A panegyric upon Cato, composed after his death at Utica in b. c. 46, to which Caesar replied in a work entitled Anticato. [CAESAR, p. 555, a.] A few words only remain. (Ad Att. xii. 40; Gall. xii. 139; Macrobi. vi. 2; Priscianus, x. 3, p. 485, ed. Krehl.)

5. Lavis Porciae. A panegyric on Porcia, the sister of M. Cato and wife of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, written in b. c. 45, soon after her death. (Ad Att. xiii. 37, 43.)

6.  Oeconomica ex Xenophonte. Probably not so much a close translation as an adaptation of the treatise of Xenophon to the wants and habits of the Romans. It was composed in the year b. c. 60, or in 79, and was divided into three books, the arguments of which have been preserved by Servius. The first detailed the duties of the mistress of a household at home, the second the duties of the master of a household out of doors, the third was upon agriculture. The most important fragments are contained in the eleventh and twelfth books, which together with those derived from other sources have been carefully collected by Nobbe (Ciceronis Opera, Leipzig, 1831), and will be found in Orelli's Ciceron, vol. iv. pt. 2, p. 472. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 43; Cic. de Off. ii. 24.)

7. Chorographia. Priscian, according to the text usually received (xvi. 16), mentions "Chorographiam Ciceronianam," but the most recent editor, Krehl, supposes "orthographiam" to be the true reading, while others substitute "chronographiam." If "chorographia" be correct, it may refer to the geographical work in which Cicero was engaged b. c. 59, as we read in letters to Atticus. (ii. 4, 6, 7.)

It is doubtful whether works under the following titles were ever written by Cicero:--

1. De Oratorugraphia. 2. De Re Militari. 3. Synonyma. 4. De Numerous Orationes ad Tironem. 5. Orphica s. De Adolescente Studioso. 6. De Memoria. Any tracts which have been published from time to time under these above titles as works of Cicero, such as the De Re Militari attached to many of the older editions, are unquestionably spurious. (See Angelo Mai, Catalog. Cod. Ambros. cl.; Bandini, Catalog. Bibl. Laurent. iii. p. 465, and Suppl. ii. p. 381; Fabric. Bibl. Lat. i. p. 211; Orrell, Ciceronis Opera, vol. iv. pt. ii. p. 584.)

The Editio Principes of the collected works of Cicero was printed at Milan by Alexander Minutianus, 4 vol. fol., 1498, and reprinted with a few changes due to Budaeus by Basilius Ascensius, Paris, 4 vol. fol., 1511. Aldus Manutius and Naugierus published a complete edition in 9 vol. fol. Venet., 1519—1523, which served as the model for the second of Ascensius, Paris, 1522, 2 or 4 vol. fol. None of the above were derived from MS. authorities, but were merely copies of various earlier impressions. A gradual progress towards a pure text is exhibited in those which follow:—Crutander, Basil. 1528, 2 vol. fol., corrected by Bentinus after certain Heidelbeg MSS.; Herogasius, Basil. 1534, 4 vol. fol.; Junius, Ven. 1554—1557, 4 vol. fol., an entirely new recension by Petrus Victorius, who devoted his attention especially to the correction of the Epistles from the Medecin MSS.; Car. Stephanus, Paris, 1555, 4 vol. fol., containing many new readings from MSS. in France; Dionysius Lusibanti, Lutet. ap. Bernardum Turrianius, 1566, 4 vol. fol., with an ample commentary.—In every respect more worthy of praise than any of the foregoing, and of the greatest importance to the critic; Gruter, Hamburg, Fribur. 1618, 4 vol. fol., including the collations of sundry German, Belgian, and French MSS., followed in a great measure by Jace. Gronvulus, Lug. Bat. 1691, 4 vol. 4to., and by Verbrugjus, Amst. Wetstein. 1724, 2 vol. fol., or 4 vol. 4to., or 12 vol. 8vo., which comprehends also a large collection of notes by earlier scholars; Ollioet, Genev. 1743—1749, 9 vol. 4to., with a commentary "in usum Delphini," very frequently reprinted; Ernesti, Ha. Sax. 1774—1777, 5 vol. 8vo., in 7 parts, immensely superior, with all its defects, to any of its predecessors, and still held by some as the standard; Schütz, Lips. 1814—1823, 20 vol. small 8vo., in 28 parts, with useful prolegomena and summaries prefixed to the various works. The small editions printed by Klein, Amst. 1684—1699, 11 vol. 12mo., by Poullis, Glag. 1749, 29 vol. 16mo., and by Bartos, Paris, 1768, 14 vol. 12mo., are much esteemed on account of their neatness and accuracy.

All others must now, however, give place to that of Orelli, Turic. 1836—1837, 9 vol. 8vo., in 13 parts. The text has been revised with great industry and judgment, and is as pure as our present resources can render it, while the valuable and well-arranged selection of readings placed at the bottom of each page enable the scholar to form an opinion for himself. There is unfortunately no commentary, but this want is in some measure supplied by an admirable "Onomasticon Tullianum," drawn up by Orelli and Baier jointly, which forms the three concluding volumes.

The seventh volume contains the Scholiasts upon Cicero, C. Marius Victorinus, Rufinus, C. Julius Victor, Boethius, Favonius Eugogius, Asconius Pedianus, Scholias Solonius, Cronovianus.

Q. Tullius Cicero, son of No. 2, was born about B.C. 102, and was educated along with his elder brother, the orator, whom he accompanied to Athens in B.C. 79. (De Fam. v. 1.) In B.C. 67 he was elected aedile, and held the office of praetor in B.C. 62. After his period of service in the city he had expired, he succeeded L. Flaccus as governor of Asia, where he remained for upwards of three years, and during his administration gave great offence to many, both of the Greeks and of his own countrymen, by his violent temper, unguarded language, and the corruption of his favourite freed-man, Statius. The murmurs arising from these excesses called forth from Marcus that celebrated letter (ad Q. Fr. i. 2), in which, after warning him of his faults and of the unfavourable impression which they had produced, he proceeds to detail the qualifications, duties, and conduct of a perfect provincial ruler. Quintus returned home in B.C. 58, soon after his brother had gone into exile, and on his approach to Rome was met by a large body of the citizens (pro Sect. 31), who had flocked together to do him honour. He exerted himself strenuously in promoting all the schemes devised for procuring the recall of the exile, in consequence of which he was threatened with a criminal prosecution by App. Claudius, son of C. Claudius (ad Att. i. 2), and on one occasion nearly fell a victim to the violence of one of the mercenary mobs led on by the demagogues. (Pro Sect. 35.) In B.C. 65 he was appointed legatus to Caesar, whom he attended on the expedition to Britain, and on their return was despatched with a legion to winter among the Nervii. (n. c. 54.) Here, immediately after the disasters of Titurius Sabinus and Aurunculeius Cotta, his camp was suddenly attacked by a vast multitude of the Eburones and other tribes which had been roused to insurrection by Ambiorix. The assault was closely pressed for several days in succession, but so energetic were the measures adopted by Cicero, although at that very time suffering from great bodily weakness, and so bravely was he supported by his soldiers, that they were enabled to hold out until relieved by Caesar, who was soon in his communications of the troops and their commander. (Caes. B. G. v. 24, &c.)

Quintus was one of the legati of the orator in Cilicia, B.C. 51, took the chief command of the military operations against the mountainers of the Syrian frontier, and upon the breaking out of the civil war, insisted upon sharing his fortunes and his fate with his former friends. He was, however, persuaded by his father to abandon this ill-judged project (ad Att. xii. 7), and it was determined that he should proceed to Athens and there prosecute his studies, along with several persons of his own age belonging to the most distinguished families of Rome. Here, although provided with an allowance upon the most liberal scale (ad Att. xii. 7, 22), he fell into irregular and extravagant habits, led a stray, it is said, by a rhetorician named Gorgias. The young man seems to have been touched by the reminiscences of Cicero and Atticus, and in a letter addressed to Tiro (ad Fam. xvi. 21), expresses great shame and sorrow for his past misconduct, giving an account at the same was an aspirant to literary fame also, and in poetry Cicero considered him superior to himself. (ad Q. Fr. iii. 4.) The fact of his having composed four tragedies in sixteen days, even although they may have been mere trumpery, does not impair his with a high idea of the probable quality of his productions (ad Q. Fr. iii. 5); but we possess no specimens of his powers in this department, with the exception of twenty-four hexameters on the twelve signs, and an epigram of four lines on the love of women, not very complimentary to the sex. (Anthol. Lat. v. 41, iii. 83.) In prose we have an address to his brother, entitled De Petitione Consulatus, in which he gives him very sound advice as to the best method of attaining his object.

Quintus was married to Pomponia, sister of Atticus: but, from incompatibility of temper, their union was singularly unhappy. As an example of their matrimonial squabbles, the reader may refer to a letter addressed to Atticus (v. 1), which contains a most graphic and amusing description of a scene which took place in the presence of the lady's brother-in-law. (Appian, B. C. iv. 20; Dion Cass. xi. 7, xlvi. 10.)

7. M. Tullius Cicero, only son of the orator and his wife Terentia, was born in the year B.C. 65, on the very day, apparently (ad Att. i. 2), on which L. Julius Caesar and C. Marcius Figulus were elected consuls. He is frequently spoken of, while a boy, in terms of the warmest affection, in the letters of his father, who watched over his education with the most earnest care, and made him the companion of his journey to Cilicia. (n. c. 61.) The autumn after their arrival he was sent along with his school-fellow and cousin, Quintus, to pay a visit to king Deiotarus (ad Att. v. 17), while the proconsul and his legati were prosecuting the war against the highlanders of Amminus. He returned to Italy at the end of B.C. 50, was invested with the manly gown at Arpinum in the course of March, B.C. 49 (ad Att. ix. 6, 19), being then in his sixteenth year, passed over to Greece and joined the army of Pompey, where he received the command of a squadron of cavalry, gaining great applause from his general and from the whole army by the skill which he displayed in military exercises, and by the steadiness with which he endured the toils of a soldier's life. (De Off. ii. 13.) After the battle of Pharsalia he remained at Brundisium until the year B.C. 46, and in the course of March, B.C. 45, went into regular and extravagant habits, led a stray, it is said, by a rhetorician named Gorgias. The young man seems to have been touched by the reminiscences of Cicero and Atticus, and in a letter addressed to Tiro (ad Fam. xvi. 21), expresses great shame and sorrow for his past misconduct, giving an account at the same time of his reformed mode of life, and diligent application to philosophy under Cratippus of Mytilene—representations confirmed by the testimony of various individuals who visited him at that period. (Ad Att. xiv. 16.) After the death of Caesar he was raised to the rank of military tribune by Brutus, gained the legion commanded by L. Piso, the lieutenant of Antonius, and did much good service in the course of the Macedonian campaign. When the republican army was broken up by the rout at Philippi, he joined Sext. Pompeius in Sicily, and taking advantage of the amnesty in favour of exiles, which formed one of the terms of the convention between that chief and the triumvirs when they concluded a short-lived peace (n. c. 39), returned to the metropolis. Here he lived in retirement and obscurity, until Octavianus, touched perhaps with remorse on account of his former treachery to the family, caused him to be admitted into the college of augurs, and after his final rupture with Antonius, assumed him as his colleague in the consulsip. (n. c. 30, from 13th Sept.) By a singular coincidence, the despatch announcing the capture of the fleet of Antony, which was immediately followed by his death, was addressed to the new consul in his official capacity, and thus, says Plutarch, "the divine justice reserved the completion of Antony's punishment for the home of Cicero," for the arrival of the intelligence was immediately followed by a decree that all statues and monuments of Antony should be destroyed, and that no individual of that family should in time coming bear the name of Marcus. Middleton has fallen into the mistake of supposing that the victory thus announced was the battle of Actium, but this was fought about eleven months before the event in question. Soon after the termination of his office, Cicero was nominated governor of Asia, or, according to others, of Syria, and we hear no more of him.

Young Cicero was one of those characters whose name would never have appeared on the page of history had it not been for the fame of his father; and that fame proved to a certain extent a misfortune, since it attracted the eyes of the world to various follies and vices which might have escaped unnoticed in one enjoying a less illustrious parentage. Although naturally indolent (ad Att. vi. 1), the advantages of education were by no means lost upon him, as we may infer from the style and tone of those two epistles which have been preserved (ad Fam. xvi. 21, 25), which prove that the praise bestowed on his compositions by his father did not proceed from mere blind partiality (ad Att. xiv. 7. xv. 17), while his merits as a soldier seem unquestionable. Even the stories of his dissipation scarcely justify the bitterness of Seneca and Pliny, the latter of whom records, upon the authority of Tergilla, that he was able to swallow two congii of wine at a draught, and that on one occasion, when intoxicated, he threw a cup at M. Agrippa, an anecdote which Middleton, who is determined to see no fault in any one bearing the name of Cicero, oddly enough quotes as an example of courage and high spirit. (Plin. H. N. xxii. 3. &c, cxx. 28; Senec. Sausor. 6, de Benev. iv. 30; Plut. Cis. and Brut.; Appian, B. C. iv. 19, 20, v. 2; Dion Cass. xiv. 15. xvi. 3. 18. 41. 19.)
the Volsci, and on this account entered the city with the honour of an ovation. (Liv. iii. 8, 10; Dionys. ix. 69; Did. xi. 81.)

4. C. Veturius P. f. Geminus Crassinus, consul b.c. 453 with T. Romanus Roccus Vatianus, marched with his colleague against the Aequi. They defeated the enemy, and gained immense booty, which however they did not distribute among the soldiers, but sold on account of the poverty of the treasury. They were in consequence both brought to trial in the next year: Veturius was accused by L. Alcius, the plebeian aedile, and sentenced to pay a fine of 10,000 asses. As some compensation for his ill-treatment by the plebeians he was elected augur in 453. (Liv. iii. 33 and T. Veturius by Dionysius (x. 56).

6. C. Veturius Crassus Cicurinus, consular tribune in b.c. 417. Livy (iii. 47) calls him Sp. Raditus Crassus; but this no doubt is a false reading, for Diodorus (xiii. 7) has Sp. Veturius, and the Raditus gens was moreover plebeian, and had not the cognomen of Crassus.

7. M. Veturius Sulp. Sp. N. Crassus Cicurinus, consular tribune b.c. 339, the only patrician elected this year; his five colleagues were all plebeians. (Liv. v. 13; Did. xiv. 54.)

9. L. Veturius L. f. Sp. N. Crassus Cicurinus, consular tribune two years successively, b.c. 368, 367, in the latter of which years the Licinian laws were carried. (Liv. vi. 38, 42.)

CILDA'RIA (Kda'pa), a surname of the Eleusinian Demeter at Pheneus, in Arcadia, derived either from an Arcadian dance called kíápa, or from a royal head-dress of the same name. (Paus. v. 15.)

CILLIX (Kila), a son of Agenor and Telephassa. He and his brothersCadmus and Phoenix were sent out by their father in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Zeus. Cilix settled in the country which derived from him the name of Cilia. He is called the father of Thasus and Thebe. (Herod. vii. 91; ApolloI. ili. 1. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 178; Did. iv. 49.)

CILLA (Ki'AAa), a daughter of Laomedon and Phoebe, sister of Priam, of whom two accounts are given. One makes her to have been sent by her father in search of Europa, who had been carried off by Zeus. Another makes her to have been driven out of their native town in b.c. 301, by the agitation of the Licinian laws. (Liv. vi. 32, 36; Did. xvi. 61, 77.)

CILJO, or CHILO, a Roman surname, seems to have been written in either way, as we find both forms on coins of the Flaminia gens. (Eckhel, v. p. 212.) The Latin grammarians, however, state that Cilo was applied to a person with a long and narrow head, and Chilo to one with large or thick lips. (Veilus Long. p. 2334, Flav. Caper, p. 2342, Charis, p. 78, ed. Pluobcius; Festus, a. c. Chilo."

CILIO, or CHILO, a Roman senator, called by Appian Klaaov, proscribed in b.c. 43 (Appian, B. c. iv. 27), may perhaps be the same as the Cilo, the friend of Tonnus and Cicero, whom the latter mentions in b.c. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. vi. 20.)

CILIO, or CHILO, L. FLAM'NIUS, occurs only on coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse Victory driving a biga. The interpretation of the inscription on the obverse, IVI. PRI. FL., is not certain. We know that Julius Caesar increased the number of the superintendents of the mint from three to four, and it has therefore been supposed that this Flaminius Cilo was one of the first four superintendents appointed by Cæsar, and that the above letters refer to this, being equivalent to IIIIVI. FLAMINVS IVNVS FLAMBINVS... (Eckhel, v. pp. 212, 213.)

CILIO, JU’NIUS, procurator of Pontus in the reign of Claudius, brought the Bosphorus Mithridates to Rome in a. d. 50, and received afterwards the consuline insignia. (Tur. Ann. xii. 21.)

Dion Cassius speaks (lx. 39) of him as governor of Bithynia, and relates an amusing tale respecting him. The Bithynians came before Claudius to complain of Cilo having taken bribes, but as the emperor could not hear them on account of the noise, he asked those standing by his side what they said. Narcissus thereupon told them that they were returning thanks to Cilo, upon which Claudius appointed him to the government of the province for two years longer.

CIIIO, or CHILO, P. MAG'ITUS, murdered at Perieanenæ, in b.c. 45. M. Claudius Marcellus, who had been consul in 51, and killed himself immediately afterwards. Cilo was a friend and client of Marcellus and a rumour was circulated at the time by Caesar's enemies, that the dictator had instigated him to commit the murder. Brutus wrote to Cicero...

to defend Caesar from this charge. The real motive for this crime seems to have been, that Marcellus refused to advance Cilo a sum of money to relieve him from his embarrassments. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 10, 5, 6. iv. 12.) Valerius Maximus (ix. 11. § 4) says, that Cilo had served under Pompey, and that he was indignant at Marcellus preferring another friend to him. Livy (Epit. 115) calls him Cn. Magnus.

CILÓ SEPTIMIÁNUS, L. PABRUS, to whom an inscription quoted by Tillemon after Onuphrius Pauviunus gives the names Catinius Acicianus Lepidus Fulgimianus, was consul in a. d. 193 and 204, and was the chosen friend of Septimius Severus, by whom he was appointed præfect of the city and tutor to his two sons. Having endeavoured to mediate between the brothers, he incurred the hatred of the elder, who after the murder of Geta gave orders that the man who had ever acted towards him the part of a father, and whom he had often addressed by that title, should be included in the massacre which followed. The soldiers hastened to the mansion of Cilo, and after plundering it of all the costly furniture and other precious effects, dragged him from the bath, compelled him to walk through the streets in his wooden slippers and a single scanty garment, buffeting him as they hurried along with the intention of putting him to death when they should have reached the palace. This gratuitous cruelty proved his salvation. For the populace, beholding one whom they had been wont to honour treated with such indignity, began to murmur, and were joined by the city-guards. A tumult was imminent, when Caracalla came forth to meet the mob, and partly through fear, partly perhaps touched for a moment with compunction, threw his own cloak over the shoulders of his former preceptor, once more addressed him as father and master, gave orders that the tribune and his attendants who had been sent to perpetrate the crime should themselves be put to death, not, says Dion, because they had wished to slay their victim, but because they had failed to do so, and continued to treat him with the outward semblance at least of respect. The only other anecdote preserved with regard to Cilo is, that he saved the life of Mærcius at the time when the latter was upon the point of sharing the fate of Phaëthontus [Plautianus], whose agent he was, and thus the destruction of Cruculla was indirectly hastened by the friend and benefactor whom he had sought to destroy. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 4, lxxviii. 11; Spartan. Caro-catt. 4; Amel. Vict. Epit. 20.)

CIMBER, C. A'NNIUS, the son of Lysidicus, had obtained the praetorship from Caesar, and was one of Antony's supporters in b. c. 43, on which account he is vehemently attacked by Cicero. He was charged with having killed his brother, whence Cicero calls him ironically Philæthanes, and perpetuates the pun nisi forte fuerit Germanum Cimer occidit, that is, "unless perchance he has a right to kill his own countryman," as Cicmer is the name of a German people, and Germanus signifies in Latin both a German and a brother. (Cic. Phil. xii. 12. vi. 6; Quintil. xii. 2. § 25, comm. Cic. ad Att. xv. 13; Suet. Aug. 86.) Cimer was an orator, a poet, and an historian, but his merits were of a low order, and he is ridiculed by Virgil in an epigram preserved by Quintilian (l.c.). (Huschke, De C. Anni Cimbro, Rostoch. 1824.)

CIMBER, L. T'ILLIUS (not Tullius), one of the murderers of Caesar, b. c. 44. When Caesar first became supreme, Cimer was one of his warmest supporters (Cic. Philipp. ii. 11; Senec. de Ira, iii. 50); and we find Cicero making use of his influence with the Dictator in behalf of a friend (Ad Fam. vi. 12). He was rewarded with the province of Bithynia. But for some reason (Seneca says from disappointed hopes) he joined the conspirators. On the fatal day, Cimer was foremost in the ranks, under pretence of presenting a petition to Caesar praying for his brother's recall from exile. Caesar motioned him away; and Cimer then, seizing the Dictator's gown with both hands drew it over his neck, so as to pull him forward. After the assassination, Cimer went to his province and raised a fleet, with which (if we may believe the author of the Pseudo-Brutus Epistles to Cicero, i. 6) he defeated Dolabella. When Cassius and Brutus marched into Macedonia, Cimer co-operated with the fleet, and appears to have done good service. (Appian, B. C. iv. 102, 105.) He was a bold active man, but addicted to wine and riotous living, so that he asked jokingly, Ego quemquam feram, qui vinum ferre non possum? (Senec. Epist. 83. 11.)

CIMON (Kí'mon). 1. Nicknamed from his sifliness Kødænus (Plut. Cim. 4), will be best described by the following table.

| Cypaxas | Miltiades I. | Cimon I. |
| Steagonor I. | (Herod. vi. 35.) |

| Steagonor II. | Miltiades II. | Cimon II. |
| Ego quernquam ferm, qui vinum ferre non possem? (Senec. Epist. 83. 11.) | (The victor at Marathon.) Married Hegesipyle, the daughter of Olorus, a Thracian king. | (Herod. vi. 38.) |
| Elpinice. |

He was banished by Peisistratus from Athens, and during his banishment won two Olympic victories with his four-horse chariot. He allowed Peisistratus to be proclaimed victor at the second, and was in consequence suffered to return to Athens. But when after the death of Peisistratus he gained another Olympic victory with the same horses, he was secretly murdered by order of the sons of the tyrant. (Herod. vi. 105.) 2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of the great Miltiades, is mentioned in Herodotus as paying his father's fine and capturing Efion. (vi. 136, vii. 107.) This latter event, the battle of Eurymedon, the expedition in aid of Sparta, and his death in Cyprus, are the only occasions in which he is expressly named by his relation, Thucydides; whose summary, moreover, of the history of this period leaves us by its briefness necessarily dependent for much on the additional authorities, which form the somewhat heterogeneous basis of Plutarch's biography. We find here the valuable contemporary recollections of Ion of Chios (cc. 5, 9), and the almost worthless contemporary gossip and scandal of the Thasian Steimbrutes: some little also from the poets of the time, Cratinus, Melan-archus, and Archedmus. He seems to have followed Thucydides, though not very strictly, as a guide in general, while he filled up the details from the later historians, or from his own researches, more than from Ephorus, whose account, as followed probably by Diodorus (xi. 60), differs materially. He appears to have also used Callisthenes, Cratinus, Phanodemus, Diodorus Periegetes, Gorgias, and Nauniacre; Aristotle, Eupolis, Aristophanes, and Critias.

On the death of Miltiades, probably in b. c. 489, Cimon, we are told by Diodorus (Excerpta, p. 255), in order to obtain the corpse for burial, took his father's place in prison till his fine of 50 talents should be paid. [MILTIADES.] It appears, however, certain (see Dem. c. Androt. p. 603) that the árplous, if not the imprisonment, of the public debtor was legally inherited by the son, and Cornelius Nepos, whose life comes in many parts from Theopompos, states the con- tinuance till it has been compulsory. The fine was eventually paid by Callias on his marriage with Elpinice, Cimon's sister. [CAILLAS, No. 2, p. 567, b.] A more difficult point is the previous connexion and even marriage of Cimon with this sister or half-sister, which was recorded by numer- ous writers, but after all was very probably the scandal of Suseinbrotus and the comedians. (Eupol- lis, ap. Plut. Cim. 15, comp. 4; Nepos, Cim. 1; Athen. xiii. p. 589.) Nor, again, can we very much rely on the statement which Plutarch introduces at this time, that he and Themistocles vied with each other at the Olympic games in the splendour of their equipments and banquetts. (Plut. Themist. 5.) It is more credible that his first occasion of attracting notice and admiration was the forwardness with which, when the city in b. c. 489 was to be deserted, he led up to the citadel a company of young men to offer the goddess their now unserviceable bridles. (Plut. Cim. 5.) After the battle of Plateae, Aristeides brought him forward. They were placed together in 477 at the head of the Athenian contingent to the Greek armament, under the supreme command of Pausanias. Cimon shared the glory of transferring that supremacy to Athens, and in the first employment of it reduced the Persian garrison at Eion, and opened the important district in the neighbourhood for Athenian coloni- zation. (Plut. Cim. 6; Herod. viii. 107; Thuc. i. 76; Nepos, Cim. 2; Schol. ad Aesch. de Fals. Lega. p. 755, ed. Reiske; Clinton, F. H. ii. App. ix.) In honour of this conquest he received from his coun- trymen the distinction, at that time unprecedented, of having three busts of Hermes erected, inscribed with triumphal verses, but without mention of the names of the generals. (Plut. Cim. 6; Aesch. c. Cleop. p. 573, ed. Reiske.) In 476, apparently under his conduct, the piratical Dolopians were expelled from Scyros, and a colony planted in their room; and the remains of Theseus discovered there, were thence transported, probably after some years' interval (n. c. 488) with great pomp to Athens. (Plut. Cim. 8; Paus. i. 17, § 6; Hdt. 3, § 6.) The reduction of Chrysostus and Naxos was most likely, effected under his command (Thuc. i. 88); and at this period he was doubtless in war and politics his country's chief citizen. His co- adjutor at home would be Aristeides; how far he contributed to the banishment of Themistocles may be doubtful. (Comp. Plut. Arist. 25, Them. 24.) The year b. c. 460 (according to Clinton; Krüger and others persist in placing it earlier) saw the completion of his glory. In the command of the allied forces on the Asiatic coast he met a Persian fleet of 350 ships, attacked them, captured 200, and following the fugitives to the shore, by the river Eurymedon, in a second and obstinate en- gagement on the same day, routed the land arma- ment; indeed, according to Plutarch, he crowned his victory before night by the defeat of a re-in- forcement of 80 Phœnician ships. (Plut. Cim. 12; Thuc. i. 100; Diod. xi. 60, with Wesseling's note.) His next achievement was the expulsion of the Persians from the Chersonese, and the subjection of the territory to Athens, accompanied perhaps with the recovery of his own patrimony. The effect of these victories was doubtless very great; they crushed perhaps a last aggressive movement, and fixed Persia finally in a defensive position. In later times it was believed, though on evidence, as was shown by Callisthenes, quite insufficient, that they had been succeeded by a treaty (the famous peace of Cimon) negotiated through Calliss, and containing in its alleged conditions the most humiliating concessions. They placed Cimon at the height of his power and glory, the chief of that empire which his character had gained for Athens, and which his policy towards the allies was rend- ering daily firmer and completer. Themistocles, a banished man, may perhaps have witnessed his Asiatlic triumphs in sorrow; the death of Aristeides left him sole possessor of the influence they had hitherto jointly exercised; nor had time yet matured the opposition of Pericles. (Plut. Cim. 13, 14.) Soon this was the case of the friend and the rapidly increasing influence of the new opponent rendered his position precarious.

The chronology of the events that follow is henceforth in most points disputed; according to Clinton's view, which cannot hastily be de- serted, the revolt of Thasos took place in 465; in 463 Cimon reduced it; in the year interven- ing occurred the earthquake and insurrection at Sparta, and in consequence, upon Cimon's urgent appeal, one if not two (Plut. Cim. 16; comp. Aristoph. Lysistr. 1137) expeditions were sent from Athens, under his command, to assist the Spartans. In these occurrences were found the means for his humiliation. During the siege of Thasos, the Athenian colonists on the Strymon were cut off by the Thracians, and Cimon seems to have been expected, after his victory there, to retrieve this disaster; and, neglecting to do so, he was on his return brought to trial; but the accusa- tion of having taken bribes from Alexander of Macedon, was, by Pericles at any rate, not strongly urged, and the result was an acquittal. The ter- mination of his Lacedaemonian policy in the jeal- ous and insulting dismissal of their Athenian auxiliaries by the Spartans, and the consequent rupture between the two states was a more serious blow to his popularity. And the victory of his opponents was decided when Ephialtes and Peri- cles, after a severe struggle, carried their measure reducing the ascendency of the aristocratic Aristo- polis. Upon this it would appear, a revolution ensued. Soon after its commencement (b. c. 457) a Lacedaemonian army, probably to meet the views of a violent section of the defeated party in Athens, posted itself at Tanagra. The Athenians advanced.

to meet it: Cimon requested permission to fight in his place; the generals in suspicion refused: he departed, begging his own friends to vindicate his character: they, in number a hundred, placed in the ensuing battle his panoply among them, and fell around it to the last man. Before five years of his exile were fully out, b. c. 453 or 454, he was recalled on the motion of Pericles himself; late reverses having inclined the people to tranquillity in Greece, and the democratic leaders perhaps being ready, in fear of more unscrupulous opponents, to make concessions to those of them who were patriotic and temperate. He was probably employed in effecting the five years' truce with Sparta which commenced in 450. In the next year he sailed out with 200 ships to Cyprus, with the view of retrieving the late misshaps in Egypt. Here, while besieging Citium, illness or the effects of a wound carried him off. His forces, while sailing away with his remains, as if animated by his spirit, fell in with and defeated a fleet of Phoenician and Cilician galleys, and added to their naval victory a second over forces on shore. (Plut. Cim. 14—19; Thuc. i. 112; Diod. xi. 61, 66, xii. 3; Theopomp. ap. Ephor. fragm. ed. Marx, 224.)

Cimon's character (see Plut. Cim. 4, 5, 9, 10, 16, Perio. 5) is marked by his policy. Exorting himself to aggrandize Athens, and to centralize in her the power of the Athenian confederacy, he still looked mainly to the humiliation of the common enemy, Persia, and had no jealous feeling towards his country's rivals at home. He was always an admirer of Sparta: his words to the people when urging the successors in the revolt of the Helots were, as recorded by Ion (Plut. Cim. 16) "not to suffer Greece to be lamed, and Athens to lose its yoke-fellow." He is described himself to have had something of the Spartan character, being deficient in the Athenian points of readiness and quick dismemberment. He was of a cheerful, convivial temper, free and indulgent perhaps rather than excessive in his pleasures. (Euseb. fragm. ed. Deiss.); (Deipolis, ap. Plat. Cim. 15), delighting in achievement for its own sake rather than from ambition. His frankness, affability, and mildness, won over the allies from Pausanias; and at home, when the recovery of his patrimony or his share of spoils had made him rich, his liberality and munificence were unbounded. His orchards and gardens were open; his fellow demesmen (Aristot. ap. Plat. Cim. 10; comp. Cic. de Off. ii. 18 and Theopomp. ap. Athen. xii. 533) were free daily to his table, and his public bounty verged on ostentation. With the treasure he brought from Asia the southern wall of the citadel was built, and at his own private charge the foundations of the long walls to the Peiraeus, works which the marvyl that still made difficult and expensive, were laid down in the most costly and efficient style. According to the report of Ion, the tragic poet, who as a boy supped in his company (Plut. Cim. 5, 9), he was in person tall and good-looking, and his hair, which he wore long, thick and curly. He left three sons, Lacedaemonius, Eleus, and Thessa-lus, and was, according to one account, married to Isodice, a daughter of Euryptolemus, the cousin of Pericles, as also to an Arcadian wife. (Diodorus Periegetes, ap. Plat. Cim. 16.) Another record gives him three more sons, Miltades, Cimon, and Pel-sianax. (Schol. ed Aristot. iii. p. 515, Dindorf.)

(Herod. Thucyd.; Plut. Cim.; Nepos, Cimon; Diodorus. Plutarch's life of Cimon is separately edited in a useful form by Arnold Eicker, Utrecht, 1848, in which references will be found to other illustrative works.)

CIMON. 1. Of Cleonae, a painter of great renown, praised by Pliny (H. N. xix. 34) and Aelian. (V. H. viii. 8.) It is difficult to ascertain, from Pliny's obscure words, wherein the peculiar merits of Cimon consisted: it is certain, however, that he was not satisfied with drawing simply the outlines of his figures, as we see in the oldest painted vases, but that he also represented limbs, veins, and the folds of garments. He invented the Chaligraapha, that is, the profile, according to the common interpretation (Caylus, Mem. de l'Acad. vol. xxv. p. 265), but the various positions of figures, as they appear when looking upwards, downwards, and sideways; and he must therefore be considered as the first painter of perspective. It would appear from an epigram of Simonides (Anthol. Palat. ix. 758), that he was a contemporary of Dionysius, and belonged therefore to the 60th Olympiad; but as he was certainly more ancient, Klaw should in that passage be changed into Mycnon. (Böttiger, Archäol. d. Altert., p. 254, &c.; Müller, Hellen. ii. 99.)

[UL. U.]

CINADON (Κινάδων), the chief of a conspiracy against the Spartan peers (Δυσαίων), in the first year of Agesilaus II. (b. c. 396—397). This plot appears to have arisen out of the increased power of the ephors, and the more oligarchical character which the Spartan constitution had by this time assumed. (Thirlwall's Greece, iv. pp. 373—378; Manso's Sparta, iii. p. 219, &c.; Wachsmuth, Hellen. Altert. i. 2, pp. 214, 215, 260, 263.) Cinadon was a young man of personal accomplishment and courage, but not one of the peers. The design of his conspiracy was to assassinate all the peers, in order, as he himself said, "that he might have no superior in Lacedaemon." The first hint of its existence the plot was given by a soothsayer, who was assisting Agesilaus at a sacrifice. Five days afterwards, a person came to the ephors, and told them the following story: He had been taken, he said, into the agora by Cinadon, who asked him to count the Spartans there. He did so, and found that, including one of the kings, the ephors, the senators, and others, there were less than forty. "These," said Cinadon, "account your enemies, but the others in the agora, who are more than four thousand, your confederates." He then referred to the like dissipation which might be seen in the streets and in the country. The leaders of the conspiracy, Cinadon further told him, were Cinadon himself, but trustworthy; but their associates were in fact all the Helots, and Neodamodes, and Hypome-neses, who, if the Spartans were mentioned in their presence, were unable to conceal their ferocious hatred towards them. For arms, he added, there were at hand the knives, swords, spits, hatchets, and so forth, in the iron market; the rustics would use bludgeons and stones, and the artificers had each his own tools. Cinadon finally warned him, he said, to keep at home, for the time of action was at hand.

Upon hearing this account, the ephors called no assembly, but consulted with the senators as they happened to meet them. Cinadon, who had been at other times employed by the ephors on important commissions, was sent to Aulon in Messenia, with orders to take certain persons prisoners; but secret instructions were given to some young men who were sent with him, and the choice of whom was so managed as not to excite his suspicions. This step was taken because the ephors were ignorant of the main object of the conspirators. Accordingly, Cinadon was seized and tortured: letters were sent to Sparta mentioning the persons whom he had denounced as his confederates; and it is a remarkable proof of the formidable character of the conspiracy that among them was Tisamenus the Eleian, who had been admitted to the full franchise. (He- red. ix. 33.) Cinadon was then brought to Sparta, and he and the other conspirators were led in irons through the streets, and scourged as they went, and so they were put to death. (Xen. Hell. iii. 3, §§ 4—11; Aristot. Polit. v. 6, § 2.) [P. S.]

CINAETHON (Κίναθων), of Locrenaeon, one of the most fertile of the Cyclic poets, is placed by Eusebius (Chron. Ol. 3. 4) in B.c. 785. He was the author of a family of the Quinctia gens. Some of the Quinctii, (b. c. 519. (Niebuhr, vol. ii. note 927.) The only cognomen of this ground of his services under the dictators, Postumius and Aemilius. (Liv. iv. 41.)

CINCA (JENS, plebeian, of small importance. None of its members ever obtained the consulship: but they were always admitted to the office of decemvir. (Liv. iii. 35.) In the disputes about the law for opening the consulate to the plebeians, we find him the advocate of milder measures. (Liv. iv. 6.) In B.c. 439, at the age of eighty, he was a second time appointed dictator to oppose the alleged machinations of Spurius Maelius. (Liv. iv. 15—16.) This is the last event recorded of him. (Schol. ad Ptolemais, p. 243.)

CINAETHUS or CYNAAETHUS (Κιναθεύς or Κυναθεύς), of Chios, a rhapsoedit, who was generally supposed by the ancients to have been the author of the Homeric hymn to Apollo. He is said to have lived about the 69th Olympiad (n. c. 504), and to have been the first rhapsoedit of the Homeric poems at Syracuse. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ii. 1.) This date, however, is much too low, as the Sibylline books were authenticated with the Homeric poems long before. Welcker (Episcopi Cyclici, p. 243) therefore proposes to read κατὰ τὴν ἐκπαίδευσιν Ολ. instead of κατὰ τὴν ἐκπαίδευσιν Ολ. ΟΑ., and places him about B.C. 750. Cynaeus is charged by Eusebius (ad L. i. p. 16, ed. Polit.) with having interpolated the Homeric poems. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. p. 508.)

CYNCA GENS, plebeian, of small importance. None of its members ever obtained the consulship: the first Cincius who gained any of the higher offices of the state was L. Cincius Alimentus, praetor in B.C. 209. The only cognomen of this gens is ALIMENTUS: those who occur without a surname are given under CINCIUS.

CINCIUS, the name of a patrician family of the Quinctia gens. Some of the Quinctii, mentioned without a surname, probably belonged to this family.

CINCIUS L. P. L. N. CINCIUS, plays a conspicuous part in the civil and military transactions of the period in which he lived. He particularly distinguished himself as a violent oppointerest in the art of war, as to epitomise the Tactica of Aeneas (Aelian, Tact. 1); and this, no doubt, is the work to which Cicero refers when he speaks of Cicero's books de militari (Plut.
ix. 25). Dr. Arnold says Plutarch mentions his Commentaries, but it does not appear to what he refers. The historian writer referred to by Stumbo (viii. fn. p. 329) may be the same person.

The most famous passage in his life is his embassy to Rome, with proposals for peace from Pyrrhus, after the battle of Heraclea (U. c. 280).
Cinna spared no arts to gain favour. Thanks to his wonderful memory, on the day after his arrival he was able (we are told) to address all the senators and knights by name (Plin. H. N. vii. 24); and in after times stories were current that he sought to gain them over by offering presents to them and their wives, which, however, were disdainfully rejected. (Plut. Pyrrh. 18; Diod. Ec. Vat. xxii.; Livy. xxxiviv. 4.) The terms he had to offer were hard, viz. that all the Greeks in Italy should be left free, and that the Hannibalic law of Cinna should be restored to all the colonies that had forfeited to Rome. (Appian, Samn. Frugm. x.) Yet such was the need, and such the persuasiveness of Cinna, that the senate would probably have yielded, if the scale had not been turned by the dying eloquence of old Appius Caecens. [Claarus, No. 10.] The ambassador returned and told the king (say the Romans), that there was no people like that people,—their city was a temple, their senate an assembly of kings. Two years after (U. c. 278), when Pyrrhus was about to cross over into Sicily, Cinna was again sent to negotiate peace, but on easier terms; and though the senate refused to conclude a treaty while the king was in Italy, his minister's negotiations were in effect successful. (Appian, Samn. Frugm. xi.) Cina was then sent over to Sicily, according to his master's usual policy, to win all he could by persuasion, before he tried the sword. (Plut. Pyrrh.
22.) And this is the last we hear of him. He probably died before Pyrrhus returned to Italy in U. c. 276, and with him the star of his master's fortune set. He was (as Niebuhr says) the king's good genius, and his place was filled by unworthy favourites. [H. G. L.]

CINEIAS (Kineias), a dithyrambic poet of Athens. The Scholiast on Aristophanes (Rsea.
163) calls him a Theban, but this account seems to be virtually contradicted by Plutarch (de Glor.
Athen. 5), and may perhaps have arisen, as Fabricius suggests (Bibl. Græca. ii. p. 117), from confounding him with another person of the same name.
(Comp. Arist. ap. Schol. ad Aristoph. An. 1729.)
Fabricius himself mentions Evagoras as his father,
on the authority apparently of a corrupt fragment of Plato's comic poem, which is quoted by Gerons. (See Dalechamp, ad Athen. xii. p. 551.) In the "Gorgias" of Plato (p. 501, e) he is expressly called the son of Meles. His talents are said to have been of a very inferior order. Plutarch (l.c.) calls him a poet of no high repute or creative genius. The comic writer, Pherecrates (op. Plut.
de Mus. 30), accuses him of having introduced and corruptions into music, and to this Aristophanes perhaps alludes in the word εμπαθουκαμας. (Nub.
332.) In the "Birds" (1572-1409), he is introduced as wishing to fly up to Olympus to bring down from the clouds, their proper region, a fresh supply of "rambling odes, air-tost and snow-

beaten" (ἀποδοσθέον καὶ νυφόθεον ἀνάλος, comp. Aristot. Rhet. iii. 9 § 1). But he presented many salient points, besides the character of his poems, to the attacks of comedy. Athenaeus tells us (xiii. p. 551), that he was so tall and thin as to be obliged to wear, for the support of his body, a species of stays made of the wood of the linden tree. Hence Aristophanes (Αἰε. 1576) calls him φίλανθρωπος: hence, too (Ran. 1453), he makes Eu- ripides propose to fit Cinesias, by way of wings, to a fellow-poet, Cleorchus; and in a fragment of the Πυράγωρος (ap. Athen. l.c.) he speaks of him as a fit ambassador from the Dithyrambic poets to their shadowy brethren of the craft in Hades. (Comp. Strattis, ap. Athen. i. c.; Dalechamp, ad loc., and the authors there referred to.) A more legitimate ground of satire was furnished by his impiety, which was open and excessive, and his very profligate life; and we learn from Lysias, the orator (ap. Athen. l.c.), who himself attacked him in two orations,—now lost with the exception of the fragment here referred to,—that not a year passed in which he was not assailed on this score by the comic poets. He had his revenge however; for he succeeded in procuring (probably about b.c. 386) the abolition of the Choragia, as far as regarded comedy, which had indeed been declining ever since the Archonship of Callinus in 334 b.c. 406. In consequence of this Strattis attacked him in his play called "Cinesias." (Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 404; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 497; Böckh, Publ. Ec. of Athens, bk. iii. ch. 22; Clinton, sub anmns 406, 388, 337.) From Lysias also (ap. Athen. l.c.) we learn, that Cinesias abandoned prudently the practice of his art, and betook himself to the trade of an informer, which he found a very profitable one. (Comp. Perizon. ad Ad. V. H. iii. 8, x. 6; Schol. ad Aristoph. lli. ii.; Plut. de Superst. 10; Harpoct. and Suid. s. v. Kunjala.) [E. E.]

CINETERIX, a Gaul, one of the first men in the city of the Treviri (Trèves, Trier). He attached himself to the Romans, though son-in-law to Indutiusinus, the head of the independent party. When this leader had been put to death by order of Caesar, he was promoted to be chief of his native city (Cic. B. G. v. 3, 44—46, vili.). Caesar (B. G. v. 22) mentions another Cineterix, a chief of the Kentish Britons. [H. G. L.]

Yet Cinsa's first act as consul was to impeach Sulla (Cic. in Cat. iii. 10, Brut. 47, Tusc. Caesar, dictionary, he went with M. Perpema to join Sertorius in Spain. (Suet. Caes. 5; Plut. Sert. 15.) Caesar, his brother-in-law, wishing to make use of him against the party of the senate, procured his recall from exile. But his father had been proscribed by Sulla, and young Cinna was by the laws of proscription unable to hold office, till Caesar, when dictator, had them repealed. He was not elected praetor till b. c. 44. By that time he had become discontented with Caesar's government; and though he would not join the conspirators, he approved of their act. And so great was the rage of the mob against him, that notwithstanding he was praetor, they nearly murdered him; nay, they did murder Helvius Cinna, tribune of the plebs, whom they mistook for the praetor, though he was at the time walking in Caesar's funeral procession. (Plut. Brut. 18, Caes. 63; Suet. Caes. 52, 85, &c.; Val. Max. ix. 9. § 1.) Cicero praises him for not taking any province (Philipp. ill. 10); but it may be doubted whether the conspirators gave him the choice, for the praetor does not seem to have been taking any province at the time walking in Caesar's funeral procession. (Plut. Brut. 16, Caes. 63; Suet. Caes. 52, 85, &c.; Val. Max. ix. 9. § 1.)

4. CINNA, probably brother of the last, served as quaestor under Dolabella against Brutus. (Plut. Brut. 25; Cic. Philipp. x. 6.)

5. CN. CORNELIUS CINNA MAGNUS, son of No. 3, and therefore grandson of Pompey, whence he received the surname of Magnus. Though he sided with Antony against Octavius, he was preferred to a priesthood by the conqueror, and became consul in a. d. 5. (Senece. de Clem. i. 9; Dion Cass. iv. 14. 22.)

The name of Cinna occurs, in the form of Cina, on asses, semisses, and trientes. A specimen of one of these forms is given below: the obverse represents the head of Janus, the reverse the prow of a ship.

6. CINNA, C. HE'LVIIUS, a poet of considerable renown, was the contemporary, companion, and friend of Catullus. (Catull. x., xcv., exiii.) The year of his birth is totally unknown, but the day of his death is generally supposed to be a matter of common notoriety; for Suetonius (Caes. 85) informs us, that immediately after the funeral of Julius Caesar the rabble rushed with fire-brands to the houses of Brutus and Cassius, but having been with difficulty driven back, chanced to encounter Helvius Cinna, and mistaking him, from the resemblance of name, for Cornelius Cinna, who but the day before had delivered a violent harangue against the late dictator, they killed him on the spot, and bore about his head stuck on a spear. The same story is repeated almost in the same words by Valerius Maximus (ix. 2. § 1), by Appian (B. C. ii. 147), and by Dion Cassius (xiv. 50), with this addition, that they all three call Helvius Cinna a tribune of the plebeians, and Suetonius himself in a previous chapter (50) had spoken of Helvius Cinna as a tribune, who was to have brought forward a law authorizing Caesar to marry whom he pleased and as many as he pleased, in order to make sure of an heir. Plutarch likewise (Caes. 68) tells us that Cinna, a friend of Caesar's, was torn to pieces under the supposition that he was Cinna, one of the conspirators. None of the above authorities take any notice of Cinna being a poet; but Plutarch, as if to supply the omission, when relating the circumstances over again in the life of Brutus (c. 20), expressly describes the victim of this unhappy blunder as ποιητής ἁδρός (ποιητής ἁδρός — the reading ποιητῆς ἁδρός being a conjectural emendation of Xylander). The chain of evidence thus appearing complete, scholars have, with few exceptions, concluded that Helvius Cinna, the tribune, who perished thus, was the same with Helvius Cinna the poet; and the story of his dream, as narrated by Plutarch (Caes. l. c.) has been embodied by Shakespeare in his Julius Caesar.

Weichert, however, following in the track of Reiske and J. H. Voss, refuses to admit the identity of the poet and the tribune. In support of this view, he argues that, since Varius was alive at this epoch, Cinna must have been alive also; that the Cinna here celebrated can be no other than Helvius Cinna; and that inasmuch as Helvius Cinna was alive in b. c. 40, he could not have been murdered in b. c. 44. But, although the conclusion is undeniable if we admit the premises, it will be at once seen that these form a chain, each separate link of which is a pure hypothesis. Allowing that the date of the pastoral has been correctly fixed, although this cannot be proved, we must bear in mind—1. That Varius cannot be proved, we must bear in mind—1. That Varius is the reading in every MS. 2. That even if Varius be adopted, the expression in the above verses might have been used with perfect propriety in reference to any bard who had been a contemporary of Virgil, although recently dead. 3. That we have no right to assert dogmatically that the Cinna of Virgil must be C. Helvius Cinna, the friend of Catullus. Hence, although we may grant that it is not absolutely certain that Helvius Cinna the tribune and Helvius Cinna the poet were one and the same, at all events this opinion rests upon much stronger evidence than the other.

The great work of C. Helvius Cinna was his Smyrna; but neither Catullus, by whom it is highly extolled (xcv.), nor any other ancient writer gives us a hint with regard to the subject, and hence the various speculations in which critics have indulged rest upon no basis whatsoever. Some believe that it contained a history of the adventures of Smyrna the Amazon, to whom the famous city of Ionia ascribed its origin; others that it was connected with the myth of Adonis and with the legend of Myrrha, otherwise named Smyrna, the incestuous daughter of Cinyras; at all events, it certainly was not a drama, as a commentator upon Quintilian has dreamed; for the fragments, short and unsatisfactory as they are, suffice to demonstrate that it belonged to the epic style. These consist of two disjointed hexameters preserved by Priscian (vi. 16. § 84, ed. Kruehl) and the Scholiast on Juvenal (vi. 155); and two consecutive lines given by Servius (ad Virg. Georg. i. 288), which are not without merit in so far as melodic variations is concerned.

The circumstance that nine years were spent in the elaboration of this piece has frequently dwelt upon, may have suggested the well-known precept of Horace, and unquestionably secured the suffrage of the grammarians. (Catull. xcv.; Quintil. x. 4. § 4; Serv. and Philargyr. ad Virg. Ecl. ix. 35; Hor. A. P. 387, and the comments of Acro, Porphyry, and the Schol. Crnq.; Martian, Eph. x. 31; Gel. xix. 9, 13; Sueton. de Istrat. Gramm. 16.)

Besides the Smyrna, he was the author of a work entitled Propriacipon Pollicis, which Voss imagines to have been dedicated to Asinus Pollio when setting forth in n. c. 40 on an expedition against the Pardhini of Dalmatia, from which he returned in triumph the following year, and founded the first public library ever opened at Rome from the profits of the spoils. This rests of course upon the assumption that Cinnas was not killed in n. c. 44, and until that fact is decided, it is vain to reason upon the subject, for the fragments, which extend to six hexameter lines, of which four are consecutive, throw no light on the question. (Charis. Instit. Gramm. p. 95, ed. Putzch; Isidor. Orig. xix. 2, 4.)

Lastly, in Isidorus (vi. 12) we find four elegiac verses, while one hexameter in Suetonius (de Illest. Gramm. 11), one hexameter and two hendecasyllables in Ocellus (ix. 12, xix. 13), and two scraps in Nonius Marcellus (s. v. Collas. c. marn), are quoted from the "Pocmata," and "Epigrumata" of Cinnas. The class to which some of these fugitive essays belonged may be inferred from the words of Ovid in his apology for the Ars Amatoria. (Trist. ii. 435.) (Weichert, Poetar. Latin. Reliq.)

CINNAMUS, JOANNES (Τουτελευς Κιναμαος), also called CIMNAMUS (Κιναμαος), and SINNAMUS (Σιναμαος), one of the most distinguished Byzantine historians, and the best European historian of his time, lived in the twelfth century of the Christian era. He was one of the "Grammatici" or "Notarii" of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, who reigned from A. D. 1143 till 1180. The functions of the imperial notaries, the first of whom was the pseudo-notarius, were nearly those of private secretaries appointed for both private and state affairs, and they had a considerable influence upon the administration of the empire. Cinnasmus was attached to the person of Manuel at a youthful age, and probably as early as the year of his accession, and he accompanied that great emperor in his numerous wars in Asia as well as in Europe. Favoured by such circumstances, he undertook to write the history of the reign of Manuel, and that of his predecessor and father, the emperor Calo-Joannes; and so well did he accomplish his task, that there is no history written at that period which can be compared with his work. The full title of this work is Ετεροτα των καταραθμων των μακαριτω βασιλεω και πορφυροηγαντω κυριω κατα την Κομνην, και έρημητω των πραξεων των ανδρων, των αδοι τω βασιλεω και πορφυροηγαντω κυριω (History of the Comnen, and the Memoirs of the Emperors, and of the Acts of the Emperors, and of the Purple-HungV King).

CINNAMUS, Τουτελευς Κιναμαος. Της κομνηνι πολυηθεσθε ιεως βασιλεω γραμματης Κυριω. It is divided into six books, or more correctly into seven, the seventh, however, being not finished; it is not known if the author wrote more than seven books; but as to the seventh, which in the Paris edition forms the end of the sixth and last book, it is evidently mutilated, as it ends abruptly in the account of the siege of Iconium by the emperor Manuel in 1176. As Cinnamus was still alive when Manuel died (1180), it is almost certain that he finished the history of his whole reign; and the loss of the latter part of his work is the more to be regretted, as it would undoubtedly have thrown light on many circumstances connected with the conduct of the Greek aristocracy, and especially of Andronicus Commenus, afterwards emperor, during the short reign of the infant son and successor of Manuel, Alexis II.

In the first book Cinnamus gives a short and concise account of the reign of Calo-Joannes, and in the following he relates the reign of Manuel. Possessed of great historical knowledge, Cinnamus records the events of his time as a man accustomed to form an opinion of his own upon important affairs; and, being himself a statesman who took part in the administration of the empire, and enjoyed the confidence of the emperor Manuel, he is always master of his subject, and never sacrifices leading circumstances to amusing trifles. His knowledge was not confined to the political state of the Greek empire; he was equally well acquainted with the state of Italy, Germany, Hungary, and the adjoining barbarous kingdoms, the Latin principalities in the East, and the empires of the Persians and Turks. His view of the origin of the power of the popes, in the fifth book, is a fine instance of historical criticism, sound and true without being a tedious and dry investigation, and producing the effect of a powerful speech. He is, however, often violent in his attacks on the papal power, and is justly reproached with being prejudiced against the Latin princes, although he deserves that reproach much less than Nicetas and Anna Comnenus. His praise of the emperor Manuel is exaggerated, but he is very far from making a romantic hero of him, as Anna Comnenus did of the emperor Alexis. Cinnamus is partial and jealous of his enemies, rivals, or such as are above him; he is impartial and just where he deals with his equals, or those below him, or such persons and events as are indifferent to him personally. In short, Cinnamus shows that he was a Byzantine Greek. His style is concise and clear, except in some instances, where he embalms his thoughts in rhetorical figures or poetical ornaments of more show than beauty. This defect also is common to his countrymen; and if somebody would undertake to trace the origin of the deviation of the writers, poets, and artists among the later Greeks from the classical models left them by their forefathers, he would find it in the supernatural tendency of minds imbued with Christianism being in perpetual contact with the sensualism of the Mohammedan faith and the showy materialism of Eastern imagination. Xenophon, Thucydides, and Procopius were the models of Cinnamus; and though he cannot be compared with the two former, still he may be ranked with Procopius, and he was not unworthy to be the disciple of such masters. His work will ever be of interest to the scholar and the historian.
CIOS.

Leo Allatius made Cinnamnus an object of deep study, and intended to publish his work; so did Petrus Possinus also; but, for some reason or unknown, they renounced their design. The first edition is that of Cornelius Tollius, with a Latin translation and some notes of no great consequence, Utrecht, 1652, 4to. Tollius dedicated this edition, which he divided into four books, to the states of Utrecht, and in his preface gives a brilliant description of the literary merits of Cinnamnus. The second edition is that in the Paris collection of the Byzantines by Du Cange, published at Paris, 1670, fol., together with the description of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, by Paulus Silentiarius, and the editor's notes to Nicephorus Bryennius and Anna Comnena. It is divided into six books. Du Cange corrected the text, added a new Latin translation, such of the notes of Tollius as were of some importance, and an excellent philological-historical commentary of his own; he dedicated his work to the minister Colbert, one of the principal protectors of the French editors of the Byzantines. This edition has been reprinted in the Venice collection, 1729, fol. Cinnamnus has lately been published at Bonn, 1836, 3vo., together with Nicephorus Bryennius, by Augustus Meinecke; the work is divided into seven books. The editor gives the Latin translation of Du Cange revised in several instances, and the prefaces, dedications, and commentaries of Tollius and Du Cange. (Hankius, De Script. Byzant. Graec. p. 516, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 733, &c.; the Prefaces and Dedications of Tollius and Du Cange; Leo Allatius, De Psall. p. 24, &c.) [W. P.]

CINYRAS (Κινυρας), a famous Cyprian hero. According to the common tradition, he was a son of Apollo by Paphos, king of Cyprus, and priest of the Paphian Aphrodite, which latter office remained hereditary in his family, the Cinyradae. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 26, &c.; Tac. Hist. ii. 8, Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 109.) Tacitus describes him as having come to Cyprus from Cilicia, from whence he introduced the worship of Aphrodite; and Apollo-dorus (iii. 14. § 3) too calls him a son of Sandacus, who had emigrated from Syria to Cilicia. Cinyrnas, according to some traditions, he begot unwittingly in an incestuous intercourse with his own daughter, Smyra. He afterwards killed himself on discovering this crime, into which he had been led by the anger of Apollo. (Hygin. Fab. 26, 292; Antonin. Lib. 34; Ov. Met. x. 310, &c.) Cinyrnas was promised to assist Agamemnon and the Greeks in their war against Troy; but, as he did not keep his word, he was cursed by Agamemnon, and Apollo took vengeance upon him by entering into a contest with him, in which he was defeated and slain. (Hom. H. ii. 20, with the note of Eustath.) His daughters, fifty in number, leaped into the sea, and were metamorphosed into alcyones. He is also described as the founder of the town of Cinycrea in Cyprus. (Plin. H. N. v. 31; Nonn. Dionys. xiii. 451.) [L. S.]

CIPUS or CIPPUS, GENU'CIUS, a Roman praetor, to whom an extraordinary prodigy is said to have happened. For, as he was going out of the gates of the city, clad in the paludamentum, horns suddenly grew out of his head, and it was said by the superstitious that if he returned to the city, he would be king: but lest this should happen, he imposed voluntary exile upon himself. (Val. Max. v. 6, § 3; Ov. Met. xv. 565, &c.; Plin. H. N. xii. 37. s. 45.)

CIRCE (Κιρκέ), a mythical sorceress, whom Homer calls a fair-locked goddess, a daughter of Helios by the oceanid Perse, and a sister of Aëtes. (Od. x. 193.) She lived in the island of Aeaea; and when Odysseus on his wanderings came to her island, Circe, after having changed several of his companions into pigs, became so much attached to the unfortunate hero, that he was induced to remain a whole year with her. At length, when he wished to leave her, she prevailed upon him to descend into the lower world to consult the seer Teiresias. After his return from thence, she explained to him the dangers which he would yet have to encounter, and then dismissed him. (Ov. lib. x.—xii.; comp. Hygin. Fab. 125.) Her descent is differently described by the poets, for some call her a daughter of Hyperion and Aëre (Orph. Argou. 1215), and others a daughter of Aëtes and Hecate. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 200.) According to Hesiod (Theog. 1011) she became by Odysseus the mother of Agrius. The Latin poets too make great use of the story of Circe, the sorceress, who metamorphosed Scylla and Piers, king of the Anasians. (Ov. Met. xiv. 9, &c.) [L. S.]

CIRRHA (Κιρρή), a nymph from whom the town of Cirrha in Phocis was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. x. 37. § 4.) [L. S.]

CISPIA GENS, plebeian, which came originally from Anagnia, a town of the Hernici. An ancient tradition related that Cispus Laenus, of Anagnia, came to Rome to protect the city, while Tullus Hostilius was engaged in the siege of Veii, and that he occupied with his forces one of the two hills of the Esquiline, which was called after him the Cispus mons, in the same way as Oppius of Tusculum did the other, which was likewise called after him the Oppius mons. (Pestus, s. v. Septimontium, Cispia mons; Varro. L. L. v. 30, ed. with the name M. CIP. M. v. upon them, but it is not impossible that they may belong to the Cispia gens, as the omission of a letter in a name is by no means of uncommon occurrence on Roman coins.
Müller, where the name is also written Cepheus and Cepheus.)

No persons of this name, however, occur till the very end of the republic. The only cognomen of the gens is Laevus; for those whose surname is not mentioned, see Cipcius.

CIPSIUS. 1. M. CIPSIUS, tribune of the plebs, n. c. 57, the year in which Cicero was recalled from banishment, took an active part in Cicero's favour. The father and brother of Cipcius also exerted themselves to obtain Cicero's recall, although he had had in former times a law-suit with the family. On one occasion the life of Cipcius was in danger through his support of Cicero; he was attacked by the mob of Clodius, and driven out of the forum. In return for these services Cicero defended Cipcius when he was accused of bribery (ambitus), but was unable to obtain a verdict in his favour. (Cic. pro. Planc. 31, post red. in Sen., pro Stat. 35.)

Citerius. One of Caesar's officers in the African war, commanded part of the fleet. (Hirt. B. Afr. 62, 67.) He is perhaps the same as the Cipcius Laevus, whom Plancius mentions in a letter to Cicero in n. c. 43. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 21.)

3. CIPSIUS, a debtor of Cicero's. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 24, xiii. 33.) Whether he is the same as either of the preceding, is uncertain.

CISSEUS (Kurio), a king in Thrace, and father of Thaneo or, according to others, of Hecabe. (Hom. ii. vi. 295, xi. 223; Eurip. Hec. 3; Hygin. Fob. 91; Virg. Aen. vii. 720; Serv. ad Aen. v. 535.) There are two other mythical beings of the name of Cisseeus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5; Virg. Aen. x. 317.)

CISSIDAS (Koio5as), a Syracusan, commanded the body of auxiliaries which Dionysius I. sent, for the second time, to aid of Sparta. (n. c. 367.) He assisted Archidamus in his successful attack on Carystus, and in his expedition against Arcadia in the same year. But during the campaign in Arcadia he left him, as the period fixed for his stay by Dionysus had now expired. On his march towards Laconia he was intercepted by a body of Messenians, and was obliged to send to Archidamus for assistance. The prince having joined him with his forces, they changed their route, but were again intercepted by the combined troops of the Arcadians and Argives. The result was, the defeat of the latter in that which has been called the "Tearless Battle." (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 26-32; see p. 267, b.)

CITERIUS SIDONIUS, the author of an epigram on three shepherds, which has no poetical merits, and is only remarkable for its quaintness. It is printed in Wernsdorff’s Poetae Latini Minores (vol ii. p. 215), and in the Anthologia Latina (ii. Ep. 257, ed. Burmann, Ep. 253, ed. Meyer). Its author appears to be the same as the Citerius, one of the professors at Bourdeaux, and the friend of Ausonius, commemorated in a poem of the latter. (Prof. Burdig. xiii.) We learn from Ausonius that Citerius was born at Syraeae, in Sicily, and was a grammarian and a poet. In his hyperbolic panegyric, Ausonius compares him to Aristaeus and Zenoetodus, and says that his poems, written at an early age, were superior to those of Simondes. Citerius afterwards settled at Bourdeaux, married a rich and noble wife, but died without leaving any children.

CITHAERON (Kitha'rōn), a mythical king in Boeotia, from whom mount Cithaeron was believed to have derived its name. Once when Hera was angry with Zeus, Cithaeron advised the latter to take into his chariot a wooden statue and dress it up so as to make it resemble Phasaeus, the daughter of Aesculapius. Zeus followed his counsel, and as he was riding along with his pretended bride, Hera, overcome by her jealousy, ran up to him, tore the covering from the suspected bride, and on discovering that it was a statue, became reconciled to Zeus. (Paus. ix. 1. § 2, 3. § 1.) Respecting the festival of the Daedala, celebrated to commemorate this event, see Dict. of Ant. s. v. [L. S.]

CIVICA CEREA LIS. [Cerealis.]

CIVILIS, ClAUDIUS, was the leader of the Batavi in their revolt from Rome, a. d. 69-70. The Batavi were a people of Germanic origin, who had left the nation of the Catti, of which they were a part, and had settled in and about the island which is formed by the mouths of the Rhine (Rheno-Merovia) and Meuse (Mania). The important position which they occupied led the Romans to cultivate their friendship, and they rendered good service to Rome in the wars in Germany and Britain, under the early emperors. When Rome gave up the idea of subduing Germany, the nations west of the Rhine, especially those of Germanic origin, began to feel a hope of setting themselves free. The civil wars afforded an opportunity for the attempt, and the oppressions of the imperial legates furnished the provocation. It was out of such an act of oppression that the rebellion of Civilis sprung. *

Julius Paulus and Claudius Civilis were brothers* of the Batavian royal race, and excelled all their nation in personal accomplishments. On a false charge of treason, Nero's legate, Fontinius Capito, put Julius Paulus to death, a. d. 67 or 68, and sent Civilis in chains to Nero at Rome, where he was heard and acquitted by Galba. He was afterwards prefect of a cohort, but under Vittilius he became an object of suspicion to the army, who demanded his punishment. (Compare Tac. Hist. i. 59.) He escaped the danger, but he did not forget the affront. He thought of Hannibal and Sertorius, like whom he had lost an eye; and, being endowed, says Tacitus, with greater mental power than is common among barbarians, he began the execution of his schemes of enmity to Rome under the pretence of supporting the cause of Vespasian. In order to understand the events which occurred at this period in the Germanies and Gaul, it must be remembered that the legions of Germany were Vitellius's own troops, who had called him to the purple, and who remained steadfast to his cause to the very last. The legates, on the other hand, early chose the side of Vespasian, and it was not without reason that they were accused by their soldiers of treasonable

* In the following narrative it is necessary to bear in mind the distinction between Germany, properly so called, and the two Gallic provinces on the left bank of the Rhine, which, from their population being chiefly of Germanic origin, were called the Germanies (Germania Inferior, and Germania Superior). The scene of the war with Civilis was on the left bank of the Rhine, and chiefly in Germania Inferior.

† Tacitus (Hist. i. 59) also calls Civillis Julius, and so do other writers. (Plut. Petr. 25, p. 770: where, however, Julius Titur is possibly meant; Frontin. Strat. iv. 3. § 14.)
eminent at the progress of the insurrection on the Rhine. (See especially Tacit. Hist. iv. 27.) Thus Civilis was urged by a letter from Antonius Primus, and by a personal request from Hordeonius Flaccus, to prevent the German legions from marching into Italy to the support of Vitellius, by the appearance of a Germanic insurrection; an appearance which Civilis himself resolved to convert into a reality. His designs were aided by an edict of Vitellius, calling for a levy of the Batavians, and still more by the harshness with which the command was executed; for feeble old men were compelled to pay for exemption from service, and beautiful boys were seized for the vilest purposes. Irritated by these cruelties, and urged by Civilis and his confederates, the Batavians refused the levy; and Civilis having, according to the ancient German custom, called a solemn meeting at night in a sacred grove, easily bound the chiefs of the Batavians by an oath to revolt. Messengers were sent to secure the assistance of the Canninefates, another Germanic tribe, living on the same island, and others to try the fidelity of the Batavian cohorts, which had formerly served in Britain, and were now stationed at Magontiacum, as a part of the Roman army on the Rhine. The first of these missions was completely successful. The Canninefates chose Brinno for their chief; and he, having joined to himself the Frisii, a nation beyond the Rhine, attacked the furthest winter quarters of the Romans, and compelled them to retire from their forts. Upon this, Civilis, still dissembling, accused the prefects, because they had deserted the camp, and declared that with his single cohort he would repress the revolt of the Canninefates. He thereby led the mind of the prefects to believe that he, himself, was about to abandon the service of the Roman empire. His treachery was, however, soon seen through, and he found himself compelled openly to join the insurgents. At the head of the Canninefates, Frisii, and Batavi, he engaged the Romans on the bank of the Rhine. In the midst of the battle, a cohort of the Tungri deserted to Civilis, and decided the battle on the land; but, being still unwilling to commit himself to the fate of his legions, he was forced by his soldiers to resist their march. Civilis was now at the head of a complete army; but, being still unwilling to commit himself to an open contest with the Roman power, he caused his followers to take the oath to Vespasian, and sent envoys to the two legions which, as above related, had taken refuge in Vetera Castra, to induce them to take the same oath. Enraged at their refusal, he called to arms the whole nation of the Batavi, who were joined by the Bructeri and Teuterci, while emissaries were sent into Germany to rouse the people. The Roman legates, Mammius Lupercus and Numinius Rufus, strengthened the fortifications of Vetera Castra. Civilis marched down both banks of the Rhine, having ships also on the river, and blockaded the camp, after a fruitless attempt to storm it. The operations of Hordeonius Flaccus were retarded by Vespasian's anxiety to serve Vespasian, and the mistrust of his soldiers, to whom this inclination was no secret; and he was at last compelled to give up the command to Dillius Vocula. The dissections at this period in the Roman camp are described elsewhere. [HORDEONIUS FLACCU S; HERENNIUS GALLUS; DILLIUS VOCULA.] Civilis, in the meantime, having been joined by large forces from all Germany, proceeded to harass the tribes of Gaul west of the Moselle, even as far as the Menapii and Morini, on the sea shore, in order to shake their fidelity to the Romans. His efforts were more especially directed against the Treviri and the Ubii. The Ubii were firm in their faith, and suffered severely in consequence. He then pressed on the siege of Vetera Castra, and, yielding to the ardent of his new allies beyond the Rhine, tried again to storm it. The effort failed, and he had recourse to attempts to tamper with the besieged soldiery.

These events occurred towards the end of A.D. 69, before the battle of Cremona, which decided the victory of Vespasian over Vitellius. [VESPA SI ANUS.] When the news of that battle reached the Roman army on the Rhine, ALP I NUS MONTANUS was sent to Civilis to summon him to lay down his arms; but, being the more established by the fact, since his professed object was now accomplished. The only result of this mission was, that Civilis sowed the seeds of dissention in the envoy's mind. Civilis now sent against Vocula his veteran cohorts and the bravest of the Germans, under the command of Julius Maximus, and Claudius Victor, his sister's son, who, having taken on their march the winter quarters of an auxiliary co/a, at Asculiurgium, fell suddenly upon the camp of Vocula, which was only saved by the arrival of unexpected aid. Civilis and Vocula are both blamed by Tacitus, the former for not sending a sufficient force, the latter for neglecting to follow up his victory. Civilis now attempted to gain over the legions who were besieged in Vetera Castra, by pretending that he had conquered Vocula, but one of the captives whom he paraded before the walls for this purpose, shouted out and revealed the truth, his credit, as Tacitus observes, being the more established by the fact, that he was stabbed to death by the Germans on the spot. Shortly afterwards, Vocula marched up to the relief of Vetera Castra, and defeated Civilis, but again neglected to follow up his victory, most probably from design. [VOCULA.] Civilis soon again reduced the Romans to great want of provisi ons, and forced them to retire to Gelduba, and thence to Novesium, while he again invaded Vetera Castra, and took Gelduba. The Romans were analy zed by new dimensions [HORDEONIUS FLACCU S; VOCULA], suffered another defeat from Civi-
At the beginning of the new year (A. D. 70), the war assumed a fresh and more formidable character. The news of the death of Vitellius exasperated the Roman soldiers, encouraged the insurgents, and shook the fidelity of the Gauls; while a rumour was moreover circulated that the winter quarters of the Moesian and Pannonian legions were besieged by the Dacians and Sarmatians; and above all the burning of the Capitol was esteemed an omen of the approaching end of the Roman empire. Civilis, whose last remnant of dissimulation was necessarily torn away by the death of Vitellius, gave his unfettered energies to the work, and was joined by Classicus and Julius Tutor, who at length gained over the army of Vezula. [Classicus; Tutor; Sabinus.] The besieged legions at Vetera Castra could now hold out no longer; they capitulated to Civilis, and took the oath in verba Gaullarum, but as they marched away, they were all put to death by the Germans, probably not without the connivance of Civilis. That chief, having at length performed his vow of emnity to the Romans, now cut off his hair which, according to the custom of the Germans, he had suffered to grow since the beginning of his enterprise. (Tac. Germ. 31.) Neither Civillis nor any others of the Batavians took the oath in verba Gaullarum, which was the watchword of Classicus and Tutor, for they trusted that, after having disposed of the Romans, they should be able to overpower the Gallic allies. Civillis and Classicus now destroyed all the Roman winter camps, except those at Mogontiacum and Vindonissa. The Germans demanded the destruction of Colonia Agrippinensis, but it was at length spared, chiefly through the gratitude of Civilis, whose son had been kept in safety there since the beginning of the war. Civilis now gained over several neighbouring states. He was opposed by his old enemy Claudius Labeo, at the head of an irregular force of Betasii, Tungri, and Nervii; and, by a daring act of courage, he not only decided the victory, but gained the alliance of the Tungri and the other tribes. The attempt, however, to unite all Gaul in the revolt completely failed, the Treviri and the Lingones being the only people who joined the insurgents. [Sabinus.] The reports of these events which were carried to Rome had at length roused Macrinus, who now sent an immense army to the Rhine, under Petullus Claudius and Annius Gallus. The insurgents were divided among themselves, Civilis was busy among the Belgae, trying to crush Claudius Labeo; Classicus was quietly enjoying his new empire; while Tutor neglected the important duty, which had been assigned to him, of guarding the Upper Rhine and the passes of the Alps. Cerealis had therefore little difficulty in overcoming the Treviri and regaining their capital. [Tutor; Valentinus.] While he was stationed there he received a letter from Civilis and Classicus, informing him that Vespanian was dead, and offering him the empire of the Gauls. Civilis now wished to wait for succours from beyond the Rhine, but the opinion of Tutor and Classicus prevailed, and a battle was fought on the Moesela in which the Romans, though greatly outnumbered, gained a complete victory, and destroyed the enemy's camp. Colonia Agrippinensis now came over to the Romans; but Civilis and Classicus still made a brave stand. The Canninefates destroyed the greater part of a Roman fleet, and defeated a body of the Nervii, who, after submitting to Fabius Priscus, the Roman legate, had of their own accord attacked their former allies. Having renewed his army from Germany, Civilis encamped at Vetera Castra, whither Cerealis also marched with increased forces, both leaders being eager for a decisive battle. It was soon fought, and Cerealis gained the victory by the treachery of a Batavian; but, as the Romans had no fleet, the Germans escaped across the Rhine. Here Civilis was joined by reinforcements from the Channel; and, after making, with Verux, Classicus, and Tutor, one more effort which was partially successful, to hold his ground in the island of the Batavi, he was again defeated by Cerealis, and driven back across the Rhine. Emissaries were sent by Cerealis to make private offers of peace to the Batavians, and with pardon to Civilis, who found that he had no alternative but to surrender. He obtained an interview with Cerealis on a bridge of the river Vahalis. The History of Tacitus breaks off suddenly just after the commencement of his speech. (Tac. Hist. iv. 12–17, 54–79, v. 14–26. Joseph. Bell. Jud. vii. 4, § 2; Dion Cass. lxxvi. 3.) CLANIS, the name of two mythical beings. (Ov. Met. i. 140,xiv. 376.) [L. S.] CLARA, DEDIA, daughter of the emperor Diocletian. She was married to Cornelius Repentium, who was appointed praefectus urbi in the room of Flavius Suplicianus; she received the title of Augusta upon her father's accession, and was deprived of it at his death. Her effigy appears upon coins, but these are of great rarity. (Sparrian. Julian. 3, 8; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 151.) [W. R.] CLARIUS (Kaepos), a surname of Apollo, derived from his celebrated temple at Claros in Asia Minor, which had been founded by Manto, the daughter of Telivias, who, after the conquest of her native city of Thebes, was made over to the Delphic god, and was then sent into the country, where subsequently Colophon was built by the Ionians. (Paus. vii. 3, § 1, ix. 23, § 1; Taet. Amn. ii. 54; Strab. xiv. p. 642; Virg. Aen. iii. 360; comp. Muller, Dor. ii. 2, § 7.) Clarius also occurs as a surname of Zeus, describing him as the god who distributes things by lot (Kaepos or Kaepos, Aeschyl. Suppl. 360). A hill near Tegea was sacred to Zeus under this name. (Paus. viii. 53, § 4.) [L. S.] CLARUS, a cognomen of a noble Roman family in the second century of the Christian era. I. C. Septicius Clarus, a brother of No. 2, and an uncle of No. 3, was an intimate friend of the younger Pliny, who dedicated to him his Epistles, and speaks of him as one "quo nihil verius, nihil simplicius, nihil candidius, nihil fidei novior" (Ep. ii. 8). Several of Pliny's Epistles are addressed to him (i. 15, vi. 26, viii.). Clarus was appointed Praefectus Praetorio by Hadrian, but removed from this office soon afterwards, having, like most of Hadrian's other friends, incurred his suspicion. (Spartian. 3rd. 11, 15.)

2. M. ERUCIUS CLARUS, brother of the preceding, is spoken of by Pliny (Ep. ii. 9), as a man of honour, integrity, and learning, and well skilled in pleading causes. He is probably the same as the Erucius Clarus who took and burnt Seleuceia, in conjunction with Julius Alexander, in A.D. 115 (Dion Cass. lviii. 30), and also the same as the M. Erucius Clarus, who was consul successively with Titus Julius Alexander, in A.D. 117, the year of Trajan's death.

3. SEX. ERUCIUS CLARUS, son of No. 2, was also a friend of Pliny, who obtained for him from Trajan the lotus clavus, which admitted him to the lotus clavus in a. d. 170, with M. Cornelius Cethegus (Fast). During the first part of the war with Niger, who had been twice consul. (Gell. vi. 6, xiii. 17.) The same author that he was praefect of the city, and says that he was most devoted to the study of ancient literature; we also learn from the inscription, that he was consul a second time in A.D. 146, with Cn. Claudius Severus. One of Pliny's Epistles (i. 15), is addressed to him.

4. C. ERUCIUS CLARUS, consul in A.D. 170, with M. Cornelius Cethegus (Fast.), was probably the son of No. 3, and the same as the Praefectus Vigilium mentioned in the Digest. (1. tit. 15. s. 3. § 2.)

5. C. (JULIUS) ERUCIUS CLARUS, probably the son of No. 4, was consul in A.D. 193, with Q. Sosius Falco. The emperor Commodus had determined to murder both consuls, as they entered upon their office on the 1st of January, but he was himself assassinated on the preceding day. (Dion Cass. lxviii. 22; Capitol. Periti. 15.) After the death of Niger, who had been one of the claimants to the vacant throne, Severus wished Clarus to turn informer, and accuse persons falsely of having assisted Niger, partly with the view of destroying the character of Clarus, and partly that the well-known integrity of Clarus might give an appearance of justice to the unjust judgments that might be pronounced. But as Clarus refused to discharge this disgraceful office, he was put to death by Severus. (Dion Cass. lviii. 9; Spartan. Sever. 13.)

CLASSICUS, JULIUS, a Trevir, was prefect of an ala of the Treviri in the Roman army on the Rhine, under Vitellius, a.D. 69 (Tac. Hist. ii. 14), and afterwards joined Celsus at the head of some of the Treviri in his rebellion against the Romans, A.D. 70. During the war with Grilus, the Treviri, like the rest of Gaul, remained firm to the Romans. They even fortified their borders, and opposed the Germans in great battles. (Tac. Hist. iv. 37.) But when the news of Vitellius's death reached Gaul (A.D. 70), there arose a rumour that the chiefs of Gaul had secretly taken an oath to avail themselves of the civil discord of Rome for the recovery of their independence. There was, however, no open sign of rebellion till after the death of Horbonius Flaccus, when messengers began to pass between Civilis and Classicus, who was still commanding an ala of Trevirians in the army of Vosca. He was denounced from a family of royal blood and of renown both in peace and war, and through his ancestors he accounted himself rather an enemy than an ally of the Roman people. His conspiracy was shared by Julius Tuto and Tuvorius, and Julius Saturnus, a Lingon. They met, with some Trevirians and a few Ubii and Tungri, in a house at Colonia Agrippinensis; and having resolved to occupy the passes of the Alps, to seduce the Roman legions, and to kill the legates, they sent emissaries to raise the Gauls. Vosca was warned of the plot, but did not feel strong enough to crush it. He even suffered himself to be enticed by the conspirators to leave his camp at Colonia, and to march against Civilis, who was besieging Veta Castra. The army was not far from this place, when Classics and Tuvor, having communicated privately with the Germans, drew off their forces and formed a separate camp. Vosca, after attempting in vain to gain them back, retired to Neuss. They followed at a little distance, and at length persuaded the disaffected soldiers of Vosca to take oath against Vosca, and afterwards, when a separate ala of the Treviri, being a small band of stubborn men, in conjunction with Julius Alexander, in A.D. 70, with M. Cornelius Cethegus (Fast). The command was now divided between Classics and Tuvor; and Classics sent the worst disposed of the captured Roman soldiers to induce the legions who were besieged in Veta Castra to surrender and to take the same oath. The further progress of the war is related under CIVILIES. The last mention of Classics is when he crossed the Rhine with Civilis after his defeat by Ceresalis, and aided him in his last effort in the island of the Batavi. (Tac. Hist. iv. 54—79, v. 19—22.)

CLAUDIA. 1. Five of this name were daughters of App. Claudius Caecus, censor B. C. 312. (Claudius, Stemma, No. 10.) It is reported that one of them, that, being thronged by the people as she was returning home from the games, she expressed a wish that her brother Publius had been alive, that he might again lose a fleet, and lessen the number of the populace. This she said by the plebeian aediles, n. c. 246. (Liv. xix.; Valer. Max. viii. i. § 4; Sueton. Tib. 2; Gell. x. 6.)

2. CLAUDIA QUINTA [Claudius, Stemma, No. 19], probably the sister of App. Claudius Pulcher [Claudius, No. 17], and grand-daughter of App. Claudius Caecus. Her fame is connected with the story of the transportation of the image of Cybele from Pessinus to Rome. The vessel conveying the image had stuck fast in a shallow at the mouth of the Tiber. The soothsayers announced that only a chaste woman could move it. Claudia, who had been accused of incest, stepped forward from among the matrons who had accompanied Scipio to Ostia to receive the image, and after calling upon the goddess to vindicate her innocence, took hold of the rope, and the vessel forthwith followed her. A statue was erected to her in the vestibule of the temple of the goddess. (Liv. xxix. 14; Or. Passt. iv. 305, &c.; Cis. de Harusp. Resp. 13; Val. Max. i. 8. § 11; Plin. N. H. vii. 85.)

3. CLAUDIA [Claudius, Stemma, No. 19], daughter of Appius Claudius Pulcher [No. 17]. She was married to Pacuvius Calavius of Capua. (Liv. xii. 3.)
CLAUDIUS.

4. Claudia [Stemma, No. 30], daughter of App. Claudia Pulcher [No. 25], was one of the vestal virgins. (Cic. pro Caelio, 14; Val. Max. v. 4. § 6.)

5. Claudia [Stemma, No. 31], sister of No. 4, was married to Tiberius Gracchus. (Plut. Tiber. Gracch. 4.)

6. Claudia [Stemma, No. 37], daughter of C. Claudius Pulcher [No. 29], married Q. Marcius Philippus. (Cic. pro Dom. 32.)

7. Claudia [Stemma, No. 41], eldest sister of P. Claudius Pulcher, the enemy of Cicero (Cic. ad Fam. i. 9.), married Q. Marcius Rex. (Plut. Cael. 29; Dion Cass. xxi. 17.) She is said to have been debauched by her brother Publilius. (Plut. Cael. 29; Cic. ad Fam. i. 9.) For a discussion respecting the number of sisters Claudia had, see Drummann, vol. ii. p. 574, &c.

8. Claudia [Stemma, No. 42], the second of the three sisters of P. Claudius, and older than her brother. (Cic. pro Caelio, 15.) She was married to Q. Metellus Celer, but became infamous for her debaucheries (Cic. i. 14), which so destroyed all domestic peace, that, as Cicero says (ad Att. ii. 1), she was at open war with her husband, and, on his sudden death, she was suspected of having poisoned him. During his widowhood's lifetime she had wished to form a connexion with Cicero, and, being slighted by him, revenged herself by exciting her brother Publilius against him, and during his exile annoyed his family. (Pro Caelio, 20; ad Att. ii. 12; Plut. Cael. 29.) Among her paramours was M. Caelius, who seduced her with the promise of a divorce from her husband Publilius, against whom, and during his exile annoyed his family. (Pro Caelio, 20; ad Att. ii. 12; Plut. Cael. 29.) Among her paramours was M. Caelius, who seduced her with the promise of a divorce from her husband Publilius, against whom, and during his exile annoyed his family. (Pro Caelio, 20; ad Att. ii. 12; Plut. Cael. 29.)

9. Claudia [Stemma, No. 43], the youngest sister of P. Claudius, was married to L. Licinius Lucullus, before his election to the consulship in B. C. 74. (Plut. Lucull. 21, 34, 38; Var. R. R. iii. 16. § 1.) After his return from the Mithridatic war, Lucullus separated from her, on account of her infidelity, and in B. C. 61 brought her to trial for an incestuous amours with her brother P. Claudius. (Plut. Lucull, 34, 38; Cic. pro Mil. 27; ad Fam. i. 9.)

10. Claudia [Stemma, No. 44], daughter of App. Claudia Pulcher [No. 30], was married to Cn. Pompeius, the elder son of the triumvirs. (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 13, iii. 4, 11; Dion Cass. xxxix. 60.)

11. Claudia [Stemma, No. 45], sister of the preceding, was married to M. Brutus, who separated from her in B. C. 45. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 4, ad Att. xiii. 9, 10, Brut. 77, 94.)

12. Claudia [Stemma, No. 49], daughter of P. Claudius, was betrothed in B. C. 43 to Octavius (Augustus), who, however, never regarded her as his wife, and at the outbreak of the Persian war sent her back to her mother Fulvia. (Suet. Aug. 62; Dion Cass. xlviii. 6.)

CLAUDIANUS.

13. Claudia Pulchra, lived in the reign of Tiberius. In A. D. 26, to prepare the way for the accusation of Agrippina, she was brought to trial by Domitius Aper, and convicted of adultery, poisoning, and conspiracy against the emperor. (Tac. Ann. iv. 32; Dion Cass. lix. 19.) She is the last member of this family whose name occurs in history.

14. Claudia, called by Suetonius (Calig. 12) Julia Claudia, was the daughter of M. Junius Silanus, and was married to Caligula, according to Dion Cassius (viii. 25) in A. D. 35. (Tac. Ann. vi. 20, 45.)

15. Claudia, daughter of the emperor Claudius I. by his wife Plautia Urgulanilla. (Suet. Claud. 27.)

16. Claudia, an illegitimate daughter of Plautia Urgulanilla, the wife of the emperor Claudius I. and his freedman Boter (Suet. Claud. 27), was exposed by the command of Claudius.

17. Claudia Augusta, daughter of the emperor Nero by his wife Poppaea Sabina. She died young. (Suet. Ner. 35.) [C. P. M.]

CLAUDIA, daughter of Crispus the brother of Claudia Gothicus, wife of Brutus, mother of Constantina, and grandmother of Constantine the Great. (Trabell. Poll. Claud. 13.) [W. R.]

CLAUDIA GENS, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Claudii were of Sabine origin, and came to Rome in B.C. 504, when they were received among the patricians. (Claudii, No. 1.) The patrician Claudii bear various surnames, as Cnaeus, Claudius, Cneuus, Cnestus, Pulcher, Rectilinthus, and Ostius, the two latter of which, though applicable to all the gens, were seldom used, when there was also a more definite cognomen. But as these surnames did not mark distinct families, an account of all the patrician Claudii is given under Claudius, with the exception of those with the cognomen Nero, since they are better known under the latter name.

The surnames of the plebeian Claudii are Asellus, Canina, Centurialus, Cicero, Flaminio, and Marcus, of which the last is by far the most celebrated. The patrician Claudii were noted for their pride and arrogance, and intense hatred of the commonalty. "That house during the course of centuries produced several very eminent, few great men; hardly a single noble-minded one. In all ages it distinguished itself alike by a spirit of haughty defiance, by disdain for the laws, and iron hardness of heart." (Niebuhr, vol. i. p. 599.) The phenomenon was avoided after two of that name had dishonoured it, the one by robbery, the other by murder. (Sueton. Tib. 1.) The honours and public offices borne by members of this gens are enumerated by Suetonius. (Caes.)

During the republic no patrician Claudius adopted one of another gens; the emperor Claudius was the first who broke through this custom by adopting L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, afterwards the emperor Nero. (Suet. Claud. 39; Tac. Ann. xii. 25.) [C. P. M.]

CLAUDIANUS, CLAUDIUS, the last of the Latin classic poets, flourished under Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. Our knowledge of his personal history is very limited. That he was a native of Alexandria seems to be satisfactorily established from the direct testimony of Suidas, corroborated by an allusion in Suidonius Apollinaris (Epist. ix. 13), and certain expressions in his own works (e. g. Epist. v. 3, i. 59, 50). It has been maintained by some that he was a Gaul, and by others that he was a Spaniard; but neither of these positions is supported by even a shadow of evidence, while the opinion advanced by Petarach and Politian, that he was of Florentine extraction, arose from their confounding the Florentiani addressed in the introduction to the second book of the Raptus Proserpineae, and who was profectus ubi in a. p. 396, with the name of their native city. We are entirely ignorant of the circumstances under which he quitted his country. We find him at Rome in 395, when he composed his panegyric on the consulate of Probinus and Olybrius. He appears to have cultivated poetry previously, but this was his first essay in Latin verse, and the success by which it was attended induced him to abandon the Grecian for the Roman muse. (Epist. iv. 13.) During the five years which immediately followed the death of Theodosius, he was absent from Rome, attached it would appear, to the retirement of Stilicho (de Coni. Stilich. praef. 23), under whose special protection he seems to have received almost immediately after the publication of the poem noticed above. We say after, because he makes no mention of the name of the all-powerful Vandal in that composition, where it might have been most naturally and appropriately introduced in conjunction with the exploits of Theodosius, while on all subsequent occasions he eagerly avails himself of every pretext for sounding the praises of his patron, and expressing his own fervent devotion. Nor was he less indebted to the good offices of Serena than to the influence of her husband. He owed, it is true, his court favour and preference to the latter, but by the interposition of the former he gained his African bride, whose parents, although they might have turned a deaf ear to the suit of a poor poet, were unable to resist the solicitations of the niece of Theodosius, the wife of the general who ruled the ruler of the empire. The following inscription, discovered at Rome in the fifteenth century, informs us that a statue of Claudian was erected in the Forum of Trajan by Arcadius and Honorius at the request of the senate, and that he enjoyed the titles of Notarius and Tribunus, but the nature of the office, whether civil or military, denoted by the latter appellation we are unable to determine.

The works of Claudian now extant are the following: 1. Three panegyrics on the third, fourth, and sixth consulships of Honorius respectively. 2. A poem on the nuptials of Theodosius and Serena. 3. Four short Paeonemlines lay on the same subject. 4. A panegyric on the consulate of Probinus and Olybrius, with which is interwoven a description of the exploits of the emperor Theodosius. 5. The praises of Stilicho, in two books, and a panegyric on his consulate, in one book. 6. The praises of Serena, the wife of Stilicho; this piece is mutilated or was left unfinished. 7. A panegyric on the consulate of Flavius Theodosius. 8. The Epithalamium of Palladius and Celerina. 9. An invective against Rahnus, in two books. 10. An invective against Entropius, in two books. 11. De Bello Gildonico, the first book of an historical poem on the war in Africa against Gildo. 12. De Bello Getico, an historical poem on the successful campaign of Stilicho against Alaric and the Goths, concluding with the battle of Pollentia. 13. Raptus Proserpineae, three books of an unfinished epic on the rape of Proserpine. 14. Gigantomachia, a fragment extending to a hundred and twenty-eight lines only. 15. Ten lines of a Greek poem on the same subject, perhaps a translation by some other hand from the former. 16. Five short epistles; the first of these is a sort of prayer, imploring forgiveness for some petulant attack. It is usually inscribed "Deprecatio ad Hadrianum Praefectum Praetorio," but from the variations in the manuscripts this title appears to be merely the guess of some transcriber. The remaining four, which are very brief, are addressed to Serena, to Olybrius, to Probinus, to Genadius. 17. Ethelcia, a collection of seven poems chiefly on subjects connected with natural history, as may be seen by their titles, Phoenix, Hydria, Torpedo, Nita, Migan, Aponus, De Pisa Ferauris. 18. A collection of short occanional pieces, in Greek as well as Latin, compounded under the general title of Epigrammata. The Christian hymns to be found among these in most editions are, as we have observed above, certainly spurious. 19. Lastly, we have a hundred and thirty-seven lines entitled "*Laudes Herculis;" but with the exception of some slight resemblance in style, we have no ground for attributing them to Claudian.

The measure employed in the greater number of these compositions is the heroic hexameter. The short prologues prefixed to many of the longer poems are in elegines, and so also are the last four epistles, the last two idylls, and most of the epigrams. The first of the Pescenines is a system of Alcaic hendecasyllabics; the second is in a stanza of five lines, of which the first three are iambic dimeters catalectic, the fourth is a pure choricambic dimeter, and the fifth a trochaic dimeter brachycatalectic; the third is a system of anapastic dimeters nentalastic; and the fourth is a system of choricambic trimeters acatalectic.

It will be at once perceived that the first thirteen articles in the above catalogue, constituting a very large proportion of the whole works of Claudian, although some of them differ from the rest and from each other in form, belong essentially to one class of poems, being such as would be exacted from a laureate as the price of the patronage he enjoyed. The object in view is the same in all—all breathe the same spirit, all are declamations in verse devoted either professedly or virtually to the glorification of the emperor, his connexions and favourites, and to the degradation of their foes. We must also bear in mind, while we discuss the merits and defects of our author, and compare him with those who went before, that although Virgil and Horace were flatterers as well as he, yet their strains were addressed to very different ears. When they, after entering upon some theme apparently far removed from any courtly train of thought, by some seemingly natural although unexpected transition seemed as it were compelled to trace a resemblance between their royal benefactor and the gods and heroes of the olden time, they expected transition seemed as it were compelled to be unpraised, naturally lead to a systematic and formal division of the subject; and hence it is impossible to feel any confidence in the fidelity of the narrator in regard to those incidents not elsewhere recorded.

The simple fact that pieces composed under such circumstances, to serve such temporary and unworthy purposes, have been read, studied, admired, and even held up as models, ever since the revival of letters, is in itself no mean tribute to the powers of their author. Nor can we hesitate to pronounce him a highly-gifted man. Deeply versed in all the learning of the Egyptian schools, possessing a most extensive knowledge of the history of man and of the physical world, of the legends of mythology, and of the moral and theological speculations of the different philosophical sects, he had the power to light up this mass of learning by the fire of a brilliant imagination, and to concentrate it upon the objects of his adulation as it streamed forth in a flashing flood of rhetoric. The whole host of heaven and every nation and region of the earth are called upon to aid in extolling his patron, the prince, and their satellites; on the other hand, an infernal Pantheon of demons and furies with all the horrors of Styx and Tartarus, are evoked as the allies and tormentors of a Rufinus, and all nature is ransacked for foul and loathsome images to body forth the mental and corporeal defects of the eunuch consul. His diction is highly brilliant, although sometimes shining with the glitter of tinsel ornaments; his similes and illustrations are elaborated with great skill, but the marks of toil are frequently too visible. His versification is highly sonorous, but is deficient in variety; the constant recurrence of the same cadences, although in themselves melodious, palls upon the ear. His command of the language is perfect; and although the minute critic may fancy that he detects some traces of the foreign extraction of the bard, yet in point of style neither Lucan nor Statius need be ashamed to own him as their equal. His powers appear to greatest advantage in description. His pictures often approach perfection, combining the softness and rich glow of the Italian with the force and reality of the Dutch school.
CLAUDIANUS.

We have as yet said nothing of the Rape of Proserpine, from which we might expect to form the most favourable estimate of his genius, for here at least it had fair and free scope, untrammeled by the Fetters which cramped its energies in Panegyric. But, although these causes of embarrassments are removed, we do not find the result anticipated. If we become familiar with his other works in the first instance, we rise with a feeling of disappointment from the perusal of this. We find, it is true, the same animated descriptions and harmonious numbers; but there is a want of taste in the arrangement of the details, of sustained interest in the action, and of combination in the different members, which gives a fragmentary character to the whole, and causes it to be read with much greater pleasure in extracts than continuously. The subject, although grand in itself, is injudiciously handled; for, all the characters being gods, it is impossible to invent their proceedings with the interest which attaches to struggling and suffering humanity. The impression produced by the commencement is singularly unfortunate. The rage of the King of Shades that he alone of gods is a stranger to matrimonial bliss, his determination to war against heaven that he may avenge his wrongs, the mustering and marshalling of the Titans and all the monsters of the abyss for battle against Jupiter, are figured forth with great dignity and pomp; but when we find this terrific tempest at once quelled by the very simple and sensible suggestion of old Laechus, that he might probably obtain a wife, if he chose to ask for one, the whole scene is converted into a burlesque, and the absurdity is if possible heightened by the blustering harangue of Pluto to the herald, Mercury.

Throughout this poem, as well as in all the other works of Claudian, we lament the absence not only of true sublimity but of simple nature and of real feeling: our imagination is often excited, our intellect is often gratified; but our nobler energies are never awakened; no cord of tenderness is struck, no kindly sympathy is enlisted; our hearts are never softened.

Of the Idylls we need hardly say anything; little could be expected from the subjects: they may be regarded as clever essays in versification, and nothing more. The best is that in which the hot springs of Apennus are described. The Ecesenine verses display considerable lightness and grace; the epigrams, with the exception of a very few which are neatly and pointedly expressed, are not worth reading.

The Edita Princeps of Claudian was printed at Vicenza by Jacobus Dusenius, fol., 1492, under the editorial inspection of Barnabus Celsanius, and appears to be a faithful representation of the MS. from which it was taken. Several of the smaller poems are wanting. The second edition was printed at Parma by Angelus Ugoletus, 4to., 1493, superintended by Thaddeus, who made use of several MSS. for emending the text, especially one obtained from Holland. Here first we find the epigrams, the Epiphalaumum of Palladius and Serena, the epistles to Serena and to Hadrian, the Aponus, and the Gigantomachia. The edition printed at Vienna by Hieronymus Victor and Joannes Singerenius, 4to., 1510, with a text newly revised by Joannes Camera, is the first which contains the Laudes Hercules, In Sirenas, Laus Christi, and Minoa Christi. The first truly critical edition was that of Theod. Palmannus, printed at Antwerp by Plantinus, 16mo., 1571, including the notes of Delrio. The second edition of Caspar Barthius, Franc. and Hamburg, 1650 and 1654, 4to., boasts of being completed with the aid of seventeen MSS., and is accompanied by a voluminous commentary; but the notes are heavy, and the typography very incorrect. The edition of Gesner, Lips. 1759, is a useful one; but for the best which has yet appeared is that of the younger Burmann, Amst. 1760, forming one of the series of the Dutch Variorum Classics, in 4to. An edition was commenced by G. L. König, and one volume published in 1808 (Götting.), but the work did not proceed farther.

The "Raptus Proserpinæ" was published separately, under the title "Claudian de Repti Proserpinæ Tragedinis duæ," at Utrecht, by Keteler and Leempi, apparently several years before the Edita Princeps of the collected works noticed above, and three other editions of the same poem belong to the same early period, although neither the names of the printers nor the precise dates can be ascertained.

We have a complete metrical translation of the whole works of Claudian by A. Hawkins, 2 vols. 8vo., Lond. 1817; and there are also several English translations of many of the separate pieces, few of which are of any merit.

CLAUDIANUS (Καυσιανος), the author of five epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Bruneck, Anal. ii. p. 447; Jacobs, ii. p. 153), is commonly identified with the celebrated Latin poet of the same name; but this seems to be disproved by the titles and contents of two additional epigrams, ascribed to him in the Vatican MS., which are addressed "to the Saviour," and which show that their author was a Christian. (Jacobs, Paravul. ap. Anthon. Graec. xiii. pp. 615—617.) He is probably the poet whom Evagrius (Hist. Ecol. i. 19) mentions as flourishing under Theodosius II., who reigned A.D. 408—450. The Gigantomachia, of which a fragment still exists (Trans. Catal. MSS. Matrial. p. 215), and which has been ascribed to the Roman poet, seems rather to belong to this one. He wrote also, according to the Scholia on the Vatican MS., poems on the history of certain cities of Asia Minor and Syria, πατρως Ταρσός, Αντωράγος, Βυρρότος, Νικαίας, whence it has been inferred that he was a native of that part of Asia. (Jacobs, Ath. Graec. xiii. p. 672.)

CLAUDIUS, patrician. [CLAUDIA GENVS.]

1. App. Claudius Sabinus Regillensis, a Sabine of the town of Regillum or Regilli, who in his own country bore the name of Attus Claudius (or, according to some, Attus Claudius; Dionysius calls him Τιτός Καυσιανος), being the advocate of peace with the Romans, when hostilities broke out between the two nations shortly after the beginning of the commonwealth, and being vehemently opposed by most of his countrymen, withdrew with a large train of followers to Rome. (p. 504.) He was forthwith received into the ranks of the patricians, and lands beyond the Anio were assigned to his followers, who were formed into a new tribe, called the Claudian. (Liv. B. 16, iv. 8; Dionys. v. 40, x. 151 Serato. Thib. 1; Tac. Ann. x. 24, xii. 25; Niebuhr, l. p. 560.) He exhibited the characteristics which marked his descendants, and, in his consulship (b. c. 495), showed great severity towards the plebeian debtors.

(Livy. ii. 21, 23, 24, 27; Dionyss. vi. 23, 24, 27, 30.)
Next year, on the refusal of the commons to enlist,
we find him proposing the appointment of a dictator.
(Livy. ii. 29.) We find him manifesting the same bitter hatred of the plebs at the time of the secession to the Mons Sacer, in b. c. 494 (Dionyss.
vi. 59, &c.), of the famine in 493 (Dionyss. vii. 15), and of the impeachment of Coriolanus. (Dionyss.
vii. 47, &c.) He is made by Dionyssius (vii. 73, &c.) to take a prominent part in opposing the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius. According to Pliny
(c. 495),

the eldest son of the decemvir, was consul tribune in b. c. 424. All that we are told of him is, that he was marked by a genuine Claudian hatred of the tribunes and plebeians.
(Livy. iii. 35, 36.)

6. P. Claudius Crassus (or Crassinus), a younger son of the decemvir. (Livy. vi. 40.)

Crassinus), son of No. 5, was consul tribune in b. c. 403. It was this Appius who was the author of the important measure, that the proceedings of the tribunes might be stopped by the veto of one of the college. (Niebuhr, vol. ii. p. 439, note 965.)
Livy (v. 3—6) puts into his mouth a speech in reply to the complaints of the tribunes, when, at the siege of Veii, the troops were kept in the field during the winter. He afterwards proposed to appropriate the spoil of Veii for the pay of the soldiers. (Livy. v. 1—6, 20.)

(or Crassinus), a son of No. 6, distinguished himself by his opposition to the Licinian rogations, particularly as regarded the appointment of plebeian consuls. In 362, on the death of the consul Hortator, he was appointed dictator to conduct the war against the Hernicans, when a victory was gained over them under his auspices. In 349
he was made consul, but died at the commencement of his year of office. (Livy. vi. 40—42, vii.
6, &c., 24, 25.)

(or Crassinus), son of No. 7, was named dictator in
b. c. 337, but immediately resigned his office,
the augurs having pronounced his appointment invalid.
Who the C. Claudius Hortator, whom he made Master of the Horse, was, is not known. (Livy.
vii. 15.)

son of No. 9. It was generally believed among the ancients that his blindness was real, and there can be no doubt that such was the fact, though it is pretty certain that he did not become blind before his old age. The tradition of the occasion of his blindness is given by Livy, ix. 29. (See also Cic. de Suet. 6, Tusc. Disp. v. 38; Plut. Pyrph.
18, 19; Dio. l. c. 38; Appian, Samn. 10.)
He was twice curule aedile (Frontin. de Aquaed.
v. 72), and in b. c. 312 was elected censor with
C. Plautius, without having been consul previously.
(Livy. ix. 29.) With the design of forming in the senate and people a party which should be subservient to him in his ambitious designs, he filled up the vacancies in the senate with the names of a large number of the low popular party, including apppointment of the decemvirs in that year, he became one of them. His influence in the college became paramount, and he so far won the condence of the people, that he was reappointed the following year. Now, however, his real character betrayed itself in the most violent and tyrannous course he took towards the plebeians. But his tyranny was directed against the Luciose and the municipalities. In 335, 332, he was made magistrate at the same time that his brother, the elder son of the decemvir, was magistrate in his province. In 332, b. c. 335,

he was made consul, but died at the commencement of his year of office. (Livy.
ix. 55, 56), he himself proposed the election of military tribunes with consular power from both plebeians and patricians.

4. App. Claudius Crassus (or Crassinus) Regillensis Sabinus, the decemvir, is commonly considered to have been the son of No. 2 (as by Livy, iii. 35); but, from the Capitoline Fasti, where the record of his consulship appears in the Regill. Sabinus II., he would appear to have been the same person. (See Niebuhr, vol. ii. note 754.)
He was elected consul in b. c. 451, and on the even the sons of freedmen. His list, however, was set aside the following year, upon which C. Plautius resigned, and Appius continued in office as sole censor. He then proceeded to draw up the lists of the tribes, and enrolled in them all the libertini, censor. He then proceeded to draw up the lists of the tribes, and enrolled in them all the libertini, cicero. He then proceeded to draw up the lists of the tribes, and enrolled in them all the libertini, Pliny (t. N. xxiii. 6) it was at his instigation that his secretary, Cic. Flavius, published his calendar and account of the legis actions. But the most durable monuments of his censorship (for his political innovations were in good part set aside by Q. Fabius Maximus) were the Appian road to Capua, which was commenced by him, and the Appian aqueduct, which he completed. (Liv. ix. 29; Frontin. de Aquaeulis 5; Niebuhr, vol. iii. pp. 303—309.) Niebuhr conjectures, with some probability, that in order to raise money he must have sold large portions of the public land. He retained his censorship four years. (Niebuhr, vol. iii. pp. 291—313.) In 307 he was elected consul after resigning his censorship, which he had ineffectually endeavoured to retain, and remained in Rome for the purpose of strengthening his interest. (Liv. ix. 42.) In the following year we find him a strenuous opponent of the Ogulian law for opening the offices of pontific and augur to the plebeians. (x. 7, 8.) In 298 he was appointed interrex (an office which he filled three times; see inscription in Pignius, ad ann. 561), and at first refused to receive votes for the plebeian candidate. (Liv. x. 11; Cic. Brat. 14.) In 296 he was chosen consul a second time, and commanded at first in Samnium with some success. (Liv. x. 17; Orelli, Inscrip. No. 559.) From Samnium he led his forces into Etruria, and having been delivered from a perilous position by his colleague Volumnius, the combined armies gained a decisive victory over the Etruscans and Samnites. (Liv. x. 13, 18.) In this battle he vowed a temple to Belluna, which he afterwards dedicated. Next year he was continued in command as praetor, but was sent back to Rome by the consul Fabius. (x. 22, 25.) Afterwards, in conjunction with Volumnius, he gained a victory over the Samnites. (x. 31.) He was once dictator, but in what year is not known. (Insc. in Orelli, l. c.) In his old age, when Cineas was sent by Pyrrhus to propose peace, Appius, now quite blind, appeared in the senate, and by his speech prevailed on them to resist the proffered terms. This speech was extant in Cicero's time. (Liv. xiii.; Cic. Brut. 14, 16, De Soecnct. 6.) His eloquence is extolled by Livy. (x. 13.)

Appius Claudius the Blind was the earliest Roman writer in prose and verse whose name has come down to us. He was the author of a poem known to Cicero through the Greek (Cic. Tusc. Disput. iv. 2), of which some fragmentary portions have come down to us. (Pisianian, viii. p. 792, ed. Putsch; Festus, s. v. Sigurinus.) Its contents were of a Pythagorean cast. He also wrote a legal treatise, De Usurpatiohnibus, and according to some was the author of the Actiones which Flavius published. [Flavius] (Pomponius, Digest. i. 2, § 36.) He left four sons and five daughters. (Cic. de Senect. 11.)

he received a wound, from the effects of which he died shortly after the surrender of the city. He ineffectually opposed the infliction of the sanguinary vengeance which Fulvius took on the Capitans. (Liv. xxv. 2, 22, 41, xxvi. 1, 5, 6, 8, 15, 16; Polyb. ix. 3.)

19. CLAUDIA. [CLAUDIA, No. 3.]

20. APP. CLAUDIUS APP. F. P. N. PULCHER, son of No. 17. In B. C. 197 and the three following years, he served as military tribune under T. Quinctius Flamininus in Macedonia and Greece in the war with Philip. (Liv. xxxv.: 35, 36, xxxvi. 29, xxxiv. 50.) We find him again in Greece in 191, serving first under M. Bacchus in the war with Antiochus (xxxvii. 10), and afterwards under the consul M. Acilius Glabrio against the Aetolians. (xxxvi. 22, 30.) In 187 he was made praetor, and Tarentum fell to him by lot as his province. (xxxvii. 42.)

In 185 he was elected consul, and gained some advantages over the Ingaunian Ligurians, and, by his violent interference at the comitia, procured the election of his brother Publius to the consulate. (xxxix. 23, 32.) In 184, when Philip was preparing for a new war with the Romans, Appius was sent to the head of an embassy into Macedonia and Greece, to observe his movements and wrest from his grasp the cities of which he had made himself master. (xxxix. 33—39.) In 180 (xl. 25, 27.)

21. P. CLAUDIUS APP. F. P. N. PULCHER, son of No. 17. In B. C. 189 he was made aedile, and in 183 praetor. (Liv. xxxvii. 45.) In 184 he was made consul [see No. 20] (xxxviii. 32), and in 181 one of the three commissioners appointed for planting a colony at Graviscae. (xl. 29.)

22. C. CLAUDIUS APP. F. P. N. PULCHER, another son of No. 17 (Vasti Cap.; Liv. xxxvii. 44), was made augur in B. C. 185, praetor in 180 (xl. 37, 42), and consul in 177. The province of Istriæ fell to his lot. Fearing lest the successes of the consuls of the preceding year might render his presence unnecessary, he set out without performing the regular initiatory ceremonies of the consulate, and so contrived to make himself compelled to return. Having again proceeded to his province with a fresh army, he captured three towns, and reduced the Istrians to subjection. He next marched against the Ligurians, whom he defeated, and celebrated a double triumph at Rome. Having held the comitia, he returned to Liguria and recovered the town of Mutina. (xli. 10—18; Polyb. xxxvi. 7.) In 171 he served as military tribune under P. Licinius against Perseus. (Liv. xiii. 49.) In 169 he was censor with T. Sempronius Gracchus. Their severity drew down upon them an impeachment from one of the tribunes, but the popularity of Gracchus secured an acquittal. Claudius opposed his colleague, who wished to exclude the freedmen from all the tribes, and at last it was agreed that they should be enrolled in one tribe—the Esquiline. (xliii. 14—16, xlv. 16, xlv. 15; Valer. Max. vi. 5, § 3.)

In 167 Claudius was one of an embassy sent to the Aetolians, to bring about a cessation of their internal hostilities and oppose the machinations of Perseus. (xli. 49.)

23. C. CLAUDIUS CENTO, probably the grandson of No. 14, served under the consul P. Sulpicius in B. C. 200, in the war with Philip. Being sent to the relief of Athens, which was besieged by a Macedonian army, he raised the siege. He next made himself master of Chalae in Euboea, and gained several advantages over Philip, who marched in person upon Athens. (Liv. xxx. 14, 22, &c.; Zonar. ix. 15.)

24. APP. CLAUDIUS CENTO, brother of No. 23, was aedile in B. C. 178. (Liv. xl. 59.) In 175 he was made praetor, and received Hispania Citerior as his province. Here he gained a victory over the revolted Celtiberi, for which he was honoured with an ovation. (xlii. 22, 31, 33.) In 173 he was sent into Thessaly, and quieted the disturbances which prevailed there. (xlii. 51.)

In 172 he was one of an embassy sent into Macedonia to communicate to Perseus the demands and threats of the Romans. (xlii. 25.) In 170 he was legatus under the consul A. Hostilius. Having been sent with 4000 men into Illyriæum, he sustained a defeat near the town of Uscana. (xlii. 11, 12.)

25. APP. CLAUDIUS APP. F. APP. N. PULCHER, son of No. 20. He was consul in B. C. 143, and, to obtain a pretext for a triumph, attacked the Salassi, an Alpine tribe. He was at first defeated, but afterwards, following the directions of the Sibylline books, gained a victory. (Frontin. de Off. xlix. 3, Dion. Cass. Fragm. lxxix. 11.; Oros. dc Hist. v. 4.) On his return a triumph was refused him; but he triumphed at his own expense, and when one of the tribunes attempted to drag him from his car, his daughter Claudia, one of the Vestal virgins, walked by his side up to the capital. (Cic. pro Cacl. 14; Sueton. Tib. 2.) Next year he was an unsuccessful candidate for the censorship, though he afterwards held that office with Q. Fulvius Nobilior, probably in 136. (Dion Cass. Fragm. lxxixiv.; Plut. Tib. Graec. 4.) He gave one of his daughters in marriage to Tib. Gracchus, and in B. C. 133 with Tib. and C. Gracchus was appointed commissioner for the division of the lands. (Liv. Epit. 58; Orelli, Fasti Rom. 570; Vell. Pat. ii. 2.) Appius lived at enmity with P. Scipio Aemilianus. (Plut. Aemil. 38; Cic. de Rep. i. 19.) He died shortly after Tib. Gracchus. (Appian, B. C. 118.) He was one of the Stillers or augurs, and princeps senatus. (Macrobo. Satur. ii. 10; Plut. Tib. Graec. 4.) Cicero ( Brut. 28) says, that his style of speaking was fluent and vehement. He married Antistia. [ANTISTIA, No. 1.]

26. C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER, son of No. 22, was consul in B. C. 130, and laid information before the senate of the disturbances excited by C. Papirius Carbo. (Cic. de Leg. iii. 19.)

27. APP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER, known only as the son of No. 26 and father of No. 32.

28. C. CLAUDIUS PULCHER, also son of No. 26 and father of No. 34. (Cic. pro Planc. 21.)

29. APP. CLAUDIUS PULCHER, son of No. 25. He inherited his father's enmity to P. Scipio Aemilianus. (Cic. pro Scaur. ii. 32.) In B. C. 107 he took part in the discussions respecting the agrarian law of Sp. Thorius. (Cic. de Ord. ii. 70.) He appears to have been of a facetious disposition. (Cic. de Ord. ii. 60.)

30. CLAUDIA. [CLAUDIA, No. 4.]

31. CLAUDIA. [CLAUDIA, No. 5.]

32. C. CLAUDIUS APP. F. C. N. PULCHER, son of No. 27 (Cic. de Off. ii. 16, Ferr. ii. 49; Fasti Capit.) appears in B. C. 100 as one of those who took up arms against Saturninus. (Cic. pro Rosc. 7.) In 89 he was curule aedile, and in the games celebrated by him elephants were for the first time exhibited in the circus, and painting employed in the scenic decorations. (Plin. H. N. viii. 7, xxxv. 7; Val. Max. ii. 4. § 6.) In 85 he was praetor in Sicily, and, by direction of the senate, gave laws to the Halesini respecting the appointment of their senators. (Cic. Ferr. ii. 49.) The Mamertini made him their patronus. (Ferr. iv. 3.) He was consul in 92. (Fasti Cap.) Cicero (Brut. 45) speaks of him as a man possessed of great power and some ability as an orator.

35. App. Claudius Pulcher, the brother, possibly of No. 32, was military tribune in B. C. 87. He was appointed to guard the Janiculum when the city was threatened by Marius and Cinna, but opened a gate to Marius, to whom he was under obligations. (Appian, B. C. i. 68.) It appears, however, that he managed to keep his credit with his own party; for it is probably this Claudius who was interrex in 77, and with Q. Lucretius Catulus had to defend Rome against M. Aemilius Lepidus. (Sall. Frugiv. lib. 1.)

34. App. Claudius Pulcher, son of No. 29, was made consul in B. C. 79, though he had been an unsuccessful candidate for the curule aedilship. (Cic. pro Pison. 21; Appian, B. C. i. 103.) He was afterwards governor of Macedonia, and engaged in contests with the neighbouring barbarians. He died in his province, before 76, when he was succeeded by C. Scribonius Curio. (Liv. Epit. 91; Flor. iii. 4.; Oros. v. 23.)

35. App. Claudius Pulcher, apparently the son of No. 29. (Orelli, Inscript. No. 578.) While curule aedile he celebrated the Megalaecon games. (Cic. de Harusp. Resp. 12.) In B. C. 89 he was made praetor (Cic. pro Arch. 5), and afterwards filled the office of praetor. In B. C. 87 Cinna gained a victory over his army. (Liv. Epit. 79.) Claudius was impeached by one of the tribunes, and, not appearing, was deposed from his command and banished. Next year, L. Marcus Philippus, his nephew, who was censor, omitted his name in the list of senators. (Cic. pro Dom. 31, 32.) He appears in 82 to have marched with Sulla against Rome, and met his death near the city. (Plut. Sulla. 29.) He married Caesilla, and left three sons and three daughters, but no property. (Varro, R. R. iii. 16.)

36. C. Claudius Pulcher, son of No. 29, when curule aedile excluded slaves from the Megalecon games which he celebrated. (Cic. de Harusp. Resp. 12.) In B. C. 73 he was praetor (Plut. Cross. 9), and commanded an army against Spartans, by whom he was defeated at mount Vesi- vius. (Liv. Epit. 93; Oros. v. 24.)

37. Claudius. [Claudia, No. 6.]

38. App. Claudius Pulcher, eldest son of No. 35 (Varr. R. R. iii. 16), appears in B. C. 75 as the prosecutor of Terentius Varro. (Anon. ad Cic. Div. in Casset. p. 103, Orell.) In 70 he served in Asia under his brother-in-law, Lucullus, and was sent to Tigranes to demand the surrender of Mitridates. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 21.) In 61 he was in Greece, collecting statues and paintings to adorn the games which he contemplated giving as aedile. (Cic. pro Dom. 45; Schol. Bob. in orat. in Cicid. et Car. p. 338, Orell.) Through the favour and influence of the consul L. Piso, however, he was made praetor without first filling the office of aedile. (Cic. I. c.) As praetor (B. C. 57) he presided in trials for extortion, and Cicero expresses anxiety on behalf of his brother Quintus, who had been praetor in Asia. (Ad Att. iii. 17.) Though Appius did not openly and in person oppose Cicer- o's recall (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 10. § 8; comp. pro Dom. 23), he tacitly sanctioned and abetted the proceedings of his brother Publius. He placed at his disposal the gladiators whom he had hired, and alone of the praetors did nothing on behalf of Cicero; and, after the return of the latter, showed more decidedly which side he took. (Cic. pro Scarr. 36, 39, 41; in Pison. 15, pro Mil. 15, post. Red. 20, 21, 23.) The Senate, however, voted Appius's recall (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 10, 707, Orell.; Dion Cass. xxxix. 6; 7.) Next year he was praetor in Sardinia, and in April paid a visit to Caesar at Luca. (Plut. Cass. 21; Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 6, 15.) In B. C. 54 he was chosen consul with L. Domitius Athenobarbus. (Caes. B. G. v. 1; Dion Cass. xxxix. 60, x1.) Through the intervention of Pompey, a reconciliation was brought about between him and Cicero, though his attentions to the latter appear, in part at least, to have been prompted by avarice. (Cic. ad Q. F. ii. 12, ad Fam. i. 9, iii. 10.) When Gabinius returned from his province, Appius appeared as his accuser, in hopes that his silence should be bought. He reached his province in July, B. C. 53, and governed it for two years. His rule appears to have been more distinctly which side he took. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 9, § 25, ad Att. iv. 16, § 12.) He reached his province in July, B. C. 53, and governed it for two years. His rule appears to have been more distinctly which side he took. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 2, § 3, ad Fam. xv. 4, comp. iii. 8, § 5-8.) He made war upon the mountaineers of Amausus, and some successes over them gave him a pretext for claiming a triumph. (Cic. ad Fam. iii. 1, 2; Eichel, iv. p. 360.) Cicero wrote to him, while in his province, in terms of the greatest cordiality (ad Fam. iii. 1); but when he was appointed his successor in 51, Appius did not conceal his displeasure. He avoided meeting him, and shewed him other marks of disrespect. His displeasure was increased by Cicero's countermanding some of his directions and regulations. (Ad Fam. iii. 2-6; 7, 8.) Appius on his return demanded a triumph, but was compelled to withdraw his claim by an impeachment instituted against him by Dolabella. (Ad Fam. iii. 9, viii. 6, iii. 11.) As witnesses were required from his old province, he found himself again obliged to pay court to Cicero. (Ad Fam. 8.)
Claudius, in Asia. Displeased at not being treated by Lucullus with the distinction he had expected, he encouraged the soldiers to mutiny. He then left Lucullus, and betook himself to his other brother-in-law, Q. Marcus Rex, at that time proconsul in Cilicia, and was entrusted by him with the command of the fleet. He fell into the hands of the pirates, who however dismissed him without ransom, through fear of Pompey. He next went to Antiochus, and joined the Syrians in making war on the Egyptians. Here again he excited some of the soldiers to mutiny, and nearly lost his life. He now returned to Rome, and made his first appearance in civil affairs in b.c. 65 by impeaching Catiline for extortion in his government of Africa. Catiline bribed his accuser and judge, and escaped.

In b.c. 64, Clodius accompanied the propurator L. Murena to Gallia Transalpina, where he resorted to the most nefarious methods of procuring money. His avarice, or the want to which his dissipation had reduced him, led him to have recourse to similar proceedings on his return to Rome. Asconius (in Milt. p. 50, Orell.) says, that Cicero often charged him with having taken part in the conspiracy of Catiline. But, with the exception of some probably exaggerated rhetorical allusions (de Horace, Resp. 3, pro Mil. 14), no intimation of the kind appears in Cicero's works.

Towards the close of b.c. 62, Clodius was guilty of an act of sacrilege, which is especially memorable, as it gave rise to that deadly enmity between himself and Cicero which produced such important consequences to both and to Rome. The mysteries of the Bona Dea were this year celebrated in the house of Caesar. Clodius, who had an intrigue with Pompeia, Caesar's wife, with the assistance of one of the attendants entered the house disguised as a female musician. But while his guide was gone to apprise her mistress, Clodius was detected by his voice. The alarm was immediately given, but he made his escape by the aid of the damsel who had introduced him. He was already a candidate for the consulship, and was elected; but in the beginning of 61, before he set out for his province, he was impeached for this offence.

The senate referred the matter to the pontifices, who declared it an act of impiety. Under the direction of the senate a rogation was proposed to the people, to the effect that Clodius should be tried by judges selected by the praeator who was to preside. The assembly, however, was broken up without coming to a decision. The senate was at first disposed to persist in its original plan; but afterwards, on the recommendation of Hortensius, the proposition of the tribune Fufius Calenus was adopted, in accordance with which the judges were to be selected from the three decuries. Cicero, who had hitherto strenuously supported the senate, now relaxed in his exertions. Clodius attempted to prove an abli, but Cicero's evidence showed that he was with him in Rome only three hours before he pretended to have been at Terracina. Bribery and intimidation, however, secured him an acquittal by a majority of 31 to 25. Cicero however, who had been irritated by some sarcastic allusions made by Clodius to his consulship, and by a verdict given in contradiction to his testimony, attacked Clodius and his partisans in the senate with great vehemence.

Claudius.

CLAUDIUS.

Soon after his acquittal Clodius went to his province, Sicily, and intimates his design of becoming a candidate for the senatorship. On his return, however, he disclosed a different purpose. Eager to revenge himself on Cicero, that he might be armed with more formidable power he purposed return, however, he disclosed a different purpose. On his coming a candidate for the aedileship. On his rogation was not made public three nundines be¬come a tribune of the plebs. A report soon after got abroad that his only child, the adoption of the gens Bibulus was not twenty years old, and consequently delivery of his speech Clodius became the adopted joint sentence. The consuls of the year he gained the acquittal of the accused. But in defending C. Antonius, Cicero provoked the triumvirs, and especially Caesar, and within three hours after the The lex curiata for his adoption was proposed by the tribune C. Horennius to get this brought over to them his kingdom.

and to restore some Byzantine exiles. [Cato, powers of praetor to take possession of the islnnd Clodius next rid himself of M. Cato, who, by a confirmed in the comitia tributa, and engraven on brass. On the same day, the consuls Gbnius and Piso had the provincies of Syria and Macedonia assigned to them, with extraordinary powers. Clodius did not immediately assail his enemies. Immediately after the banishment of Cicero, Clodius set fire to his house on the Palatine, and destroyed his villas at Tusculum and Formiae. The greater part of the property carried off from them was divided between the two consuls. The ground on which the Palatine house stood, with such of the property as still remained, was put up for auction. Clodius wished to become the pur¬chaser of it, and, not liking to bid himself, got a needy fellow named Senato for him. He wished to erect on the Palatins a palace of surpassing size and magnificence. A short time be¬fore he had purchased the house of Q. Scius Postumus, after poisoning the owner, who had refused to sell it. This it was his intention to unite with another house which he already had there. He pulled down the portico of Catulus, which adjoined Cicero's grounds, and erected another in its place, with his own name inscribed on it. To alienate Cicero's property irretrievably, he dedicated a Tanagraean hetaera, which his brother Appius had brought from Greece. To maintain the armed bands whom he employed, Clodius required large sums of money; but this he did not find much difficulty in procuring: for with the populace he was all-powerful, and his influence made his favour worth purchasing. (For an account of the way in which, through his influence, Brogitarus of Gallatia was made priest of Cybele at Pessinus, and Menula of Anagnia screened from punishment, with other arbitrary and irregular proceedings of Clodius, see Cie. pro Dom. 30, 50, de Har. Resp. 16, pro Senat.
offend Pompey by aiding the escape of Tigranes, 26, 30.

He went so far as to his services were purchased. Pompey, however, did not feel himself strong enough to resent the insult. Clodius soon assailed him more openly. The consul Gabinius sided with Pompey. Frequent conflicts took place between the armed bands of the tribune and consul, in one of which Gabinius himself was wounded and his faces broken. Clodius and the tribune Nummius went through the threads of the gods, only the property of Gabinius, the other that of Clodius. An attempt was made by Clodius, through one of his slaves, upon the life of Pompey, who now withdrew to his own house, and kept there as long as his enemy was in office. Clodius stationed a body of men under his freedman Damis to watch him, and the praetor Flavius was repulsed in an attempt to drive them off.

The attempts made before the end of this year to procure the recall of Cicero proved abortive. Next year (b.c. 57), Clodius, possessing no longer tribunitian power, was obliged to depend on his armed bands for preventing the people from passing a decree to recall Cicero. On the twenty-fifth of January, when a rogation to that effect was brought forward by the tribune Fabricius, Clodius appeared with an armed body of slaves and gladiators; Fabricius had also brought armed men to support him, and a bloody fight ensued, in which the party of Fabricius was worsted. Soon afterwards, Clodius with his men fell upon another of his opponents, the tribune Sextius, who nearly lost his life in the fray. He attacked the house of Milo, another of the tribunes, and threatened his life whenever he appeared. He set fire to the temple of the Nymphs, for the purpose of destroying the consular records; interrupted the Apollinarian games, which were being celebrated by the praetor L. Caecilius, and besieged him in his house. Milo made an unsuccessful attempt to bring Clodius to trial for his acts of violence; and finding his endeavours unsuccessful, resolved to repel force by force. Accordingly he collected an armed band of slaves and gladiators, and frequent contests took place in the streets between the opposing parties.

When the senate came to a resolution to propose to the comitia a decree for the restoration of Cicero, Clodius was the only one who opposed it; and when, on the fourth of August, it was brought before the people, Clodius spoke against it, but could do nothing more; for Milo and the other friends of Cicero had brought to the place of meeting a force sufficiently powerful to deter him from attempting any violence, and the decree was passed. Clodius, however, was not stopped in his career of violence. On the occasion of the death which pursued immediately after Cicero's recall, the blame of which Clodius endeavoured to throw on him, he excited a disturbance; and when, by the advice of Cicero, Pompey was inveigled with extraordinary powers to superintend the supplies, Clodius charged the former with betraying the senate.

The decree by which Cicero was recalled, provided also for the restoration of his property. Some difficulty, however, remained with respect to the house on the Palatine, the site of which had been consecrated by Cicero to the service of religion. The matter was referred to the college of pontifices, but was not decided till the end of September, when Cicero defended his right before them. The pontifices returned an answer sufficient to satisfy all religious scruples, though Clodius chose to take it as favourable to himself, and the senate decreed the restoration of the site, and the payment of a sum of money to Cicero for rebuilding his house. When the workmen began their operations in November, Clodius attacked and drove them off, pulled down the portico of Catalus, which had been nearly rebuilt, and set fire to the house of Q. Cicero. He then, as an act of retaliation, he assaulted Cicero himself in the street, and compelled him to take refuge in a neighbouring house. Next day he attacked the house of Milo, situated on the eminence called Germinalus, but was driven off by Q. Flaccus. When Marcellinus proposed in the senate that Clodius should be brought to justice, the friends of the latter protracted the discussion, so that no decision was come to.

Clodius was at this time a candidate for the aedileship, that, if successful, he might be screened from a prosecution; and threatened the city with fire and sword if an assembly were not held for the election. Marcellinus proposed that the senate should decree that no election should take place till Clodius had been brought to trial; Milo declared that he would prevent the consul Metellus from holding the comitia. Accordingly, whenever Metellus attempted to hold an assembly, he posted himself with a strong body of armed men on the place of meeting, and stopped the proceedings, by giving notice that he was observing the auspices. In the beginning of the following year, however (b.c. 56), when Milo was no longer in office, Clodius was elected without opposition; for, notwithstanding his outrageous violence, as it was evident that his chief object was not power but revenge, he was supported and connived at by several who found his proceedings calculated to further their views. The optimates rejoiced to see him insult and humiliate the triumvirs, Pompey, and the latter to find that he was sufficiently powerful to make the senate afraid of him. Cicero had many foes and rivals, who openly or secretly encouraged so active an enemy of the object of their envy and dislike; while the disturbances which his proceedings occasioned in the city were exactly adapted to further Caesar's designs. Clodius almost immediately after his election impeached Milo for public violence. Milo appeared on the second of February to answer the accusation, and the day passed without disturbance. The next hearing was fixed for the ninth, and when Pompey stood up to defend him, Clodius' party attempted to put him down by raising a tumult. Milo's party acted in a similar manner when Clodius spoke. A fray ensued, and the judicial proceedings were stopped for that day. The matter was put off by several adjournments to the beginning of May, from which time we hear nothing more of it.

In April, Clodius celebrated the Megalesian games, and admitted such a number of slaves, that the free citizens were unable to find room. Shortly after this, the senate consulted the haruspices on some prodigies which had happened near Rome. They replied, that, among other things which had provoked the anger of the gods, was the desecration of sacred places. Clodius interpreted this as referring to the restoration of Cicero's house, and made it a handle for a fresh attack upon him. Cicero replied in the speech De Haruspicarum Respons. By this time Pompey and Clodius had found it convenient to make common cause with each other. A fresh attack which Clodius soon afterwards made on Cicero's house was repulsed by each other. A fresh attack which Clodius soon found it convenient to make common cause with De Hanispicum Reappears to have been in a great measure led by to which they were elected in the beginning of a. c. 55, and nearly lost his life in doing so. He appears to have been in a great measure led by the hope of being appointed on an embassy to Asia, which would give him the opportunity of recruiting his almost exhausted pecuniary resources, and getting from Brogitarus and some others whom he had assisted, the rewards they had promised him for his services. It appears, however, that he remained in Rome. We hear nothing more of him this year. In b. c. 54 we find him prosecuting the ex-tribune Procilius, who, among other acts of violence, was charged with murder; and soon after we find Clodius and Cicero, with four others, appearing to defend M. Aemilius Scaurus. Yet it appears that Cicero still regarded him with the greatest apprehension. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, ad Q. Fr. ii. 15, b., iii. 1. 4.)

In b. c. 53 Clodius was a candidate for the praetorship, and Milo for the consulship. Each strove to hinder the election of the other. They collected armed bands of slaves and gladiators, and the streets of Rome became the scene of fresh tumults and frays, in one of which Cicero himself was endangered. When the consuls endeavoured to hold the combats, Clodius fell upon them with his band, and one of them, Cn. Domitius, was wounded. The senate met to deliberate. Clodius spoke, and attacked Cicero and Milo, touching, among other things, upon the amount of debt with which the latter was burdened. Cicero replied in the speech De Aere alieno Milonis. The contest, however, was soon after brought to a sudden and violent end. On the 20th of January, a. c. 52, Milo set out on a journey to Lanuvium. Near Bovillae he met Clodius, who was returning to Rome after visiting some of his property. Both were accompanied by armed followers, but Milo's party was the stronger. The two antagonists had passed each other without disturbance; but two of the gladiators in the rear of Milo fell upon Clodius, who immediately turned round, and rode up to the scene of dispute, when he was wounded in the shoulder by one of the gladiators. The fray now became general. The party of Clodius were put to flight, and betook themselves with their leader to a house near Bovillae. Milo ordered his men to attack the house. Several of Clodius' men were slain, and Clodius himself dragged out and despatched. The body was left lying on the road, till a senator named Sex. Tadius found it, and conveyed it to Rome. Here it was exposed to the view of the populace, who crowded to see it. Next day it was carried naked to the forum, and again exposed to view before the rostra. The mob, enraged by the spectacle, and by the inflammatory speeches of the tribunes Munatius Plancus and Q. Pompeius Rufus, headed by Sex. Clodius carried the corpse into the Curia Hostilia, made a funeral pile of the benches, tables, and writings, and burnt the body on the spot. Not only the senate-house, but the Forum basilisk, erected by Cato the Censor, and other adjoining buildings, were reduced to ashes. (For an account of the proceedings which followed, see No. 46.)

Clodius was twice married, first to Pinaria, and afterwards to Fulvia. He left a son, Publius, and a daughter. Cicero charges him with having held an incestuous intercourse with his three sisters. [CLAUDIA, Nos. 7—9.] Clodius inherited no property from his father. [See No. 53.] Besides what he obtained by less honest means, he received some money by legacies and by letting one of his houses on the Palatine. He also received a considerable dovery with his wife Fulvia. He was the owner of two houses on the Palatine hill, an estate at Alba, and considerable possessions in Etruria, near lake Frelius. His personal appearance was effeminate, and neither handsome nor commanding. That he was a man of great energy and ability there can be little question; still less that his character was of the most profligate kind. Cicero himself admits that he possessed considerable eloquence.

The chief ancient sources for the life of Clodius are the speeches of Cicero, pro Caelio, pro Sextio, pro Milone, pro Domna saa, de Haruspicarum Respons, in Pisone, and in Clodium de Caronum, and his letters to Atticus and his brother Quintus; Plutarch's lives of Lucullus, Pompey, Cicero, and Caesar; and Dion Cassius. Of modern writers, Middleton, in his Life of Cicero, has touched upon the leading points of Clodius's history; but the best and fullest account has been given by Drum- man, Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 199—570. 41—45.

46. APP. CLAUDIUS OF CLAUDIUS PULCHER, the elder of the two sons of C. Claudius. [No. 59.] Both he and his younger brother bore the praenomen Appius (Ascon. Arg. in Milon. p. 35, Orell.), from which it was conjectured by Manutius (in Cic. ad Fam. ii. 13. § 2, and viii. 8. § 2), that the former had been adopted by his uncle Appius [No. 39], a conjecture which is confirmed by a coin, on which he is designated c. clod. c. p. (Vaillant, Claud. No. 13.) Cicero, in letters written to Atticus during his exile (iii. 17. § 1, 8. § 2, 9. § 3) expresses a fear lest his brother Quintus should be brought to trial by this Appius before his uncle on a charge of extortion. On the death of P. Clodius he and his brother appeared as accusers of Milo. (Ascon. in Milon. pp. 35, 39, 40, 42, ed. Orell.) In b. c. 50 he led back from Gallia the two legions which had been lent to Caesar by Pompey. (Plut. Pomp. 57.) Whether it was this Appius or his brother who was consul in b. c. 38 (Dion. Cass. xviili. 48) cannot be determined.

47. APP. CLAUDIUS OF CLAUDIUS PULCHER, brother of No. 46, joined his brother in prosecuting Milo. [b. c. 52.] Next year he exposed the intrigue through which his father had escaped [see No. 39], in hopes of getting back the bribe that had been paid to Servilius. But he managed the matter so clumsily, that Servilius escaped, and Appius, having abandoned a prosecution with which he had threatened Servilius, was himself not long after impeached for extortion by the Ser-

3. App. Claudius, a follower of M. Brutus, who by the direction of the latter put C. Antonius to death. [Antonius, No. 13, p. 216.] (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24; Plut. Anton. 22, Brut. 28.) He was afterwards sent by Brutus in command of a squadron to Rhodes, and on the death of his patron joined Caesar at Parma. (Appian. B. C. v. 2.) [C. P. M.] CLAUDIUS L., or, with his full name, Tib. Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus, was the fourth in the series of Roman emperors, and reigned from A. D. 41 to 54. He was the grandson of Tib. Claudius Nero and Livia, who afterwards married Augustus, and the son of Drusus and Antonia. He was born on the first of August, B. C. 10, at Lyons in Gaul, and lost his father in his infancy. During his early life he was of a sickly constitution, which, though it improved in later years, was in all probability the cause of the weakness of his intellect, for, throughout his life, he showed an extraordinary deficiency in judgment, tact, and presence of mind. It was owing to these circumstances that from his childhood he was neglected, despised, and intimidated by his nearest relatives; he was left to the care of his paedagogues, who often treated him with improper harshness. His own mother is reported to have called him a portentum hominum, and to have said, that there was something wanting in his nature to make him a man in the proper sense of the word. This judgment, harsh as it may appear in the mouth of his mother, is not exaggerated, for in everything he did, and however good his intentions were, he failed from the want of judgment and a proper tact, and made himself ridiculous in the eyes of others. Notwithstanding this intellectual deficiency, however, he was a man of great industry and intelligence. He took the charity of his family, and confined to slaves and women, whom he was led to make his friends and confidants by his natural desire of unfolding his heart. During the long period previous to his accession, as well as afterwards, he devoted the greater part of his time to literary pursuits.
Augustus and his uncle Tiberius always treated him with contempt; Caligula, his nephew, raised him to the consulship indeed, but did not allow him to take any part in public affairs, and behaved towards him in the same way as his predecessors had done.

In this manner the ill-fated man had reached the age of fifty, when after the murder of Caligula he was suddenly and unexpectedly raised to the imperial throne. When he received the news of Caligula's murder, he was alarmed about his own safety, and concealed himself in a corner of the palace; but he was discovered by a common soldier, and when Claudius fled prostrate before him, the soldier saluted him emperor. Other soldiers soon assembled, and Claudius in a state of agony, as if he were led to execution, was carried in a litter into the praetorian camp. There the soldiers proclaimed him emperor, and took their oath of allegiance to him, on condition of his giving each soldier, or at least each of the praetorian guards, a donative of fifteen sestertii—the first instance of a Roman emperor being obliged to make such a promise on his accession. It is not quite certain what may have induced the soldiers to proclaim a man who had till then lived in obscurity, and had taken no part in the administration of the empire. It is said that they chose him merely on account of his connexion with the imperial family, but it is highly probable that there were also other causes at work.

During the first two days after the murder of Caligula, the senators and the city cohorts, which formed the praetorian guard, indulged in the vain hope of restoring the republic, but being unable to make head against the praetorians, and not being well agreed among themselves, the senators were at last obliged to give way, and on the third day they recognized Claudius as emperor. The first act of his government was to proclaim an amnesty respecting the attempt to restore the republic, and a few only of the murderers of Caligula were put to death, partly for the purpose of establishing an example, and partly because it was known that some of the conspirators had intended to murder Claudius likewise. The acts which followed these show the same kind and amiable disposition, and must convince every one, that, if he had been left alone, or had been assisted by a sincere friend and adviser, his government would have afforded little or no ground for complaint. Had he been allowed to remain in a private station, he would certainly have been a kind, good, and honest man. But he was throughout his life placed in the most unfortunate circumstances. The perpetual fear in which he had passed his earlier days, was now increased and abused by those by whom he was surrounded after his accession. And this fear now became the cause of a series of cruel actions and of bloodshed, for which he is stamped in history with the name of a tyrant, which he does not deserve.

The first wife of Claudius was Plautia Urgulina, by whom he had a son, Drusus, and a daughter, Claudia. But as he had reason for believing that his own life was threatened by her, he divorced her, and married Aelia Petina, whom he likewise divorced on account of some misunderstanding. At the time of his accession he was married to his third wife, the notorious Valeria Messalina, who, together with the freedmen Narrus, Pallia, and others, led him into a number of cruel acts. After the fall of Messalina by her own conduct and the intrigues of Narcissus, Claudius was, if possible, still more unfortunate in choosing for his wife his niece Agrippina, A. D. 49. She prevailed upon him to set aside his own son, Britannicus, and to adopt her son, Nero, in order that the succession might be secured to the latter. Claudius soon after regretted this step, and the consequence was, that he was poisoned by Agrippina in A. D. 54.

The conduct of Claudius during his government, in so far as it was not under the influence of his wives and freedmen, was mild and popular, and he made several useful and beneficial legislative enactments. He was particularly fond of building, and several architectural plans which had been formed, but thought impracticable by his predecessors, were carried out by him. He built, for example, the famous Claudian aqueduct (Aqua Claudia), the port of Ostia, and the emissor at which the water of lake Facinus was carried into the river Liris. During his reign several wars were carried on in Britain, Germany, Syria, and Mauretania; but they were conducted by his generals. The southern part of Britain was constituted a Roman province in the reign of Claudius, who himself went to Britain in A. D. 43, to take part in the war; but not being of a warlike disposition, he quitted the island after a stay of a few days, and returned to Rome, where he celebrated a splendid triumph. Mauretania was made a Roman province in A. D. 42 by the legate Cn. Hosidius.

As an author Claudius occupied himself chiefly with history, and was encouraged in this pursuit by Livy, the historian. With the assistance of Sulpicius Flavius, he began at an early age to write a history from the death of the dictator Caesar; but being too straightforward and honest in his accounts, he was severely censured by his mother and grandmother. He accordingly gave up his plan, and began his history with the restoration of peace after the battle of Actium. Of the earlier period he had written only four, but of the latter forty-one books. A third work were memoirs of his own life, in eight books, which Suetonius describes as magis laeppis quam veris homine composita. A fourth was a learned defence of Claudius against the attacks of Asinius Pollio. He seems to have been as well skilled in the use of the Greek as of the Latin language, for he wrote two historical works in Greek, the one a history of Carthago, in eight books, and the other a history of Etruria, in twenty books. However small the literary merit of these productions may have been, still the loss of the history of Etruria in particular is greatly to be lamented, as we know that he made use of the genuine sources of the Etruscans themselves. In A. D. 48, the Aedui petitioned that their senators should obtain the juss petendorum honorum at Rome. Claudius supported their petition in a speech which he delivered in the senate. The graecophiles of Lyons had this speech of the emperor engraved on brass tablets, and exhibited them in public. Two of these tablets were discovered at Lyons in 1529, and are still preserved there. The inscriptions are printed in Gruter's Corp. Inscrip.

CLAUDIUS II. (M. Aurelius Claudius, surnamed Gothicus), Roman emperor A. D. 268-270, was descended from an obscure family in Dardania or Illyria, and was indebted for distinction to his military talents, which recommended him to the favour and confidence of Decius, by whom he was entrusted with the defence of Thermopylae against the northern invaders of Greece. By Valerian he was nominated captain-general of the Illyrian frontier, and commander of all the provinces on the Lower Daube, with a salary and appointment on the most liberal scale; by the teetle and indolent son of the latter he was regarded with mingled respect, jealousy, and fear, but always treated with the highest consideration. Having been summoned to Italy to aid in suppressing the insurrection of Aureolus, he is believed to have taken a share in the plot organized against Gallienus by the chief officers of state, and, upon the death of that prince, was proclaimed as his successor by the senate, who heaped honours on his memory: a golden shield bearing his effigy was hung up in the forum beside the rostra, and a greater number of coins bearing the epithet indiciaating his justice, moderation, and moral worth, placing him in the foremost rank of good emperors, equal to Trajan in valour, to Antoninus in piety, to Augustus in self-control—commendations which must be received with a certain degree of caution, from the fact, that the object of them was considered as one of the ancestors of Constantine, his niece Claudia being the wife of Eutropius and the mother of Constantius Chlorus. The biography of Trebellius Pollio is a mere declamation, bearing all the marks of fulsome panegyric; but the testimony of Zosimus, who, although no admirer of Constantine, echoes these praises, is more to be trusted. It is certain also that he was greatly beloved by the senate, who heaped honours on his memory: a golden shield bearing his effigy was hung up in the curia Romana, a colossal statue of gold was erected in the capitol in front of the temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, a column was raised in the forum beside the rostra, and a greater number of coins bearing the epithet dicens, indicating that they were struck after death, are extant of this emperor than of any of his predecessors. CLEANETUS (Kleaiuerov.) 1. Father of Cleson, the Athenian demagogue. (Thuc. iii. 36, iv. 21.) It is doubtful whether he is the same person as the Cleanetus who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Eq. 572), and of whom the Scholiast on the passage speaks as the author of a decree for withholding the στίχοι ουράνιοι from the generals of the state.

2. A tragic poet, of whom we find nothing recorded except the interesting fact of his being so fond of lupines, that he would eat them, husks and all. (Com. incert. ap. Athen. ii. p. 55, c.; comp. Casaub. ad loc.)

CLEANDER (Kleaidhoòs). 1. Tyrant of Gela, which had been previously subject to an oligarchy. He reigned for seven years, and was murdered B. c. 498, by a man of Gela named Sabyllus. He was succeeded by his brother Hippocrates, one of whose sons was also called Cleander. The latter, together with his brother Euleides, was deposed by Gelaon when he gained the government for himself in B. c. 491. (Herod. vii. 154, 155; Aristot. Polit. v. 12, ed. Bekck; Paus. vi. 5.)

2. An Aeginetan, son of Telearchus, whose victory in the pancratium at the Isthmian games is celebrated by Pindar. (Isthm. viii.) The ode must have been composed very soon after the end of the Persian war (B. c. 479), and from it we learn that Cleander had also been victorious at the 'Akoloniotai at Megara and the 'Akoloniotai at Epidauros. (See Dist. of Ant. on the words.)

3. A Lacedaemonian, was harmost at Byzantium in B. c. 400, and promised Cleisichros to meet the Cyrean Greeks at Calpe with ships to convey them to Europe. On their reaching that place, however, they found that Cleander had neither come nor sent; and when he at length arrived, he brought only two triremes, and no transports. Soon after his arrival, a tumult occurred, in which the traitor Dexippus was rather roughly handled, and Cleander, instigated by him, threatened to sail away, to denounce the army as enemies, and to issue orders that no Greek city should receive them. [Dexippus.] They succeeded, however, in pacifying him by extreme submission, and he entered into a connexion of hospitality with Xenophon, and accepted the offer of leading the army home. But he wished probably to avoid the possibility of any hostile collision with Pharnabazus, and, the sacrifices being declared to be unfavourable for the projected march, he sailed back to Byzantium, promising to give the Cyreans the best reception in his power on their arrival there. This promise he seems to have kept as effectually as the opposition of the admiral Amaziades would permit.

He was succeeded in his government by Aristarchus. (Xen. Anab. vi. 2, § 13, 4. §§ 12, 18, vi. 6, §§ 5—36, vii. 1, §§ 8, 36, &c., 2, § 3, &c.)

4. One of Alexander's officers, son of Polomenes. Towards the winter of B. c. 334, Alexander, being then in Caria, sent him to the Polomenes to collect mercenaries, and with these he returned and joined the king while he was engaged in the siege of Tyre, B. c. 331. (Arr. Anab. i. 24, ii. 20; Curt. iii. 1. § 1, iv. 3, § 11.) In B. c. 330 he was employed by Polydamas, Alexander's emissary, to kill Parmenion, under whom he had been left as second in command at Ecbatana. (Arr. Anab. iii. 20; Curt. vii. 2. §§ 19, 32; Plut. Alex. 49; Diod. xvii. 80; Just. xii. 5.) On Alexander's arrival in Carmania, B. c. 325, Cleander joined him there, together with some other generals from Media and their forces. But he was accused with the rest of extreme profligacy and oppression, not unmixed with sacrilege, in his command, and was put to death by order of Alexander. (Arr. Anab. vi. 27; Diod. xvii. 109; Plut. Alex. 69; Curt. x. 1. §§ 1—8; Just. xii. 10.)

5. A collector of proverbs, is quoted by the Scholast on Theocritus. (Idyll. v. 21, ἐκινεὶν οὖν ὑζυλό.)

CLEANDER, a Phrygian slave, brought to Rome as a porter. He chanced to attract the attention and gain the favour of Commodus, who elevated him to the rank of chamberlain, and made him his chief minister after the death of Pernin. (Pernin.) Being now all-powerful, he openly offered for sale all offices, civil and military, and the regular number of magistrates was multiplied to answer the demand, so that on one occasion twenty-five were displayed in a single day. On the following year (it is believed to have been A. D. 185, or, according to Tillemant, 189), one of whom was Septimius Severus, afterwards emperor. The vast sums thus accumulated were however freely spent, partly in supplying the demands of the emperor, partly in his own private gratifications, partly in works of public magnificence and utility. But fortune, which had raised him so rapidly, as suddenly hurled him down. A scarcity of corn having arisen, the empress ordered the wants of friends, and partly in his own private gratifications, partly in the praefectus annonae. A tumult burst forth in the circus, a mob hurried to the suburban villa of Commodus, clamouring for vengeance, and the emperor giving way to the dictates of his natural cowardice, yielded up Cleander, who was torn to pieces, and his whole family and nearest friends destroyed. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 12, 13; Herodian. i, 12; 10; Lamprid. Commod. 6, 7, 11.) [W. R.]

CLEAN'NRIDAS (Κλεινηρίδας), a Spartan, father of Gylippus, who having been appointed by the Ephors as commissary to the Thessalians to be prosecuted for having marched against Attica, b.c. 445, was said to have been bribed by Pericles to withdraw his army. He was condemned to death, but fled to Thurii, and was there received into citizenship. (Plut. Peric. 22, c. 17; Osann, Comm. Kunslblaii.)

CLEAN'OR (Ξεανθός), an Arcadian of Orchomenus, entered into the service of Cyrus the Younger, and is introduced by Xenophon as refusing in the name of the Greeks, after the battle of Cunaxa, b.c. 401, to surrender their arms at the requisition of Artaxerxes. (Xen. Anab. ii. 1, § 10.) After the treacherous apprehension of Clearchus and the other generals by Tissaphernes, Cleanor was one of those who were appointed to fill their places, and seems to have acted throughout the retreat with bravery and vigour. (Xen. Anab. iii. 1, § 47, 2, §§ 4–6, iv. 6, § 9.) When the Greeks found themselves deceived by the adventurer Coemtades, under whom they had marched out of Byzantium, Cleanor was among those who advised that they should enter the service of Suthes, the Thracian prince, who had conciliated him by the present of a horse. We find him afterwards co-operating with Xenophon, of whom he seems to have had a high opinion, in his endeavours to obtain from Suthes the promised pay. (Xen. Anab. vii. 2, § 2, 5, § 10.)

CLEANTHES (Κλεανθής), a Stoic, born at Assos in Trucis about b.c. 300, though the exact date is unknown. He was the son of Phanius, and entered life as a boxer, but had only four drachmas of his own when he felt himself impelled to the study of philosophy. He first placed himself under Crates, and then under Zeno, whose faithful disciple he continued for nineteen years. In order to support himself and pay Zeno the necessary fee for his instructions, he worked all night and all day, at drawing water from gardens, and in consequence received the nickname of ἐραυτογενής. As he spent the whole day in philosophical pursuits, he had no visible means of support, and was therefore sum-

"Hence the correction of putetum for planum is proposed in Juv. ii. 7; "Et jubet archetypos planum servare Cleanthas." moned before the Areiopagus to account for his way of living. The judges were so delighted by the evidence of industry which he produced, that they voted him ten minae, though Zeno would not permit him to accept them. By his fellow-pupils he seems to have been considered as modest and abstemious, and received from them the title of the As, in which appellation he said that he rejoiced, as it implied that his back was strong enough to bear whatever Zeno put upon it. Several other anecdotes preserved of him show that he was one of those enthusiastic votaries of philosophy who naturally appeared from time to time in an age when there was no deep and earnest religion to satisfy the thinking part of mankind. We are not therefore surprised to hear of his declaring that for the sake of philosophy he would dig and undergo all possible labour, of his taking notes from Zeno's lectures on bones and pieces of earth—unaware when he was too poor to buy paper, and of the quaint pittance with which he fed his body, and the necessity to rectify and develop his master's system, yet his stern morality and his devotion to Zeno induced him to keep it free from all foreign corruptions. His poverty was relieved by a present of 3000 minas from Antigonus, and he died at the age of eighty. The story of his death is characteristic. His physician recommended to him a two days' abstinence from food to cure an ulcer in his mouth, and at the end of the second day, he said that, as he had now advanced so far on the road to death, it would be a pity to have the trouble over again, and he therefore still refused all nourishment, and died of starvation.

The names of the numerous treatises of Cleanthes preserved by Læstius (vii. 175) present the usual catalogue of moral and philosophical subjects: πρὸς ἀρσενίκας, πρὸς Ἵ�ρον, πρὸς θεον, &c. A hymn of his to Zeus is still extant, and contains some striking sentiments. It was published in Greek and German by H. H. Cludius, Göttingen, 1786; also by Sturz, 1785, re-edited by Merzendorf, Lips. 1835, and by others. His doctrines were almost exactly those of Zeno. There was a slight variation between his opinion and the more usual Stoic view respecting the immortality of the soul. Cleanthes taught that all souls are immortal, but that the intensity of existence after death would vary according to the strength or weakness of the particular soul, thereby leaving to the wicked some apprehension of future punishment; whereas Chrysippus considered that only the souls of the wise and good were to survive death. (Plut. Pæn. Phil. iv. 7.) Again, with regard to the ethical principle of the Stoics, to "live in unison with nature," it is said that Zeno only enunciated the vague direction, ὄμορφος ὠνάγκης, which Cleanthes explained by the addition of τῶν φύσεων. (Stob. Ed. ii. p. 183.) By this he meant the universal nature of things, whereas Chrysippus understood by the nature which we are to follow, the particular nature of man, as well as universal nature (Diog. Laert. viii. 89.). This opinion of Cleanthes was of a Cynical character [Antisthenes], and held up as a model
CLEARCHUS.

CLEARCHUS, a Spartan, son of Ramphias. In the congress which the Spartans held at Corinth, in B.C. 412, it was determined to employ him as commander in the Hellespont after Chios and Lesbos should be gained from the Athenians; and in the same year the eleven commissioners, who were sent out from Sparta to take cognizance of the conduct of Astyochus, were entrusted with the discretionary power of despatching a force to the Hellespont under Clearchus. (Thuc. viii. 8, 39.) In B.C. 408, he was present at the battle of Cyzicus under Mindarus, who appointed him to lead that part of the force which was specially opposed to Thrasybulus. (Diod. xiii. 51; Xen. Hell. i. 16, &c.; Plut. Alex. 26.) In the same year, on the proposal of Agis, he was sent to Chalcodon and Byzantium, with the latter object of Cyrus. When the prince had set out on his expedition, Clearchus joined him at Celaenae in Phrygia with a body of 2000 men in all, being, according to Xenophon (Anab. iii. 1 § 10), the only Greek who was aware of the prince's real object. When the actual intention of Cyrus began to be suspected, the Greeks refused to march further, and Clearchus, attempting to force his own troops to proceed, narrowly escaped stoning at their hands. Professing then to come into their wishes, and keeping up a show of variance between himself and Cyrus, he gradually led, not his own forces only, but the rest of his countrymen as well, to perceive the difficulties of their position should they desert the service of the prince, and thus ultimately induced them to advance. When Orontes was brought to trial for his treason, Clearchus was the only Greek admitted into the number of judges, and he was the first to advise sentence of death against the accused. At the battle of Cumaxa, B.C. 401, he commanded the right wing of the Greeks, which rested on the Euphrates; from this position he thought it unsafe to withdraw, as such a step would have exposed him to the risk of being surrounded; and he therefore neglected the directions of Cyrus, who had desired him to charge with all his force the enemy's centre. Plutarch blames him exceedingly for such an excess of caution, and attributes to it the loss of the battle. When the Greeks began their retreat, Clearchus was tacitly recognized as their commander-in-chief, and in this capacity he exhibited his usual qualities of prudence and energy, as well as great strictness in the preservation of discipline. At length, however, being desirous of coming to a better understanding with Tissaphernes, and allaying the suspicions which existed between him and the Greeks in spite of their solemn treaty, Clearchus sought an interview with the Persian prince, the result of which was an agreement to punish the parties on both sides who had harboured to excite their mutual jealousy; and Tissaphernes... promised that, if Clearchus would bring his chief officers to him, he would point out those who had instilled suspicion into him against their countrymen. Clearchus fell into the snare, and induced four generals and twenty of the laches to accompany him to the interview. The generals were admitted and arrested, while the other officers, who had remained without, were massacred. Clearchus and his colleagues were sent to the court of Artaxerxes, and, notwithstanding the efforts of the queen-mother, Parysatis, in their favour, were all beheaded, with the exception of Menon, who escaped. The bodies of the other generals were torn by dogs and birds, a violent wind raised over that of Clearchus a tomb of sand, round which, in a miraculous manner, he knew that he had slain a favourite of the gods. (Xen. Anab. i. 1, § 9, 2, § 9, 3, §§ 1—21, 5, §§ 11—17, 6, §§ 8—13, ii. 1—6, § 15; Plut. Artax. 8, 18.) [E. E.]

CLEARCHUS (Kαέρχος), a citizen of Hermelaea on the Rhaxine, was recalled from exile by the nobles to aid them in quelling the seditious temper of the people, and to defend the city. According to Justin, he made an agreement with Mithridates I. of Pontus to betray the city to him on condition of holding it under him as governor. But, perceiving apparently that he might make himself master of it without the aid of Mithridates, he not only broke his agreement with the latter, but seized his person, and compelled him to pay a large sum for his release. Having deserted the oligarchical side, he came forward as the man of the people, obtained from them the command of a body of mercenaries, and, having got rid of the nobles by murder and banishment, raised himself to the tyranny. He used his power as badly, and with as much cruelty as he had gained it, while, with the very frenzy of arrogance, he assumed publicly the attributes of Zeus, and gave the name of Kapsos to one of his sons. He lived in constant fear of assassination, against which he guarded in the strictest way. But, in spite of his precautions, he was murdered by Chion and Leon in B. c. 353, after a reign of twelve years. He is said to have been a pupil both of Plato and of Isocrates, the latter of whom asserts that, while he was with him, he was one of the gentlest and most benevolent of men. (Diod. xv. 81, xvi. 36; Just. xvi. 4, 5; Polyen. ii. 30; Menn. op. Plat. Bibl. 224; Plut. de Alec. Port. ii. 5, ad Princ. inerad. 4; Theopomp. op. Athem. iii. p. 65; Isocop. Ep. ad Timoth. p. 425, ad fin.; Suid. s. v. Kævzvow; Wesseling, ad Diod. u. ec.; Perizon. ad Ad. V. H. ix. 13.) [E. E.]

CLEARCHUS (Καέρχος), of Soli, one of Aristotle’s pupils, was the author of a number of works, none of which are extant, on a very great variety of subjects. He seems to have been the same person whom Athenaeus (i. p. 4, a.) calls τρεχάτω, or the diner out. A list of his principal writings is subjoined, all the references which may be of interest are prefixed to them. (See Athen. xii. p. 548, d.)
secundo, of the Editio Secunda. [Donatus.] Of Cledionius personally we know nothing; but it is not improbable that he may have been attached to the Auditorium or University established in the epoikish of Constantinople, an institution to which we find an allusion in p. 1866. (Comp. Godfr. ed. Cod. Theod. 14. tit. 9 vol. v. p. 203, &c.) The only edition is that contained in the "Grammaticae Latinae Anctores Antiqui" of Putschius, 4to., Hann. 1605, pp. 1859—1893. (Usam, Beiträge zur Griech. und Röm. Literaturgesch., vol. ii. p. 59.)

CLELSONUS or CLEAMORUS, a physician, who may have lived in the sixth or fifth century a. c., as Pliny says that a botanical work, which was commonly attributed to Pythagoras, was by some persons supposed to have been written by him. (H. N. xxiv. 101.) [W. A. G.]

CLEIDE/MUS (Κλειδέμος), an ancient Athenian author. Meursius is inclined to believe (Pessistr. c. 2), that the name, where it occurs in Plutarch, Athenaeus, and others, has been substituted, by an error of the copyists, for Cleideomus, who is mentioned by Pausanias (x. 15) as the most ancient writer of Athenian history. We find in Athenaeus the following works ascribed to Cleideomus:—1. "Ἐγγράδες." (Athen. ix. p. 410, a.) This is probably the same work which is referred to by Suidas (s. v. "Τυχα") and Vit. Pylh. 2. (Athen. vi. p. 253, a.), the subject of which seems to have been the history and antiquities of Attica. It is probably the work quoted by Plutarch (Thes. 19, 27), who mentions the prominence as the especial characteristic of the author. 3. Πρωτογονία, also apparently an antiquarian work. (Athen. xiv. p. 660, a.) 4. Νήσος, a passage from the eighth book of which is referred to by Athenaeus (xii. p. 609, c.), relating to the first restoration of Pericles, and the marriage of Hipparchus with Phya. (Comp. Herod. ii. 60.) We cannot fix the exact period at which Cleidemus flourished, but it must have been subsequently to B. C. 479, since Plutarch refers to his account of the battle of Plataea. (Plut. Arist. 19.) See further references in Vossius (l. c.).

CLEIGHENES (Κλειγήνης). 1. A citizen of Acanthus, sent as ambassador to Sparta, B. C. 382, to obtain her assistance for Acanthus and the other Chalcidian towns against the Olynthians. Xenophon records a speech of his, delivered on this occasion, in which he dwells much on the ambition of Olynthus and her growing power. His application for aid was successful. (Xem. Helv. v. 2. § 11, cc.; Diod. xx. 19, &c.; comp. p. 155, a.)

2. A man who is violently attacked by Aristophanes in a very obscure passage (Ras. 706-716), where he is spoken of as a bath-man, puny in person, dishonest, drunken, and quarrelsome. The Scholiast says (ad Arist. i. c.), that he was a rich man, but of foreign extraction. He seems to have been a meddler in politics, and a mischievous charlatan of the day. [E. E.]

CLEIDNIAS (Κλειδνίας). 1. Son of Aleibiades, who traced his origin from Euryaces, the son of the Thebanian Ajax. This Aleibiades was the contemporary of Cleisthenes [CLEISTHENES, No. 2], whom he asisted in expelling the Peisistratidæ from Athens, and along with whom he was subsequently banished. Cleinias married Deinomachus, the daughter of Megacles, and became by her the father of the famous Aleibiades. He greatly distinguished himself in the third naval engagement at Artemision, B. C. 480, having provided a ship and manned it with 200 men at his own expense. He was slain in B. C. 447, at the battle of Coronea, in which the Athenians were defeated by the Boeotian and Euboean exiles. (Herod. vii. 17; Plut. Alc. 1; Plut. Alc. Prin. p. 112; Thuc. ii. 115.)

2. A younger brother of the famous Aleibiades. Pericles, the guardian of the youths, fearing lest Aleibiades might corrupt him, sent him away from his own house and placed him for education with his brother Aristophon; but the latter sent him back at the end of six months, finding it impossible to make anything of him. (Plut. Protag. p. 820.) In another dialogue (Alc. Prin. p. 118, ad fin.; comp. Schol. ad loc.) he is spoken of as quite a madman.

3. Son of Aziuchus, and the same who is introduced as a very young man by Plato in the "Euthydemus," was first cousin to No. 3 and to Aleibiades.

4. The father of Aratus of Sicily. The Sicynnians committed to him the supreme power in their state on the deposition, according to Pausanias, of the tyrants Euthydemus and Timocleides, the latter of whom, according to Plutarch, was joined with Cleinias as his colleague. Soon after this Abantidas murdered Cleinias and seized the tyranny, B. C. 264. (Paus. ii. 8; Plut. Arist. 2.) [ABANTIDAS.]

CLEI'NIAIAS (Κλεινίας), a Pythagorean philosopher, of Tarentum, was a contemporary and friend of Plato's, as appears from the story (perhaps otherwise worthless) which Diogenes Laëritius (ix. 40) gives on the authority of Aristoxenus, to the effect that Plato wished to burn all the writings of Democritus which he could collect, but was prevented by Amyclas and Cleinias. In his practice, Cleinias was a true Pythagorean. Thus we hear that he used to assuage his anger by playing on his harp; and, when Prous of Cyrene had lost all his fortune through a political revolution (comp. Thrige, Res Cyreniense, § 48), Cleinias, who knew nothing of him except that he was a Pythagorean, took on himself the risk of a voyage to Cyrene, and supplied him with money to the full extent of his loss. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. 27, 31, 33; Ael. V. H. xiv. 23; Perizem. ad loc. ; Channel. Pont. op. Athen. xiv. p. 623, f.; Diod. Fragment. lib. x.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. i. pp. 849, 886.) [E. B.]

CLEINIS (Κλεινίς), the husband of Harpe and father of Lycus, Orytgyius, Harpasus, and Arte- michia. He lived in Mesopotamia, near Babylon, and was beloved by Apollo and Artemis. Having heard that the Hyperboræans sacrificed asces to Apollo, he wished to introduce the same custom at Babylon; but Apollo threatened him, and commanded that only sheep, goats, and heifers should be sacrificed. Lycus and Harpasus, the sons of Cleinis, however, persisted in sacrificing asses, whereupon Apollo infuriated the animals so as to attack the family of Cleinis. Other divinities, however, took pity upon the family, and changed all its members into different birds. (Anton Lib. 26.) [L. S.]

CLEINOMACHUS (Κλεινόμαχος), a Megaric
CLEISTHENES. 793

philosopher of Thurium, is said by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 112) to have been the first who composed treatises on the fundamental principles of dialectics (περὶ διαλογισμῶν καὶ κατηγορήματων). We learn from Suidas (s. v. Πυρρόνος), who Pythoion, who flourished about 330 B.C., attended the instructions of Bryso, and that the latter was a disciple of Cleomachus. We may therefore set the date of Cleomachus towards the commencement of the same century. [E. E.]

CLEIO. [MUSAR.]

CLEISTHENES (Κλεισθένης). 1. Son of Aristocles and tyrant of Sicyon. He was descended from the Alcmaeonidae, who founded the dynasty about 100 years before his time, and succeeded his grandfather Myron in the tyranny, though probably without some opposition. (Herod. vi. 126; Aristot. Pol. ii. 12, ed Bekk.; Paus. ii. 8; Müller, Dor. i. 8, § 2.) In B.C. 595, he aided the Amphictyons in the sacred war against Cirra, which ended, after ten years, in the destruction of the guilty city, and in which Solon too is said to have assisted with his counsel the avengers of the gods. (Paus. x. 37; Aesch. c. Cle. § 107, &c.; Clinton, F. H. sub anno. 595.) We find Cleisthenes also engaged in war with Argos, his enmity to which is said by Herodotus to have been so great, that he prohibited the recitation at Sicyon of Homer's poems, because Argos was celebrated in them, and restored to the worship of Dionysus what the historian calls, by a prolepsis, the tragic choruses in which Adrastos, the Argive hero, was commemorated. (Herod. vi. 67; see Nitzsch, Melden. i. p. 153, &c.) Müller (l. c.) connects this hostility of Cleisthenes towards Argos, the chief Doric city of the district, with his systematic endeavour to depress and dishonour the Doric tribes at Sicyon. The old names of these he altered, calling them by new ones derived from the sow, the ass, and the pig (Ὑατα, Ὄσεατα, Χορεατα), while to his own tribe he gave the title of Ἀργαῖοι (lords of the people). The explanation of his motive for this given by Müller (Dor. iii. 4, § 96) is not satisfactory; but the order of Herodotus which he sets aside; and the historian's statement, that Cleisthenes of Athens imitated his grandfather in his political changes, may justify the inference, that the measures adopted at Sicyon with respect to the tribes extended to more than a mere alteration of their names. (Herod. v. 67, 68.) From Aristotle (Pol. v. 12) we learn, that Cleisthenes maintained his power partly through the respect inspired by his military exploits, and partly by the popular and moderate course which he adopted in his general government. His administration also appears to have been characterized by much magnificence, and Pausanias mentions a colonnade (ἐρωτοάρχεια) which he built with the spoils taken in the sacred war. (Paus. ii. 9.)

We have no means of ascertaining the exact date of the death of Cleisthenes, or the conclusion of his tyranny, but we know that it cannot be placed earlier than B.C. 582, in which year he won the victory in the chariot-race at the Pythian games. (See Clinton and Müller on the year.) His daughter Agarista, whom so many suitors sought, was given in marriage to Megacles the Alcmeonid. [AGARISTA.]

2. An Athenian, son of Megacles and Agarista, and grandson of the tyrant of Sicyon, appears as the head of the Alcmeonid clan on the banishment of the Peisistratidae, and was indeed suspected of having tampered with the Delphic oracle, and urged it to require from Sparta the expulsion of Hippasii. Finding, however, that he could not cope with his political rival Isagoras except through the aid of the commons, he set himself to increase the power of the latter, and to remove most of the safeguards against democracy which Solon had established or preserved. There is therefore less truth than rhetoric in the assertion of Isocrates (Adr. p. 143, a.), that Cleisthenes merely restored the constitution of Solon. The principal change which he introduced, which for the most part of his other alterations grew, was the abolition of the four ancient tribes, and the establishment of ten new ones in their stead. These last were purely local, and the object as well as the effect of the arrangement was, to give permanence to democratic ascendency by the destruction of the old aristocratic associations of clans (Comp. Arist. Pol. vi. 4, ed Bekk.; Thring, Hist. Græc. § 43.) The increase in the number of the ἐκκλησίαι and of the ναυπακται was a consequence of the above measure. The ἐπαρχίαι were indeed allowed to remain as before, but, as they were no longer connected with the tribes (the σῶμα constituting the new subdivision), they ceased to be of any political importance. According to Aelian (V. F. xiii. 24) Cleisthenes was also the first who instituted ostracism, by which he is said, on the same authority, to have been the first sufferer; and this is partly borne out by Diodorus (xi. 55), who says, that ostracism was introduced after the banishment of the Peisistratidae (but see Plut. Nic. 11; Harpocr. s. v. ἵππαρχοι). We learn, moreover, from Aristotle (Pol. iii. 2, ed Bekk.) that he admitted into the tribes a number of persons who were not of Athenian blood; but this appears to have been only intended to serve his purposes at the time, not to be a precedent for the future. By some again he is supposed to have remodelled the Ephetae, adding a fifth court to the four old ones, and altering the number of the judges from 80 to 51, &c. From each tribe and a president. (Wachsmuth, vol. i. p. 360, Eng. transl.; but see Müller, Euen. § 64, &c.) The changes of Cleisthenes had the intended effect of gaining political superiority for himself and his party, and Isagoras was reduced to apply for the aid of the Spartans under Cleomenes I. [Hemida accordingly were sent from Lacedaemon to Athens, who demanded and obtained the banishment of Cleisthenes and the rest of the Alcmeonidae, as the accused family (ἐνακτῆς), on whom rested the pollution of Cylon's murder. [CYLON.] Cleisthenes having withdrawn, Cleomones proceeded to expel 700 families pointed out by Isagoras, and endeavoured to abolish the Council of 500, and to place the government in the hands of 200 oligarchs. But the Council resisted the attempt, and the people supported them, and besieged Cleomones and Isagoras in the Acropolis, of which they had taken possession. On the third day the besieged capitulated, and the Lacedaemonians and Isagoras were allowed to depart from Attica. The rest were put to death, and Cleisthenes and the 700 banished families were recalled. (Herod. v. 63, 66, 69—73, vi. 131; comp. Dict. of Ant. pp. 156, 233, 323, &c., 633, 755, 990—993.)

3. An Athenian, whose foppery and effeminate profligacy brought him more than once under the lash of Aristophanes. Thus the Clouds are said to take the form of women when they see him (Vib. 354); and in the Thesmophoriazusae (574, &c.) he brings information to the women, as being a particular friend of theirs, that Euripides has smuggled in Musislochos among them as a spy. In spite of his character he appears to have been appointed on one occasion to the sacred office of Sevaphos. (Vesp. 1167.) The Scholiast on A. ch. 118 and Eth. 1371 says that, in order to preserve the appearance of youth, he wore no beard, removing the hair by an application of pitch. (Comp. Emsl. ad Achn. 118.)

CLEITAGORA (Kateytya), a lyric poetess, mentioned by Aristophanes in his Wasps (v. 1245), and in his lost play, the Daidalos. She is variously represented as a Laederamemonian, a Thessalian, and a Lesbian. (Schol. in Aristoph. Vesp. 1230, 1245, Lysistr. 1337; Suid. Hesych. a. v.) [P. S.]

CLEITARCHUS (Kateymenos), tyrant of Eretria in Euboea. After Phintarchus had been expelled from the tyranny of Eretria by Phocion, B. c. 350, popular government was at first established; but strong party struggles ensued, in which the adherents of Athens were at length overpowered by those of Macedonia, and Philip then sent Hipponicus, one of his generals, to destroy the walls of Porthmus, the harbour of Eretria, and to set up Hipparchus, Automedon, and Cleitarchus as tyrants. (Plut. Phe. 13; Dem. de Cor. § 88, Philipp. iii. §§ 58, 65.) This was subsequent to the peace between Athens and Philip in B. c. 346, since Demosthenes adduces it as one of the proofs of a breach of the peace on the part of Macedon. (Philipp. iii. § 25.) The tyrants, however, were not suffered to retain their power quietly, for Demosthenes (Philipp. iii. § 69) mentions two armaments sent by Philip for their support, at different times, under Eurylochus and Parmenion respectively. Soon after, we find Cleitarchus in sole possession of the government; but he does not seem to have been at open hostility with Athens, though he held Eretria for Philip, for we hear of the Athenians sending ambassadors to request his consent to the arrangement for uniting Euboea under one federative government, having its congress at Chalcis, to which Athens was also to transfer the annual contributions from Oreus and Eretria. Aeschines says, that a talent from Cleitarchus was part of the bribe which he received for procuring the decree in question. Cleitarchus appears therefore to have come into the above project of Demosthenes and Callias, to whom he would naturally be opposed; but he thought it perhaps a point gained if he could get rid of the remnant of Athenian influence in Eretria. For the possible motives of Demosthenes, see p. 568, n. The plan, however, seems to have fallen to the ground, and Demosthenes in B. c. 341 carried a decree for an expedition to Euboea with the view of putting down the Macedonian interest in the island. On this, Cleitarchus and Philistides, the tyrant of Oreus, sent ambassadors to Athens to prevent, if possible, the threatened invasion; and Aeschines, at whose house the envoys were entertained, appears to have supported their cause in some degree. But the decree was carried into effect, and the command of the armament was given to Phocion, by whom Cleitarchus and Philistides were expelled from their respective cities. (Aesch. c. 354); and in the Nub. to take the form of women when they see him (Vesp. 1167.) The Scholiast on A. ch. 118 and Eth. 1371 says that, in order to preserve the appearance of youth, he wore no beard, removing the hair by an application of pitch. (Comp. Emsl. ad Achn. 118.)

CLEITUS.

31.) He sometimes translates from the works of Cleitomachus, as for instance from the "De sustentandis Offensionibus," which was in four books. (Acad. ii. 31.)

Cleitomachus appears to have been well known to his contemporaries at Rome, for two of his works were dedicated to illustrious Romans; one to the poet C. Lucilius, and the other to L. Censorinus, consul in B. C. 149. (Cic. Acad. ii. 32.)

Cleitomachus probably treated of the history of philosophy in his work on the philosophical sects (τρεις αδαρέων). (Diog. Laërt. ii. 92.)

CLEITO'MACHUS (Κλειτομάχος), a Thracian athlete, whose exploits are recorded by Pausanias (vi. 15; comp. Suid. s. v. Κλειτομάχος).

He won the prize at Olympia in the panathenaea in Ol. 141. (n. c. 216.) Aelian mentions (V. H. iii. 30) his great temperance, and the care he took to keep himself in good condition. [E. E.]

CLEITONYMUS (Κλειτονύμος), an historian of uncertain date. A work of his on Italy and its provinces at Triparadeisus, B. C. 321, is noted by Athenaeus and Aelian for his pomp and parade of the latter, and also at supposing that his own services and those of his contemporaries were depreciated as compared with the exploits of younger men. Being heated with wine, he launched forth into language highly insolent to the king, quoting a passage from Euripides (Androm. 653, &c.) to the effect, that the soldiers win by their toil the victories of which the general reaps the glory. Alexander at length, stung to a frenzy of rage, rushed towards him, but was held back by his friends, while Cleitus also was forced from the room. Alexander, being then released, seized a spear, and sprung to the door; and Cleitus, who had not agreed, however, in stating, that Cleitus became exasperated at a comparison which was instituted between Alexander and Philip, much to the disapprobation of the latter, and also at supposing that his own services and those of his contemporaries were depreciated as compared with the exploits of younger men. Being heated with wine, he launched forth into language highly insolent to the king, quoting a passage from Euripides (Androm. 653, &c.) to the effect, that the soldiers win by their toil the victories of which the general reaps the glory. Alexander at length, stung to a frenzy of rage, rushed towards him, but was held back by his friends, while Cleitus also was forced from the room. Alexander, being then released, seized a spear, and sprung to the door; and Cleitus, who was returning in equal fury to brave his anger, met him, and fell dead beneath his weapon. (Diod. xvi. 21, 57; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. Alex. 16, 50-52; Arr. Anab. i. 15, iii. 11, 27, iv. 8, 9; Curt. iv. 13. § 26, viii. 1; Just. xii. 6.)

Another of Alexander's officers, summoned Αντίπατρος to distinguish him from the above. He is noted by Athenaeus and Aelian for his pomp and luxury, and is probably the same who is mentioned by Justin among the veterans sent home to Macedonia under Critaurus in B. C. 324. (Athen. xii. p. 539, c. ; Plut. Alex. V. H. ix. 3; Just. xii. 12; Arr. Anab. vii. 12.)

4. An officer who commanded the Macedonian fleet for Antipater in the Lusian war, B. C. 332, and defeated the Athenian admiral, Euxion, in two battles off the Echinades. In the distribution of provinces at Triparadeisus, B. C. 321, he obtained from Antipater the satrapy of Lydia; and when Antigonus was advancing to dispossess

tively in the strong positions they were enabled to take up among their hills, compelled him to flee from his dominions and take refuge in those of Glauca. Arrian mentions a dreadful sacrifice of three boys, three girls, and three black rams, offered by the Illyrians before their first battle with Alexander's troops. (Arr. Anab. 1. 5, 6; Plut. Alex. 11; Diod. xvii. 8.)

2. A Macedonian, surnamed Νέας, son of Dropides, and brother to Liance or Hellanice, nurse of Alexander the Great. He saved Alexander's life at the battle of Oranicus, B. C. 334, cutting off with a blow of his sword the arm of Spithridates which was raised to slay the king. (Cic. Acad. vi. 15; comp. Suid. s. v. Κλέτος.) In B. C. 331, he commanded, in the right wing, the body of cavalry called "Δρακοντα" (see Polyb. v. 65, xxxi. 3); and when, in B. C. 330, the guards (τρηοκτόνοι) were separated into two divisions, it was considered expedient not to entrust the sole command to any one man, Hephaestion and Cleitus were appointed to lead respectively the two bodies. In B. C. 328, Artabazus resigned his satrapy of Bactria, and the king gave it to Cleitus. On the eve of the day on which he was to set out to take possession of his government, Alexander, then at Marneanda in Sophiania, celebrated a festival in honour of the Dioscuri, though the day was in fact sacred to Dionysus—a circumstance which afterwards, no doubt, inspired friends and subjects with a topic of consolation to him in his remorse for the murder of Cleitus, the soothsayers declaring, that his frenzy had been caused by the god's wrath at the neglect of his festival. At the banquet an angry dispute arose, the particulars of which are variously reported by different authors. They agree, however, in stating, that Cleitus became exasperated at a comparison which was instituted between Alexander and Philip, much to the disapproval of the latter, and also at supposing that his own services and those of his contemporaries were depreciated as compared with the exploits of younger men. Being heated with wine, he launched forth into language highly insolent to the king, quoting a passage from Euripides (Androm. 653, &c.) to the effect, that the soldiers win by their toil the victories of which the general reaps the glory. Alexander at length, stung to a frenzy of rage, rushed towards him, but was held back by his friends, while Cleitus also was forced from the room. (Diod. xvi. 21, 57; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. Alex. 16, 50-52; Arr. Anab. i. 15, iii. 11, 27, iv. 8, 9; Curt. iv. 13. § 26, viii. 1; Just. xii. 6.)

Another of Alexander's officers, summoned Αντίπατρος to distinguish him from the above. He is noted by Athenaeus and Aelian for his pomp and luxury, and is probably the same who is mentioned by Justin among the veterans sent home to Macedonia under Critaurus in B. C. 324. (Athen. xii. p. 539, c. ; Plut. Alex. V. H. ix. 3; Just. xii. 12; Arr. Anab. vii. 12.)

4. An officer who commanded the Macedonian fleet for Antipater in the Lusian war, B. C. 332, and defeated the Athenian admiral, Euxion, in two battles off the Echinades. In the distribution of provinces at Triparadeisus, B. C. 321, he obtained from Antipater the satrapy of Lydia; and when Antigonus was advancing to dispossess him of it, in B.C. 319, after Antipater's death, he garrisoned the principal cities, and sailed away to Macedonia to report the state of affairs to Polysperchon. In B.C. 318, after Polysperchon had been baffled at Megalopolis, he sent Cleitus with a fleet to the coast of Thrace to prevent any forces of Antigonus from passing into Europe, and also to effect a junction with Arrhidæus, who had shut himself up in the town of Chius. [See p. 350, a.] Nicanor being sent against him by Cassander, a battle ensued near Byzantium, in which Cleitus secured a decisive victory. But his success rendered him over-confident, and, having allowed his troops to disembark and encamp on land, he was surprised by Antigonus and Nicanor, and lost all his ships except the one in which he proved himself. Having reached the shore in safety, he procceeded toward Macedonia, but was slain by some soldiers of Lysimachus, with whom he fell in on the way. (Died. xiii. 15, 39, 52, 72.) [E. E.] Clemens (Kilxis), a Greek historian, probably of Constantinople, who wrote, according to Suidas (s. v.), respecting the kings and emperors of the Romans, a work to Hieronymus on the figures of Isocrates (περὶ τῶν Ἀθηναϊκῶν σχεδίων), and other treatises. Ruhnken (Proofs ad Tit. Lex. p. x.) supposes that Suidas has confounded two different persons, the historian and grammar-ian. One of these was certainly Cleonides, whose name is prefixed by Isocrates (ἱεράρχης, παλαιόλογος), and the historical works very frequently in the Byzantine Westermann.)
Clemens (Kilxis), a slave of Agrippa Postumus, whose person very much resembled his master's, and who availed himself of this resemblance, after the murder of the latter on the accession of Tiberius in A.D. 14, to personate the character of Agrippa.
Great numbers joined him in Italy; he was generally believed at Rome to be the grandson of Ti-berius; and a formidable insurrection would probably have broken out, had not Tiberius contrived to have him apprehended secretly. The emperor did not venture upon a public execution, but commanded him to be slain in a private part of the palace. This was in A.D. 16. (THE ANN. ii. 39, 40; Dion Cass. iiii. 16; comp. Suet. Tib. 25.)
Clemens's Alexandrinus, whose name was T. Flavius Clemens, usually surmounted Alexdrinus, is supposed to have been born at Athens, though he spent the greater part of his life at Alexandria. In this way the two statements in which he is called an Athenian and an Alexandrian (Eph. Phil. Hvn. xxvii. 6) have been reconciled by Cave. In early life he was ardently devoted to the study of philosophy, and his thirst for knowledge led him to visit various countries—Greece, southern Italy, Coelo-Syria, Palestine, and Egypt.
It appears, from his own account, that he had various Christian preceptors, of whom he speaks in terms of great respect. One of them was a Jew by birth, and several were from the East. At length, coming to Egypt, he sought out Pantaenus, master of the Christian school at Alexandria, to whose instructions he listened with much satisfaction, and whom he prized far more highly than all his former teachers. It is not certain known whether he had embraced Christianity before hearing Pantaenus, or whether his mind had only been favourably inclined towards it in consequence of previous inquiries. Probably it first became a Christian under the influence of the precepts of Pantaenus, though Neander thinks otherwise.
After he had joined the Alexandrian church, he became a presbyter, and about A.D. 190 he was chosen to be assistant to his beloved preceptor.
In this latter capacity he continued until the year 202, when both principal and assistant were obliged to flee to Palestine in consequence of the persecution under Severus. In the beginning of Carausius's reign he was at Jerusalem, to which city many Christians were then accustomed to repair in consequence of its hallowed spots. Alexander, bishop of Jerusalem, who was at that time a prisoner for the gospel, recommended him to a letter to the church at Antioch, representing him as a godly minister, a man both virtuous and well-known, whom they had already seen, and who had confirmed and promoted the church of Christ.
It is conjectured, that Pantaenus and Clement returned, after an absence of three years, in 206, though of this there is no certain evidence. He must have returned before 211, because at that time he succeeded Pantaenus as master of the school. Among his pupils was the celebrated Origen. Guerick thinks, that he died in 213; but it is better to assume with Cave and Schleierm, that his death did not take place till 220. Hence he flourished under the reigns of Severus and Camaxil, 193—217.
It cannot safely be questioned, that Clement held the fundamental truths of Christianity and exhibited genuine piety. But in his mental character the philosopher predominated. His learning was great, his imagination lively, his power of perception not defective; but he was unduly prone to speculation. An eclectic in philosophy, he eagerly sought for knowledge wherever it could be obtained, examining every topic by the light of his own mind, and selecting out of all systems such truths as commended themselves to his judgment. "I espoused," says he, "not this or that philosophy, not the Stoic, nor the Platonist; nor the Epicurean, nor that of Aristotle; but whatever of these sects had said that was fit and just, that taught righteousness with a divine and religious knowledge, all that being selected, I call philosophy." He is supposed to have leaned more to the Stoics than to any other sect. He seems, indeed, to have been more attached to philosophy than any of the fathers with the exception of Origen.
In comprehensiveness of mind Clement was certainly deficient. He never develops great principles, but runs chiefly into minute details, which often become trifling and insipid. In the interpretation of the Scriptures he was guided by fancy rather than fixed rules deduced from common sense. He pursues no definite principles of exposition, neither does he penetrate into the essential nature of Christianity. His attainments in purely religious knowledge could never have been extensive, as no one doctrine is well stated. From his works no system of theology can be gathered. It were preposterous to recur to them for sound exegesis, or even a successful development of the duties of a Christian, much less for an enlightened estimate of the obligations under which men are laid to their Creator and to each other. It may be questioned, whether he had the ability to compose a connected system of theology, or a code of Christian morality.
 Doubtless great allowance should be made for the education and circumstances of the writer, the character of the age in which he lived, the persons for whom chiefly he wrote, the modes of thought then current, the entire circle of influences by which he was surrounded, the principal object he had in view; but after all deductions, much theological knowledge will not be attributed to him. The speculative philosopher is still more prominent than the theologian—the allegoriser rather than the exponent of the Bible appears—the metaphysician eclipses the Christian.

The works of Clement which have reached us are his Προτερπτικα προς Ελληνας or Hortatory Address to the Greeks; Πατερετικα, or Teachers; Στροματα, or Stromata; and Τεταουρνοι Πλανοις, Quis Dies salvator? In addition to these, he wrote Τιτουσωρες in eight books; περι του Θανατος, i.e. de Pa schate; περι Νεφελαιας, i.e. de Sonnentumulos; περι Καταλακτων, i.e. de Orationibus; Προτερπτικα εις Τιτουσωρης, i.e. Exhortatio ad Patientiam; Καναν Εκκλησιακας, i.e. Canon Ecclesiasticus, or de Canonicis Ecclesiasticis; εις την Προφητικην Αιμας, On the Prophet Names; περι Προσωπων and Οροι Ειρηνου. If the Τιτουσωρες be the same as the Admonitiones mentioned by Cassiodorus, as is probable, various fragments of them are preserved and may be seen in Potter’s edition. Perhaps the ἔριες του παδαγογου, which are also given by Potter, were originally a part of the Τιτουσωρες. Among the fragments printed in the same edition are also εις των θεωδοτων και των αναλογικων και λειτουργικων διδασκαλια κατα των Οδαλεττων χρωμα του πανομοιοι, i.e. extracts from the writings of Theodorus and the doctrine called oriental, relating to the times of Valentinus. Whether these excerpts were really made by Clement admits of doubt, though Sylburg remarks that the style and phraseology resemble those of the Alexandrine father. The fragments of his lost works have been industriously collected by Potter, in the second volume of his edition of Clement’s works; but Fabricius, at the end of his second volume of the works of Hippolytus, published some of the fragments more fully, along with several not found in Potter’s edition. There are also fragments in the Biblioth. Patr. of Galland. In various parts of his writings Clement speaks of other works which he had written or intended to write. (See Potter, vol. ii. p. 1045.)

His three principal works constitute parts of a whole. In the Hortatory Address his design was to convince the Heathens and to convert them to Christianity. It exposes the impurities of polytheism as contrasted with the spirituality of Christianity, and demonstrates the superiority of the gospel to the philosophy of the Gentile world by shewing, that it effectually purifies the motives and elevates the character. The Paedagogus takes up the new convert at the point to which he is supposed to have been brought by the hortatory address, and furnishes him with rules for the regulation of his conduct. In the first chapter he explains what he means by the term Paedagogus,—one who instructs children, leading them up to manhood through the paths of truth. This preceptor is none other than Jesus Christ, and the children whom he trains up are simple, sincere believers. The author goes into minutiae and trifling details, instead of dwelling upon great precepts applicable to human life in all circumstances. The Stromata are in eight books, but probably the last book did not proceed from Clement himself. The treatise is rambling and discursive, without system, order, or method, but contains much valuable information on many points of antiquity, particularly the history of philosophy. The principal information respecting Egyptian hieroglyphics is contained in the fifth book of this work of Clement. His object was to delineate in it the perfect Christian or Gnostic, after he had been instructed by the Teacher and thus prepared for sublime speculations in philosophy and theology. The eighth book is a treatise on logic, so that the original seems to have been lost, and this one substituted in its place. Eromep Kypria, however, nothing to the opinion, that it is a genuine production of Clement. The treatise entitled τις εις σωθεσιν is practical, shewing to what temptations the rich are particularly exposed. It has the appearance of a homily. His Hypotoseis in eight books (τιτουσωρες, translated admonitiones by Cassiodorus) contained, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iv. 14), a summary exposition of the books of Scripture. Photius gives a most unfavourable account of it, affirming that it contained many fabulous and impious notions similar to those of the Gnostic heretics. But at the same time he suggests, that those excerpts which may not have proceeded from Clement, as there is nothing similar to them in his acknowledged works. Most probably they were interpolated.

CLEMENS, ATRIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who has addressed two of his letters to him. (Ep. i. 10, iv. 2.)

CLEMENS, CA'SSIUS, was brought to trial about a. d. 95, for having espoused the side of Niger; but defended himself with such dignity and freedom, that Severus, in admiration, not only granted him his life, but allowed him to retain half of his property. (Dion Cass. xxiv. 9.)

CLEMENS, T. FLA'VIUS, was cousin to the emperor Domitian, and his colleague in the consuleship, a. d. 95, and married Domitilla, also a relation of Domitian. His father was Flavius Sabinus, the elder brother of the emperor Vespasian, and his brother Flavius Sabinus, who was put to death by Domitian. (Suet. Domit. 10.) Domitian had despatched the sons of Clemens to succeed him in the empire, and, changing their original names, had called one Vespasian and the other Domitian; but he subsequently put Clemens to death during the consuleship of the latter. (Suet. Domit. 15.) Dion Cassius says (lvii. 14), that Clemens was put to death on a charge of atheism, for which, he adds, many others who went over to the Jewish opinions were executed. This must imply that he had become a Christian; and for the same reason his wife was banished to Pandataria by Domitian. (Comp. Philostr. Apoll. viii. 15; Euseb. H. E. iii. 14; Histor. Ep. 27.) To this Clemens in all probability is dedicated the church of St. Clement at Rome, on the Caelian hill, which is believed to have been built originally in the fifth century, although its site is now occupied by a more recent, although very ancient, structure. In the year 1725 Cardinal Annaib Alabani found under this church an inscription in honour of Flavius Clemens, martyr, which is described in a work called T. Flavii Clemensia Verc Consulatis at Martyris Thumstaticus illustratus, Urbino, 1727. Some connect him with the author of the Epistle to the Corinthians. [CLEMENS ROMANUS.][G. E. L. C.]

CLEMENS, PACTUMEIUS, a Roman jurist, who probably died in the lifetime of Pomponius, for Pomponius mentions him as if he were no longer living, and cites, on his authority, a constitu tion of the emperor Antoninus: “Pactumius Clemens nieslat imperatorem Antonium constitutise.” (Dig. 40. tit. 7. a. 21. § 1.) The name Antonius is excruciatingly ambiguous, as it belongs to Pius, Marcus, L. Verus, Commodus, Caracalla, Geta, Didymenus, and Elagabalus; but in the compilations of Justinian, the name Antonius, without addition, refers either to Caracalla, M. Aurelius, or Pius—usually to the first; to the second, if used by a jurist who lived earlier than Caracalla, and not earlier than Marcus; to the third, if used by a jurist who was living under Pius. (Zimmerm., R. R. G. i. p. 184, n. 8.) Here it probably denotes Pius, of whom Pactumius Clemens may be supposed to have been a contemporary. [J. T. G.]

CLEMENS ROMANUS, was bishop of Rome at the end of the first century. He is probably the same as the Clement whom St. Paul mentions (Phil. iv. 3) as one of “his fellow workers, whose names are in the Book of Life.” To Clement are ascribed two epistles addressed to the Corinthian Church, and both probably genuine, the first certainly so. From the style of the second, Neander (Kirchenesch. iii. p. 1100) considers it as a fragment of a sermon rather than an epistle. The first was occasioned by the divisions which distracted the Church of Corinth, where certain presbyters had been unjustly disposed. The exhortations to unity are enforced by examples from Scripture, and in addition to these are mentioned the martyrdoms of St. Peter and St. Paul. Of the latter it is said, that he went to tēn vīratōn Bése— a passage which has been considered to favour the supposition that the apostle executed the intention of visiting Spain, which he mentions, Rom. xv. 24.

The epistle seems to contain an important interpolation (§ 40, &c.). In these chapters is suddenly introduced, in the midst of practical exhortations, a laboured comparison between the Jewish priesthood and Christian ministry, and the theory of the former is transferred to the latter. This style of speaking savours in itself of a later age, and is opposed to the rest of the epistle, which uniformly speaks of the church and its offices in their simplest form and relations. The whole tone of both epistles is meek, pious, and Christian, and is evidently drawn from that tendency to find types in greater number than the practice of Scripture warrants, which the latter fathers carried to so extravagant a length. Thus, when Rahab is quoted as an example of faith and hospitality, the fact of her hanging a scarlet thread from her window is made to typify our redemption through Christ’s blood. In the midst of much that is wise and good we are surprised to find the fable of the phoenix adduced in support of the resurrection of the body.

As one of the very earliest apostolical fathers, the authority of Clement is valuable in proving the authenticity of certain books of the New Testament. The parts of it to which he refers are the gospels of St. Mark and St. John, the epistle of St. James, the first of St. Peter, and several of St. Paul, while from the epistle to the Hebrews he quotes so often, that by some its authorship has been attributed to him. Two passages are quoted (i. § 46, and ii. § 4) with the formula γέγραπται, which do not occur in Scripture; we also find reference to the apocryphal books of Wisdom and Judith; a traditio...
related between our Lord and St. Peter; and a bishop Wake, 1693. [G. E. L. C.] Athenaeus, and Plutarch (De El op. Delph.
1039.) Lastly, we may just mention the Clemens, —homilies of a Judaising tendency, and supposed by Neander (Genetische Entwicklung, &c.
p. 587) to be written by a member of the Ebionithit sect.
The true particulars of Clement's life are quite unknown. Tillemont (Mémoires, ii. p. 147) supposes that he was a Jew ; but the second epistle is plainly written by a Gentile. Hence some connect him with Flavius Clemens who was martyred under Domitian. It is supposed, that Trajan barished Clement to the Chersonese, where he suffired martyrdom. Various dates are given for the first Epistle. Grabe (Spic. Patr. i. p. 254) has fixed on A. D. 68, immediately after the martyrdom of St. Peter and St. Paul; while others prefer A. D.
95, during Domitian's persecution.
The Epistles were first published at Oxford by Patric Young, the king's librarian, from the Codex Alexandrinus, to the end of which they are ap-ended (the second only as a fragment), and which had been sent by Cyrilltia Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, to Charles I. They were republished (the second only as a fragment), and which was also the name of the mother of Thales. (Diog.

was also the name of the mother of Thales. (Diog.

CLEOBULUS (Klo€obulós), one of the Seven Sages, was son of Evagoras and a citizen of Lindus in Rhodes, for Durs seems to stand alone in stating that he was a Carian. (Diog. Laert. i. 89; Strab. xiv. p. 655.) He was a contemporary of Solon's, and must have lived at least as late as a.
c. 600 (the date of the usurpation of Pisis-tratus), if the letter preserved in Diogenes Laétius is genuine, which purports to have been written by Cleobulus to Solon, inviting him to Lindus, as a place of refuge from the tyrant. In the same letter Lindus is mentioned as being under democratc government; but Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iv. 19) calls Cleobulus king of the Lin-dians, and Phutarch (De El op. Delph. 3) speaks of by the expression Julianus wester. (Dig. 28, tit. 6.
s. 6.) From this we infer, not that he was a pupil of Julianus, but that he belonged to the same legal school. (Compare Dig. 7, tit. 7. s. 8.) He probably therefore flourished in the time of Hadrian.
It has been suggested from the agreement of date,
that he was the same person as Ptolemaeus Clemens, and that his name in full was Ter. Ptolemaeus Clemens, but this is not likely. No jurist is mentioned in the Digest by the name Clemens simply, but, as it expressly for the sake of distinction, we have already either Terentius Clemens or Ptolemaeus Clemens. Terentius is nowhere cited in any extant fragment of any other jurist. He wrote a treatise on the famous lex Julia et Papia Poppaea, with the title "Ad Leges Libri xx," and of this work 35 fragments (belonging, according to Blume's hypothesis, to the classis edititalia), are preserved in the Digest.
They are explained by Heineccius in his excellent commentary on the lex Julia et Papia Poppaea. [Comp.

CLEOBULINE (Kl€obulínē), called also CLEOBULINE and CLEOBULE (Kl€obulón-

Lindus, and is said by Phutarch to have been a Corinthian by birth. From the same author we learn that her father called her Eumolpis, while others gave her the name which marks her relation to Cleobulus. She is spoken of as highly distinguished for her moral as well as her intellectual qualities. Her skill in riddles, of which she compose a number in hexameter versé, is particularly recorded, and we find ascribed to her a well-known one on the subject of the year (Clylôus as well as that on the cupping-glass, which is quoted with praise by Aristotle. A play of Cratinus, called Klawbôlonh, and apparently having refercence to her, is mentioned by Athenæus. (Plut.

him as a tyrant. These statements may, however, be reconciled, by supposing him to have held, as αὑσβελτήρ, an authority delegated by the people through election. (Arist. Polit. iii. 14, 15, ad fin. iv. 10, ed. Bekker.) Much of the philosophy of Cleobulus is said to have been derived from Egypt. He wrote also lyric poems, as well as riddles (γρύφους) in verse. Diogenes Laërtius also ascribes to him the inscription on the tomb of Midas, of which Homer was considered by others to have been the author (comp. Plat. Phaidon. p. 264), and the riddle on the year (τὸ δὲ παραμάζειν κατέναν τὸν Κλεοβολόν, κ. τ. η.) generally attributed to his daughter Cleobulina. He is said to have lived to the age of sixty, and to have been distinguished for strength and beauty of person. Many of his sayings are on record, and one of them at least—διός σωματικώς τὰς θυγατέρας, χαράντως μὲν τὴν ἀλεξάντην, τῇ δὲ φρονήματι γνώσαται,—shows him to have had worthy visions of female education than were generally prevalent; while that he acted on them is clear from the character of his daughter Cleobulina. (Diog. Laërt. i. 89—93; Suid. s. v. Κλεοβολόν; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 14; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. pp. 117, 121, 654; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Χελεδώνα.)

CLEOCITUS (Κλεοκίτης), an Athenian, of Myrleia in Bithynia, contemporary with the orator Demochares and the philosopher Arcesilaus, towards the close of the third century n. c. The chief passage relating to him is in Rutilius Lupus, de Figur. Scendent. p. 1, 3, where a list of his orations is given. He also wrote on rhetoric: a work in which he compared the styles of Isocrates and Demosthenes, and said that the former resembled an athlete, the latter a soldier, is quoted by Photius. (Cod. 176, p. 121, b. 9, ed. Bekker.) The remark there quoted is, however, ascribed to Philip of Macedon by Photius himself (Cod. 265, p. 493, c.). The obvious explanation is, that Cleocritus inserted the observation in his work as having been made by Philip. None of his orations are extant. (Strab. x. 456; Diog. Laërt. iv. 41; Ruhnken, ad Notit. Legat. i. 5, 5, &c.; and Hist. Crit. Ord. Gr. Gr. 63, pp. 158, 185; Westermann, Gesch. der Berufsausübung in Griechenland, § 76. 1.)

way that, if he adheres in this case to his usual practice of giving the names in chronological order, this Cleomachus would fall much later than the time of Gnesippus. His name was given to a variety of the Ionic B Majore metre. (Hephaestion, xi. p. 62, ed. Gaisford.)

CEOMBROTUS. (Κλεόμπροτος), son of Anaxandrus, king of Sparta, brother of the king, and half-brother of Cleomenes. (Herod. v. 41.) He became regent after the battle of Thermopylae, b.c. 480 (thus Muller, fix his death to the end of time of Gnesippus. His name was given to a variety of the Ionic B Majore metre. (Hephaestion, xi. p. 62, ed. Gaisford.)

CEOMBROTUS II., the 30th king of Sparta of the Agid line, was of the royal race, though not in the direct male line. He was also the son-in-law of Leonidas II., in whose place he was made king by the party of Agis IV. about 248 b.c. On the return of Leonidas, Cleombrotus was deposed and banished to Teges, about 240 b.c. [Athen.] He is mentioned as a conspicuous example of conjugal affection. He left two sons, Agesoplis and Cleomenes, of whom the former became the father and the latter the guardian of Agesoplis III. [Plut. Agis, 11, 16—18; Paus. iii. 6; Polyb. iv. 35; Manso, Sparta, iii. 1, pp. 294, 298.)

The disciple of Socrates, whose Plato mentions as being in Aegina when Socrates died, may possibly be the same person. (Phaedon, 2, p. 59, c.)

CLEODEDES (Κλεόμπης), an Athenian, son of Lycomedes, was one of the commanders of the expedition against Melos in b.c. 416. He is mentioned also by Xenophon as one of the 30 tyrants appointed in b.c. 404. (Thuc. v. 84, 8c.; Xen. Hcd. ii. 8, § 2.) Schneider’s conjecture with respect to him (ad Xen. l.c.) is inadmissible. [E. E.]

CLEODEDES (Κλεόμπης), of the island Astypalæa, an Athenian athlete, of whom Pausanias (vi. 9) and Plutarch (Rom. 28) record the following legend:—In Ol. 72 (b. c. 492) he killed Ircus, his opponent, in a boxing-match, at the Olympic games, and the judges (‘Ελαξωδικα) decided that he had been guilty of unfair play, and punished him with the loss of the prize. Stung to madness by the disgrace, he returned to Astypalæa, and there, in his frenzy, he shook down the pillar which supported the roof of a boys’ school, crushing all who were in it beneath the ruins. The Astypalæans preparing to stone him, he fled for refuge to the temple of Athena, and got into a chest, which his pursuers, having vainly attempted to open it, at length broke to pieces; but no Cleomedes was there. They sent accordingly to consult the Delphic oracle, and received the following answer:—

CLEOMENES I. (Kawfop), 16th king of Sparta in the Agid line, was born to Anaxandrides by his second wife, previous to the birth by his first of Durieu, Leonidas, and Cleombrotus. He accordingly, on his father's death, succeeded, not later it would seem than 519 B. C., and reigned for a period of 20 years. (Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 206.)

In r. c. 519 we are told it was to Cleomenes that the Plateans applied when Sparta, declining to assist them, recommended alliance with Athens. (Herod. vi. 108.) And not much later, the visit of Maenandrius occurred, who had been left in possession of Samos by the death of Polyetnes, but had afterwards been driven out by the Persians with Syloson. Maenandrius twice or thrice in conversation with Cleomenes led the way to his house, where he took care to have displayed certain splendid goblets, and, on Cleomenes expressing his admiration, begged he would accept them. Cleomenes refused; and at last, in fear for his own or his citizens' weakness, went to thearthors and got an order for the stranger's depar¬ture. (Herod. iii. 148.)

In 510 Cleomenes commanded the forces by whose assistance Hippias was driven from Athens, and not long after he took part in the struggle between Cleisthenes and the aristocratical party of Ixion by sending a herald with orders, pointed against Cleisthenes, for the expulsion of all who were stained with the pollution of Cylon. He followed this step by coming and driving out, in person, 700 households, substituting also for the new Coun¬cil of 500 a body of 300 partisans of Ixion. But his force was small, and having occupied the acro¬polis with his friends, he was here besieged, and at last forced to depart on conditions, leaving his allies to their fate. In shame and anger he hur¬ried to collect Spartan and allied forces, and set forth for his revenge. At Eleusis, however, when the Athenians were in sight, the Corinthians refused to proceed; their example was followed by his brother-king Demaratus; and on this the other allies also, and with them Cleomenes, withdrew. When in the acropolis at Athens, he is related to have attempted, as an Achaean, to enter the temple, from which Dorians were excluded, and to have hence brought back with him to Sparta a variety of oracles predictive of his country's future relations with Athens; and their contents, says Herodotus, induced the abortive attempt which the Spartans made soon after to restore the tyranny of Ixion. (Herod. v. 64, 65, 67-69, 80-90.)

appear to have had considerable effect on Cleomenes. He demanded three days to consider; then enquired how far was Susa from the sea. Aristogoras forgot his diplomacy and said, "three months' journey." His Spartan listener was thoroughly alarmed, and ordered him to depart before sunset. Aristogoras however in suppliants' attire hurried to meet him at home, and made him offers, beginning with ten, and mounting at last to fifty talents. It chanced that Cleomenes had his daughter Gorgo, a child eight or nine years old, standing by; and at this point she broke in, and said "Father, go away, or he will do you harm." And Cleomenes on this recovered his resolution, and left the room. (Herod. vi. 49—51.) This daughter Gorgo, his only child, was afterwards the wife of his half-brother Leonidas; and she, it is said, first found the key to the message which, by scraping the wax from a wooden writing-tablet, graving the wood, and then covering it with wax again, Demaratus conveyed to Sparta from the Persian court in announcement of the intended invasion. (Herod. vii. 259.)

In 491 the heralds of Dareius came demanding earth and water from the Greeks; and Athens denounced to Sparta the submission of the Aeginetans. Cleomenes went off in consequence to Aegina, and tried to seize certain parties as hostages. Meantime Demaratus, with whom he had probably been on bad terms ever since the retreat from Eleusis, sent private encouragements to the Aeginetans to resist him, and took further advantage of his absence to intrigue against him at home. Cleomenes returned unsuccessful, and now leagued himself with Leotychides, and effected his colleague's deposition. [Demaratus.] (Herod. vi. 49—66.) He then took Leotychides with him back to Aegina, seized his hostages, and placed them in the hands of the Athenians. But on his return to Sparta, he found it detected that he had tampered with the priestess at Delphi to obtain the oracle which deposed Demaratus, and, in apprehension of the consequences, he went out of the way into Thessaly. Shortly after, however, he ventured into Arcadia, and his machinations there to excite the Arcadians against his country were sufficient to frighten the Spartans into offering him leave to return with impunity. He did not however long survive his return. He was seized with long standing madness, and dashed his staff in every one's face whom he met; and at last when confined as a maniac in a sort of stocks, he prevailed on the Helot who watched him to give him a knife, and died by slashing (κατακοιτάζων) his whole body over with it. (Herod. vi. 73—75.)

His madness and death, says Herodotus, were ascribed by the Spartans to the habit he acquired from some Cretan visitors at Sparta of excessive drinking. Others found a reason in his acts of sacrilege at Delphi or Eleusis, where he laid waste the grove of Argus. Such is the strange account given by Herodotus (vi. 76—84) of the great battle of the Seventh (Ἐπέδραμος), the greatest exploit of Cleomenes, which deprived Argos of 6000 citizens (Herod. vii. 140), and left her in a state of debility from which, notwithstanding the enlargement of her franchise, she did not recover till the middle of the Peloponnesian war. To this however we may add in explanation the story given by later writers of the defence of Argos by its women, headed by the poet-heroine Teleilla. (Paus. ii. 29, § 7; Plut. Mor. p. 245.; Polyb. viii. 33; Suidas s. v. Teleilla.] Teleilla. (Teleilla.) (Phil.) Herodotus appears ignorant of it, though he gives an oracle seeming to refer to it. It is perfectly probable that Cleomenes thus received some check, and we must remember the Spartan incapacity for sieges. The date again is doubtful. Pausanias, (iii. 4. §§ 1-5), who follows Herodotus in his account of Cleomenes, says, it was at the beginning of his reign; Clinton, however, whom Thirlwall follows, fixes it, on the ground of Herod. vii. 148-9, to the end of his reign, about 510 n. c. The life of Cleomenes, as graphically given by Herodotus is very curious; we may perhaps, without much imputation on the father of history, suspect that his love for personal story has here a little coloured his narrative. Possibly he may have some what mistaken his character; certainly the freedom of action allowed to a king whom the Spartans were at first half inclined to put aside for the younger brother Dorieus, and who was always accounted half-mad (ὑπτυπαστέρος), seems at variance with the received views of the account of his office. Yet it is possible that a wild character of this kind might find favour in Spartan eyes. (Comp. Müller, Dor. i. 8. § 6; Clinton, n. 251, and p. 423, note x.) The occupation of the acropolis of Athens is mentioned by Aristophanes. (Lysistr. 272.) [A. H. C.]

CLEOMENES II., the 25th king of Sparta of the Agid line, was the son of Cleombrotus I. and the brother of Agesipolis II., whom he succeeded in n. c. 370. He died in n. c. 308, after a reign of sixty years and ten months; but during this long period we have no information of any importance. He had two sons, Acrotatus and Cleonymus. Acrotatus died during the life of Cleomenes, upon whose death Areus, the son of Acrotatus, succeeded to the throne. [AREUS I.; CLEONYMUS.] (Diod. xx. 29; Plut. Agis, 3.; Paus. i. 13. § 3, iii. 6. § 1; Mannso., Spartoi, iii. 1, p. 164, 2, pp. 247, 248; Diod. xv. 60, contradicts himself about the time that Cleomenes reigned, and is evidently wrong; see Clinton, Fast. ii. pp. 213, 214.)

CLEOMENES III., the 31st king of Sparta of the Agid line, was the son of Leonidas II. After the death of Agis IV., n. c. 240, Leonidas married his widow Agiatis to Cleomenes, who was under age, in order, as it seems, to bring into his family the influences of the Peloponnesian Aristides. Though at first violently opposed to the match, conceived a great affection for her husband, and used to explain to him the principles and designs of Agis, about which he was eager for information. Cleomenes was endeared, according to Plutarch, with a noble spirit; in moderation and simplicity of life he was not inferior to Agis, but superior to him in energy, and less scrupulous about the means by which his good designs might be accomplished. His mind was further stirred up to manliness and ambition by the instructions of the Stoic philosopher Sphaerus of Borysthenes, who visited Sparta. To this was added the influence of his mother Cratesicleia. It was not long, therefore, before Cleomenes had formed the design of restoring the ancient Spartan discipline, and the death of his father, whom he succeeded (b. c. 236), put him in a position to attempt his projected reform; but he saw that careful preparations must first be made, and that Sparta was not to be restored by the means which Agis had employed. Instead of repeating the vain attempt at a popular party against the Ephors, he perceived that the regeneration of Sparta must be achieved by restoring her old renown in war, and by raising her to the supremacy of Greece; and then that, the restored strength of the state being centred in him as its leader, he might safely attempt to crush the power of the Ephors. It was thus manifest that his policy must be war, his enemy the Achaean league. Lydiadas, the former tyrant of Megalopolis, foresaw the danger which the league might apprehend from Cleomenes; but the valiant sons of Aratus, who was blind to this danger, prevailed; and the proposal of Lydiadas, to make the first attack on Sparta, was rejected.

The first movement of Cleomenes was to seize suddenly and by treachery the Arcadian cities, Tegas, Mantineia, and Orchoemenus, which had recently united themselves with the Aetolians, who, instead of resenting the injury, confirmed Cleomenes in the possession of them. The reason of this, was that the Aetolians had already conceived the project of forming an alliance with Macedonia and Sparta against the Achaean league. It is probable that they even connived at the seizure of these towns by Cleomenes, who thus secured an excellent position for his operations against the league before commencing war with it. Aratus, who was now strategos, at last perceived the danger which threatened from Sparta, and, with the other chiefs of the Achaean league, he resolved not to attack the Lacedaemonians, but to resist any aggression they might make. About the beginning of the year 227 b. c., Cleomenes, by the order of the Ephors, seized the little town of Belbina, and fortified the temple of Athena near it. This place commanded the mountain pass on the high road between Sparta and Megalopolis, and was at that period claimed by both cities, though anciently it had belonged to Sparta. Aratus made no complaint at its seizure, but attempted to get possession of Tegas and Orchoemenus by treachery. But, when he marched out in the night to take possession of them, the conspirators, who were to deliver up the towns, lost courage. The attempt was detected by Cleomenes, who wrote in ironical terms of friendship to ask Aratus whether he had led his army in the night? "To prevent your fortifying Belbina," was the reply. "Pray then, if you have no objection," retorted Cleomenes, "tell us why you took with you lights and scaling ladders." By this correspondence Aratus found out with whom he had to do. The Spartans, on the other hand, were satisfied with the important advantage which they had gained in the fortification of Belbina; and Cleomenes, who was in Arcadia with only three hundred foot and a few horse, was recalled by the Ephors. His back was no sooner turned than Aratus seized Caphyae, near Orchoemenus. The Ephors immediately sent back Cleomenes, who took Methydron, and made an incursion into the territories of Argos. About this time Aristomenes succeeded Aratus as strategos of the Achaean league (in May, 227, b. c.), and to this period perhaps should be referred the declaration of war against Cleomenes by the council of the Achaeanas, which is mentioned by Polybius and Pausanias. Aratus, with an army of 20,000 foot and 1000 horse, with which he met Cleomenes near Palantium; and, though the latter had only 5000 men, they were so eager and brave that Aratus persuaded Aristomenes to decline battle. The fact is, that the Achaeanas were never a warlike people, and Aratus was very probably right in thinking that 20,000 Achaeanas were no match for 5000 Spartans. But the moral effect of this affair was worth more than a victory to Cleomenes. In May, 226, Aratus again became strategos, and led the Achaeanas against Elis. The Eleans applied to Sparta for aid, and Cleomenes met Aratus on his return, at the foot of Mount Lycaum, in the territory of Megalopolis; and defeated him with great slaughter. It was at first reported that Aratus was killed; but he had only fled; and, having rallied part of his army, he took Mantineia by a sudden assault, and revolutionized its constitution by making the metoeci citizens. The effect of this change was the formation of an Achaean party in the town. Cleomenes had not yet taken any open steps against the Ephors, though he could not but be an object of suspicion to them; they were however in a difficult position. The spirit of Agis still lived in the Spartan youth; and Cleomenes, at the head of his victorious army, was too strong to be crushed like Agis. Secret assassination might have been employed—and when was a Spartan ephor heard of who would have resorted to it?—but then they would have lost the only man capable of carrying on the war, and Sparta must have fallen into the position of a subordinate member of the Achaean league. They appear, however, to have taken advantage of the loss of Mantineia to make a truce with the Achaeanas. (Paus. viii. 27. § 10.) Cleomenes now took measures to strengthen himself against them. These measures are differently represented by Phylarchus, the panegyrist of Cleomenes, whom Plutarch seems on the whole to have followed, and by Polybius and Pausanias, who followed Aratus and other Achaean writers. At the death of Agis, his infant son, Eurydamidas, was left in the hands of his mother, Agiatis; and Archidamus, the brother of Agis, fled into Messenia, according to the statement of Plutarch, which, from the nature of the case, is far more probable than the account of Polybius (v. 37. § 2., vii. 1. § 3.), that Archidamus fled at a later period, through fear of Cleomenes. Eurydamidas was now dead, poisoned, it was said, by the Ephors, and that too, according to Pausanias (ii. 9. § 1), at the instigation of Cleomenes. The falsity of this last statement is proved by the silence of Polybius, who never speaks Cleomenes, but it may serve to show how recklessly he was abused by some of the Achaeanas.
Cleomenes.

Party. Archidamus had thus become the rightful heir to the throne of the Proclidae, and he was invited by Cleomenes to return; but no sooner had he set foot in Sparta than he was assassinated. This crime also is charged upon Cleomenes by the Achaean party, and among them by Polybius. The truth cannot now be ascertained, but every circumstance of the case seems to fix the guilt upon the Ephors. Cleomenes had everything to hope, and the Ephors everything to fear, from the association of Archidamus in his councils. Cleomenes, it is true, did nothing to avenge the crime: but the reason of this was, that the time for his attack upon the Ephors was not yet come; and thus, instead of an evidence of his guilt, it is a striking proof of his patient resolution, that he submitted to incur such a suspicion rather than to peril the object of his life by a premature movement. On the contrary, he did everything to appease the party of the Ephors. He bribed them largely, by the help of his mother Cratcsicleia, who even went so far as to marry one of the chief men of the oligarchical party. Through the influence thus gained, Cleomenes was permitted to continue the war; he took Leuctra, and gained a decisive victory over Aratus beneath its walls, owing to the impetuosity of Lydiadas, who was killed in the battle. The conduct of Aratus, in leaving Lydiadas unsupported, though perhaps it saved his army, disgusted and dispirited the Achaenians to such a degree, that they made no further efforts during this campaign, and Cleomenes was left at leisure to effect his long-cherished revolution during the winter which now came on. (n. c. 226—225.)

Having secured the aid of his father-in-law, Through the influence of this alliance, Cleomenes was permitted to continue the war; he took Leuctra, and gained a decisive victory over Aratus beneath its walls, owing to the impetuosity of Lydiadas, who was killed in the battle. The conduct of Aratus, in leaving Lydiadas unsupported, though perhaps it saved his army, disgusted and dispirited the Achaenians to such a degree, that they made no further efforts during this campaign, and Cleomenes was left at leisure to effect his long-cherished revolution during the winter which now came on. (n. c. 226—225.)

Having secured the aid of his father-in-law, he was the last truly great man of Greece. From this period must he be dated the contest between the Achaeans and Cleomenes for the supremacy of Greece, which Polybius calls the Cleomenic war, and which lasted three years, from n. c. 225 to the battle of Sellasia in the spring of n. c. 222. For its details, of which a slight sketch is given under Aratus, the reader is referred to the historians. Amidst a career of brilliant success, Cleomenes committed some errors, but, even if he had avoided them, he could not but have been overpowered by the united force of Macedonia and the Achaean league. The moral character of the war is condensed by Niebuhr into one just and forcible sentence:—"Old Aratus sacrificed the freedom of his country by an act of high treason, and gave up Cerinthus rather than establish the freedom of Greece by a union among the Peloponnesians, which would have secured to Cleomenes the influence and power he deserved." (History of Rome, iv. p. 226.)

From the defeat of Sellasia, Cleomenes returned to Sparta, and having advised the citizens to submit to Antigonus, he fled to his ally, Ptolemy Euergetes, at Alexandria, where his mother and children were already residing as hostages. Any hope he might have had of recovering his kingdom by the help of Ptolemy Euergetes was defeated by the death of that king, whose successor, Ptolemy Philopator, treated Cleomenes with the greatest neglect, and his minister, Sosibius, imprisoned him on a charge of conspiracy against the king's life. Cleomenes, with his attendants, escaped from prison, and attempted to raise an insurrection against Ptolemy, but finding no one join him, he put himself to death. (n. c. 221—220.) His reign lasted 16 years. He is rightly reckoned by Pan- sians (iii. 6. § 5) as the last of the Agidao, for the royal family of the Agidao, but not kings. 1. Son of the general Pansians, brother of king Pleistannus, and uncle of king Pansians, led the Peloponnesian army in their fourth invasion of Attica, in the fifth year of the Peloponnesian war. (p. 457.) Cleomenes acted in place of his nephew, Pansians, who was a minor. (Thucyd. iii. 26, and Schol.)

CLEOMENES, a Greek of Naucratia in Egypt, was appointed by Alexander the Great as monarch of the Arabian district (vices) of Egypt and receiver of the tributes from all the districts of Egypt and the neighbouring part of Africa. (n. c. 331.) Some of the ancient writers say that Alexander made him satrap of Egypt; but this is incorrect, for Arrian expressly states, that the other monarchs were independent of him, except that they had to pay to him the tributes of their districts. It would, however, appear that he had no difficulty in extending his depredations over all Egypt, appearing as if likely that he would assume the title of satrap. His rapidity in exercising his office solely for his own advantage. On the occurrence of a scarcity of corn, which was less severe in Egypt than in the neighboring

Cleomenes, a sculptor mentioned only by Pliny (xxvi. 4. § 10) as the author of a group of the Theaspides, or Muses, which was placed by Asinius Pollio in his buildings at Rome, perhaps the library on the Palatine hill. This artist, who does not appear to have enjoyed great celebrity with the ancients, is particularly interesting to us, because one of the most exquisite statues, the Venus de Medici, bears his name in the following inscription on the pedestal:

"CLEOMENES, a sculptor of the name of Cleomenes, is said to have executed the statue of Venus de Medici."

This inscription, which has been undeservedly considered as a modern imposition, especially by Florentine critics, who would fain have claimed a greater master for their admired statue, indicates both the father and the native town of Cleomenes; and the letter Ω gives likewise an external proof of what we should have guessed from the character of the work itself, that he was subsequently to n. c. 403. But we may assume him still nearer at his age. Mummius brought the above-mentioned group of the Muses from Thebes to Rome; and Cleomenes must therefore have lived previously to n. c. 146, the date of the destruction of Corinth. The beautiful statue of Venus is evidently an imitation of the Cnidian statue of Phoibis; and Müller's opinion is very probable, that Cleomenes tried to revive at Athens the style of this great artist. Our artist would, according to this supposition, have lived between n. c. 365 (the age of Phoibis) and n. c. 146.

Now, there is another Cleomenes, the author of a much admired but rather lifeless statue in the Louvre, which commonly bears the name of Germanicus, though without the slightest foundation. It represents a Roman orator, with the right hand lifted, and, as the attribute of a turtle at the foot shews, in the habit of Mercury. There the artist calls himself

"CLEOMENES, a sculptor of the name of Cleomenes, is said to have executed the statue of Mercury, which is now in the Louvre."
CLEON.

The following winter unmasked his boldest enemy. At the city Dionysia, n. c. 426, in the presence of the numerous visitors from the subject states, Aristophanes represented his "Babyloniens." It attacked the plan of election by lot, and contained no doubt the first sketch of his subsequent portrait of the Athenian democracy. Cleon, it would appear, if not actually named, at any rate felt himself reflected upon; and he rejoined by a legal suit against the author or his representative. The Scholiasts speak of it as directed against his title to the franchise (čëías γραφήν), but it certainly also assailed him for insulting the government in the presence of its representatives (Aristoph. Achæn., 577, 562.)

About the same time, however, before the winter's Lenaeæ, Cleon himself, by means of a combination among the nobler and wealthier (τὰ ἄρετα), was brought to trial and condemned to disgorge five talents, which he had extorted on false pretences from some of the islanders (Aristoph. Achæn., 6, comp. Schol., who refers to Theopompos.) Thirlwall, surely by an oversight, places this trial after the representation of the Knights. (Hist. of Greece, iii. p. 500.)

In 425 Cleon reappears in general history, still as before the potent favourite. The occasion is the embassy sent by Spartæ with proposals for peace, after the commencement of the blockade of the island of Sphænteria. There was considerable elevation at their success prevalent among the Athenians; yet numbers were truly anxious for peace. Cleon, however, well aware that peace would greatly curtail, if not annihilate, his power and his emoluments, contrived to work on his countrymen's presumption, and insisted to the ambassadors on the surrender, first of all, of the blockaded party with their arms, and then the restoration in exchange for them of the losses of n. c. 445, Nisaæa, Pegæ, Troæzm, and Achaia. Such concessions it was beyond Sparta's power to make good; it was even dangerous for her to be known to have so much as admitted a thought of them; and when the ambassadors begged in any case to have disgorge five talents, which he had extracted on false pretences from some of the islanders. (Aristoph."

CLEON.

Cleon at this time, we must suppose, a violent opponent of the policy which declined risking a battle; may, it is possible he may also have indulged freely in invectives against the war in general. (ibid.)

In 427 the submission of the Mytileneans brings him more prominently before us. He was now established fairly as demagogue. (τῷ διάμαρκο επάλη κατὰ τὰ τότε πιθανοτάτα, Thuc. iii. 36.) The deliberations on the use to be made of the unconditional surrender of these revolted allies ended in the adoption of his motion,— that the adult males should be put to death, the women and children sold for slaves. The morrow, however, brought a cooler mind; and in the assembly held for reconsideration it was, after a long debate, recondemned. The speeches which on this second occasion Thucydidès ascribes to Cleon and his opponent give us doubtless no grounds for any opinion on either as a speaker, but at the same time considerable acquaintance with his own view of Cleon's position and character. We see plainly the effort to keep up a reputation as the straightforward energetic counsellor; the attempt by rude bullying to hide from the people his slavery to them; the unscrupulous use of calumny to excite prejudice against all rival advisers. "The people were only shewing (what he himself had long seen) their incapacity for governing, by giving way to a sentimental unbusinesslike compassion: as for the orators who excited it, they were, likely enough, paid for their trouble." (Thuc. iii. 36—19.)

mattered treated as serious, began to be discouraged and back out. But it was intolerable to spoil the joke by letting him off, and the people insisted that he should abide by his word. And he at last recovered his self-possession and coolly replied, that if they wished it then, he would go, and would take merely the Lemnians and Imbrians then in the city, and bring them back the Spartans dead or alive within twenty days. And indeed, says Thucydides, wild as the proceeding appeared, soberer minds were ready to pay the price of a considerable failure abroad for the ruin of the demagogue at home.

Fortune, however, brought Cleon to Pylos at the moment when he could appropriate for his needs the merit of an enterprise already devised, and no doubt entirely executed, by Demosthenes. (Demosthenes.) He appears, however, not to have been without shrewdness either in the selection of his troops or his conductor, and it is at least some small credit that he did not mar his good luck. In any case he brought back his prisoners within his time, among them 120 Spartans of the highest blood. (Thuc. iv. 27—39.) At this, the crowning point of his fortunes, Aristophanes dealt him his severest blow. In the next winter's Lenaec, n. c. 424, appeared "The Knights," in which Cleon figures as an actual dramatic person, and, in default of an artificer bold enough to make the mask, was represented by the poet himself with his face smeared with wines. The play is simply one satire on his venality, incapacity, ignorance, violence, and cowardice; and was at least successful so far as to receive the first prize. It treats of him, however, chiefly as the leader in the Ecclesia; the Wasps, in n. c. 422, similarly displays him as the grand patron of the abuses of the courts of justice. He is said to have originated the increase of the dicast's stipend from one to three obols (See Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, bk. ii. 15), and in general he professed to be the uninitiated advocate of the poor, and their protector and enforcer by his judicial attacks on the rich.

The same year (422) saw, however, the close of his career. Late in the summer, he went out, after the expiration of the year's truce, to act against Brasidas in Chalcidice. He seems to have persuaded both himself and the people of his consummate ability as a general, and he took with him a magnificent army of the best troops. He effected with ease the capture of Torone, and then moved towards Amphipolis, which Brasidas also effected with ease the capture of Torone, and then moved towards Amphipolis, which Brasidas also CLEO'NE (Κλεόνη), one of the daughters of Asopus, from whom the town of Cleonea in Peloponnesus was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. ii. 15 § 1; Diod. iv. 74.) [L. E.]

CLEO'NYUS. [PAUSANIAS.

CLEO'NYUS (Κλεονύς), of Naupactus in Aetolia, was taken prisoner by the Achaean admiral in a descent on the Aetolian coast, in the last year of the social war, b. c. 217; but, as he was a ἵδεος of the Achaeanas, he was not sold for a slave with the other prisoners, and was ultimately released without ransom. (Polyb. v. 95.) In the same year, and before his release, Philip V. being anxious for peace with the Aetolians, employed him as his agent in sounding them on the subject. (v. 102.) He was perhaps the same person who is mentioned in the speech of Lycurgus, the Achaean envoy (ix. 37), as having been sent by the Aetolians, with Chalceneas, to excite Lacedaemon against Philip, b. c. 211. 2. A Spartan, son of Sphodrias, was much beloved by Archidamus, the son of Ageaulas. When Sphodrias was brought to trial for his incursion into Attica in b. c. 376, the teers of Cleonymus prevailed on the prince to intercede with Ageaulas on his behalf. The king, to gratify his son, used all his influence to save the accused, who was accordingly acquitted. Cleonymus was extremely grateful, and assured Archidamus that he would do his best to give him no cause to be ashamed of his friendship. He held his promise well, acting upon the Spartan standard of virtue, and fell at Leuctra, b. c. 371, bravely fighting in the foremost ranks. (Xen. Hell. v. 4. §§ 25—33; Plut. Ages. 25, 23.)

3. The younger son of Cleomenes II., king of Sparta, and uncle of Agesilaus I., was excluded from the throne on his father's death, b. c. 309, in consequence of the general dislike inspired by his violent and tyrannical temper. In b. c. 303, the Tarentines, being at war with the Romans and Lucanians, asked aid of Sparta, and requested that the command of the required succours might be given to Cleonymus. The request was granted, and Cleonymus crossed over to Italy with a considerable force, the mere display of which is said to have frightened the Lucanians into peace. Dio- dorus, who mentions this, says nothing of the effect of the Spartan expedition on the Romans, though it is pretty certain that they also concluded a treaty at this time with the Tarentines. (See Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 315.) According to some of the Roman annalists, Cleonymus was defeated and driven back to his ships by the consul, M. Acilius; while others of them related that, Ju- nius Bubulcus the dictator being sent against him, he withdrew from Italy to avoid a conflict. After this, abandoning a notion he had formed of freeing the Sicilians from the tyranny of Agathocles, he sailed up the Adriatic and made a piratical descent on the country of the Veneti; but he was defeated by the Patavians and obliged to sail away. He then seized and garrisoned Corecyra, from which he seems to have been soon expelled by Demetrius Poliorcetes. While, however, he still held it, he was recalled to Italy by intelligence of the revolt of the Tarentines and others whom he had reduced: but he was beaten off from the coast, and returned to Corecyra. Hencefor he we bear no more of him till b. c. 272, when he invited Pyrrhus to attempt the conquest of Italy. (Diod. xii. 9; CICERO.)

CLEOPATRA (Κλεοπάτρα) .—1. A daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and wife of Medequer (Hom. II. ix. 556), is said to have hanged herself after her husband's death, or to have died of grief. Her real name was Alycone. (Apollod. i. 8 § 3; Hygin. Fab. 174.)

2. A Danaid, who was betrothed to Eteocles or Agor. (Apollod. i. 1 § 5; Hygin. Fab. 170.)

4. A daughter of Idas and Marpessa, and wife of Medequer (Hom. II. ix. 556), is said to have hanged herself after her husband's death, or to have died of grief. Her real name was Alycone. (Apollod. i. 8 § 3; Hygin. Fab. 174.)

2. A daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister of Alexander the Great, married Alexandre, king of Epeirus, her uncle by the mother's side, b. c. 336. It was at the celebration of her nup- tials, which took place on a magnificent scale at Aegae in Macedonia, that Philip was murdered. (Diod. xvi. 92.) Her husband died in b. c. 326; and, after his murder, in the next year she was put to death by Olympias, being either compelled to hang herself (Justin, ix. 7) or boiled to death in a brazen cauldron. (Paus. viii. 7 § 5.) Her infant son or daughter, according to Justin, perished with her, being apparently looked upon as a rival to Alexander. (Just. l. c., and ix. 5; Diod. xvi. 93, xvii. 2; Plut. Alex. 10.)

2. A daughter of Philip and Olympias, and sister of Alexander the Great, married Alexander, king of Epeirus, her uncle by the mother's side, b. c. 336. It was at the celebration of her nup- tials, which took place on a magnificent scale at Aegae in Macedonia, that Philip was murdered. (Diod. xvi. 92.) Her husband died in b. c. 326; and after the death of her brother, she was sought in marriage by several of his generals, who thought to strengthen their influence with the Macedonians by a connexion with the sister of Alexander. Leonatus is first mentioned as putting forward a claim to her hand, and he represented to Eumenes that he received a promise of marriage from her. (Plut. Eum. 3.) Perdiccas next attempted to gain her in marriage, and after his death in b. c. 321, her hand was sought by Cassander, Lysimachus, and Antigonus. She refused, however, all these offers; and, anxious to escape from Sardis, where she had been kept for years in a sort of hopeless captivity, she readily acceded to proposals from Ptolemy; but, before she could accomplish her design, she was assassinated by order of Antigonus. (Diod. xvii. 22, xx. 37; Justin, i. 6, xiii. 6, xiv. 1; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, ed. Bekker.)

3. A daughter of Antiochus III. the Great, who married Ptolemy V. Epiphanes (b. c. 198), Cœle-Syria being given her as her dowry (Appian, Syr. c. 5; Liv. xxxvii. 3), though Antiochus after- wards repudiated any such arrangement. (Polyb. xxviii. 17.)

4. A daughter of the preceding and of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes, married her brother Ptolemy VI. Philo- meter. She had a son by him, whom on his death, to choose the elder, Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrys, but she soon prevailed on them to expel him, and make room for her younger son Alexander, her favourite (Paus. viii. 7), and even sent an army against Lathyrys to Cyprus, whither he had fled, and put to death the general who commanded it for allowing him to escape alive. Terrified at her cruelty, Alexander also retired, but was recalled by her mother, who attempted to assassinate him, but was herself put to death by her evil she could effect her object, n. c. 89. (Justin. xxxix. 4.)

7. A daughter of Ptolemy Physcon and Cleopatra [No. 6], married first her brother Ptolemy VIII. Lathyrys, but was divorced from him by his mother, and fled into Syria, where she married Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus, who was then in arms against his brother Grypus, about n. c. 117, and successfully tampered with the latter's army. A battle took place, in which Cyzicenus was defeated; and she then fled to Antioch, which was besieged and taken by Grypus, and Cleopatra was surrendered by him to the vengeance of his wife Tryphaneia, her own sister, who had her murdered in a temple in which she had taken refuge. (Justin. xxxix. 3.)

8. Another daughter of Ptolemy Physcon, married her brother Lathyrys (on her sister [No. 7] being divorced), and on his exile remained in Egypt, and then married Antiochus XI. Epiphanes, and on his death Antiochus X. Eusebes. She was besieged by Tigranes in Syria or Mesopotamia, and either taken and killed by him (Strab. xvi. p. 749), or, according to Josephus (Ant. xiii. 16. § 4), relieved by Lucullus' invasion of Armenia. She was the mother of Antiochus XIII. Asiaticus. She is more generally called Selene.

9. Daughter of Ptolemy IX. Lathyrys, usually called Berenice. [Berence, No. 4.]

10. Third and eldest surviving daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, was born towards the end of n. c. 69, and was consequently seventeen at the death of her father, who in his will appointed her heir of his kingdom in conjunction with her younger brother, Ptolemy, whom she was to marry. The personal charms, for which she was so famed, shewed themselves in early youth, as we are told by Appian (B. C. v. 8), that she made an impression on the heart of Antony in her fifteenth year, when he was at school at Alexandria. She was very fair, but not long, as Ptolemy, or rather Pothinus and Achilias, her chief advisers, expelled her from the throne, about n. c. 49. She retrenched into Syria, and there collected an army with which she designed to force her brother to reinstate her. But an easier way soon presented itself; for in the following year Caesar arrived in Egypt in pursuit of Pompey, and took upon himself to arrange matters between Cleopatra and her brother. (Cass. B. C. iii. 103, 107.) Being informed of Caesar's amatory disposition, she resolved to avail herself of it, and, either at his request, according to Plutarch, or of her own accord, clandestinely effected an entrance into the palace where he was residing, and by the charms of her person and voice and the fascination of her manner, obtained such an ascendency over him, that, in the words of Dion Cassius (xlii. 35), from being the judge between her and her brother, he became her advocate. According to Plutarch, she made her entry into Caesar's apartment in a half of cloth, which was brought by Apollodorus, her attendant, as a present to Caesar. However this may be, her plan fully succeeded, and we find her replaced on the throne, much to the indignation of her brother and the Egyptians, who involved Caesar in a war in which he ran great personal risk, but which ended in his favour. In the course of it, young Ptolemy was killed, probably drowned in the Nile (Liv. 112; Hist. B. Aet. 31; Dion Cass. xliii. 43), and Cleopatra obtained the undivided rule. She was however assailed by Caesar with another child of the same name, and still quite a child, with a view to conciliate the Egyptians, with whom she appears to have been very unpopular (Dion Cass. xliii. 34), and she was also nominally married to him.

While Caesar was in Egypt, Cleopatra lived in undisguised connexion with him, and would have detained him there longer, or have accompanied him at once to Rome, but for the war with Pharnaces, which tore him from her arms. She however joined him in Rome, in company with her nominal husband, and there continued the same open intercourse with him, living in apartments in his house, which he provided for her in the Palatine hill. (Doubts have been thrown on her visit to Rome, but the evidence of Cicero (ad Att. xiv. 5), of Dion Cassius (xliii. 27), and Suetonius (Ces. 35), seems to be conclusive.) She was loaded with honours and presents by Caesar, and seems to have stayed at Rome till his death, B. C. 44. She had a son by him, named Caesarion, who was afterwards put to death by Augustus. Caesar at least owned him as his son, though the paternity was questioned by some contemporaries [CASSARION]; and the character of Cleopatra perhaps favours the doubt. After the death of Caesar, she fled to Egypt, and in the troubles which ensued she took the side of the triumvire, and assisted Dolabella both by sea and land, resisting the threats of Cassius, who was preparing to attack her when he was called away by the entreaties of Brutus. She also sailed in person preparing to attack her when he was called away by the entreaties of Brutus. She also sailed in person with a considerable fleet to assist Antony after the defeat of Dolabella, but was prevented from joining him by a storm and the bad state of her health. She had however done sufficient to prove her attachment to Caesar's memory (which seems to have been sincere), and also to furnish her with arguments to use to Antony, who in the end of the year 41 came into Asia Minor, and there summoned Cleopatra to attend, on the charge of having failed to co-operate with the triumvirates against Caesar's murderers. She was now in her twenty-eighth year, and in the perfection of matured beauty, which in conjunction with her talents and eloquence, and perhaps the early impression which we have mentioned, completely won the heart of Antony, who henceforth appears as her devoted lover and slave. We read in Plutarch elaborate descriptions of her well-known voyage up the Cydnus in Cilicia to meet Antony, and the magnificent entertainments which she gave, which were remarkable not less for good taste and variety than splendour and profuse expense. One of these is also celebrated in Athenaeus (iv. 29). The first use Cleopatra made of her influence was to procure the death of her younger sister, Arsinoe, who had once set up a claim to the kingdom. (Appian, B. C. v. 8, 9; Dion Cass. xlviii. 24.) Her brother, Ptolemy, she seems to have made away with before; for after his death she was accused of having had the heads of her generals, Serrapon, who had assisted Cassius contrary to her orders, and got into her hands a person whom the people of Aradus had set up to counterfeit the elder of her two brothers, who perished in Egypt. All these were torn from the sanctuaries of temples; but Antony, we learn from both Dion and Appian, was so entirely enslaved by Cleopatra's charms, that he set at nought all ties of religion and humanity. (Appian, B. C. v. 9; Dion Cass. xlviii. 24.)

Cleopatra was therefore determined to go to Egypt, where Antony spent some time in her company; and we read of the luxury of their mode of living, and the unbounded empire which she possessed over him. The ambition of her character, however, peeped out even in these scenes, particularly in the fishing anecdote recorded by Plutarch. (Ant. 29.) Her connexion with Antony was interrupted for a short time by his marriage with Octavia, but was renewed on his return from Italy, and again on his return from his Parthian expedition, when she went to meet him in Syria with money and provisions for his army. He then returned to Egypt, and gratified her ambition by assigning to her children the titles of the sun and the moon, and giving audience in that dress to ambassadors, and the farce of their public entertainments, opposed to the Romans as "bewitched by that accursed Egyptian" (Dion Cass. i. 26); and he was not slow in availing himself of the disgust which Antony's conduct occasioned to make a determined effort to crush him. War, however, was declared against Cleopatra, and not against Antony, as a less invincible way. (Dion Cass. i. 6.) Cleopatra insisted on accompanying Antony in the fleet; and we find them, after visiting Samos and Athens, where they repeated what Plutarch calls the farce of their public entertainments, opposed to Augustus at Actium. Cleopatra indeed persuaded Antony to retreat to Egypt, but the attack of Augustus frustrated this intention, and the famous battle took place (n. c. 31) in the midst of which, when fortune was wavering between the two parties, Cleopatra, weary of suspense, and alarmed at the defeat of her brother (Dion Cass. xliii. 33), sent a signal of retreat to her fleet, and herself led the way. Augustus in vain pursued her, and she made her way to Alexandria, the harbour of which she entered with her prows crowned and music sounding, as if victorious, fearing an outbreak in the city. With the same view of retaining the Alexandrians in their allegiance, she and Antony, who soon joined her, proclaimed their children, Antyllus and Cleopatra, of age. She then prepared to defend herself in Alexandria, and sent embassies to the neighbouring tribes for aid. (Dion Cass. li. 6.) She had also a plan of retiring to Spain, or to the Persian gulf; and either was building ships in the Red Sea, as Dion asserts, or, according to Plutarch, intended to draw her ships across the isthmus of Suez. Whatever was the case, the ships were burnt by the Arabs of Petra, and this hope failed. She scrupled not to behead Artavasdes, and send his head as a tribute for aid to the king of Media, who was her enemy. Finding, however, no aid nigh, she prepared to negotiate with Augustus, and sent him on his approach her sceptre and throne (unknown to Antony), as thereby resigning her kingdom. His public answer required her to resign and submit to a trial; but he privately urged her to escape with Antony, and promised that she should retain her kingdom. On a subsequent occasion, Thyrus, Caesar's freedman, brought similar terms, and represented Augustus as captivated by her, which she seems to have believed, and, seeing Antony's fortunes desperate, betrayed Ptolemais to Augustus, prevented the Alexandrians from going out against him, and frustrated Antony's plan of escaping to Rome by persuading the fleet to desert him. She then fled to a mausoleum she had built, where she had collected her most valuable treasures, and proclaimed her intention of putting an end to her life, with a view to entice Antony thither, and thus ensure his capture. (This is the account of Dion Cassius, li. 6, 8—11; of the same facts as those recorded by Plutarch, who however represents Cleopatra's death as less glaring.) She then had Antony informed of her death, as thought to persuade him to die with her; and this stratagem, if indeed she had this object, fully succeeded, and he was drawn up into the unfinished mausoleum, and died in her arms. She did not however venture to meet Augustus, though his rival was dead, but remained in the mausoleum, ready if need was to put herself to death, for which purpose she had asps and other venomous animals in readiness. Augustus contrived to apprehend her, and had all instruments of death removed, and then requested an interview (for an account of which see Dion Cass. li. 12, 13, and Plut. Act. 89). The charms of Cleopatra, however, failed in softening the conqueror of Augustus. He only "bade her be of good cheer, and fear no violence." Seeing that her case was desperate, and determined at all events not to be carried captive against her will, she prepared to negotiate with Augustus, and sent him as a bribe for aid to the king of Media, who was brought to Rome in b. c. 46, when quite a boy, after the defeat of the latter by Caesar. (Dion Cass. li. 15; Plut. Act. 87.) By Juba, Cleopatra had two children, Ptolemy, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and Drusilla, who married Antonius Felix, the governor of Judaea. The following coin represents the head of Antony on the obverse, and Cleopatra's on the reverse.

11. Daughter of Antony, the triumvir, and Cleopatra, was born with her twin brother Alexander in b. c. 40. Her early history till the time she was carried to Rome is given under Alexander, p. 112. She continued to reside at Rome till her marriage with Juba, king of Numidia, who was brought to Rome in b. c. 46, when quite a boy, along with his father, after the defeat of the latter by Caesar. (Dion Cass. li. 15; Plut. Act. 87.) By Juba, Cleopatra had two children, Ptolemy, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and Drusilla, who married Antonius Felix, the governor of Judaea. The following coin contains the head of Juba on the obverse, and Cleopatra's on the reverse.

—κατά τῶν ἀνιστατῶν ἀνήρ τιν ἰδρυφυγελσθός, κ. τ. ἀλ. The second occasion was after the battle of Arginnae, b. c. 406, and the third after that of Aegospotami in the following year, when, resisting the demand of the enemy for the partial demolition of the Long Walls, he is said to have threatened death to any one who should make mention of peace. (Aristot. op. Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 1328; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 38, c. Ches. p. 75; Thirlwall's Greece, iv. pp. 89, 125, 158.) It is to the second of the above occasions that Aristophanes refers in the last line of the "Frogs," where, in allusion also to the foreign origin of Cleophon, the former cites a passage from the comic poet Plato in the play of that name above alluded to, as well as the notices of him, not complimentary, in the "Frogs" of Aristophanes. If we may trust the latter (Theop. 506), his private life was as profligate as his public career was mischievous. By Isocrates also (De Pace p. 174, b.) he is classed with Hyperbolus and contrasted with the worthies of the good old time, and Andocides mentions it as a disgrace that his house was inhabited, during his exile, by Cleophon, the harp manufacturer. (Andoc. de Myst. p. 19.) On the other hand, he cannot at any rate be reckoned among those who have made a thrilling and not over-honest trade of patriotism, for we learn from Lysias (de Arist. Bon. p. 158), that, though he managed the affairs of the state for many years, he died at last, to the surprise of all, in poverty. (Comp. Meincke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 171 &c.)

2. A tragic poet of Athens, the names of ten of whose dramas are given by Suidas (s. v.). He is also mentioned by Aristotle. (Poet. 2, 22) [B.E.]

CLEOPTOLEMUS (Κλεόπτολημος), a noble Chaldean, whose daughter, named Euboea, Antiochus the Great married when he wintered at Chaldea in b. c. 192. (Polyb. xx. 8; Liv. xxxiv. 11; Diod. Frgm. lib. xxix.) [B.E.]

CLEOSTRATUS (Κλεοστράτωρ), an astronomer of Tenedos. Censorinus (De Nat. c. 18) considers him to have been the real inventor of the Octoëteris, or cycle of eight years, which was used before the Metonic cycle of nineteen years, and which was popularly attributed to Eudoxus. Theophrastus (de Sign. Plura. p. 259, ed. Basili. 1541) mentions him as a meteorological observer along with Matricetas of Methymna and Phaeinus of Athens, and says that Meton was taught by Phaeinus. If, therefore, Calistratus was contemporary with the latter, which however is not clear, he must have lived before Ol. 87. Pliny (H. N. ii. 8) says, that Anaximander discovered the obliquity of the ecliptic in Ol. 58, and that Cleostatus afterwards introduced the division of the Zodiac into signs, beginning with Aries and Sagittarius. It seems, therefore, that he lived some time between n. c. 548 and 432. Hyginus (Poet. Astr. ii. 13) says, that Cleostatus first pointed out the two stars in Auriga called Hoocli. (Virg. Aen. ix. 693.) On the Octaeteris, see Genesis, Elem. Astr. c. 6. (Petav. Uranolog. p. 37.)

(CLERO/CHENUS (Kleovros), was joint-author with one Democletus of a somewhat cumbrous system of telegraphing, which Polyaenus explains (x. 45-47) with the remark, that it had been considerably improved by himself. See Suidas, s. v. Kleovros kal Deumoklavos érgamai pei poráon, where poráon was the erroneous reading of the old editions.

CLEPSINA, the name of a patrician family of the Genia gens.

1. C. Genniicus Clepsina, consul in n. c. 276 with Q. Fabius Maximus Gugoses, in which year Rome was visited by a grievous pestilence (Oros. iv. 2), and a second time in 270 with Cn. Cornelius Belus. (Fasti.)

2. L. Genniicus Clepsina, probably brother of the preceding, was consul in n. c. 271 with C. Quinctius Claudius. He was sent to subdue the Campanian legion, which under Decius Jubaellius had revolted from the Romans and made itself master of Rhegium. After a long siege, Clepsina took the town; he knighted death to all the loose vagabonds and robbers whom he found among the soldiers, but sent the remains of the legion (probably a few above 300, though the numbers vary in the different authorities) to Rome for trial, where they were scourged and beheaded. (Oros. iv. 3; Dionys. xx. 7 in Mal's Excerpta; Appian, Sama 9; Polyb. i. 71; Liv. Epit. 15; Zonar. viii. 6; Val. Max. B. 7, 8; Gell. iv. 1, 38.) Orosius and Dionysius are the only writers who mention the name of the consul, with the exception of Appian, who calls him by mistake Fabriacus; and even the two former do not entirely agree. Orosius calls the consul Genniicus simply, and places the capture of Rhegium in the year after that of Tarentum, by which L. Gennius would seem to be intended; while Dionysius, on the other hand, names him C. Genniicus, and would thus appear to attribute the capture of the city to the consul of the following year (n. c. 270). [No. 1.]

CLETA. [CHARIUS.]

CLIMACUS, JOANNES (Iakoiv 8 Kalma-koos), summoned the Learned (é Sauktaxastés), a Greek writer who lived in the sixth century of the Christian era, whose original name was Ioannes, and who was called Climacus on account of a work written by him, which was entitled Kamaos. He took orders, and although the learned education which he had received seemed to have destined him for a life among scholars, he lived during forty years with monks of the most rude and illiterate description, till he was chosen abbot of the convent on Mount Sinai, where he died at the age of one hundred, or thereabouts, on the 30th of March. The year of his death is uncertain, but it was probably in the beginning of the seventh century. (A. D. 606?) The life of Climacus, written by a Greek monk of the name of Daniel, is contained in "Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima," in the "Aeta Sanctorum," ad 30 diei Martii, in the editions of the works of Climacus, and in "Johannis Climaci, Johannis Damasceni, et Johannis Eleemosynarii Vitae," &c., ed. Johannes Vicarius, Jesuita, Tournai, 1664, 4to. Two works of Climacus, who was a fertile writer on religious subjects, have been printed, viz.:- 1. "Scala Paradisii" (Kalmaos), addressed to John, abbot of the monastery of Raithin, which is divided into thirty chapters, and treats on the means of attaining the highest possible degree of religious perfection. A Latin translation of this work by Ambrosius, a Camaldulensian monk, was published at Venice, 1531, ibid. 1569, Cologne, 1583, ibid. 1653, with an exposition of Dionysius, a Carthusian friar; ibid. 1601, 8vo. The Greek text, with a Latin translation and the Scholia of Elias, archbishop of Crete, was published together with the work of Climacus cited below, by Matthaeus Raderus, Paris, 1633, fol. It is also contained, together with the previously mentioned Scholia of Elias, in the different Bibliotheca Patrum. In some MSS. this work has the title Maxier Hierogrammar, or Spiritual Tables.

2. "Liber ad Pastorum," of which a Latin translation was published by the Ambrosian mentioned above, and was reprinted several times; the Greek text with a Latin version was published, together with the "Scala Paradisii" and the Scholia of the archbishop Elias, by Raderus mentioned above, Paris, 1635, fol. Both these works of Climacus were translated into modern Greek and published by Maximus Margnusius, bishop of Cerigo, Venice, 1590. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 322, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 421, ad an. 564; Hamburger, Zuerstüälige Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern, vol. iii. p. 467.)

CLOACINA or CLOACINA, a surname of Venus, under which she is mentioned at Rome in very early times. [See CLOACINA, 2. (f. 458.)] The name was derived from the great sewer (cloaca maxima), where the image of the goddess was said to have been found in the time of king Tatius, is merely one of the unfortunate etymological speculations which we frequently meet with in the ancients. There is no doubt that Pliny (H. N. xx. 36) is right in saying that the name is derived from the ancient verb cloare or etear, to wash, clean, or purify. This meaning is also alluded to in the tradition about the origin and worship of Venus Cloacina, for it is said that, when Tatius and Romulus were arrayed against each other on account of the rape of the Sabine women, and when the women prevented the two belligerents from bloodshed, both armies purified themselves with sacred myrtle-branches on the spot which was afterwards occupied by the temple of Venus Cloacina. The supposition of some modern writers, that Cloacina has reference to the purity of love, is nothing but an attempt to intrude a modern notion upon the ancients, to whom it was quite foreign. (Hartung, Die Relig. d. Röm. ii. p. 249.) [LS.] CLOELIA.

CLODIA'NUS, mentioned by Cicero (ad Att. i. 19), is the same as C. Cornelius Lentulus Clodia'nius, consul a. d. 72. [Lentulus.]

CLODIUS, another form of the name Claudius, just as we find both cornicis and codex, clestrum and cloestrum, cauda and coda. In the latter times of the republic several of the Claudia gens, adopted exclusively the form Clodiis, others were called indifferently, sometimes Claudius and sometimes Clodius: their lives are given under Claudius.

CLODIUS. 1. A physician, who must have lived in the first century a. d., as he was a pupil of Asclepiades of Bithynia. One of his works is quoted by Caesarius Aurelianus (De Mort. Chron. iv. 9, p. 545; De Mort. Auct. iii. 8, p. 217) with reference to accuracies.

2. L. Clodius, a native of Ancona, who was employed by Oppianicus to poison Dinae in the first century b. c., and who is called by Cicero (pro Client. c. 14) "pharmacopola circumfunereus," may perhaps be the same person as the preceding, though it is scarcely probable. [W. A. G.]

CLODIIUS ALBINUS. [Albinus.]

CLODIIUS BITHYNICUS. [Bithynicus, and Claudius No. 6, p. 775 b.]

CLODIIUS LICINUS. [Liceus.]

CLODIIUS MACER. [Macer.]

CLODIIUS QUIRINUS L. [Quirinalis.]

CLODIIUS SABINUS. [Sabinus.]

CLODIIUS TURRINUS. [Turrinus.]

CLOELIA, a Roman virgin, who was one of the hostages given to the Etruscans as a native of Thebes. His age is not quite certain, though it is scarcely probable. [W. A. G.]

CLOE'LIA or CLOUI'LIA GENS, patrician, all four were placed on the Rostra. Cicero calls M. Geganius, came to the assistance of the optimates, drew lines around the Volscians, and did not allow them to march out till they had surrendered their general, Clodius, who led the consul at Rome. (Liv. iv. 9, 10.) Comp. CLOE'LIUS GRACCHUS.

CLOE'LIA or CLOUI'LIA, a Roman virgin, who was one of the hostages given to the Etruscans as a native of Thebes. His age is not quite certain, though it is scarcely probable. [W. A. G.]

CLOE'LIIUS, the leader of the Aequians in b. c. 458, surrounded the consul L. Minucius Angurinus, who had through fear shut himself up in his camp on Mount Algidus; but Caesar was in his turn surrounded by the dictator L. Quinctius Capitolinus, who had come to relieve Minucius, and was delivered up by his own troops to the dictator. (Liv. iii. 25—26; Dionys. x. 22—24.) The legendary nature of this story as told by Livy has been pointed out by Niebuhr (vol. ii. p. 268), who remarks, that the Aequian general, Caesar is again surrounded and taken prisoner twenty years after at Ardea—a circumstance quite impossible, as no one who had been led in triumph in those days ever escaped execution.

CLOE'LIIUS TULLIUS, a Roman ambassador, who was killed with his three colleagues by the Fidenates, in b. c. 438, upon the instigation of Tar Tolumnius, king of the Volsci. Statues of all four were placed on the Rostra. Cicero calls him Tullius Clodium. (Liv. iv. 17; Cic. Phil. ix. 2; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6. s. 13; Verg. Aen. viii. 651; Juv. viii. 265.)

CLOE'LIIUS or CLOUI'LIA GENS, patrician, of Alban origin, was one of the gentle minores, and was said to have derived its name from Clolius, a companion of Aeneas. (Feustus, s. v. Cloelia.) The name of the last king of Alba is said to have been C. Clodium or Clolius. He led an army against Rome in the time of Tullus Hostilius, pitched his camp five miles from the city, and surrounded his encampment with a ditch, which continued to be called after him, in subsequent ages, Fossa Clolius, Fossa Clodium, or Fossa Cloliius. While here, he died, and the Albans chose Mettius Fufettius as dictator, in consequence of whose treachery the Romans destroyed Alba. Niebuhr, however, remarks, that though the Fossa Clodium was undoubtedly the work of an Alban prince called Clodium, yet that the story of the Alban army encamping there was probably invented for the sake of accounting for this name. (Liv. i. 22, 23; Dionys. iii. 2-4; Festus, s. v. Clodium Fussae; comp. Liv. ii. 39; Dionys. viii. 29; Niebuhr, vol. i. pp. 294, 348, n. 370.)

Upon the destruction of Alba, the Cloelii were one of the noble Alban houses enrolled in the Roman senate. (Liv. i. 30; Dionys. iii. 29.) They bore the surname Siculus, probably because the Albans were regarded as a mixture of Siculiains with Friscians. Tullus was perhaps another cognomen of this gens. See CLOE'LIIUS TULLIUS.

The following coin of this gens contains on the obverse the head of Mars, and on the reverse Victory in a biga, with the inscription T. CLOVLI, Conlio being an ancient form of the name.
Schoenium, and of Porsenna. Mention is made of a choral song in which he used all the three ancient modes of music, so that the first strophe was Dorian, the second Phrygian, and the third Lydian. (Plini. de Mus. 3. p. 1132, c. 5. p. 1133. a., 8. p. 1134, n. b., 17. p. 1136, f.; Herod. Pont. p. 140; Pans. x. 7. § 5.) [P. S.]

CLO'NIUS (Klivos). 1. The leader of the Boecotians in the war against Troy, was slain by Agenor. (Hom. II. ii. 495, xv. 340; Diod. iv. 67; Hygin. Fab. 97.)

2. Two companions of Aeneas, the one of whom was slain by Turnus, and the other by Messeapus. (Verg. Aen. ix. 374, x. 749.) There is a fourth mythical personage of this name. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

CLOTHIO. (Moirae.)

CLUEN'ITA. 1. Sister of the elder A. Cluentius Habitus. She was one of the numerous wives of Statius Albius Oppianicus, and, according to the representation of Cicero, was poisoned by her husband (pro Cluent. 10). This Cluentia, in Orelli's Onomasticon Tullianum, seems to be confounded with her niece. [No. 2.]

2. Daughter of the elder A. Cluentius Habitus. Soon after her father's death she married her first cousin A. Aurius Melinus, from whom she was soon divorced in order to make way for her own mother, Sassia, who had conceived a passion for the husband of her daughter. (Pro Cluent. 5.) [W. R.]

L. CLUEN'TIUS, called A. Cluentius by Eutropius (v. 3), was one of the generals of the Latians in the Social War. He gained a victory over Sulla in the neighbourhood of Pompeii, but was soon after defeated with great loss by Sulla. (Appian, B. C. i. 50; Eutrop. l.c.; comp. Cic. de Div. i. 53; Val. Max. i. 6, § 4; Plin. H. N. xxii. 6.)

A. CLUEN'TIUS HA'BITUS. 1. A native of Larinum, highly respected and esteemed not only in his own municipium but in the whole surrounding country, on account of his ancient descent, unblemished reputation, and great moral worth. He married Sassia, and died in B. C. 89. Thirty thousand of his men are said to have fallen in their flight towards Nola, and twenty thousand, among whom was Cluentius himself, before the walls of that town, as the inhabitants would admit them by only one gate, for fear lest Sulla's troops should rush in with them. (Appian, B. C. i. 50; Eutrop. l.c.; comp. Cic. de Div. i. 53; Val. Max. i. 6, § 4; Plin. H. N. xxii. 6.)

In modern editions of Cicero the cognomen Acitus uniformly appears instead of Habitus, having been first introduced, in opposition to all the best MSS. both of Cicero and Quintilian, by Lamfinus at the suggestion of Cujaccius, who maintained, that Habitus must in every case be considered as a corruption of the transcribers, and appealed for the confirmation of his opinion to the Florentine MS. of the Digest (45. tit. 19. s. 39), where, however, upon examination the reading is found to be Acitus. Accordingly, Orelli, following Niebuhr and Claussen, has restored the ancient form in his Onomasticon, although not in the text of the edition. (Römisches Museum for 1827, p. 223.)

2. Son of the foregoing and his wife Sassia, was also a native of Larinum, born about B. C. 103. (Pro Cluent. 5.) In B. C. 74. being at Rome, he accused his own step-father, Statius Albius Oppianicus, of having attempted to procure his death by poison. The cause was heard before a certain C. Junius during a period when a strong feeling prevailed with regard to the veracity of the criminal judicium, who were at that epoch selected from the senate exclusively. Shortly before the trial, a report was spread abroad, and gained general credit, that bribery had been extensively practised by those interested in the result. Accordingly, when a verdict of guilty was pronounced by a very small majority, including several individuals of notoriously bad character, when it became known that one of the concilium had been irregularly introduced, and had voted against the defendant without hearing the evidence, and when, above all, it was ascertained beyond a doubt that one of the most infamous of the judges who had condemned Oppianicus had actually received a large sum of money for distribution among his fellows, the belief became universal that Cluentius had by the foulest practices obtained the conviction of an innocent man. Indignation being thus strongly excited, it was exhibited most unequivocally. No opportunity was allowed to pass of inflicting dictum punishment on the obnoxious judges. Junius, the judex questionis, a man rising rapidly to eminence, was forced by the popular clamour to retire from public life; Cluentius and many others of those concerned were disowned by the censors, and the Judicium Junianum or Albaniwm Judicium became a by-word for a corrupt and unrighteous judicium. It was developing more and more the advantage of the outcry than Cicero himself, when insisting, at the trial of Verres, on the necessity of obliterating the foul stain which had thus sufficed the reputation of the Roman courts. (In Varr. act. i. 10. 18—61, pro Cluent. 10; Pseudo-Aiexon. in Varr. act. i. p. 141; Schol. Gronov. p. 395, ed. Orelli.)

Eight years after these events, in B. C. 66, Cluentius was himself accused by young Oppianicus, son of Statius Albius who had died in the interval, of three distinct acts of poisoning, two of which, it was alleged, had proved successful. The attack was conducted by T. Accius Pisaurensis; the defence was conducted by T. Accius Pisaurensis, the defence was undertaken by Cicero, at that time praeator. It is perfectly clear, from the whole tenor of the remarkable speech delivered upon this occasion, from the vast amount devoted to the refutation of the above charges, and from the meagre and defective evidence by which they were supported, that comparatively little importance was attached to them by the prosecutor, that they were merely employed as a plausible pretext for bringing Cluentius before a Roman court, and that his enemies grounded their hopes of success almost entirely upon the prejudice which was known to exist in men's minds on account of the Judicium Junianum,—a prejudice which had already proved the ruin of many others when arraigned of various offences. Hence it would appear that the chief object kept in view by Accius in his opening address was to refresh the memories of his hearers, to recall to their recollections all the circumstances connected with the previous trial, and the punishments which had been inflicted on the guilty judges. Consequently, the greater portion of the reply is devoted to the same topics; the principal aim of Cicero was to undeceive his audience with regard to the real state of the facts, to draw a vivid picture of the life and crimes of the elder Oppianicus and Sassia, proving them to be monsters of guilt, and thus to remove the "invetera invidia" which had taken such deep root against his client. Following the example of his antagonist, he divides the subject into two heads: 1. The treason or prejudice which prevailed. 2. The crimes or specific offences libelled; but while five-sixths of the pleading are devoted to removing the former, the latter is dismissed shortly and contemptuously as almost unworthy of notice. A critical analysis of the whole will be found in the well-known lectures of Blair upon rhetoric and belles-lettres, who has selected the oration as an excellent example of managing at the bar a complex and intricate cause with order, elegance, and force. And certainly nothing can be more admirable than the distinct and clear exposition by which we are made acquainted with all the details of a most involved and perplexing story, the steady precision with which we are guided through a frightful and entangled labyrinths of domestic crime, and the apparently plain straightforward simplicity with which every circumstance is brought to bear upon the elucidation of the impeachment. We are told (Quintil. ii. 17. § 21), that Cicero having procured an acquittal by his eloquence, boasted that he had spread a mist before the judges; but so artfully were all the parts connected and combined, that it is very difficult, in the absence of the evidence, to discover the suspicious and weak points of the narrative. In one place only do we detect a sophism in the reasoning, which may involve important consequences. It is freely confessed that bribery had been extensively employed at the trial of Oppianicus; it is admitted with ostentatious display in his struggles to escape from the dilemma. Taken as a whole, the speech for Cluentius must be considered as one of Cicero’s highest efforts. (Comp. Quintil. xi. § 61.) [W. R.]

CLUVIUS. [CLOELIA GENS AND CLOELIUS.] CLUVIA, FAUCULA [CLUVII], a Campanian courtesan, who lived in the time of the second Punic war. She earned the good-will of the Romans by secretly supplying the Roman prisoners with food. When Capua was taken, b. c. 210, her property and liberty were restored to her by the Senate; but so artfully were all the parts connected and combined, that it is very difficult, in the absence of the evidence, to discover the suspicious and weak points of the narrative. In one place only do we detect a sophism in the reasoning, which may involve important consequences. It is freely confessed that bribery had been extensively employed at the trial of Oppianicus; it is admitted with ostentatious display in his struggles to escape from the dilemma. Taken as a whole, the speech for Cluentius must be considered as one of Cicero’s highest efforts. (Comp. Quintil. xi. § 61.) [W. R.]

CLUVIUS, the name of a family of Campanian origin, of whom we find the following mentioned:—

1. C. CLUVIUS SASULA, praetor in b. c. 175, and again in b. c. 173 (Proc. Pomp. xxxvi. 125, 126; Cic. pro Rosc. Com. xiv. 14—16.)

2. S. CLUVIUS, praetor in b. c. 172, had Sardinia as his province. (Liv. xliii. 9, 10.)
mother of Iphicles and Alcimede. (Paus. x. 29. § 2 ; Hom. Od. vi. 325 ; Schol. ad Apollod. Rhod. i. 48, 230.) According to Hesiod (ap. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1689 ; comp. Ov. Met. i. 756, iv. 294), she was the mother of Phineus by Helios, and according to Apollodorus (iii. 9. § 2), also of Atalante by Jana.

3. A relative of Menelaus and a companion of Helena, together with whom she was carried off by Paris. (Hom. H. iii. 144 ; Dictys Cret. i. 3, v. 13.) After the taking of Troy, when the booty was distributed, Clymena was given to Acamas. She was represented as a captive by Polygnotus in the Lesche of Delphi. (Paus. x. 26. § 1 ; comp. Ov. Her. xvii. 267.) There are several other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. H. xviii. 47 ; Hygin. Fab. 71 ; Apollod. iii. 2. § 1, &c. ; Paus. x. 24. § 5.) [L. S.]

CLYMENUS (Κλύμενος). 1. A son of Cardis in Crete, who is said to have come to Elis in the fiftieth year after the flood of Deucalion, to have restored the Olympic games, and to have erected altars to Heracles, from whom he was descended. (Paus. v. 8. § 1, 14. § 6, vi. 21. § 5.)

2. A son of Caeneus or Schoenus, king of Arcadia or of Argos, was married to Epicaste, by whom he had among other children a daughter Harpalyce. He entertained an unnatural love for his daughter, and after having committed incest with her, he gave her in marriage to Alastor, but afterwards took her away from him, and again lived with her. Harpalyce, in order to avenge her father's crime, slew her younger brother, or, according to others, her own son, and placed his flesh prepared in a dish before her father. She herself was thereafter changed into a bird, and Clymenus hung himself. (Hygin. Fab. 242, 246, 255 ; Parn. Erol. 13.)

3. A son of Probas and king of Orchomenos, who was married to Minya. (Paus. ix. 37. § 1, &c. ; Apollod. ii. 4. § 11 ; Hygin. Fab. 14.) There are several other mythical personages of this name. (Hygin. Fab. 154 ; Paus. ii. 35. § 3 ; Ov. Met. v. 98 ; comp. Althaea.) [L. S.]

CLITAIEMNESTRA (Κλιταιμνήστρα), a daughter of Tyndareus and Leda, and sister of Castor, Timandra, and Philonoe, and half-sister of Althaea. (Paus. x. 26. § 1 ; comp. Ov. Met. vi. 305.)

CLYTIE (Κλύττε), the name of three mythical personages. (Hes. Theog. 352 ; Ov. Met. iv. 205 ; Paus. x. 30. § 1 ; Tzetza, ad Lyoph. 421.) [L. S.]

CLYTUS (Κλύτος). 1. A son of Laomedon and father of Caleros and Procles, was one of the Trojan elders. (Hom. H. iii. 147, xv. 419 ; Paus. x. 14. § 2.)

2. A son of the Oechelian king Eurytes, who was one of the Argonauts, and was killed during the expedition by Hercules, or according to others by Actaeon. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 86 ; Schol. ad Soph. Trach. 235 ; Hygin. Fab. 14.) There are several other mythical personages of this name. (Paus. vi. 17. § 4 ; Ov. Met. i. 140 ; Apollod. i. 6. § 2 ; Virg. Aen. ix. 774, x. 129, 235, xi. 666.) [L. S.]

CLYTUS (Κλύτος), the name of three mythical personages. (Hygin. Fab. 124, 170 ; Ov. Met. v. 87.) [L. S.]

CLYTUS (Κλύτος), a Milesian and a disciple of Aristotle, was the author of a work on the history of his native city. The two passages of Athenaeus (xii. p. 540, d., xiv. p. 565, b.), in which this work is quoted, must be assimilated to one another either by reading Κλύτος in the first and Κλάτος in the second, for it is clear that the work is made in both to the same author and the same treatise. In the passage of Diogenes Laertius (i. 25), — καλ ανετὸς δὲ τίμημα γίνεται. Κλάτος ἁρπασθείσαι εἰς τὴν λαυρέαν τρωτοῦ, κ. τ. λ.—Menagius proposes, with much show of probability, the substitution of Κλάτος for Κλύτος, as a notice of Thales would naturally find a place in an account of Melitius. It does not appear what ground there is for the assertion of Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 91, ed. Westermann), that Clytus accompanied Alexander on his expedition. The passage in Valerius Maximus to which he refers (ix. 3, extern. § 1), speaks only of the Cleitus who was murdered by the king. [E. B.]

CNA'GIA (Κναγία), a surname of Artemis, derived from Cnages, a Laconian, who accompanied the Dioscuri in their war against Aphobos, and was made prisoner. He was sold to Pythias of Tyre, and carried to Crete, where he served in the temple of Artemis; but he escaped from thence with a priestess of the goddess, who carried her statue to Sparta. (Paus. iii. 18. § 3.) [L. S.]

CNE'MUS (Κνέμος), the Spartan high admiral (vanduxpos) in the second year of the Peloponnesian war, b. c. 430, made a descent upon Zacynthus with 1000 Lacedaemonian hoplites; but, after ravaging the island, was obliged to retire without reducing it to submission. Cnemus was continued in his office of admiral next year, though the regular term, at least a few years subsequently, was only one year. In the second year of his command (b. c. 429), he was sent with 1000 hoplites again to co-operate with the Ambracians, who wished to subdue Acanania and to revolt from Athens. He put himself at the head of the Ambracians and their barbarian allies, invaded Acanania, and penetrated to Stratus, the chief town of the country. But here his barbarian allies were defeated by the Ambracians, and he was obliged to abandon the expedition altogether. Meanwhile the Peloponnesian fleet, which was intended to co-operate with the land forces, had been defeated by Phormio with a far smaller number of ships. Enraged at this disaster, and suspecting the incompetency of the commanders, the Lacedaemonians sent out Timocrates, Brasidas, and Lycurgus to assist Coenus as a council, and with instructions to prepare for fighting a second battle. After refitting their disabled vessels and obtaining reinforcements from their allies, by which their number was increased to seventy-five, while Phormio had only twenty, the Lacedaemonian commanders attacked the Athenians off Naupactus, and though the latter at first lost several ships, and were nearly defeated, they eventually gained the day, and recovered, with one exception, all the ships which had been previously captured by the enemy. After this, Coenus, Brasidas, and the other Peloponnesian commanders formed the design of surprising Perimene, and would probably have succeeded in their attempt, only their courage failed them at the time of execution, and they sailed to Salamis instead, thereby violating the Athenians' notion of their intention. (Thuc. ii. 66, 80—93 ; Diod. xii. 47. &c.) [CNEPH. (CNEPH.)]
CNU'DIA (Ko'dia), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the town of Cnidus in Caria, for which Praxiteles made his celebrated statue of the goddess. The statue of Aphrodite known by the name of the Medicus Venus, is considered by many critics to be a copy of the Cnidian Aphrodite. (Paus. i. 3 § 3; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5; Lucian, Amor. 13; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 57.) [L. S.]

CNO'PIAS (Ko'pras), of Alorus, an officer who, having seen some active service under Demetrius II. and Antigonus Doson, was one of those who, having seen some active service under Deme¬trius II. and Antigonus Doson, was one of those employed by Agathocles and Sosibius, ministers of Antiochus the Great in B. C. 219. Cnopias is said to have performed the duty entrusted to him with ability and zeal. (v. 63-65.) [E. E.]

COBIDAS, JOANNES, a Graeco-Roman jurist, who seems to have lived shortly after the time of Justinian. His name is spelt in various ways, as Cobidas, Cobidius, &c. He is one of the Greek jurists whose commentaries on the titles "de Procuratoribus et Defensibus" in the Digest and the Code (which titles, translated into Greek and arranged, constitute the eighth book of the Basilica) were edited by D. Ruhnkenius and first published in the third and fifth volumes of Meermann's The¬aurus. Extracts from the commentaries of Cobi¬das on the Digest are sometimes appended as notes to the Basilian, and sometimes the Scholiasts on the Basilica cite Cobidas. (Basil. ed. Heimbach, i. pp. 559, 794, ii. p. 10.) In Basil. (ed. Fabrot.) iii. p. 162, Cobidas is found citing Cyrillus and Stephanus, contemporaries of Justinian, and in no extant passage does he refer to the Novellae of Leo; though Nic. Cononius (Pracot. Myth. p. 372) mentions a Cobidas, logotheta genici, who wrote scholia on the Novellae of Leo. Cobidas is cited by Balsamo. (Ad Nomocam. Photii in Just. et Voell. Bijd. Jur. Canon. p. 1118.)

Cobidas, the commentator on the Digest, is usu¬ally identified and may perhaps be the same with the Joannes Cobidiius (Cobidius, Convidia, &c.) who wrote a Nova Alar, or treatise on punishments. Of this jurist and professor (antecessor) Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 27) says, that Ant. Augustinus possessed some works or portions of works in manus¬cript and fragments of the Novellae were preserved in the appendix to the Ecloga of Leo and Constantine. This appendix consists of legal writings, chiefly of the eighth and ninth centuries, and was published from a Parisian manuscript by C. E. Zachariae in his work entitled Anecdota. (Lips. 1843, p. 191.) (Zachariae, Hist. Jur. Graeco-Rom. p. 50; Heimbach, Anecdota, i. p. xxxvii; Pohl, ad Suav. Notit. Basil. p. 137, n. (o); Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xii. p. 563.)

CO'CALIUS (Ko'kalus), a mythical king of Sicily, who kindly received Daedalus on his flight from Crete, and afterwards killed Menos, who came with an army in pursuit of him. According to others, Menos was killed by the daughters of Cocalus. (Diod. iv. 76, 60; Hygin. Fab., 44; Paul. Pint. xii. 4, § 5. C. E. Zachariae in his work entitled Anecdota.)

COCEI'NUS, SALVIUS, the son of the brother of the emperor Otho, was quite a youth at his uncle's death in A.D. 69. He was afterwards put to death by Domitian for celebrating his uncle's birthday. Plutarch calls him Coceius, but Cocceius seems the correct form. (Tac. Hist. ii. 49; Plin. Oth, 16; Suet. Oth, 10, Domit. 10.)

COCEI'US, the name of a family which is first mentioned towards the latter end of the re¬public, and to which the emperor Nerva belonged. All the members of this family bore the cognomen Nerva.

COCCUS (Kókou), an Athenian orator or rhetorician, was, according to Suidas (s. o.), a disciple of Isocrates, and wrote rhetorical discourses (Aγος παραγωγικος). A passage of Quintilian (xii. 10) has been thought to imply that Cocceus lived at an earlier period than Isocrates and even Lycurgus; but it seems that Quintilian is speaking of the comparative distinction of the orators he mentions, rather than of their time.

According to his description, Horatius defended

Maeculey observes (Lays of Ancient Rome, p. 43), with much probability, that it is likely that there were two old Roman lays about the defence of the bridge; and that, while the story which Livy transmitted to us was preferred by the multitude,
the other, which ascribed the whole glory to Homtius alone, may have been the favourite of the Horatian house. (Compare Niebuhr, i. p. 443.)

CODINUS, GEOE RGIUS, surnamed CURO-PALA T ES (Της θυσίας ου εστησαν), a Greek compiler, who held the office of europa-lates, lived during the latter period of the Byzantine empire, and died probably after the coquest of Constantinople in 1453. He has compiled two works, which, although written in most barbarous Greek, are of considerable importance, inasmuch as one of them treats of the various public offices in the church and in the administration of the empire, and another on the antiquities of Constantinople. The principal works from which Codinus has taken his accounts, and which he has copied in many instances to a considerable extent, are those of Hesychius Mileus, Glycas, Julius Pollux, the Chronicon Alexandrinum, &c.; his accounts of the statues and buildings of Constantinople are chiefly taken from Phuruntas, Ioannes Lydus of Philadelphia, and from the Antiquities of Constantinople, written by an anonymous author, who,
in his turn has plundered Theodorus Lector, Papi, Eusebius, Socrates, Marcellus Lector, and others.
The works of Codinus are—1. Περί των οφέκασιων του Πολιτικών Καυστανονύμων κατ των οφέκασιω των μεγάλης Εκκληνίας, "De Official-bus Palati Constantinopolitani et de Officiis MagnaE Ecclesiae."
Editions: 1. By Naclibus, Agnominus, 1588, 2. the same reprinted by Junius, who was also the editor of the first edition, but for some foolish motive adopted that pseudonym.
Both these editions are of little value; the editor,
a man of great vanity and equivocal learning, had carelessiy perused bad MSS., and though he was aware of all the errors and negligences he committed in the first edition, he did not take the trouble to correct them when the public curiosity required a second.
Junius confounded this work with another of the same author on the antiquities of Constantinople. 3. By Greterus, Ingolstadt, 1620; the editor perused good MSS.
with his usual care, and added a Latin translation and an excellent commentary; still this edition is not without several defects, since the editor did not understand the meaning of many barbarous words employed by Codinus, and of which the glossary of Meursius likewise gives either an imperfect account or none at all.
4. By Gour, Paris, 1648, fol., in the Paris collection of the Byzantines. Gour revised both the text and the translation, and added the commentary of Greterus, which he corrected in many passages, to which he added his own observations.
5. By Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1839, 8vo., in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines. This is a revised reprint of the Paris dition; the editor gives no preface.
This work of Codinus, although but a dry catalogue, is of great importance for the understanding of Byzantine history, since it explains the numerous civil and ecclesiastical titles and offices of the later Greeks, as the "Notitiae Dignitatum" does for the earlier period of the Eastern empire.
11. Παρεκκλησία ἐκ τῆς βίβλου τοῦ θριώνος περὶ τῶν πατρίων Καυστανονύμων, "Excerpta ex Libro Chronic of Originibus Constantinopolitanis." Editions: 1. By George Dousa, 1536, 8vo., the Greek text with a Latin translation, 2. The same, with notes by John Meursius, 1609, 8vo., 3. By Petrus Lambecius, Paris, 1655, fol., in the Paris collection, and afterwards reprinted in the Venice collection of the Byzantines.
Lambeck, a native of Hamburg, perused the best MSS. in France, revised the text, and added a new Latin translation and an extensive commenary; he dedicated his work to the celebrated Christians and persons of rank and wealth, died a saint, and martyr, who was born at Corinth in the third century after Christ. His parents, who were acquainted with that interesting subject, the antiquities of Constantinople, should begin with Petrus Gyllius, "Antiquitates Constantinopolitanae," of which a very good English translation was published by John Ball, London, 1729, 8vo., to which is added a "Description of the City of Constantinople as it stood in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius" (translated from "Notitii Urnsae Imperii") with the notes of Panzio. After this the student will peruse with profit Du Cange's celebrated work, "Constantinopolis Christiana," where he will find numerous observations referring to Codinus.

CODOMANNUS. (Darius III.)

CODON. Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 27) states, that portions of the Paratitla of Codon, copied from a Cretan manuscript, were in the library of Ant. Augustinus. Paratitla are additions made by commentators, explaining difficulties and filling up defects in the text of the laws. Codon is a fictitious name assumed by some commentator on the Code of Justinian, for such names were common among the Graeco-Roman jurists. Thus, Eutantophanes is the name given to the author (probably Photius) of a treatise Περί ἑυταντόφανου (apparent legal inconsistencies). So the Paratitla of Tipucitus are perhaps the work of an author who was acquainted with that interesting subject, the antiquities of Constantinople, should begin with Petrus Gyllius, "Antiquitates Constantinopolitanae," of which a very good English translation was published by John Ball, London, 1729, 8vo., to which is added a "Description of the City of Constantinople as it stood in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius" (translated from "Notitii Urnsae Imperii") with the notes of Panzio. After this the student will peruse with profit Du Cange's celebrated work, "Constantinopolis Christiana," where he will find numerous observations referring to Codinus.

CODRATUS. (Kódrados), an ancient physician, saint, and martyr, who was born at Corinth in the third century after Christ. His parents, who were Christians and persons of rank and wealth, died while he was quite young. When he was grown up, he applied himself to the study and practice of medicine, and also took every opportunity of endeavouring to convert his fellow-citizens to Christianity. He was put to death, together with several other Christians, about the year 258, at the command of Jason, the governor of Greece at that time; and there is an interesting account of his martyrdom in the Acta Sanctorum, Mart. vol. ii. p. 5. His memory is observed on the 10th of March both by the Roman and Greek Churches. (Acta Sact. l. c.; Monument. Graec. vol. iii. p. 11; Basil., Nomenclator Sanctorum: "De Medicina in oecumenica pro Sanctis labitis." [W. A. D.].

CODRUS (Κόδρος), the son of Melanthes, and king of Athens, where he resided, according to tradition, some time after the conquest of the Peloponnesus by the Dorians, about B.C. 1068. Once when the Dorians invaded Attica from Peloponnesus, they were told by an oracle, that they should be victorious if the life of the Attic king was spared. The Dorians accordingly took the greatest precautions not to kill the king. But when Codrus was informed of the oracle, he resolved to sacrifice himself, and thus to deliver his country. In the disguise of a common man, he entered the camp of the enemy. There he began quarrelling with the soldiers, and was slain in the struggle. When the Dorians discovered the death of the Attic king, they abstained from further hostilities, and returned home. Tradition adds, that as no one was thought worthy to succeed such a high-minded and patriotic king, the kingly dignity was abolished, and a responsible archon for life was appointed instead. In our accounts of this transaction there are points which justify the belief, that when, after the death of Codrus, quarrels arose among his sons about the succession, the eunaptris availed themselves of the opportunity for stripping the chief magistrate of as much of his power as they could, and that they succeeded in altogether abolishing the kingly dignity, for which that of a responsible archon was instituted. Men accordingly succeeded his father as archon, and his brothers emigrated to Asia Minor, where they founded several of the Ionian colonies. (Herod. v. 76; Lycog. a. Lec. 20; Veil. Pat. i. 2; Justin, ii. 6, &c.; Psal. iv. § 4, vii. 2; Strab. xiv. p. 633, &c.)

CODRUS, a Roman poet, a contemporary of Virgil, who ridicules him for his vanity. (Elog. vii. 22, x. 10.) According to Servius, Codrus had been mentioned also by Valgins in his elegies. Weichert (Post. Lat. Relig. p. 407) conjectures, that this Codrus is the same as the Jarbitas, the imitation of Timagenes, who is ridiculed by Horace (Epist. i. 19. 15); whereas Bergk believes, that Codrus in Virgil and Valgins is a fictitious name, and is meant for the poet Cornificius. (Classical Museum, vol. i. p. 278.) Juvenal (i. 1) also speaks of a wretched poet of the name of Codrus (the Scholiast calls him Cordus), who wrote a tragedy "Theseus." But it is generally believed, that in all the above cases Codrus is altogether a fictitious name, and that it is applied by the Roman poets to those poetasters who annoyed other people by reading their productions to them. [L. S.]

COELESTINUS. (Κόλεστινος), a Campanian by birth, the successor of Pope Bonifacius I., was ordained bishop of Rome on the 10th of September, &c. D.
COELSTIUS.

428, and retained this dignity until his death, in the month of July, 432. He was distinguished by the activity which he displayed in seconding the exertions of Cyril for procuring the deposition of Nestorius and the condemnation of his doctrines at the council of Ephesus in 431, and by the earnestness with which he strove to root out the Semi-

Pelagianism of Cassianus, which he strove to root out the Semi-

Pelagianism of Cassianus, the first bishop of Scotland, which probably means Ireland, was con-

Secrected by Coelestius.

Sixteen Epistles of Coelestius are extant, and being chiefly of an official character, are considered of importance by the students of church history. The whole series is given in the "Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum," published by Constant, Paris, fol. 1724 (vol. i. pp. 1051—1225), in the great work of Galland (vol. ix. p. 297), and in all the larger collections of councils. [W. R.]

COELESTIUS, the friend, associate, and par- son of Pelagius, whose followers were hence termed indifferently Pelagians or Coelestians, is believed from an expression used by Prosper to have been born in Campania, although others maintain that he was a native of Ireland or of Scotland. He commenced his career as an advocate (adversitas scholasticas), but in early life, in consequence of bodily deformity, became a monk, and in A.D. 409 accompanied Pelagius to Carthage. Here he soon excited the suspicions of the restless ecclesiastics of that province, and was impeached of heresy before the council held in 412. Having been found guilty and excommunicated, he prepared to appeal to Pope Innocent against the sentence; but, feeling probably that success was hopeless before such a judge, refrained from prosecuteing the matter further for the time being, and retired to Ephesus, where he was raised to the rank of presbyter, and passed five years in tranquillity. From thence, about the year 417, he passed over to Constantinople, but being speedily driven out of that city by Atticus, the enemy and supplanter of Chrysostom, he betook himself to Rome, and laying his whole case before Zosimus, the successor of Pelagius, Coelestius composed a treatise of Augustin, De Peccato Originali, out of which Garnier has essayed to extract the original document in its perfect form. Finally, Augustin, De gestis Palaeontis (13, 14), quotes from several chapters of a piece by Coelestius, without, however, giving it a name. After his banishment from Rome, he addressed Epistles to his adherents; and, in like manner, when driven from Constantinople, he wrote to Nestorius, whose reply is still extant.

Of the above compositions none exist in an entire shape; but, a considerable portion, if not the whole, of the Ratioicinatos and the Libellus Fidelis, as noticed above, may be extracted from the replies of Augustin.

For the best account of the high account of the life and the most complete collection of the fragments of Coelestius, we are indebted to the Jesuit Garnier, in the dissertations prefixed to his edition of the works of Marius Mercator, Paris, fol. 1673. [W. R.]

COELIOMONTANUS. [Cassianus.] COELESTIUS. [Carlius.]

COENUS (Κοίνος), a son of Polemocrates and son-in-law of Parmenion, was one of the ablest and most faithful generals of Alexander the Great in his eastern expedition. In the autumn of B.C. 334, when Alexander was in Caria, and sent those of his soldiers who had been recently married, to Macedonia, to spend the ensuing winter with their wives there, Coenus was one of the commanders who led them back to Europe. In the spring of the year following; Coenus returned with the Macedonians, and joined Alexander at Gordium. He commanded a portion of Alexander's army, and distinguished himself on various occasions. When Alexander had arrived at the river Hyphasis, and was anxious to push his conquests still further, Coenus was the first who had the boldness strongly to urge the necessity of returning, and and about 429 we find him expelled from Constantinople by a proclamation of Theodosius, granted in compliance with the solicitations of Marius Mercator. [MERCATOR.] Coelestius is mentioned in the Acts of the Council of Rome held in 430, but from that time his name disappears from ecclesiastical history, and the close of his life is unknown.

Coelestius was younger than Pelagius, and appears to have possessed a more bold, enterprising temper than his master, and to have displayed more zeal and energy in the propagation and defence of their peculiar tenets, while he at the same time, with great acuteness, verbal subtlety, and dialectic skill, sought to establish these principles by metaphysical and a priori reasoning, rather than by induction from the observed habits of mankind. [Augustin; Pelagius; Zosimus.]

While still a young man, before he had embraced the views of Pelagius, Coelestius composed in his monastery three Epistolae on moral subjects, addressed to his parents. These were followed by Confession, and transmission of sin, published, apparently, before the commentary of Pelagius on the Romans. Augustin, in his De Perfectione Justitiae, replies to a work which he believes to have proceeded from Coelestius, entitled, it would seem, Definitiones, or perhaps Ratiocinatos, containing sixteen propositions to prove that man may be without sin. The Libellus Fidelis, or Confession of Faith, presented to Zosimus, is known to us from the treatise of Augustin, De Peccato Originali, out of which Garnier has essayed to extract the original document in its perfect form. Finally, Augustin, De gestis Palaeontis (13, 14), quotes from several chapters of a piece by Coelestius, without, however, giving it a name. After his banishment from Rome, he addressed Epistles to his adherents; and, in like manner, when driven from Constantinople, he wrote to Nestorius, whose reply is still extant.

the king was obliged to follow his advice. But a short time afterwards, when the Macedonian army had actually commenced its return, Coenus died of an illness, and was honoured by the king with a splendid burial. Alexander lamented his death, but is reported to have said, that Coenus had urged the necessity of returning so strongly, as if he alone had been destined to see his native country again. (Arr. Anab. i. 6, 14, 24, 25, iv. 16-18, 27, v. 16, 17, 21, 27, vi. 2-4; Curtius, ii. 10, iii. 9, iv. 15, v. 4, vi. 3, viii. 1. 10, 12. 14, ix. 3; Diod. xvi. 75, 81.) [L. S.]

COELETTADAS (Kωρελλάτας), a Thessalian, commanded some Boeotian forces under Clearchus, the Spartan harrested at Byzantium, when that place was besieged by the Athenians in B.C. 408. When Clearchus crossed over to Asia to obtain money from Pharamnaxus, and to collect forces, he left the command of the garrison to Helixus, a Megarian, and Coeautadas, who were soon after compelled to surrender themselves as prisoners when parties within the town had opened the gates to Alcibiades. [CLEARCHUS.] They were sent to Athens, but during the disembarkation at the Promontory of Phalaeon, Coeautadas contrived to escape in the crowd, and made his way in safety to Decelea. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. §§ 15-22; Diod. xiii. 67; Plut. Alc. 31.) In B.C. 400, when the Cyrenian Greeks had arrived at Byzantium, Coeautadas, who was going about in search of employment as a general, prevailed on them to choose him as their commander, promising to lead them into Thrace on an expedition of much profit, and to supply them plentifully with provisions. It was however almost immediately discovered that he had no means of supporting them for even a single day, and he was obliged accordingly to relinquish his command. (Xen. Anab. vii. 1. §§ 33-41.) [B. E.]

COES (Κοῖς), of Mytilene, attended Dareius Hystaspis in his Scythian expedition (see Clinton, P. H. ii. p. 313) as commander of the Mytilenean forces, and persuaded the king from breaking up his bridge of boats over the Danube, and so cutting off his own retreat. For this good counsel he was rewarded by Dareius on his return with the tyranny of Mytilene. In B.C. 501, when the Ionian Greeks had been instigated to revolt by Aristagoras, Coes, several of the other tyrants, was seized by the Persians at Myus, where the Persian fleet that had been engaged at Naxos was lying. They were sent to Athens, and were plentifully with provisions. It was however almost immediately discovered that he had no means of supporting them for even a single day, and he was obliged accordingly to relinquish his command. (Xen. Anab. vii. 1. §§ 33-41.) [B. E.]

COLETAS (Kολέτας), a surname of Artemis, in the Attic demos of Myrrhinus, was derived from a mythical king, Colanus, who is believed to have reigned even before the time of Cecrops. (Paus. i. 31. § 3.) [L. S.]

COLAXAS or COLAXES (Κολάχας, Κολάχης), a petty prince of Spain, who ruled over twenty-eight cities, and furnished supplies of troops to Seipio against Mago and Hasdrubal in B.C. 206. (Pol. xi. 20; Liv. xxviii. 13.) In reward for his services, the Romans increased his dominions (Pol. xxi. 9); but in B.C. 197 he revolted, and drew away seventeen towns from their allegiance to Rome. The rebellion spread widely through Spain, but was eventually suppressed by M. Porcius Cato. Q. Minucius Thermus, and various other commanders, in B.C. 193. (Liv. xxxii. 21, 26, 44, xxviv. 3-21.) [E. B.]

COSIAΣ (Κοίσιας), a surname of Apariste, who had a statue on the Attic promontory of Cossa. (Paus. i. 1. § 4; comp. Herod. viii. 96; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 56.) Strabo (ix. p. 393) places a sanctuary of Apariste Cossia in the neighbourhood of Anaphylustus. [L. S.]

COLLATINUS, L. TARQUINIUS, the son of Egerius, who was the son of Aruns, the brother of Tarquinus Priscus. When the town of Collatia was taken by Tarquinus Priscus, Egerius was left in command of the place (Liv. i. 33), and there his son also resided, whence he received the surname of Collatinus. He was married to Lucretia, and it was the rape of the latter by his cousin, Sec. Tarquinius, that led to the destruction of Tarquinii Supercius, and the establishment of the republic, B.C. 509. Collatinus and L. Junius Brutus were the first consuls; but as the people could not endure the rule of any of the hated race of the Tarquins, Collatinus was persuaded by his colleague and the other nobles to resign his office and retire from Rome. He withdrew with all his property to Lavinium, and P. Valerius Poplicola was elected in his place. (Liv. i. 57—60, i. 2; Dionys. iv. 64, &c.; Dion Cass. Frag. 24, ed. Reimar; Cie. de Rep. ii. 23, de Off. iii. 10.)

COLLEGA, POMPEIUS, consul with Cornelius Priscus, A. D. 93, the year in which Agricultor died. (Tac. Agr. 44.)

COLLUTHUS (Κόλλουθος). 1. A heretic, who seems nearly to have agreed in his opinions with the Manichæans. He was a presbyter of Alexandria. He was deposed by the council of Alexandria (A.D. 324), and died before A.D. 540. His sect lasted no long time.

2. A heretic of the Monophysite sect, who lived at a later time. Some fragments of his writings are preserved in the acts of the great Laterian council, A.D. 649. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. 345, ed. Harle.)

COLOTES (Κολότης), of Lampsacus, a hearer of Epicurus, and one of the most famous of his disciples, wrote a work to prove, "That it was impossible even to live according to the doctrines of the other philosophers" (ὅτι κατὰ τὰ τῶν άλλων φιλοσοφῶν δέοματα οὔτε ἦν ἄστων.). It was dedicated to king Ptolemy, probably Philopator. In the fragments of his Platonic two works, a dialogue, to prove, "That it is impossible even to live pleasantly according to Epicurus," and a work entitled "Against Colotes." (Plut. Op. 1086—1127.) The two works stand in the editions of this order, which should be reversed. It may be collected from Plutarch, that Colotes was clever, but vain, dogmatical, and intolerant. He made violent attacks upon Socrates, and other great philosophers. He was a great favourite with Epicurus, whom, by a way of endearment, to call him Κολόταρας and Κολόταρας. It is also related by Plutarch, that Colotes, after hearing Epicurus discourse on the nature of things, fell on his knees before him, and besought him to give him instruction. He held, that it is unworthy of the truthfaleness of a philosopher to use fables in his teaching, a notion which Cicero opposes. De Repub. v. 7, ed. Oratti, ap. Macrob. Somn. Scip. i. 2.) Some fragments of another work of Colotes, against the Lysis of Plato, have been recently discovered at Heracleaenum. [P. S.]

COLOTES (Κολότης). 1. A sculptor from the island of Paros, who assisted Phidias in executing the colossal Zeus of Olympia, and left several useful works, principally in gold and ivory, in Elis, where he seems to have lived in banishment. He appears to belong to Ol. 84, &c. (b. c. 444), and is praised for his statues of philosophers. (Strab. viii. p. 537; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 19, xxxiv. 34; Pass. v. 20. § 1; Eustath. ad II. H. 653; Döckl., Corp. Inscr. n. 24.)

2. A painter, a contemporary of Timanthes, b. c. 307, mentioned by Quintilian (ii. 13). [L. U.]

COLUMELLA, L'JU'NIUS MODERATUS, is now to us as the most voluminous and important of all the Roman writers upon rural affairs. The only particulars which can be ascertained with regard to his personal history are derived exclusively from incidental notices scattered up and down in his writings. We thus learn, that he was a native of Cadiz (x. 185); and since he frequently quotes Virgil, names Cornelius Celsus (i. § 14, iii. 17. § 4, &c.), and Seneca (iii. 3. § 5), as his contemporaries, and is himself repeatedly referred to by the elder Pliny, it is certain that he must have flourished during the early part of the first century of the Christian era. At some period of his life, he visited Syria and Cilicia (ii. 10. § 18); Rome appears to have been his ordinary residence (Praef. 29); he possessed a property which he called Cerctum (iii. 3. § 3, comp. iii. 9. § 6), but whether situated in Etruria, in Spain, or in Sardinia, we cannot tell; and from an inscription found at Tarentum it has been conjectured that he died and was buried in that city. His great work is a systematic treatise upon agriculture in the most extended acceptance of the term, dedicated to an unknown Silvius, and divided into twelve books. The first contains general instructions for the choice of a farm, the position of the buildings, the distribution of the various duties among the master and his labourers, and the general system of the garden. A second book is devoted to the culture of grain, pulse, and artificial manures; the third and fourth are occupied with the cultivation of fruit trees, especially the vine and the olive; the sixth contains directions for choosing, breeding, and rearing oxen, horses, and mules, together with an essay on the veterinary art; the seventh discusses the same topics with reference to asses, sheep, goats, swine, and dogs; the eighth embraces a series of receipts for manufacturing different kinds of wine, and for pickling and preserving vegetables and fruits.

In addition to the above, we have one book "De Arboribus," which is of considerable value, since it contains extracts from ancient authorities now lost, and throws much light on the fifth book of the larger work, which appears under a very corrupt form in many of the MSS. Cassiodorus (Divin. Lect. 28) mentions sixteen books of Columella, from which some critics have imagined, that the tract "De Arboribus" was one of four written at an early period, presenting the outline or first sketch of the complete production. The MSS. from which Columella was first printed inserted the "De Arboribus" as the third book of the whole work, and hence in the older editions which is now the third book is marked as the fourth, and so on for all the rest in succession.

The Latinity of Columella is in no way inferior to that of his contemporaries, and belongs to the best period of the Silver Age. His style is easy and copious to exhaustion, while the fondness which he displays for multiplying and varying his mode of expression is out of taste when we consider the nature of his theme, and not compatible with the close precision which we have a right to expect in a work professedly didactic. Although we miss the racy quaintness of Cato and the varied knowledge and highly cultivated mind of Varro, we find here a far greater amount of information than they convey, and could we persuade ourselves that the whole was derived from personal observation and experience, we might feel satisfied that our knowledge of the rural economy of that epoch was tolerably complete. But the extreme carelessness with which the Calendar has been compiled from foreign sources may induce the suspicion, that other matters also may have been taken upon trust; for no man that had actually studied the appearance of the heavens with the eye of a practical farmer could ever have set down in an almanac intended for the use of Italian husbandmen observations copied from parapigmata calculated for the latitudes of Athens and Alexandria.

With the exception of Cassiodorus, Servius, and Isidore, scarcely any of the ancient grammarians notice Columella, whose works lay long concealed and unknown. The Ed. Princeps was printed at Venice by Nic. Jenson, 1472, fol., in a collection of "Rei Rusticae Scriptores" containing Cato, Terentius Varro, Columella, and Palladius Rutilius. The first edition in which the "Liber de Arboribus" was separated from the rest was that superintended by Jucundus of Verona and published by Aldus, Venice, 1514, 4to. The most valuable editions are those contained in the "Scriptores Rei Rusticae veteres Latini," edited by Gesner, 2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735, reprinted, with the collation of an important Paris MS., by Ernesti, Lips. 1773.; and in the Scriptores Rei Rusticae of J. G. Schmidt, 4 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1794. This last must be considered in every respect the most complete, and in the preface will be found a very full account of the different MSS., and of the gradual progress and improvement of the text.

The tenth book, under the title "J. Moderati Columellae Hortuli Commentarium," appeared in a separate form at Rome, about 1472, from the press of Adam Rot, and was frequently reprinted in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. COLUMELLA.
COMAZON.

Translations exist in English, Lond. 4to. 1745; in French by Coteren, Paris, 4to. 1751; in Italian by P. Laure, Venice, 8vo. 1552, 1567, and 1559; by Buon, de Bene, 2 tomo. 4to. Verona, 1808; and in German, among many others, by M. C. Curtius, 8vo., Hamburg, 1769. [W. R.]

COMAZON (KOLWOUA), one of the late Greek epic poets, was a native of Lycopolis in Upper Egypt, and flourished under the emperor Anastasius, at the beginning of the sixth century of our era. He wrote laudatory poems (δυσνομία α' φαίνου), an heroic poem, in six books, entitled ΚΑΛΩΒΟΙΚΕΣ, and another entitled ΠΕΡΙΖΕΙ. These are all lost, but his poem on "The Rape of Helen" (Ειδίς θεραπνηγ) was discovered, with Quintus Smyrnaeus, by the Cardinal Bessarion in Calabria. It was first printed by Aldus, 8vo. (no date); more accurately, with ingenious conjectural emendations, by H. Stephens in his Poetae Graeci Principes, Par. 1566, fol. Several Latin versions and reprints of the text appeared in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, the most important of which is the edition of Ie. Dan. Lennep, Leonvard. 1747, 8vo. The latest and best editions are those of Beckkcr, Berl. 1816, 8vo., and Schaefer, Lips. 1825, 8vo. The poem, as it now stands, consists of 392 hexameter lines, and both editions are those of Beckkcr, Berl. 1816, 8vo., and Schaefer, Lips. 1825, 8vo. The poem, as it now stands, consists of 392 hexameter lines, and is an unsuccessful imitation of Homer. [P.S.]

COMANUS (KOMAOS), one of the ministers of Ptolemy Philometor, whom he had been disgraced. Comazon not only escaped the massacre which followed the death of his patron (A. d. 292), but was immediately after appointed prefect of the city for the third time—an honour never before enjoyed by any individual. [GANNYS.]

COMETAS SCHOLA'STICUS (ΚΟΜΕΤΑΣ ΢ΧΟΛΑΣΤΙΚΟΣ, Cod. Val. pp. 130, 457), or CHAR-TULA'RIVS (Χαρτυλαριους, record-bearer, ib. p. 458), is the author of six epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Bruck, Anot. iii. pp. 15, 16; Jacobs, iii. pp. 236, 237), and of a paraphrase of part of the 11th chapter of John's Gospel, in fifty-seven hexameter verses. (Jacobs, Paralip. e Cod. Val. 213, xiii. p. 747.) From some of his epigrams (4, 5, 6) we learn, that he produced a new recension of the Homeric poems, in which he reformed the punctuation. His time is very doubtful. [P. S.]

VILOSON (Proleg. in Hom. p. Lk.) identifies him with the Cometas who was appointed by Bardas public professor of grammar at Constantinople in the reign of Michael III., A. D. 856. Jacobs, however, thinks that there are indications of his having lived later, in some marginal notes on his poems in the Vatican MS. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. xiii. p. 873.) These notes are by no means complimentary. Respecting the title of Chariluras, see Du Cange, Gloss. Mod. et Inf. Graec. s. v. 1735.

Clemens Alexandrinus mentions Cometas, a Cretan, among the commentators on Homer. (Stroma, i. p. 39.)

COMINIA GENS, plebeian. If Postumius or Postumius Cominiius Auruncus, consul in B. C. 501, belonged to this gens, it must have been patrician originally; but it is probable that he was a member of the Postumia gens, as Valerius Maximus (de Nom. Rat.) mentions him as an instance in which the phenomena and cognomens are confounded in the consular Fasti. Cominiius also occurs as a cognomen of the Pontii. (See below.) None of the members of the Cominia gens obtained any of the higher offices of the state. [COMINIIUS.]

1. Tribe of the plebs, but in what year is uncertain, accused M. Laetorius Meragus, a military tribune, for attempting to seduce his cornicularius. (Val. Max. vi. l. § 11.)

2. L. COMINUS, military tribune in the army of the dictator, L. Papirius Cursor, b. C. 825. (Liv. viii. 30.)

3. L. COMINUS, the commander of a troop of cavalry in the army of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus in Spain, B. C. 178. (Appian, Hisp. 43.)

4. Sex. COMINUS, a Roman knight, maltreated by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 10.)

5. G. P. and L. or C. COMINII, two brothers, who are described by Cicero as men of character and eloquence, accused Stalemus, about b. C. 74. (Cic. pro Cluent. 86.) In b. C. 66, these two brothers accused of majestas C. Cornelius, the tribune of the preceding year [C. Cornelius], but on the day appointed for the trial, the praetor, L. Cassius, did not appear, and the Comini were driven away by a mob, and were eventually obliged to quit the city. The reason of the impeachment in the following year, B. C. 65; Cornelius was defended by Cicero, who was then praetor, and acquitted. The speech which P. Cominius delivered on this occasion was extant in the time of Asconius, who says that it was worth reading, not only because of Cicero's speech, but for its own merits. P. Cominius was a native of Spletium. He died shortly before Cicero composed his "Brutus," namely B. C. 43, in which he calls Commodius his friend, and praises his well-arranged, lively, and clear style of speaking. (Ascon. in Cornel.; Cic. Brut. 76.)

7. Q. COMMUNS, one of Caesar's officers, was taken prisoner with L. Ticia by Virginius, a Pompeian commander, near Thapsus, in crossing over to Africa, B. C. 47. (Hist. B. Afr. 44, 46.)

8. L. COMMINS PEDARIUS, appointed by Augustus to assist Messalla Corvinus in his superintendence over the aqueducts. (Frontin. de Aquaeduct. 99.)

9. C. COMMINS, a Roman knight, was the author of a libellous poem against Tiberius, but was pardoned by the emperor on the entreaty of his brother, who was a senator, A. D. 24. (Tac. Ann. iv. 31.)

COMMIUSI, PONTIUS, a youth of great bravery and activity, who offered to go to the senate, when besieged in the Capitol by the Gauls, to convey the wish of the Roman army at Veii, that Camillus should be appointed dictator. He arrived at the Capitol in safety by floating down the Tiber in the bark of a tree. (Liv. v. 46; Plut. Camill. 25; Zonar. vii. 23.)

COMMUNIA'NUS, a Latin grammarian, who was intermediate between Donatus, whom he quotes, and Servius, by whom he is quoted (Verg. Ed. iii. 21, Georg. i. 215), and therefore belongs to the latter part of the fourth century. Large extracts from his work are to be found in Chariades, and a few fragments in Lindemann, Grammat. Inedit. Lat. i. Zittau. 1822, and in Mai, Classici Antories ex Codicibus Vaticanis, vol. v. p. 150. [W. R.]

CO'MMIUS, king of the Atrebates, was advanced to that dignity by Caesar. When Caesar's projected invasion of Britain became known to the inhabitants, ambassadors from various states came to him. Commius, in whose fidelity Caesar had great confidence, and whose influence in Britain was great, was sent back with them, accompanied by a small body of cavalry. He was seized and cast into chains by the Britons, but was released when, after a defeat, they found it expedient to sue for peace. (Caes. B. G. iv. 21, 27, 35.) In a. D. 53, we find him serving under Caesar against the Menipii (vi. 6); but towards the close of 52, when an extensive league was formed by the Gauls for the purpose of relieving Alesia, his patriotism proved stronger than his gratitude. He joined the confederates, and was one of those to whom the chief command was assigned. (vii. 78, 79, &c.) In the course of the ensuing winter, an unsuccessful attempt was made by T. Cassius to assassinate him. (viii. 23.) We find him again in 51 one of the two leaders of the confederacy formed by the Belgae and the neighboring tribes. (For an account of the operations which ensued, see B. G. vii. 23-28.) When the Atrebates were reduced to subjection, Commius continued to carry on a predatory warfare against the Romans, but, having lost a great part of his men in an engagement, he made his submission to Antonius (vii. 47, 48). [C. P. M.]

COMMODIA'NUS, the Christian composer of a prosaic poem against the Pagan divinities, divided into eighty sections, and entitled Instructiones ad gentes Deos pro Christiana Disciplina. Of these the first thirty-six are addressed to the Gentiles with the object of gaining them over to the true faith; in the nine which follow an attempt is made to bring home conviction to the obstinate ignorance of the Jews; the remainder are devoted to the instruction of catechumens and penitents. Whatever knowledge we possess with regard to this author is derived exclusively from his work. The general style and the peculiar words occasionally employed lead us to infer that he was of African extraction. It is expressly and repeatedly declared, that for a long period he was heathen, but was converted by perusing the Scriptures (e. g. Prov. 5, Instruc. xxvi. 54, lxi. 1); while the epithet Gazaeus, which he applies to himself, may either indicate that he was connected with the city of Gaza in Palestine, or, more probably, that he was indebted for support to the treasury of the church. Doubts have been entertained with regard to the period when he flourished. Rigaltius concluded, from a conjectural emendation of his own upon the text of an obscure passage (Instruc. xxviii. 5), that it contained an allusion to pope Sylvester (a. D. 314—335), the contemporary of Constantine the Great; but the careful and accurate researches of Cave and Dodwell have clearly proved that Commodianus belongs to the third century (comp. Instruc. vi. 6), and may with tolerable certainty be placed about a. D. 270.

The Instructions display much devotion and a fervent zeal for the propagation of the Gospel, but from their harshness, dryness, and total want of all poetical fire, they present few attractions as literary productions. The versification is curious, since it exhibits an early specimen of the Versus arcatus, and in like manner the general rhythm of some ancient measure, the rules of quantity are to a great extent neglected. Thus the following lines from the Preface are intended for dactylic hexameters:

Praefatio nostra viam eremi demonstrationest
Respectumque bonum, cum venerit sæcula metu
Aceterum fieri: quod discrendum inest corda.

The taste for acrostics also is largely developed: the initials of the twenty-six concluding verses, when read backwards, form the words Commodianus Mendoza Christi, and in like manner the general subject and contents of each chapter are expressed by the first letters of the opening lines.

The Instructions of Commodianus were first published by Rigaltius at Toul (Tullum Lencornum), 4to. 1650. They were subsequently printed at the end of the edition of Cyprian by Porius, Paris, 1695, fol.; in the Bibliotheca Patrum Lugdin. vol. xxvii.; in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. iii. p. 621; and in an independent form, by Schurzleisch, Vitenberg. Saxo. 4to. 1704. [W. R.]

COMMODUS, the name of a family of the Caesars under the emperors.

1. L. CERIOSUS COMMODUS, appears in the Fasti as consul under Vespasian, a. D. 78.

2. CERONIUS COMMODUS, who according to some was named also Verus, according to others L. Aurelius, according to many Annus, descended from a noble family of Etruria or Fennaria (Spurious. Ael. Ver. 2), was the father of

3. L. CERONIUS COMMODUS, otherwise called L. Aurelius Verus, who was adopted by Hadrian when that emperor, feeling that his health was sinking under the attacks of protracted disease, deemed it expedient to select an assistant and successor. The new prince from that time forward, as we infer from inscriptions and Fasti, laid aside his former appellations, and, passing into the gens Aelia, was styled L. AELIUS VERUS CAESAR, being the first individual on whom the title of Caesar was bestowed to indicate the next heir to the imperial throne. Of the early life of Aelius Caesar we know nothing except that he attracted the attention and gained the favour of Hadrian by his personal beauty and literary accomplishments, although the son-in-law of Nigrinus, who was put to death as a traitor. The precise date of his adoption is a disputed point among chronologers (see Tillemont and Eckehl), some, on the authority of Spartianus, declaring for a.d. 135; while others with greater probability conclude, from inscriptions and coins, that it took place the year following. He is set down in the Fasti as consul for a.d. 136, under the name of Caionius Commodus, which seems to prove that the ceremonies of adoption had not at all events been completed at the commencement of that year; while on the coins of his second consulship, which belongs to a.d. 137, we find him designated as L. AELIUS CAESAR; and invested with the tribunica potestas. Soon after his elevation to the dignity of Caesar, he was nominated governor of Pannonia, returned from his province in the course of 137, and died suddenly on the 1st of January, 138, and was interred in the mausoleum of Hadrian.

Aelius Caesar, according to the testimony of his biographer, Spartianus, was a man of comedy features, graceful bearing, and noble aspect, but in all other respects deeply stamped with the impress of mediocrity. He displayed moderate abilities as a statesman, governed his province respectably, was considered a tolerably good general, and although somewhat addicted to the pleasures of the table and other luxurious indulgences, maintained a decent character in his private life and social relations. His health was so wretched, that Hadrian is said to have speedily repented of the choice he had made, declaring that he had leaned for support upon a falling wall, and had thrown away the largesses and shows in honour of the adoption. Aelius Caesar left behind him one daughter, Fabia, and one son, namely

4. L. CHRONIUS COMMODOUS, who was born at Rome on the 15th of December, a.d. 130. Upon the adoption of his father by Hadrian, he passed into the gens Aelia, and was entitled L. CHRONIUS AEOLIUS AURELIUS COMMODOUS. Again, after the death of his father, he was, in pursuance of the command of Hadrian, adopted, along with M. Aurelius, by Antoninus Pius on the 25th of February, a.d. 161, and thus became L. CHRONIUS AEOLIUS AURELIUS COMMODOUS ANTONINUS. During the lifetime of Pius he enjoyed no peculiar distinction except the appellation Filius Augusti, in 166 he was quaestor, and in the year following consul, an honour which he enjoyed for a second time, along with his brother by adoption, in 161. After the death of Antoninus Pius, which took place in March, 161, he was invested with the titles of Caesar and Augustus, and by the favour of the new sovereign admitted to a full participation in all the imperial dignities. At the same time, M. Aurelius transferred to him the name of Verus, which he had himself borne up to this time, and the designation of Commodus being altogether dropped, the younger of the two Augusti was addressed as the emperor L. AELIUS VERUS. His journey to the East; his conduct during the campaign against the Parthians; his marriage with Lucilla, the daughter of M. Aurelius; his return to Rome; the joint triumph of the two princes; their expedition into Germany, and the sudden death of Verus at Alzium in the country of the Veneti, towards the close of a.d. 169, in the 39th or 40th year of his age and the 9th of his reign, are fully detailed in the biography of M. AELIUS, to which the reader is referred.

It may be remarked, that there is some question as to the various names enumerated above. In opposition to the clear and explicit testimony of Spartianus, Lampridius, and Capitolinus, it has been doubted whether he was ever called Antoninus, because it never appears upon any public monument of unquestionable authority. But if we suppose it to have been assumed, as appears most natural, at the period of his adoption by Pius, and dropped after his elevation to the purple, the difficulty will be in a great measure removed, although it must be confessed, that the Augustan historians represent him as having received the designations of Antonines and Verus at the same time from M. Aurelius.

COMMODOUS, L. AURELIUS, son of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina (see genealogical table prefixed to ANTONINES PIIUS), was born at Lanuvium on the last day of August, a.d. 161, a few months after the death of Antoninus Pius, and this was the first of the Roman emperors to whom the title of Propiiogrovinon was correctly applied. Faustina at the same time gave birth to a twin son, known as Antoninus Geminus, who died when four years old. The nurture and education of Commodus were watched and superintended from infancy with anxious care; and from a very early age he was surrounded with the most distinguished preceptors in the various departments of general literature, science, and philosophy. The honours heaped upon the royal youth as he advanced towards manhood have been accurately chronicled by his biographers. He received the appellation of Caesar along with his younger brother Annius Verus on the 12th of October, a.d. 166, at the time when M. Aurelius and Verus celebrated their triumph over the Parthians; he was styled GERMANUS on the 15th of October, 172; in 175, on the 20th of January, he was admitted a member of all the sacerdotal colleges; on the 19th of May he left the city, having been summoned in all haste to Germany in consequence of the news which had arrived from Syria of the rebellion of Avidius Cassius; on the 7th of July he was invested with the manly gown, proclaimed Princeps Iacetulius, and nominated consul-elect; he then accompanied his father to the East, and, during his absence from Rome, Soter- Raden was added to his other titles; on the 27th of November, 176, he was saluted Imperator; on the 23rd of December, he shared in the triumph celebrated over the Germans, and was assumed as

* Spartianus in several passages gives him the name of Verus and so Hadrian (ap. Vopisc. Saturn. c. 8); but Cardinal Noris rejects Verus, because it does not appear in inscriptions and Fasti.
Commodus, colleague in the tribunician power; on the 1st of January, 177, he entered on his first consulship; in the same year he married Bruttia Crispina, daughter of Bruttius Praesens, was hailed as Augustus and Pater Patriae, and thus at the age of 16 was admitted to a full participation in all the imperial dignities except the chief pontificate, which, according to the principle maintained inviolate until the reign of Balbinus and Pupienus [Balbinus], could be held by one individual only. On the 5th of August he set forth to take part in the war then raging on the Upper Danube, which, as is mentioned elsewhere [M. Aurelius], was prosecuted with signal success until the death of M. Aurelius, on the 17th of March, 180.

Impatient of hardship and eager to indulge without restraint in the pleasures of the capital, Commodus, disregarding alike the last injunctions of his sire and the earnest advice of the trusty counselors to whose care he had been consigned, concluded a hasty and therefore uncertain peace with the barbarians, who, in their depressed and enfeebled condition might by a vigorous effort have been crushed for ever. In autumn he reached Rome, where his authority was as fully and freely acknowledged by the senate, the procurators, and the people, as it had been by the legions which he commanded in person and the armies of the distant provinces. No prince ever commenced a career of power under fairer auspices. The love and veneration entertained by men of every condition for the father had descended like an inheritance on the son, and although some who knew him well and had marked his boyhood might whisper distrust of his native inclination, the general acclamations which greeted his first appearance as emperor. Nor were the hopes of men for a while disappointed. Grave and calculating statesmen might feel displeasure and alarm at the reckless profusion which characterized the very commencement of the new reign; but since a large portion of the sums squandered was lavished upon the soldiers and the people, the lower orders at least of the community were enthusiastic in their attachment to the new ruler. This state of things did not endure long. A formidable plot against his life was organized (A. D. 183) by his sister Lucilla, jealous, it was believed, of the superior influence and position of Crispina; but the scheme failed in consequence of the awkwardness of the assassin, who, instead of dealing the fatal blow at the proper moment, put the prince upon his guard by exclaiming as he rushed forward, "The senate sends thee this." The event seems to have awakened the slumbering ferocity of a monster, whose food was unbounded. He abandoned himself without intermission to the most shameless and beastly debauchery. But while devouring in gluttony the resources of the empire and wallowing in every description of sensual filth, he was at the same time the slave of the most childish vanity, and sought for popular applause with indefatigable activity. He disdained not to dance, to sing, to play the charioteer and the buffoon, to disguise himself as a pedlar or a horse-dealer, and to essay his skill in the practical pursuits of the humble artisan. Frequently he would appear and officiate as a sacrificing priest, and eagerly assisted in all the orgies of foreign superstition, celebrating the rites of Ias, of Amunis, of Serapis, or of Mithra, in all their folly and all their horror. His pride and boast, however, was his skill in the use of martial weapons. This he sought not to display against the enemies of his country in the field, but he fought as a gladiator upwards of seven hundred times, and slew many thousands of wild beasts in the amphitheatre with bow and spear. Other emperors had sought or accepted the compliment of having one month named after themselves, but Commodus decreed that the whole twelve should be designated by the epithets and titles which he had at different periods assumed, and that they should be arranged and enumerated in the following order:—Amazonius, Invictus, Felix, Pius, Lucius, Actius, Aurelius, Commodus, Augustus, Hercules, Romanus, Exsessoratorius, ordaining also that the happy epoch during which he had sojourned on earth should be distinguished as Secundus aeraeum Commodianum, the nation as Commodiana, the senate as Commodianus, the armies as Commodiani, and the eternal city itself as Colonia Commodiana. At length the miserable craving could be no longer appeased; he hurled, he boasted which a mere mortal might claim. Long ere this, indeed, the Greeks had been wont to compare their rulers, both domestic and foreign, to deities, and the Romans had sometimes delicately hinted at some such resemblance by the devices stamped on the reverse of the coins of their Augusti. But as yet no inscription had appeared openly ascribing divine attributes to living princes, nor had any symbol appeared on their medals which could openly and directly convey such impious meaning. It was left for Commodus to break through these decent restrictions; his exploits in the slaughter of wild beasts suggested an analogy with the Tyrithean hero: he demanded that he should be worshipped as Hercules, and hence from the year 191 we find a multitude of coins on which he is represented in the attire of the immortal son of Alcmena, with the epigraph of Hercules Commodius or Hercules Romanus. His statues too, as we are told by the historians of the day, were clad in the appropriate robes; sacrifices were publicly offered as to a present God; when he went abroad the lion's hide and other insignia were borne before him; and, to crown the whole, a number of unhappy wretches were inclosed in cases terminating in serpent-tails, and these he slaughtered with his club, as if they had been the giants warring against heaven. After having escaped many plots provoked by atrocious tyranny, he at length came to a fitting conclusion as the thirst for blood. Resigning the reins of government into the hands of the various favourites who followed each other in rapid succession [see Pertinax; Cleander; Laetus; Eclitus], he abandoned himself without interruption to the most shameless and beastly debauchery. Commodus, on the 17th of March, 180.
end. He had a mistress named Marcia, to whom he was deeply attached, and who, especially low in her estimation, he made his wife. Hence the epithet ‘Amazonus’ was frequently assumed by himself: the name Amazonus, as we have already seen, was attached to the first month, and he displayed his own person in the amphitheatre arrayed in the Amazonian garb. The first of January, 193, was to have been signalized by a spectacle which would have thrown into the shade the insults previously heaped upon the senate and the people, for Commodus had determined to put to death the two consuls-elect, Q. Sosius Falco and C. Julius Eutocius Clauditus, and to come forth himself as consul at the opening of the year, not marching in robes of state from the palace to the capitol at the head of the senate, but in the uniform of a secutor, followed by a band of gladiators issuing from their training-school. This project he communicated to Marcia, who earnestly implored him to abandon a design so fraught with disgrace and danger, and her remonstrances were warmly seconded by Laetus and Eucttius, the one prefect of the praetorians, the other imperial chamberlain. These counsellors were dismissed with wrath from the presence of the prince, who retired to indulge in his wonted siesta, having previously inscribed on his tablets a long catalogue of persons who were to be put to death that night, the names of Marcia, Laetus, and Eucttius appearing at the head of the list. This document was found by a favourite child, who entered the apartment while Commodus was asleep, and was carried by him in sport to Marcia, who at once perceived its import. She immediately communicated the discovery to Lactus and Eucttius. The danger was imminent, and, unless promptly met, inevitable. Their plans were quickly matured and quickly executed. That evening poison was administered, and its operation proving so slow as to excite apprehensions of its inefficacy, Narcissus, a celebrated athlete, was introduced, and by him Commodus was strangled on the second morning before day. The war was successfully terminated about the same time that Eugene met with heavy losses in his PACs. His actions were attributed rather to the artful advice of evil counsellors acting upon a timid and yielding disposition, than to any inherent depravity; and imagines that he erred at first from ignorance of what was right, and gliding by degrees into a habit of doing evil, became gradually familiar with deeds of shame and wickedness. But had this been the case, the lessons so carefully inculcated in early life would never have been so rapidly and for ever obliterated. We feel more inclined to give credit to the assertion of Lampridius, who declares that from his earliest boyhood he displayed evident proofs of dark passions and a corrupt heart, a propensity to indulge freely in every low and dissolute pleasure, and utter indifference to human suffering and life.

It is almost needless to remark, that Commodus paid no attention to foreign policy nor to the government and regulation of the provinces, except in so far as they might be made to minister to his profusion and profligacy. The integrity of the empire was however maintained, and the barbarians repulsed from the Dacian frontier by the skill and valour of Claudius Albinus and Pescennius Niger, the same who after the death of Pertinax contested the throne with Septimus Severus. A still more serious disturbance arose in Britain; for the northern tribes, having forced a passage across the wall of Antonine, defeated the Roman troops who opposed their progress, slew their leader, and laid waste the more peaceful districts far and wide. But Ulpius Marcellus having assumed the chief command, the Caledonians were speedily driven back, the war was successfully terminated about A.D. 184, Commodus was saluted Imperator for the seventh time, and added Britannicus to his other titles.
COMNENUS.

COMNENAE. [anna Comnena.]

COMNENUS, the name of an illustrious Byzantine family, which in all probability was of Italian origin, and migrated to the East in the time of Constantine the Great or his immediate successors. Several of the other great Byzantine families were likewise of Italian origin, as for instance the Ducas. That the name Comnenus was not unknown in Italy in early times, is proved by an inscription on a marble discovered in the walls of the church of St. Secundus, at America in Italy, and which stands thus:—

\[ \text{COMNENO, Q. L. FELICI.} \]

\[ \text{ET. COMNENO, Q. L. FELIONI.} \]

\[ \text{C. SERVILIO. ALBANO.} \]

Six emperors of the East.—Isaac I., Alexis I., Calo-Joannes (John II.), Manuel I., Alexis II., and Andronicus I., all the emperors of Trebizond, and a vast number of generals, statesmen, and authors, were descended from the family of the Comneni; but while almost all of them were distinguished by the choicest natural gifts both of mind and of body, many of them were notorious for a laxity of morals, in which they were excelled by none of their frivolous countrymen. Imperial families, such as the Ducas, the Angeli, the Pataeologi, several royal houses in Europe, and even the reigning dynasty of the sultans in Turkey, boasted, and still boast, of being descended from the Comneni; and down to this very day the pretensions of a noble family in France to be entitled by descent to the name of Princes de Commenue have attracted the attention of historians of repute. A history of that family would be a most valuable contribution to our knowledge of the Greeks during the middle ages. When the Comneni first became known in history, in the tenth century, they belonged to the Greek nobility in Asia, and their family seat was at Castamone, a town in Phaphugonia, near the Black Sea, where Alexis Comnenus, afterwards emperor, visited the palace of his ancestors during the reign of Michael VII. Ducas Parapineces. Towards the close of the tenth century two Comneni, Manuel and Nicephorus, became conspicuous, who were probably brothers, and who are generally called the ancestors of the Commenian family. The following table exhibits the genealogy of this family, as far as it can be traced, together with a brief account of each individual of it.

| 1. Joannes; returned from Iconium, whither he had fled with his father; but, for some insult shown to him, abandoned the Greeks for ever, adopted the Mohammedan religion, settled at Iconium, and married Camaro (?), daughter of Sultan Manzith (Mesud I); called by the Turks-Seljuks Zelubis (Chelebi), that is, “the Nobleman.” This Joannes, as was said by Mohammad II., sultan of the Turks-Osmanlis, the conqueror of Constantinople, and repeated by most of the Turkish historians, was the ancestor of the sultans of Turkey, leaving issue, viz. Solimm Shah.

2. Eudoxia, married time or Zetesim, a Turkish emir, and after his death John V. Palaeologus, Emperor of Constantine.

3. Anna, married Bagrat VI., king of Georgia.

4. A daughter, married Taharan or Zhratan, emir of Arinaga.

(XIX.) Alexis IV., Emperor; succeeded his father in 1412; murdered between 1445 and 1449; married a Cantacuzenian princess.

2. Alexander, married a daughter of Gatteluzi, prince of Lesbos.

3. (XXII.) David, the last emperor of Trebizond; seized the crown from his nephew Alexis V. in 1458; married 1. Maria Thedora, of the house of the Theodori, prince of Gothia in the Crimea; 2. Helena (Irene), daughter of Matthias, and granddaughter of John VI. Cantacuzenus, emperor of Constantinople; deposed by Sultan Mohammed II. in 1462; exiled with his family to Serres, near Adrianople; put to death with nearly all his children by order of the Sultan, probably in 1466.

1—7. Seven sons, put to death with their father the Mohammedan religion; his life was spared; also married at Adrianople.

A branch of the Comnenian family became extinct at Rome in 1551; another branch flourished in Savoy, and became extinct in 1784. Demetrius Comnenus, a captain in the French army, whose descendants are still alive, are pretended to be descended from Niphoras, one of the sons of the last emperor of Trebizond, David, whose life, according to him was spared by Mohammed, and his parentage and name were recognized by letters-patent of Louis XVI., king of France. But his claims will hardly stand a critical examination, notwithstanding many so-called authentic documents which he published in a rather curious work, "Précis historique de la Maison Impériale des Comnens, avec Filiation directe et reconnue des Comnens, avec Filiation directe et reconnue par Lettres-Patentes du Roi du mois d'Avril, 1782, depuis David, dernier emperaire de Trebizonde, jusqu'à Demetrius Comnens," Amsterdam, 1784.

COMUS (Kápos), occurs in the later times of antiquity as the god of festive mirth and joy. He was represented as a winged youth, and Philostratus (Toum. l. 2) describes him as he appeared in a painting, drunk and lauguid after a repast, his head sunk on his breast; he was slumbering in a standing attitude, and his legs were crossed.

CONCOLITANUS (Kóyóślátovos), a king of the Gallic people called Gaesati, and colleague of Aneroestus, together with whom he made war against the Romans, B.C. 225. [ANEROESTUS.] In the battle in which they were defeated, Concolitanus was taken prisoner. (Polyb. ii. 31.) [E. E.]

CONCORDIA, a Roman divinity, the personification of concord. She had several temples at Rome, and one was built as early as the time of Furius Camillus, who vowed and built it in commemoration of the reconciliation between the patricians and plebeians. (Plut. Cam. 42; Ox. Fest. i. 639.) This temple, in which frequent meetings of the senate were held, but which appears to have fallen into decay, was restored by Livius, the wife of Augustus, and was consecrated by her son, Tibersius, A.D. 9, after his victory over the Pannonians. (Suet. Tib. 20; Dion Cass. iv. 17.) In the reign of Constantine and Maxentius, the temple was burnt down, but was again restored. A second temple of Concordia was built by Cn. Flavius on the area of the temple of Vultan (Liv. i. iv. 46, xii. 10; Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 6), and a third was vowed by L. Manlius during a sedition commotion among his troops in Gaul, and was afterwards erected on the Capitoline hill. (Liv. xxii. 33.) Concordia is represented on several coins as a matron, sometimes standing and sometimes sitting, and holding in her hand a cornucopia, and in her right either an olive branch or a patera. (Comp. Or. Fast. vi. 91; Varr. L. L. v. 73, ed. Müller; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 23; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderr. ii. p. 168.) [E. E.]

CONCOLEREIUS (Kóyóślóléros), the Greek name of Sardanapalos. (Polyb. Polyg. iv. 67. Other forms of the name are Kónosarjókólos (see Suid. s. v.) and Θωσκοκάλαλος. [E. E.]

COMUS (Kápos), occurs in the later times of antiquity as the god of festive mirth and joy. He was represented as a winged youth, and Philostratus (Toum. l. 2) describes him as he appeared in a painting, drunk and lauguid after a repast, his head sunk on his breast; he was slumbering in a standing attitude, and his legs were crossed. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderr. ii. p. 224.) [L. S.]
CONIA'NUS, SEX. QUINTILIUS, and SEX. QUINTILIUS MAXIMUS, two brothers remarkable for their mutual affection, high character, learning, military skill, and wealth, who flourished under the Antonines. They were consuls together in A.D. 151; were subsequently joint governors, first of Achaia, and afterwards of Pannonia; they addressed a joint epistle to M. Aurelius, to which he gave a rescript (Dig. 38. tit. 2. a. 16, § 4); they wrote jointly a work upon agriculture frequently quoted in the Geoponica; and, having been inseparable in life, were not divided in death, for they both fell victims at the same time to the cruelty of Commodus, guiltless of any crime, but open to the suspicion that, from their high fame and probity, they must have felt disgusted with the existing state of affairs and eager for a change.

Sex. CONIA'NUS, son of Maximus, is said to have been in Syria at the period of his father's death, and, in anticipation of his own speedy destruction, to have devised an ingenious trick for escape. The story, as told by Dion Cassius, is amusing and romantic, but bears the aspect of a fable. (Lamprid. "Commodus," 4, and Caesarian's note; Dion Cass. Lxxvi. 5, and Reimarus's note; Philostrat. "Vit. Sophist." ii. 1. § 11; Needham, "Protogen," ad Geoponica. Cantab. 1704.) [W. R.]

Athen. x. p. 441; Strab. xiii. p. 568; Hesych. s. v.) (L.S.)

CON'NIUS (Ko'nov), the god who excites or makes lust, a surname of Zeus, who had an uncovered temple under this name in the apex of Magnm. (Paus. i. 40, § 5.)

CONNUS (Ko'nov), the son of Metrodorus, a player on the cithara, who taught Socrates music. (Plut. "Ethylp.," pp. 372, c. 295, d, "Menex." p. 235, e; Cic. ad Fam. i. 22.) This Connus is probably the same as the flute-player Connas, mentioned by Aristophanes ("Equit." 532), who was, as we learn from the Scholast, very poor, although he had gained several victories in the Olympic games. Whether the proverb mentioned by Suidas, Kónovov "good for nothing," refers to the same person, is doubtful.

CONON (Ko'nov). I. A distinguished Athenian general, who lived in the latter part of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth century B.C. In 418, he was stationed in command of a fleet off Naupactus, to prevent the Corinthians from sending succours to the Syracuseans. In an engagement which ensued neither side gained a decisive victory. (Thuc. vii. 31.) In 410, according to Diodorus (xiv. 48), he was strategus, and was sent to Corecyra to protect the Athenians in that quarter, when Corecyra became the scene of another massacre. In 409, he was elected strategus with Athibiediae and Thrasybulus (Xen. "Hell." i. 4, § 10), and again in 406 was made the first of the ten generals chosen to supersede Athibiediae. (Xen. "Hell." i. 5, § 16; Diod. xiii. 74.) For an account of the operations which forced him to take refuge in Mytilene, of his blockade by Callimachus, and the victory of the Athenians at Arginusae by which he was delivered, see Xen. "Hell." i. 6; Diod. xiii. 77-79, 37, &c. When all his colleagues were deposed, Conon retained his command. (Xen. "Hell." vii. 1.)

When the Athenian fleet was surprised by Ly-and temples, and the remainder to his son Timothoeus. (Lys. de Arist. Bon. p. 638, ed. Reiske; Corn. Nep. i. 6.) His tomb and that of his son, in the Cememcicus, were to be seen in the time of Pausanias. (i. 29. § 15.)

3. On the death of Timotheus nine-tenths of the fines which had been imposed on him were remitted, and Conon was allowed to discharge the remainder in the form of a donation for the repair of the long walls. (Corn. Nep. Tita. 4.) He was sent by the Athenians, together with Phocion and Clearchus, to remonstrate with Nicanor on his seizure of Peiraeus, b. c. 318. (Diod. xvi. 64.)

CONON, literary. 1. A grammarian of the age of Augustus, the author of a work entitled Ἀργυρίας, addressed to Archelains Philopator, king of Cappadocia. It was a collection of fifty narratives relating to the mythical and heroic period, and especially the foundation of colonies. An evidence of the work has been preserved in the epistle of Photius (Cod. 186), who speaks in terms of commendation of his Attic style, and remarks (Cod. 189), that Nicolaus Damascenus borrowed much from him. There are separate editions of this abstract in Gale's Histor. Poet. Script. p. 241, &c., Paris, 1675; by Trench, Lips. 1794 and 1802; and Kunne, Götting. 1798.

Dion Chrysostom (Or. xviii. tom. i. p. 480) mentions a rhetorician of this name, who may possibly be identical with the last.

2. A Conon is mentioned by the scholar on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1162), who quotes a passage, ἄν ὅπως ἔγνως, and mentions a treatise by him, Ἡρακλεία, Josephus (c. Apion. i. 29) also speaks of a writer of this name.

3. Another Conon, whether identical with any of those above-mentioned or not is uncertain, is mentioned by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. vii. 738) as having written a work on Italy. (Fabric. Bibli. Graec. iv. p. 25; Voss. de Hist. Gr. pp. 206, 420, ed. Westermann.)

4. There was a Christian writer of this name, who wrote on the resurrection against Johannes Philoponus. (Phot. Cod. 23, 24.)

CONON (Konon), of Samos, a mathematician and astronomer, lived in the time of the Ptolemies Philadephus and Euergetes (b. c. 282—222), and was the friend and probably the teacher of Archimedes, who survived him. None of his works are preserved. His observations are referred to Ptolemy in his ἐπίστευμα δολίνων, and in the historical notice appended to that work they are said to have been made in Italy (Petrav. Uranolog. p. 93), in which country he seems to have been celebrated. (See Virgil's mention of him, Ec. iii. 40.) According to Seneca (Nat. Quaest. vii. 3), he made a collection of the observations of solar eclipses preserved by the Egyptians. Apollonius Pergaeus (Conic. Lib. iv. praef.) mentions his attempt to demonstrate some propositions concerning the number of points in which two conic sections can cut one another. Conon was the inventor of the curve called the spiral of Archimedes (Archimedes); but he seems to have contented himself with proposing the investigation of its properties as a problem to other geometers. (Pappus, Collect. Math. iv. Prop. 18.) He is said to have given the name Coma Berenices to the constellation so called (Berenice, 3), on the authority of an ede of Callimachus translated by Catullus (ixvii. de Coma Berenices); a fragment of the original is preserved by Theon in his Scholia on Aratus. (Phainomenon. 146; see Hyginus, Poet. Astron. ii. 24.) But it is doubtful whether the constellations were really adopted by the Alexandrian astronomers. The strongest evidence which remains to us of Conon's mathematical genius consists in the admiration with which he is mentioned by Archimedes. See his preface to the treatises on the Quadrature of the Parabolæ and on Spirals. [W. F. D.]

CONOSTAULUS BESTES. [Bestes.]

CONONEUS (Konoveros), a Tarentine, is mentioned by Appian (Annib. 82) as the person who betrayed Tarentum to the Romans in b. c. 213. (Comp. Frontin. Strateg. iii. 3. § 6, where Ouden-dorp has restored this name from him.) Polybius (viii. 19, &c.) and Livy (xxv. 8, &c.) say, that Philomenus and Nicom were the leaders of the conspiracy; but Schweighäuser remarks (ad App. &c.), that as Percon was the cognomen of Nicom (see Liv. xxvi. 39), so there is no reason why we should not infer that Cononius was the cognomen of Philomenus. [Philomenus.]

P. CONSA. A Roman jurist of this name is mentioned by legal biographers and by writers who have made lists of jurists, as Val. Porstusus, Rutillus, Gul. Grotius, and Fabricius, but they give no authority for their statement. The only authority that we can find for this name is an anecdote in Plutarch's life of Cicero (c. 26), repeated in his Apophhegymata. When P. Consa, an ignorant and empty man, who held himself forth as a jurist, was summoned as a witness in a cause, and declared that he knew nothing whatever about the matter that he was examined upon, Cicero said to him, dryly, "Perhaps you think that the question relates to law."

The reading of the name in Plutarch is exceedingly doubtful,—Publius may be Popilius, and Consa may be Caius, Cassius, or Cotta. [J. T. G.]

CONSENTIUS, the author of a grammatical treatise "Ars P. Consentii V. C. de duabus partibus," and on a collection of Psalms (Grumelius, Dissert. Locorum Antiqu. 4to. Hannov. 1695), who had access to MSS. which enabled him to supply numerous and large deficiencies. Another work by the same writer, entitled "Ars de Barbarismis et Metaphrasis," was recently discovered by Cramer in a Regensburg MS. now at Munich, and was published at Berlin, in 1817, by Buttmann. It is of considerable value on account of the fragments quoted from lost productions, and of the view which it affords of the state of the language and of grammatical studies at the period when it was composed. In the "de Barbarismis" we find a reference to a third essay on the structure of periods, "de Structurarum Ratione," which, if ever published, is no longer extant.

Consentius is commonly believed to have flourished at Constantinople in the middle of the fifth century, on the supposition that he was one or other of the following individuals.

1. Consentius, a poet violently reprimanded by Sidonius Apollinaris. (Carm. xxiii., Epist. viii. 4.) He married a daughter of the consul Jovianus, by whom he had a son, namely

2. Consentius, who rose to high honour under Valentinian III., by whom he was named Comes Palatii and despatched upon an important mission to Theodosius. He also had a son, namely

3. Consentius, who devoted himself to literary leisure and the enjoyments of a rural life, and is celebrated as well as his grandfather by Sidonius. Fabricius (Bibl. Lat. vol. iii. p. 743) tells us, that in some MSS. the grammarian is styled not only vir clarissimus, but the ordinary appellation of learned men at that period, but also quidem consul forte quinguae civitatem, which might perhaps lead us to identify him with the second of the above personages.

CONSEVYUS or CONSVYVIS, the propagator, occurs as the surname of Jannus and Opis. (Macrob. Sat. i. 9, iii. 9; Fest. a. v. Opima.) [L. S.]

CONS/DIA GENIS, plebeian. None of its members ever obtained any higher office in the state than the praetorship, and are, with one exception, mentioned only in the last century of the republic. The cognomina of this gens are Gallus, Longus, Nonius, and Paetus, the last two of which also occur on coins; but as there is some confusion between some of the members of the gens, an account of all of them is given under Consintius, and not under the cognomina.

1. Q. Consintius, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 476, conducted, in conjunction with his colleague T. Junius, the business of a citizen, who had possession of Adrumetum two years afterwards, B. C. 47, when Cato came into Africa; and when a letter was sent him by the hands of a captive, Consentius caused the unfortunate bearer to be put to death, because he said he had brought it from the imperator Caesar, declaring at the same time himself, that Scipio was the only imperator of the Roman people at that time. Shortly afterwards Consentius made an unsuccessful attempt upon Aella, a free town in Caesar's interest; and was obliged to retire to Aedumetum. We next hear of Consentius in possession of the strongholds of Tindias; but after the defeat of Scipio at Thapsus, and when he heard that Cn. Domitius Calvinus was advancing against the town, he secretly withdrew from it, accompanied by a few Galicians and laden with money, intending to fly into Mauretania. But he was murdered on the journey by the Galicians, who coveted his treasures. (Hirt. B. A. 3, 4, 53, 43, 76, 80, 93.)
10. C. Constantius, son of No. 9, fell into Caesar's power, when he obtained possession of Armavistum after the battle of Thapsus, B. C. 47, and was pardoned by Caesar. (Hist. B. Afr, 89.) It is supposed that he may be the same as the C. Constantius Paetus, whose name occurs on coins; but this is mere conjecture. (Eckhel, v. p. 177.)

CONSTANS I., FLAVIUS JULIUS, the youngest of the three sons of Constantine the Great, and Fausta, was at an early age appointed by his father governor of Western Illyricum, Italy, and Africa, countries which he subsequently received as his portion upon the division of the empire in A. D. 337. After having successfully resisted the treachery and violence of his brother Constantine, who was slain in invading his territory, A. D. 340, Constans became master of the whole West, and being naturally indolent, weak, and profligate, abandoned himself for some years without restraint to the indulgence of the most depraved passions. While hunting in Gaul, he suddenly received intelligence that Magnentius [Magnetius] had rebelled, that the soldiers had mutinied, and that emissaries had been despatched to put him to death. Flying with all speed, he succeeded in reaching the Pyrenees, but was overtaken near the town of Helena (formerly Illibera) by the cavalry of the usurper, and was slain, A. D. 350, in the thirtieth year of his age and the thirteenth of his reign. (Anrel. Vict. de Caesar. xii. Eupl. xii.; Eutrop. x. 5; Zosimus, ii. 42; Zonaras, xiii. 6.) [W. R.]
As early as A.D. 614, Rothari, king of the Longobards, attacked the imperial dominions in northern Italy, and conquered the greater part of them. One of his successors, Grimoald, had formed designs against the Greek possessions in southern Italy, where the emperor was still master of the duchies of Rome and Naples, with both the Calabrians, Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica belonged likewise to the Greek empire. The emperor’s authority in Italy was much shaken by the religious and civil troubles which he had caused there by his absurd edict, the “Typus;” but, on the other hand, the disensions among the dukes and other great chiefs of the Longobards seemed to afford a favourable chance for the re-establishment of the Roman empire of Italy by the Greeks, an enterprise which one hundred years before the emperor Justinian had so gloriously achieved by his general Narses. Under these circumstances, Constans resolved not only to imitate the example of Justinian, but to make Rome once more the centre of the Roman empire. His resolution caused the greatest surprise, for since the downfall of the Western empire no emperor had resided, not even made a momentary stay, in Italy. “But,” said Constans, “the mother (Rome) is worthier of my care than the daughter (Constantinople);” and, having fitted out a fleet, he fixed the day of his departure, and ordered the empress and his three sons to accompany him: after waiting for them on board of his galley, but no sooner had they left the imperial palace, than the people of Constantinople rose in revolt and prevented them by force from joining the emperor. Being informed of this, Constans spit against the city, cursed its inhabitants, and ordered the sailors to weigh anchor. This took place towards the end of 662. Constans stayed the winter at Athens, having previously appointed his eldest son, Constantine, governor of Constantinople. Our space prevents us from giving an account of his campaign in Italy; it is sufficient to state, that though he met at first with some success, his troops were afterwards defeated by the Longobards, and he was obliged to relinquish his design of subduing them. After plundering the provinces and other public buildings of Rome of their finest ornaments and treasures, he took up his residence at Syracuse for a time. In this city also he gratified his love of avarice and cruelty to such an extent, that many thousands fied from the island and settled in different parts of Syria, especially at Damascus, where they adopted the religion of Mohammed. The emperor’s absence from the seat of government excited Māʾūniyāḥ to make fresh inroads into the Greek provinces.

It has been already related that Constans was deeply offended on account of the treaty having been concluded without his consent between his officers in Africa and the Arabian general Abū-l-farar. In 665, Māʾūniyāḥ being then chiefly occupied in the eastern part of the Khalifate, Constans resolved to revenge himself upon his subjects in Africa, and accordingly imposed a tribute upon them which was more than double what they had engaged to pay to the Arabs. This avaricious and imprudent measure caused a revolt. They invited the Arabs to take possession of their country, promising to make no resistance. Upon this Māʾūniyāḥ entered Africa, defeated the few troops who were faithful to Constans, and extended his

CONSTANTIA. 1. Flavia Valeria Constantia, also called Constantina, the daughter of Constantius Chlorus Caesar and his second wife, Theodora, was born after A. D. 322 and before A. D. 306, either in Gaul or Britain. She was a half-sister of Constantine the Great, who gave her in marriage in 313 to C. Valerius Licinius Licinius Augustus, master of the East. In the civil war which broke out between Constantine and Licinius in 323, the latter was entirely defeated at Chrysopolis, now Scutari, opposite Constantinople, and fled to Nicomedia, where he was besieged by the victor. In order to save the life of her husband, who was able neither to defend the town nor to escape, Constantia went into the camp of her brother, and by her earnest entreaties obtained pardon for Licinius. Afraid, however, of new troubles, Constantine afterwards gave orders to put him to death; but this severity did not alter his friendship for his sister, whom he always treated with kindness and respect. Constantia was first an orthodox Christian, having been baptized by Pope Sylvester at Rome; but she afterwards adopted the Arian creed. It appears that she was governed by an Arian priest, whose name is unknown, but who was certainly a man of great influence, for it was through him that she obtained the pardon of Arius, who had been sent into exile in 325, after his opinion had been condemned by the council at Nicaea. During the negotiations concerning the recall of Arius, Constantia fell ill, and, being visited by her brother Constantine, besought him on her death-bed to restore Arius to liberty. She died some time afterwards, between 328 and 330. She had a son Flavius Constantius, who, when he was last called Licinius Caesar (Philostorg. ii. 9; Theophanes, ii. 27, ed. Paris; Euseb. H. E. x. 9; Socin. i. 2; Zoisim. ii. pp. 17, 28.)

CONSTANTINA. 2. Flavia Maxima Constantina, the daughter of the emperor Constantius II. and his third wife, Faustina, was born shortly after the death of her father in A. D. 367. In 375 she was destined to marry the young emperor Gratian, but, on her way to the emperor, was surprised in Ilyria by the Quadi, who had invaded the country, and would have been carried away into captivity but for the timely succour of Massalia, the governor of Ilyria, who brought her safely to Sirmium. When a child of four years, she had the misfortune to be seized with her mother by Procopius, a cousin of the emperor Julian, who had raised a rebellion in CONSTANTINUS. 365, and who carried his captives with him in all his expeditions, in order to excite his troops by their presence. Constantia died before her husband Gratian, that is, before 303, leaving no issue. (Amm. Marc. xxi. 15, xxv. 7, 9, xxix. 6.) [W. P.]

CONSTANTINUS, Flavia Julia, by some authors named Constantina, daughter of Constantine the Great, and wife of Hannibalarius, and received from her father the title of Augusta. Disappointed in her ambitious hopes by the death of her husband, she encouraged the revolt of Vetranio [Vetranio], and is said to have placed the diadem on his brow with her own hand. She subsequently became the wife of Gallus Caesar (A. D. 351), and three years afterwards (A. D. 354) died of a fever in Bithynia. This princess, if we can trust the highly-coloured picture drawn by Ammianus Marcellinus, must have been a perfect demon in the human form, a female fury ever thirsting for blood, and stimulating to deeds of violence and savageatrocity the cruel temper of Gallus, who after her death ascribed many of his former excesses to her evil promptings. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 1, &c.; Anael. Vict. 41, 42; Julian, Epist. ad Athen. p. 501, ed. 1630; Philos. Hist. Eccl. iii. 22, iv. 1; Theophan. Chronog. p. 37, ed. 1655.) [W. R.]

CONSTANTINUS, the second son of Constantius Chlorus, and the first whom he had by his second wife, Theodora, was probably murdered by his nephew, the emperor Constantius. He is mentioned only by Zonaras (vol. i. p. 246, ed. Paris). There is much doubt respecting him, although it appears from Julianus (Epist. ad Pop. Athen. p. 497, ed. Paris), that Constantius put two uncles to death; so that we are forced to admit three brothers of Constantine the Great, one of whom, Hannibalarius, died before him, while his brothers Constantius and Constantine survived him. The passage in Philostorgius (li. 4) "Met oei polyn xipos (after the empress Fausta was suffocated in a bath) yu twn thelpen epafhioke kata twi Neomphoriani Diaporxwv anti treboietai" says clearly, that at the death of Constantine the Great there was more than one brother of him alive. [Constantius II.] [W. P.]

CONSTANTINUS, the tyrant, emperor in Britain, Gaul, and Spain, was a common soldier in the Roman army stationed in Britain in the beginning of the fifth century of our era, during the reign of the emperor Honorius. In A. D. 407 these troops rebell ed, and chose one Marcus emperor, whom they murdered soon afterwards. They then swore obedience to one Oratiansus, and having got tired of him, they killed him likewise, and chose one of the sons of Constantine, in his stead. They had no other motive for selecting him but the fact that he bore the venerated and royal name of Constantine. Although little fitted for the duties of his exalted rank, Constantine considered that he should soon share the fate of his predecessors, if he did not employ his army in some serious business. He consequently carried his troops immediately over to Gaul, and landed at Boulogne. This country was so badly defended, that Constantine was recognized in nearly every province before the year had elapsed in which he was invested with the purple. (A. D. 407.) Stilicho, who was commissioned by the emperor Honorius, sent his lieutenant Sarus, a Goth, into Gaul, who defeated and killed Justinian, and assassinated Nervigaste3, the two best generals of the usurper. Constantine was besieged by Sarus in Vienna, now Vienna in Dauphîne; but, assisted by the skill of Edobincus and especially Gerontius, the successors of Justinius and Nervigastes in the command of the army, he defeated the besiegers, and drove them back beyond the Alps. Upon this, he took up his residence at Arelatum, now Arles, and sent his son Constans, whom he created Caesar, into Spain. At the head of the Honoriani, a band of mercenary barbarians, Constans soon established the authority of his father in Spain (a.d. 408), and was rewarded with the dignity of Augustus.

In the following year Honorius judged it prudent to acknowledge Constantine as emperor, in order that he might obtain his assistance against the Goths. Constantine did not hesitate to arm for the defence of Honorius, having previously obtained his pardon for the assassination of Didymus (Didymius) and Verinianus (Verenianus), two kinsmen of Honorius, who had been killed by order of Constantine for having defended Spain against his son Constans; and he entered Italy at the head of a strong army, his secret intention being to depose Honorius and to make himself master of the whole Western empire. He had halted under the walls of Verona, when he was suddenly recalled to Gaul by the rebellion of his general, Gerontius, who, having the command of the army in Spain, persuaded the troops to support his revolt. In a short time, Gerontius was master of Spain; but, instead of assuming the purple, he had his friend Maximus proclaimed emperor, and hastened into Gaul, where Constantine had his eldest son Julian sent to pursue him; with the other part he continued the siege, as is related under Constantius, and afterwards compelled Constantine to surrender on condition of having his life preserved. Constantine and his second son Julian were sent to Italy; but Honorius did not keep the promise made by his general, and both the captives were put to death. The revolt of Constantine is of great importance in the history of Britain, since in consequence of it and the rebellion of the inhabitants against the officers of Constantine, the emperor Honorius gave up all hopes of restoring his authority over that country, and recognized its independence of Rome,—a circumstance that led to the conquest of Britain by the Saxons. (a.d. 411.) (Zosim. lib. vii. and lib. viii., the chief source; Oros. vii. 40—42; Sozom. ix. 11—13; Jornandes, de Reb. Goth. p. 112, ed. Lindenbrog; Sidon. Apoll. Epist. v. 9; Prosper, Chron., Honorio VII. et Theodosio ii. Cos., Theodosio Aug. IV. Cons.) [W. P.]
Constantine was born in the month of February, A.D. 272. There are many different opinions respecting his birth-place; but it is most probable, and it is now generally believed, that he was born at Naissus, now Niš, a well-known town in Dardania or the upper and southern part of Moesia Superior.*

Constantine was distinguished by the choicest gifts of nature, but his education was chiefly military. When his father obtained the supreme command in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, he did not accompany him, but remained with the emperor Diocletian as a kind of hostage for the fidelity of his parent, and he attended that emperor on his celebrated expedition in Egypt. After the capture of Alexandria and the pacification of that country, and the Persian war, which resulted in the conquest of Mesopotamia and the adjoining countries, for which Diocletian and Maximian celebrated a triumph in Rome in 303, in these wars Constantine distinguished himself so much by personal courage as well as by higher military talents, that he became the favourite of the army, and was as a reward appointed tribunus militum of the first class. But he was not allowed to enjoy quietly the honours which he so justly deserved.

* Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Naissu) calls this town Κρίσια καὶ πατρίς Κωνσταντίνου τοῦ Ἀρμενίου, meaning by Κρίσια that town was enlarged and embellished by Constantine, which was the case. The opinion that Constantine was born in Britain is ably refuted in Schopflin's dissertation, "Constantinus Magnus non fuit Britannus," contained in the author's "Commentiones Historicae," Basel, 1741, 4to.
of by treachery on his journey, Constantine had no sooner obtained the permission of Galerius than he departed from Nicomedia, where they both resided, without taking leave of the emperor, and travelled through Thrace, Illyricum, Pannonia, and Gaul with all possible speed, till he reached his father at Boulogne just in time to accompany him to Britain on his expedition against the Picts, and to be present at his death at York (25th of July, 306). Before dying, Constantius declared his son as his successor.

The moment for seizing the supreme power, or for shrinking back into death or obscurity, had now come for Constantine. He was renowned for his victories in the East, admired by the legions, and beloved by the subjects, both heathen and Christian, of Constantius, who did not hesitate to believe that the son would follow the example of justice, toleration, and energy set by the father. The legions proclaimed him emperor; the barbarian auxiliaries, headed by Croesus, king of the Alemanni, acknowledged him; yet he hesitated to place the diadem on his head. But his hesitation was mere pretence; he was well prepared for the event; and in the quick energy with which he acted, he gave a sample of that marvellous combination of boldness, cunning, and wisdom in which but a few great men have surpassed him. In a conciliatory letter to Galerius, he protested that he had not taken the purple on his own account, but that he had been pressed by the troops to do so, and he solicited to be acknowledged as Augustus. At the same time he made preparations to take the field with all his father's forces, if Galerius should refuse to grant him his request. But Galerius dreaded a struggle with the brave legions of the West, headed by a man like Constantine. He disguised his resentment, and acknowledged Constantine as master of the countries beyond the Alps, but with the title of Caesar only: he conferred the dignity of Augustus upon his own son Severus.

The peace in the empire was of short duration. The rapacity of Galerius, his absence from the capital of the empire, and probably also the example of Constantine, caused a rebellion in Rome, which resulted in Maxentius, the son of Maximian, seizing the purple; and when Maximian was informed of it, he left his retirement and reassumed the diadem, which he had formerly renounced with his colleague Diocletian. The consequence of their rebellion was a war with Galerius, whose son, Severus Augustus, entered Italy with a powerful force; but he was shut up in Ravenna; and, unable to defend the town or to escape, he surrendered himself up to the besiegers, and was treacherously put to death by order of Maxentius. (A.D. 307.)

Galerius chose C. Valerius Licinius as Augustus instead of Severus, and he was forced to acknowledge the claims of Maxentius likewise, who had been proclaimed Augustus by the legions under his command, which were stationed in Syria and Egypt. The Roman emperors thus divided the masters: Galerius, Licinius, and Maximin in the East, and Maximian, Maxentius, and Constantine in the West (308). The union between the masters of the West was cemented by the marriage of Constantine, whose first wife Minervina was dead, with Fausta, the daughter of Maximin, which took place as early as 306; and at the same time Constantine was acknowledged as Augustus by Maximian and Maxentius. But before long serious quarrels broke out between Maxentius and Maximian; the latter was forced by his son to fly from Rome, and finally took refuge with Constantine, by whom he was well received. Maximian once more abdicated the throne; but during the absence of Constantine, who was then on the Rhine, he reassumed the purple, and entered into secret negotiations with his son Maxentius for the purpose of ruining Constantine. He was surprised in his plots by Constantine, who on the news of his rebellion had left the Rhine, and embarking his troops in boats, descended the Saône and Rhône, appeared under the walls of Arles, where Maximian then resided, and forced him to take refuge in Marseilles. That town was immediately besieged; the inhabitants gave up Maxentius, and Constantine quelled the rebellion by one of those acts of bloody energy which the world hesitates to call murder, since the kings of the world cannot maintain themselves on their thrones without blood. Maxentius was put to death (A.D. 309); he had deserved punishment, yet he was the father of Constantine's wife. [MAXIMIANUS.]

The authority of Constantine was now unrestrained in his dominions. He generally resided at Trier (Trèves), and was greatly beloved by his subjects on account of his excellent administration. The inroads of the barbarians were punished by him with great severity: the captive chiefs of the Franks were devoured by wild beasts in the circus of Trier, and many robbers or rebels suffered the same barbarous punishment. These exceptional cruelties did not prejudice him in the eyes of the people, and among the emperors who then ruled the world Constantine was undoubtedly the most beloved, a circumstance which was of great advantage to him when he began his struggle with his rivals. This struggle commenced with Maxentius, who pretended to feel resentment for the death of his father, insulted Constantine, and from insults proceeded to hostile demonstrations. With a large force assembled in Italy he intended to invade Gaul, but so great was the aversion of his subjects to his cruel and rapacious character, that Roman deputies appeared before Constantine pretending to negotiate with his son Maxentius for thepurple, and he persuaded Galerius and Maximin to put a stop to the persecutions to which they were exposed in the East. This was a measure of prudence, but the Christians in their joy, which increased in proportion as Constantine showed still more proofs of his conviction, that Christianity had become a moral element in the nations which would give power to him who understood how to wield it, attributed the politic conduct of their master to divine inspiration, and thus the fable became believed, that on his march to Italy, either at Autun in France, or at Verona, or near Andernach on the Rhine in Germany as some pretend, Constantine had a vision, seeing in his sleep a cross with the inscription "σωτήρ εστίς." Thus, it is said, he adopted the cross, and in that sign was victorious.

Constantine crossed the Cottian Alps (Mount Cenis), defeated the vanguard of Maxentius at Turin, entered Milan, and laid siege to Verona, under the walls of which Maxentius suffered a severe defeat. Another battle fought near Rome on the 28th of October, 312, decided the fate of Maxentius: his army was completely routed, and while he tried to escape over the Milvian bridge into Rome, he was driven by the throng of the fugitives into the Tiber and perished in the river.

Constantine entered Rome, and displayed great activity in restoring peace to that city, and in removing the causes of the frequent fugitives into the Tiber and perished in the river. The Constantine of the Roman empire. His fame as a great monarch, distinguished both by civil and military abilities, increased every year, and the consciousness of his talents and power induced him to make a final struggle for the undivided government of the empire. In 323, he declared war against Licinius, who was then advanced in years and was detested for his cruelties, but whose land forces were equal to those of Constantine, while his navy was more numerous and manned with more experienced sailors. The first battle took place near Adrianople on the 3rd of July, 323. Each of the emperors had above a hundred thousand men under his command; but, after a hard struggle, in which Constantine gave fresh proofs of his skill and personal courage, Licinius was routed with great slaughter, his fortified camp was stormed, and he fled to Byzantium. Constantine followed him thither, and while he laid siege to the town, his eldest son Crispus forced the entrance of the Ilissusport, and in a three days' battle defeated Amandus, the admiral of Licinius, who lost one-third of his fleet. Unable to defend Byzantium with success, Licinius went to Bithynia, assembled his troops, and offered a second battle, which was fought at Chrysopolis, now Skutari, opposite Byzantium. Constantine obtained a complete victory, and Licinius fled to Nicomedia. He surrendered himself on condition of having his life spared, a promise which Constantine made on the intercession of his sister Constantina, the wife of Licinius; but, after spending a short time in false security at Thessalonica, the place of his exile, he was put to death by order of his fortunate rival. We cannot believe that he was killed for forming a conspiracy; the cause of his death was undoubtedly the dangerous importance of his person. [Licinius; Constantina.]

Constantine acted towards his memory as, during the restoration in France, the memory of Napoleon was treated by the Bourbons: his reign was considered as an usurpation, his laws were declared void, and infamy was cast upon his name.

Constantine was now sole master of the empire, and the measures which he adopted to maintain himself in his lofty station were as vigorous, though less bloody, as those by which he succeeded in attaining power. The importance of those who dwelt north of the Danube and the Black Sea, the Goths, who had occupied Dacia, were the most dangerous. Constantine chastised them several times in Illyricum, and finally crossed the Danube, entered Dacia, and compelled them to respect the dignity of the Roman empire. [Hist. i. 4]. soon obtained such an ascendency over the Latin,

that while the Roman empire perished by the bar¬ barians in the West, it was changed into a Greek empire by the Greeks in the East. There was, however, such a prestige of grandeur connected with Rome, that down to the capture of Constan¬ tinopolie by the Turks, in 1453, the rulers of the Eastern empire retained the name of Roman em¬ pire as a title by which they thought that they inherited the government of the world. The same title and the same presumption were assumed by the kings of the German barbarians, seated on the ruins of Rome, and they were the pride of their successors till the downfall of the Holy Roman empire in 1806.

The year 324 was signalized by an event which caused the greatest consternation in the empire, and which in the opinion of many writers has thrown indelible disgrace upon Constantine.

His accomplished son, Crispus, whose virtues and glory would perhaps have been the joy of a father, but for their rendering him popular with the nation, and producing ambition in the mind of Crispus himself, was accused of high treason, and, during the celebration at Rome of the twentieth anniver¬ sary of Constantine's victory over Maxentius, was arrested and sent to Pola in Istria. There he was put to death. Licinius Caesar, the son of the em¬ peror Licinius and Constantina, the sister of Con¬ stantine, was accused of the same crime, and suffered the same fate. Many other persons ac¬ cused of being connected with the conspiracy were likewise punished with death. It is said, that

Crispus had been calumniated by his step-mother,

Fausta, and that Constantine, repenting the inno¬ cent death of his son, and discovering that Fausta lived in criminal intercourse with a slave, com¬ manded her to be suffocated in a warm bath. As our space does not allow us to present more than a short sketch of these complicated events, some ad¬ ditions to which are given in the lives of Priscus

and Fausta, we refer the reader to the opinion of Niebuhr, who remarks (History of Rome, ed. by Dr. L. Schmitz, vol. v. p. 360), "Every one knows the miserable death of Constantine's son, Crispus, who was sent into exile to Pola, and then put to death. If however people will make a tragedy of this event, I must confess that I do not see how it can be proved that Crispus was innocent. When I read of so many insurrections of sons against their fathers, I do not see why Crispus, who was CaeSar, and demanded the title of Augustus, which his father refused him, should not have thought,—

"If he cannot do so much and murder anything of myself, my father will not, for he will certainly prefer the sons of Fausta to me, the son of a repudiated woman." Such a thought, if it did occur to Crispus, must have stung him to the quick. That a father should order his own son to be put to death is certainly repulsive to our feelings, but it is rash and incon¬ siderate to assert that Crispus was innocent. It is to me highly probable that Constantine himself was quite convinced of his son's guilt: I infer this from his conduct towards the three step-brothers of Crispus, whom he always treated with the high¬ nest respect, and his unity and harmony with his sons is truly exemplary. It is related that Fausta was suffocated, by Constantine's command, by the steam of a bath; but Gibbon has raised some weighty doubts about this incredible and unac¬ countable act, and I cannot therefore attach any importance to the story."

During the latter part of his reign, Constantine enjoyed his power in peace. As early as 318, Ariaus denied at Alexandria the divinity of Christ.

His doctrine, which afterwards gave rise to so many troubles and wars, was condemned by the general council assembled at Nicaea in 325, one of the most important events in ecclesiastical history.

Constantine protected the orthodox fathers, though he must be looked upon as still a Pagan, but he did not persecute the Arians; and the dissensions of a church to which he did not belong did not occupy much of his 'attention, since the domestic peace of the empire was not yet in danger from them. Notwithstanding the tranquillity of the empire, the evident result of a man of his genius being the sole ruler, Constantine felt that none of his sons was his equal; and by dividing his empire among them, he hoped to remove the causes of troubles like those to which he owed his own accession. He therefore assigned to Constantine, the eldest, the administration of

Gaul, Britain, Spain, and Tingitania; to Con¬ stantius, the second, Egypt and the Asiatic pro¬ vinces, except the countries given to Hanniba¬ lusianus; to Constans, the youngest, Italy, Western Illyricum, and the rest of Africa; they all received the title of Augustus. He conferred the title of CaeSar upon his nephew Dalmatius, who obtained the administration of Eastern Illyricum, Macedo¬ nia, Thrace, and Greece; and his nephew Hanni¬ balianus, who received the new title of Nobilissi¬ mus, was placed over Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor, with Caesarea as capital. They to govern the empire, after his death, as a joint property. Among the three Augusti, Con¬ stantine, the eldest, was to be the first in rank, but they were to be equal in authority: the Caesar and the Nobilissimus, though sovereign in their dominions, were inferior in rank, and, with regard to the administration of the whole empire, in au¬ thority also to the Augusti. The failure of this plan of Constantine's is related in the lives of his sons.

In 337, Constantine was going to take the field against Sapor II., king of Persia, who claimed the provinces taken from him by Galerius and Maxi¬ tian. But his health was bad; and having re¬ tired to Nicomedeea for the sake of the air and the waters, he died there, after a short illness, on the 23rd of May, 337. Shortly before his death, he declared his intention of becoming a Christian, and he was accordingly baptized. His death was the sig¬ nal for the massacre of nearly all his kinsmen,

which was committed by his own sons, and subse¬ quentiy of the violent death of two of his sons, while the second, Constantius, succeeded in be¬ coming sole emperor.

The following were the most important of the laws and regulations of Constantine. He developed and brought to perfection the hierarchical system of state dignities established by Diocletian on the model of the Eastern courts, and of which the details are contained in the Notitia Dignitatum. The principal officers were divided into three classes: the Illustres, the Spectabiles, and the Clarissimi; for officers of a lower rank other titles were invented, the pompous sounds of which contrasted strangely with the pettiness of the functions of the holders. The consularship was a mere title, and so was the dignity of patricians; both of these titles were in later years often conferred upon barbarians. The number of public officers was immense, and they all derived their authority from the supreme chief of the empire, who could thus depend upon a host of men raised by their education above the lower classes, and who, having generally nothing but their appointments, were obliged to do all in their power to prevent revolutions, by which they would have been deprived of their livelihood. A similar artificial system, strengthening the government, is established, in our days, in Prussia, Austria, France, and most of the states of Europe. The dignity and dangerous military power of the prefects praetorio were abolished. Under Diocletian and Maximian there were four prefects, but they were only lieutenants of the two Augusti and their two Caesars. Constantine continued the number, and limited their power by making them civil officers: under him there was the Praefectus Orienter over the Asiatic provinces and Thrace; the Praefectus Italicus, over Italy, Rhaetia, Noricum, and Africa between Egypt and Tingitania; the Praefectus Illyrico, who had Ilyricum, Pannonia, Macedonia, and Greece; and the Praefectus Galliae, over Gaul, Britain, Spain, and Tingitania or the westernmost part of Africa. Rome and Constantinople had each their separate prefect. Under the prefects there were thirteen high functionaries, who were civil governors of the thirteen dioceses into which the empire was divided, and who had either the title of comes or comm., or of vicarius or vice-prefect. Between these officers and the praefecti there were three proconsuls, of Asia, Achaia, and Africa, who however were but governors of provinces, the whole number of which was one hundred and sixteen, and which were governed, besides the proconsuls, by thirty-seven consulars, five correctores, and seventy-one presidentes.

The military administration was entirely separated from the civil, and as the Praefectus Praetorio were changed into civil officers, as has been mentioned above, the supreme military command was conferred at first upon two, then four, and finally eight Magistri Militum, under whom were the military Comites and Duces. The number of legions was diminished, but the army nevertheless much increased, especially by barbarian auxiliaries, a dangerous practice, which hastened the overthrow of the Western and shook the Eastern empire to its foundations. The increase of the army rendered various oppressive taxes necessary, which were unequally assessed, and caused many revolts. There were seven high functionaries, who may be compared with some of the great officers of state in our country, viz. the Praepositus Sacri Cubiculi, or Lord Chamberlain; the Magister Officiorum, who acted in many con-

Concerns as a secretary for home affairs; the Quaestor, or Lord Chancellor and Seal-Keeper; the Comes Sacrarum Largitionum, or Chancellor of the Exchequer for the public revenue; the Comes Rerum Privatarum Divinæ Domus for the private property of the emperor; and, finally, two Comites Domesticorum, or simply Domestici, the commanders of the imperial life-guard. For further details we refer to the authorities enumerated at the end of this article, and to Gutherius, 'De officiis Domus Augustae.'

Constantine deserves the name of Great: he rose to the highest pinnacle of power, and owed his fortune to nobody but himself. His death was envied by many dangers to him; his exalted qualities caused jealousy among his enemies, and during the greater part of his reign his life was one continued struggle. He overcame all obstacles through his own exertions; his skill vanquished his enemies; his energy kept the hydra of anarchy headless; his prudence conducted him in safety through conspiracies, rebellions, battles, and murder, to the throne of Rome; his wisdom created a new organization for an empire, which consisted of huge fragments, and which no human hand seemed powerful enough to raise to a solid edifice. Christianity was made by him the religion of the state, but Paganism was not persecuted though discouraged. The Christianity of the emperor himself has been a subject of warm controversy both in ancient and modern times, but the graphic account which Niebuhr gives of Constantine's belief seems to be perfectly just. Speaking of the murder of Licinius and his own son Crucitus, Niebuhr remarks (Hist. of Rome, vol. v. p. 539), "Many judge of him by too severe a standard, because they look upon him as a Christian; but I cannot regard him in that light. The religion which he had in his head must have been a strange compound indeed. The man who had on his coins the inscription Sol invictus, who worshipped pagan divinities, consulted the haruspices, indulged in a number of pagan superstitions, and, on the other hand, built churches, shut up pagan temples, and interceded with the council of Nicea, must have been a repulsive phænomenon, and was certainly not a Christian. He did not allow himself to be baptized till the last moments of his life, and those who praise him for this do not know what they are doing. He was a superstitious man, and mixed up his Christian religion with all kinds of absurd superstitions and opinions. When, therefore, certain Oriental writers call him Ιεσοῦς Χριστός, they do not know what they are saying, and to speak of him as a saint is a profanation of the word." The blame which falls upon Constantine for the death of Maximian, Licinius, and Crucitus, will fall upon many kings, and we have only to analyse the accounts of the mental sufferings which his bloody deeds might have caused him. Constantine was not so great during the latter part of his reign. In proportion as he advanced in years he lost that serene generosity which had distinguished him while he was younger; his temper grew macaronious, and he gave way to passionate bursts of resentment which he would have suppressed while he was in the bloom of manhood. He felt that the grandeur of Rome could be maintained only in the East, and he founded Constantinople; but the spirit of the East overwhelmed him, and he sacrificed the heroic majesty of a Roman emperor to ra'Clius, called Novus Constantinus, emperor of the East, A. D. 641, the son of the emperor Heraclius by his first wife, Eudoxia, was born in May, 612, and succeeded his father on the 11th of March (February), 641, together with his younger half-brother Heraclonas, the succession being thus established by the testament of their father. Constantine died as early as the 22nd of June (25th of May) A. D. 641, after rule of 12 days, either from ill-health, or probably from poison administered to him by his step-mother Martina. His successor was his brother Heraclonas. (Hera-

was he gone, than an Arabian fleet, perhaps invited thither by the rebels, appeared off Syracuse. The place was taken by surprise and partly destroyed, and the riches and statues, the plunder of Rome, collected there by Constantes, were carried by the Arabs to Alexandria. The Greek troops in Asia revolted soon after the return of the emperor. They would be governed by a "Trinity," and not by a sole sovereign, and demanded that Constantine should divide his authority with his two brothers, Heraclius and Tiberius, who had the title but not the power of Augustus. This rebellion was likewise soon quelled, and Constantine pardoned both his brothers. At the same time, an Arabian army commanded by Ukhah and Dinâr invaded the remaining part of the Greek dominions in Africa (Mauretania), penetrated as far as the shores of the Atlantic, and ravaged the country so fearfully, that both the Greek and Berber inhabitants rose in despair, and, under the command of a native chief named Rüşsiel, surprised the Moslems, and killed nearly all of them. This retrocession was an advantage to the emperor, since Rüşsiel succeeded in seizing the supreme power in that country.

In 671 the Arabs equipped a powerful fleet with the intention of laying siege to Constantinople. They conquered Smyrna and nearly all the islands of the Greek archipelago, and began the blockade of Constantinople in the spring of 672; but, after a protracted siege of five months, were compelled to sail back, after sustaining immense losses from the Greek fire, which had just been invented by Callinicus, a native of Heliopolis in Syria, and was first employed in that siege. Yezyd, the son of the khaiffi Maawiya, who commanded the Arabic forces, returned in the following spring, and, during a period of seven years, regularly appeared before Constantinople in the spring, and sailed to his winter-quarters in the autumn, but was not able to take the city. During the last siege, in 679, the Arabian fleet lost so many ships by the Greek fire, that Yezyd was compelled to make a hasty retreat, and not having a sufficient number of ships for his numerous forces, despatched a body of 30,000 men by land for Syria, while he embarked the rest on board his fleet. But his fleet was destroyed by a storm, and the land army was overtaken and cut to pieces by a Greek army commanded by Florus, Petronas, and Cyprianus. This unfortunate campaign, and the war at the same time with the Maronites or Druses of Mount Lebanon, pressed so heavily upon the khaiffi Maawiya, that, wishing for peace, he signed the conditions offered him by Constantine, and he thus became liable, for the period of thirty years, to an annual tribute of 3000 pounds of gold accompanied by rich presents of slaves and horses. By this treaty the emperor was enabled to defeat the heathen and to extend the dominions of the empire eastwards. The treaty was confirmed by a new one in 680, by which the districts in which such corps were stationed, and its use became so general, that at last the whole empire was divided into twenty-nine thekata, seventeen of which were to be entered in the western, southern or Asiatic part of the empire, and twelve in the northern and western parts, from the Cimmerian Bosporus to Sicily. This important change in the administration of the empire took place in the latter years of the reign of Heraclius, or in the reign of Constantine IV., that is, from 635 to 685. But although we do not precisely know the year, there are many reasons for believing that Constantine IV. was the originator of that plan.

CONSTANTIUS V., surnamed COPRO- NYMUS (κορονόμυς), because he permitted the baptismal font at the time of his baptism, emperor of the East, A. D. 741—775, was the only son of the emperor Leo III. Isaurus. He was born in 719, and succeeded his father in 741. The unfortunate commencement of his reign is related in the life of the emperor Artavasdes, p. 570, b. The downfall of this usurper in 743 and the complete success of Constantine caused much grief to pope Zacharias, who had recognized Artavasdes because he protected the worship of images, while Constantine was an iconoclast, at whose instigation a council held at Constantinople in 754 condemned the worship of images throughout the whole Eastern empire. Constantine was most cruel in his proceedings against the orthodox; he anathematized Joannes Damascenus and put to death Constantine, the patriarch of Constantinople, St. Stephenus, and many other fathers who had declared for the images. In 751 Eutychius, exarch of Ravenna, was driven out by Astolf (Astauphus), king of the Longobards, who united that province with his dominions after the dignity of exarch had been in existence during a period of 185 years. A war having broken out between Astolf and Pipin the Short, king of the Franks, the latter conquered the exarchate and gave it to pope Stephen (753), the first pope who ever had temporal dominions, the duchy of Rome, being still a dependency of the Western empire. Constantine sent ambassadors to Pipin, Astolf, and the pope, to claim the restitution of the exarchate; but the negotiations proved abortive, since the emperor could not give them sufficient weight by the display of a formidable army in Italy; for his troops were engaged in disastrous wars with the Arabs, who ravaged Pamphylia, Cilicia, and Isauria; with the Bulgarians, who penetrated several times as far as the environs of Constantinople. The Bulgarian king, Paganus, however, suffered a severe defeat from Constantine in 765, in which he was energetically killed, and Constantine entered his capital in triumph; but in the following year he sustained a severe defeat from the Bulgarians, and was compelled to fly ingloriously, after losing his fleet and army.
Constantine still flattered himself with regaining the island of Sicily, which is still an object of the Greek dominions in Italy, the match of southern Italy with the island of Sicily, and with the Bulgarians, who conquered Greece; and with the Slavonians, who conquered Armenia, evacuated that country, and fled in confusion to Syria; but in the following year, a powerful Arab army, divided into three strong bodies, and commanded by Harun-ar-Rashid, the son of the khalif Mahadzi, penetrated as far as the Bosphorus, and compelled Irene to pay an annual tribute of 60,000 pieces of gold. The peace, however, was broken some years afterwards, and the new war lasted till the end of the reign of Constantine, who in 790 lost half of his fleet in the gulf of Attalia, but obtained several victories over the Arabs by land. He was likewise victorious in a war with the Bulgarians, who had conquered all Greece, but were driven back by Stauracius in 794.

At an early age, Constantine was betrothed to Rotrudis, daughter of Charlemagne; but quarrels having broken out with that emperor on the subject of the Greek dominions in Italy, the match was broken off, and Constantine married Maria, an Armenian lady, whom he repudiated three years afterwards, and married one Theodat. In 797, the sect of the Iconoclasts was condemned in the seventh general council held at Nicea, and the worship of images was restored throughout the empire. When Constantine came of age, he was of course intrusted with the administration of the empire; but Irene's influence was so great, that she remained the real sovereign. Tired of his vassalage, Constantine intrigued against her, and had already resolved to arrest her, when the plot was discovered; his partisans were severely punished, and he himself received the chastisement of a boy from the hands of his mother. Infuriated by this outrage, the young emperor requested the assistance of his Armenian life-guard, and, having found them all devoted to him, seized upon his mother, and confined her in one of her palaces, where she was kindly treated, but was allowed to have no other company but that of her attendants. A reconciliation took place some time afterwards, but Irene finally contrived the ruin of her son.

After succeeding in being recognized as the lawful master of the empire, Constantine put himsel at the head of his army, and set out to meet the Bulgarians, who were plundering all Thrace.
He obtained some advantages over them, but lost his army to pieces, and with difficulty escaped to Constantinople. There he received intelligence that a conspiracy against his life, formed by his four uncles and supported by the Armenian guard, was on the eve of breaking out. His measures were at once quick and energetic: he seized the conspirators, disarmed the Armenians, whose commander, Alexis, had his eyes put out, and punished his uncles with equal severity: one of them was blinded, and the three others had their tongues cut off, and they were all forced to become ecclesiastics, in order to inapacitate them for reigning. They were afterwards banished, and died in obscurity.

The reconciliation which had taken place between Constantine and his mother through the empress Theodore, an able general, defeated him in several engagements in 782, and Elpidius fled with his treasures to the Arabs in Africa, by whom he was treated till his death with the honours due to an emperor. The power of the Arabs grew year ever more dangerous to the empire. In 781 they suffered a severe defeat from the eunuch Johannes in Armenia, evacuated that country, and fled in crimes. Elpidius, governor of the thema of Sicily, revolted in 781; and it seems that his intention was either to place himself or one of the four paternal uncles of his heir on the throne, as the eunuch Theodore, an able general, defeated him in several engagements in 782, and Elpidius fled with his treasures to the Arabs in Africa, by whom he was treated till his death with the honours due to an emperor. The power of the Arabs grew year
ever more dangerous to the empire. In 781 they
Before arriving there, he was joined by the empress and a host of partisans. Relying on the promises of Irene, he returned to Constantinople, but was surprised in his palace by a band of assassins hired by Irene and her favourite, the general Staurachus. His eyes were put out by their order with so much violence that he died on the same day. By a singular coincidence of circumstances, he was murdered in the "Porphyra," the name of the apartment where the empresses were accustomed to be confined, and where he was born. His only son, Leo, having died in his lifetime, he was succeeded by his mother Irene. Constantin VI. was the last of the Iaurian dynasty. Zonaras and Cedrenus say, that he survived his excaecatum for a considerable time; but their opinion seems to be untenable, although Le Beau believes it to be correct. (Theophan. p. 382, &c., ed. Paris; Cedren. p. 469, &c., ed. Paris; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 93, &c., ed. Paris; Joel, p. 178, ed. Paris; Glycyn, p. 283, ed. Paris. [W. P.]

CONSTANTINUS VII. FLAVIUS PORPHYROGENITUS (ὁ Πορφυρογενήτως), emperor of the East, A. D. 911—959, the only son of the emperor Leo VI. Philosophus, of the Macedonian dynasty, and his fourth wife. Zoe, was born in A. D. 906; the name Πορφυρογένετος, that is, "born in the purple," was given to him because he was born in an apartment of the imperial palace called τὸ πορφυρω, in which the empresses awaited their confinement. The name Porphyrogenitus is also given to Constantine VI., but it is generally employed to distinguish the subject of this article. Constantine succeeded his father in 911, and reigned under the guardianship of his paternal uncle, Alexander, who was already Augustus, governed the empire as an absolute monarch, and died in the following year, 912. After his death the government was usurped by Romanus Lecapenus, who excluded Constantine from the administration, leaving him nothing but an honorary retreat in the imperial palace, and who ruled his empire even when he was deposed and exiled by his sons Stephanus and Constantine, both Augusti, and who expected to be recognised as emperors. [ROMANUS LECAPENUS.] They were deceived; the people declared for the son of Leo; Constantine left his solitude, and, supported by an enthusiastic population, seized upon the usurpers, banished them, and ascended the throne. In the long period of his retirement Constantine had become a model of learning and theoretical wisdom; but the energy of his character was suppressed; instead of men he knew books, and when he took the reins of government into his hands, he held them without strength, prudence, and resolution. He would have been an excellent arrabbiato, a learned professor, but was an incompetent emperor. Yet the good qualities of his heart, his humanity, his love of justice, his sense of order, his passion for the fine arts and literature, won him the affection of his subjects. His good nature often caused him to trust without discernment, and to confer the high offices of the state upon fools or rogues; but he was not always deceived in his choice, and many of his ministers and generals were able men, and equally devoted to their business and their master. The empire was thus governed much better than could have been expected. In a long and bloody war against the Arabs in Syria, the Greek arms were victorious under Leo and Nicephorus, the sons of Bardas Phocas; the Christian princes of Iberia recognised the supremacy of the emperor; alliances of the Greeks with the Pechenegues or Patzinakii in southern Russia checked both the Russians and the Bulgarians in their hostile designs against the empire; and Constantine had the satisfaction of receiving in his palace ambassadors of the khalifs of Baghdad and Africa, and of the Roman emperors. On Leo's death the government was usurped by Romanus, a daughter Theodora, married to Joannes Zimiscus, and other children.

Constantine Porphyrogenitus holds a high rank in literature. He was a good judge of poetry and prose, and knew nothing of the fine arts and literature, won him the affections of his subjects. His own works are—

I. Ιστορία βιγματος των βιων και πατησον των Βασιλεων των αδημων βασιλεων (Vita Basili), the life of Basilus I. Macedo, the grandfather of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, a work of great importance for the reign and character of that great emperor, although it contains many things which cannot be relied upon, as Constantine was rather credulous, and embellished the truth from motives of filial piety or vanity. Editions: 1. By Leo Allatius in his Συμμετοχή, with a Latin translation, Cologne, 1653, 8vo.; the text divided into 70 sections or chapters. 2. By Cambesius, in his "Scriptores post Theophanem," Paris, 1693, fol.; divided into 101 sections or chapters; with a new translation and notes of the editor.

II. Περι των θητακτων, "DeThemathibus." (The origin and signification of the word θεσμος as a new name for "province," is given in the life of CONSTANTINUS IV.) This work is divided into two books; the first treats on the Eastern (Eastern and Southern) or Asiatic themes, and the second on the Western (Western and Northern) or European themes. Editions: 1. The first book, with a Latin translation and notes, by B. Valenianus, Paris, 1589, fol. 2. His second book, with a Latin translation and notes by T. Morellus, Paris, 1609, 8vo. Both these editions, and consequently the complete work, were reprinted and edited with some other works of Constantine, by Meursius, Leyden, 1617, 8vo. 3. The same in the sixth volume of "J. Meursii Opera," edited by Lami. 4. The complete work, by Bandurinus, in the first volume of his "Imperium Orientale," with notes and a corrected version by the editor. 5. The same in the third volume of the Bonn edition or the works of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, a revised reprint of the edition of Bandurinus, but without the map of De l'Isle, edited by Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1840.
III. "De Administrando Imperio," without a corresponding Greek title. This celebrated work was written by the imperial author for the special purpose of informing his son Romanus of the political state of the empire, its various resources, and the political principles which ought to be followed in its administration, as well as in its relations to foreign nations. It contains abundance of historical, geographical, ethnographical, and political facts of great importance, and without it our knowledge of the times of the author and the nations which were either his subjects or his neighbours would be little more than vagueness, error, or complete darkness. The work is divided into 53 chapters, preceded by a dedication to prince Romanus. In the first 13 chapters the author gives an account of the state of several nations which lived towards the north of the Danube, such as the Petchenegs or Patzinacitae, the Chazars, the Bulgarians, the Turks (by which he means the Magars or present Hungarians), and especially the Russians, who were then the most dangerous enemies of Constantinople. In the 14th and following chapters he speaks of Mohammed, and gives a view of the rising power of the Arabs, which leads him to Spain and the conquest of the West Gothic kingdom by the Arabs. (cc. 23 and 24.) The relations of the work is that to the map of Guillaume de L'Isle. The commentary which we have on the work: it refers to the Greek language, which are, however, explained by the commentators. It is possible to read it through; but if used as a book of reference it answers well, and it contains, besides, a number of important facts, and little stories or anecdotes referring to the life of former emperors. Editions: 1. By Leich and Reiske, the first volume containing the first book and the appendix, Leipzig, 1751, fol.; the second volume containing the second book, ibid. 1754, fol., with a Latin translation, an excellent Commentary to the first book by Reiske, and Notes and a "Commentatio de Vita et Rebus Gestis Constantini" by Leich. 2. By Niebuhr, vol. i., Bonn, 1829, 8vo.; vol. ii., ibid. 1830. This is a carefully revised reprint of the editio princeps; it contains the remaining part of Reiske's commentary (to the appendix and the second book), first edited by Niebuhr. The principal laws issued by Constantine (Novellae Constitutiones) have been published by Leunclavitis, in his "De Iberia" and "De Hispania"), of which Meursius had only fragments, so that he could not translate them. 3. By Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1840, in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines, a revised reprint of the edition of Bandurius without the map of Guillaume de L'Isle. The commentary of Bayer cited above belongs likewise to this work. IV. Βελλάντα Ταξινομία Philοσόφης κατά την Μαχαιρινήν, commonly called "Tactica," an essay on the art of warfare by sea and by land, a very interesting treatise. Editions: 1 and 2. By Meursius, in "Constantini Opera," and in the sixth volume of "Meurisii Opera," edited by Lami, both cited above. No. 1 gives only the text, but No. 2 has also a Latin translation by Lami. 4. By Bandurius, in his "Imperium Orientale," in which, however, only the translation of Meursius in the editor having likewise given the more perfect text and translation of Bandurius. 5. By Bandurius, in his "Imperium Orientale," the best edition, partly on account of a map of the Eastern empire by Guillaume de L'Isle, which belongs both to this work and to that on the Themen. Bandurius added a new translation and an extensive commentary. Having perused better MSS. than Meursius, Bandurius was enabled to add the text with a translation of the 23rd and 24th chapters ("De Iberia" and "De Hispania"), of which Meursius had only fragments, so that he could not translate them. 3. By Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, CONSTANTIUS.

Besides his own writings, we owe to Constantine's love of literature the preservation of some works from destruction or oblivion, and the compilation of others at his order. Such are: I. "Collectanea et Excerpta Historico-Politicæ et Moralæ," an extensive compilation, of which but the 27th book, "De Prosephon," "De Legationibus," and the 50th, "De Arêtis cal Kaasas, " De Virtute et Vitio," have been preserved. A further account of this work is given in the life of Francis. II. "Inseritur," "De Medicina Veterinaria," compiled from the works of a number of writers, a list of whom is given by Fabriæus; it is divided into two books, and translated by J. Ruellius, Paris, 1530, fol. 2. The Greek text, by Simon Grynaeus, Basel, 1537, 4to. 3. By Valaesius, together with the "Collectaneæ," &c., Paris, 1624, 4to. An Italian translation of it was published at Venice, 1543, 8vo., and a French one at Paris, 1563, 4to. III. "De Re Rustica," which is generally attributed to Bassus Cassianus.[Bassus Cassianus.] Both the Hippocrates and the Geoponics were held in high esteem in the middle ages as well as in after times, and they were both used for practical purposes, as we may see from the numerous editions and translations, especially of the Geoponics. The first eight books of this work, which treat on the cure of beasts, and form a kind of domestic veterinary hand-book, were separately published in a Latin translation by Andreas a Laeno, Cologne, 1543, 8vo. An Italian translation of the complete work appeared at Venice, 1542; French ones at Poitiers, 1545, Lyon, 1557; and a German, by Michael Herr, in 1551, 3rd edition, edited by Ludwig Rabus, Strassburg, 1666, 8vo.

CONSTANTIUS VIII., emperor of the East, reigned, together with his brother Stephanus, after the deposition of their father, Romanus Lecapenus, but was soon compelled to cede the throne to the lawful sovereign, Constantin Porphyrgeonitius. (A. D. 945.) [Constantinus VII.]

CONSTANTIUS IX., emperor of the East, A. D. 976—1028, the son of the emperor Romanus II., was born in A. D. 961, and began to reign, together with his elder brother, Basil II., in 978; but, addicted to idleness and luxury, he took no part in the administration of the empire. After the death of Basil in 1025, he became sole emperor; but, fortunately for his subjects, who suffered much from the Arabs during his miserable administration, he died three years afterwards, in 1028. Constantine IX. was the last of the Macedonian dynasty. His successor was Romanus Argyrus, the husband of his daughter Zoe, whom he had by his wife Helena Angustia. [Basiliius III.]

CONSTANTIUS X. MONOMACHUS (Δ Μονομαχος), emperor of the East, A. D. 1042—1054. His surname was given him on account of his personal courage in war. In 1042 the government of the empire was in the hands of two imperial sisters, Zoe, the widow of the emperor Romanus Argyrus, and afterwards of Michael IV. the Paphlogionan, and Thedora, a spinster, who were placed on the throne by the inhabitants of Constantinople, when they had deposed the emperor Michael V. Constantinople was restored to Zoe. The two sisters being afraid of their position, Zoe proposed to Constantine Monomachus that he should marry her; and as she was rather advanced in age, being then upwards of sixty, she allowed the gallant warrior to bring his beautiful mistress, Sclerena, with him to the imperial palace, where the two ladies lived together on the best terms. Constantine was saluted as emperor, and conferred the dignity of Augusta upon Sclerena. Soon after the accession of Constantine, Georgius Maniacus, a brother of Sclerena, who was renowned for his victories over the Arabs, and who then held the command in Italy, raised a rebellion. At the head of a chosen body of troops he crossed the Adriatic, landed in Epirus, joined an auxiliary army of Bulgarians, and marched upon Constantinople. An assassin delivered the emperor from his fears: Maniacus was murdered by an unknown hand in the midst of his camp.

A still greater danger arose in 1043 from an invasion of the Russians, who appeared with a powerful fleet in the Bosporus, while a land force penetrated as far as Varna: but the fleet was dispersed or taken in a bloody engagement, and the Russian army was routed by Cretacalo.

In 1047, while absent on an expedition against the Arabs, Constantine received news of another rebellion having broken out, headed by Tornicius, a relative of the emperor, who assumed the imperial title, and laid siege to Constantinople. The emperor hastened to the defence of his capital, broke the forces of the rebel in a decisive battle, and Tornicius, having fallen into the hands of his pursuers, was blinded and confined to a monastery. Constantine was not less fortunate in a war with Cacius, the vassal king of Armenia and Iberia, who tried to make himself independent; but, unable to take the field against the imperial armies, he was at last compelled to throw himself at the feet of the emperor and implore his clemency. His crown was taken from him, but he was allowed to enjoy both life and liberty, and spent the rest of his days in Cappadocia, where his generous victor had given him extensive estates. Iberia and Armenia were reunited under the immediate authority of the Greeks.

While the frontiers of the empire were thus extended in the East, Thracia and Macedonia suffered dreadfully from an invasion of the Petchenegues, who were so superior to the Greeks in martial qualities, that they would have conquered all those provinces which they had hitherto only plundered, but for the timely interference of the emperor's body-guard, composed of Wearigisas or Normans, who drove the enemy back beyond the Danube, and compelled them to beg for peace. (A. D. 1053.) At the same time the Normans made great progress in Italy, where they finally succeeded in conquering all the dominions of the Greek emperor. In the following year, 1054, the greatest of all the emperors, the younger Constantine X., died, and put an end to the authority of the emperors in the East. Constantine did not live to see the completion of the schism, for he died in the course of the same year, 1054. Constantine was a man of generous character, who, when emperor, would not revenge many insults he had received while he was but an officer in the army. He managed, however, the financial department in an unprincipled manner, spending large sums upon the embellishment of Constantinople and other luxuries, and shewing himself a miser where he ought to have spared no money. Thus, for economy’s sake, he paid off his Heronian troops, 50,000 in number, who were the bulwark of Greece, and who were no sooner disbanded than the frontier provinces of the empire were invaded by Arabs and Petchenegues, so that, although he augmented the extent of his dominions by the addition of Iberia and Armenia, he contributed much to the rapid decline of Greek power under his successor. The successor of Constantine X. was the empress Theodora mentioned above. (Cedren. p. 754, &c., ed. Paris; Paellius in Zonar. vol. ii. p. 247, &c., ed. Paris; Glycas, p. 319, &c., ed. Paris; Joel, p. 103, &c., ed. Paris.) [W.P.]

CONSTANTINUS XI. DUCAS (Δαύδας), emperor of the East, A.D. 1059–1067, was chosen by the emperor Isaac I. Comnenus, who abdicated in 1059, as his successor, in preference to his own children, because he thought him to be the most worthy of his subjects. It proved, however, that, although Constantine was undoubtedly one of the best subjects of Isaac, he still was not fit to rule in those troublous times. Previously to his election, Constantine had been very active in putting Michael VI. Stratiosiots on the throne (A.D. 1056), but he deserted him in the following year and espoused the party of Isaac Comnenus, who succeeded in seizing the government. Thence their friendship arose. When he ascended the throne, the people expected that he would take vigorous measures against those swarms of barbarians who were attacking the empire from all sides, and they were the more justified in their expectations, as Constantine was an able general. But he loved talking quite as much as action, and instead of preparing for war, he addressed the people in a long elaborate speech on the duties of an emperor under the circumstances of the times. So fond was he of speeches, that he said he preferred the crown of eloquence to the crown of Rome, nor can we feel sure whether he really meant so or not, for both those crowns were rather dusty then. Having reduced his army from motives of economy, he saw his empire suddenly invaded (1064) by a host, or probably the whole nation, of the Uzcs, for they are said to have been 600,000 men strong. While they ravaged Thrace and Macedonia, the Hungarians crossed the Danube and seized Belgrade, the capital of them, was taken shortly before the death of the emperor, which happened in A.D. 1067. Constantine had many good qualities, though they were overshadowed by petty and strange passions. Love of justice induced him to recall immediately on his accession all those who were exiled for political crimes, and to undertake a great number of lawsuits, which, accustomed as he was to follow his sophistical genius, he believed to be just, while they proved to be mere chicaneries. When it became known that his love of war had turned into love of legal intrigues, many officers of his army abandoned the profession of arms, and became advocates for the purpose of rising to honours and making their fortunes. Constantine conferred the title of Augustus upon his three sons, Michael, Andronicus, and Constantine, who were all under age, and whom he destined to succeed him and to reign conjointly under the regency of his widow Eudoxia. But she was unable to keep the throne alone, and married Romansus Diogenes for the sake of protection and support, and this distinguished general, who was created emperor, must be considered as the real successor of Constantine XI. (Seylitzes, p. 813, &c., ed. Paris; Paellius in Zonar. vol. ii. p. 272, &c., ed. Paris; Glycas, p. 324, &c., ed. Paris; Nicephorus Bryenn. p. 19, &c., ed. Paris.) [W.P.]

CONSTANTINUS XII. DUCAS, emperor of the East, the youngest son of the preceding, succeeded his father Constantine XI. in 1067, together with his brothers Michael and Andronicus, under the regency of their mother Eudoxia, who married Romansus III. Diogenes and made him emperor. After the capture of Romans by the Turks in 1071, Constantine and his brothers were proclaimed emperors, but Michael, the eldest, was the real ruler. Constantine was confined in a monastery by the emperor Nicephorus III. Botaniates about 1078. His final fate is not well known. He died either in the same year in consequence of cruel tortures to which he had been exposed, or as late as 1082, in a battle between the emperor Alexis I. and Robert Guiscard. Anna Comnena calls him Constantine (p. 117, ed. Paris). [Michael VII.; Romanus III.] [W.P.]

CONSTANTINUS XIII. PALAILOGUS, surname Michael (Μιχα'ηλ Παλα'ηολογος), the last emperor of the East, A.D. 1448–1453, was the fourth son of the emperor Manuel II. Palaeologus. He was born in A.D. 1394, and obtained the throne after the death of his elder brother, the emperor John VII., in 1448. He first married Theodora, daughter of Leonardo, count of Tocco, a lord in the Peloponnese, and, after her death, Catharina, daughter of Notaras Palaeologus Catefius, prince of Leshos, by neither of whom he left issue. Previously to his accession, Constantine was despot or lord of a small remnant of the Byzantine empire in the Chersonesea Taurica, and during the reign of his brother John he was invested with the principality of, or more correctly a patrician dignity in, the Peloponnese, which he bravely defended against the Turks. After the death of John, the throne was claimed by his surviving brothers, Demetrius, the eldest, Constantine, and Thomas. A strong party having declared for Constantine, this prince, who was still in the Peloponnese, accepted the crown after long hesitation, as he saw that he had but few chances of defending it against beauty, we refer to Gibbon, Le Beau, "Histoire du Bas Empire," continued by Amelot, and Hammer, "Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches." The contest lasted from the 6th of April till the 29th of May, 1453: prophecies had foretold its issue. On that day the last emperor of the East fell on the wall of his trembling capital; Οὖν δικαίους μελλόν ἃ γινήσα, he cried out in despair when the Turks stormed the wall and he was forsaken by his guards. Surrounded by a crowd of Janissaries, and foreseeing his fate, he cried out again, "Is there no Christian who will cut off my head?"

He had scarcely uttered these words when he was struck by two Turks at once, and expired unknown to them on a heap of slain. His body was afterwards discovered, and when Mohammed was in undisputed possession of the city, he ordered his head to be cut off, and had it nailed on the poryphry column on the place called Augusteum. It was afterwards sent as a trophy to the principal towns in Turkish Asia. One of the first acts of the victor was the consecration of the church of St. Sophia as a mosque, and Mohammed was the first Moslem who prayed there standing on the altar. It is said that he entered that church on horseback, but this is an idle story invented by monks. He alighted from his horse at the principal gate, entered the church with visible respect and adoration, and was so far from committing any profanation, that he killed with his own hand a Turk whom he discovered breaking up the beautiful mosaics of the pavement.

The conquest of Constantinople was an event of the greatest importance to the Sultan. During upwards of one thousand years that city had been looked upon by the nations of the East as the sacred seat of both the supreme temporal and spiritual power, and being masters of Constantinople, the Sultans at once were considered as the heirs of the Roman emperors. Until then the obedience paid to them was but submission to the sword of a conqueror: it was now both fear and habit, and the transient impression of victory acquired the strength of hereditary duty. With the fall of Constantinople, darkness spread over the East; but the Musea flying from the Bosphorus found a more genial home on the banks of the Arno and the Tiber. Almost four centuries have elapsed since the first Mohammedan prayer was offered in St. Sophia; yet all the power and glory of the Sultans have been unable to root out of the minds of the Greeks the remembrance of their past grandeur, and at the present moment the duration of the Turkish power in Constantinople is less probable than the revival of a new Greek empire. (Phranzes, lib. iii., &c.; Ducas, c. 34, &c.; Chalcenodycles, lib. vii., &c.; Leonardus Chienius, Hist. Constantin. a Turc. expugnatae, 1st ed., Nürnberg, 1544, 4to., a small but curious work, written a few months after the fall of Constantinople.) [W. P.]

CONSTANTINUS ACROPOLITANA. [ACROPOLITA, GEORGIOI.]

CONSTANTINUS, of Antioch, also called Constantius, was a presbyter at the metropolitan church of Antioch, lived about A.D. 400, and was destined to succeed bishop Flavienus, Porphyrius, however, who wished to obtain that see, intrigued at the court of Constantinople, and succeeded in obtaining an order from the emperor Arboius for the banishment of Constantius. With the aid of some friends, Constantius CONSTANTINUS.

CONSTANTINUS, surrarned NICAEUS from the place of his abode, by which surname alone he is usually designated in the Basilica, was a Graeco-Roman jurist. (Bas. ii. p. 572.) He was prior to Gallus, who flourished in the latter half of the eleventh century of the Christian era, for in Basilica, ii. pp. 653, 654, he cites the 2TyovcLtv of Garidas. He was a commentator upon the Novellas of Justinian (Bas. iii. p. 113), and upon the books of the Basilica. (Bas. ii. p. 651, iii. p. 240.) Nic. Commenmus (Præced. Mystag. p. 571) cites his exposition of the Novellas. In Bas. iii. p. 298, he speaks of Stephanus as his teacher (η διδασκαλος ημων Ξεφρόνος); but by this expression he may have referred to the jurist Stephanus, who was a contemporary of Justinian, as an English lawyer might call Coke his master. Reiz, however (ad Theoph., p. 1243), thinks it more probable, that he referred to an Antonius Stephanus, judge and magistrate, who is said by Nic. Commenmus (Papadopoli) (Præced. Mystag. p. 404) to have written scholia on the Ecloga of Leo; but G. E. Heimbach (Aedoloa, i. p. 221) has in this case clearly exposed the fabrication of Commenmus. In the scholia of Constantinus Nicaeus appended to the Basilica are citations of Cyrilinus, Stephanus, and Thalaeaus (ii. p. 141), of Joannes Nomophylus, with whom he disagrees (ii. p. 549), of the Institutes (iii. p. 616), of the Digest (iii. p. 275, iii. p. 650), of the Novellas of Leo (iii. p. 186), and of the Basilica (ii. pp. 550, 615, 616, 619, iii. pp. 194, 240). (Reiz, ad Theoph. p. 1238; Assemani, Bibl. Jur. Orient. ii. c. 20, p. 404; Pohi, ad Sacres. Notit. p. 134, n. (c); Heimbach, ad Sacres. Notit. i. p. 75.) [J. T. G.]

CONSTANTINUS RHODIUS (Koautvarioi' and Pobios), is the author of three epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Jacobs, Paralip. e Cod. Vat. 201—203, xiii. pp. 736—740), the first of which was written, as appears from internal evidence, during the joint reign of the emperors Leo and Alexander, that is, between A. D. 906 and 911. Reiske supposed him to be the same person as Constantinus Cephalas, who compiled the Palatine Anthology. [CONSTANTINUS CEPHALAS.] The poetry of Constantinus himself is barbarous in the last degree. (Jacobs, Anthol. Græc. xiii. pp. 674, 675; Fabric., Bibl. Græc. iv. 465.) [O. S.]

CONSTANTINUS SICULUS (Koautvarioi' k Sinulos), is the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology, on the chair (Sipoios) from which he taught, which is followed in the Vatican MS. by the reply of Theophanes. (Jacobs, Paralip. e Cod. Vat. 199, 200, xiii. pp. 737, 738.) Since each poet's name has the title μακασβω added to it, it would appear that they were both dead before the time when the Palatine Anthology was compiled, that is, the beginning of the tenth century. From the subject of the above-mentioned epigram it is inferred, that Constantinus was a rhetorician or philosopher. There is extant in MS. an anacreontic poem by Constantine, a philo-
CONSTANTIUS.

CONSTANTIUS I. FLAVIUS VALERIUS.

The first and most important business of Constantius was the union of Britain with the empire, as Carausius had succeeded in making himself independent of the authority of Diocletian and Maximian. [CARAUSIUS.] After the murder of Carausius by Allectus in 293, this officer seized the government; but Britain was taken from him after a struggle of three years [ALLECTUS], and Constantius established his authority there. Some time afterwards, the Alemani invaded Gaul. A pitched battle took place, in 296, between them and Constantius at Lirongues, in Lugdunensis Primia, now Langres: the Romans were nearly routed, when Constantius restored the battle, defeated the enemy, and killed either 60,000 or 6000 barbarians. They suffered another defeat at Vindonissa, now Windisch, in Switzerland: there are doubts with regard to this battle. After the abolition of Diocletian and Maximian, in 305, Constantius and Galerius assumed the title and dignity of Augusti, and ruled as co-emperors. Constantius died fifteen months afterwards (25th of July, 306) at Eboreum, now York, on an expedition against the Picts, in which he was accompanied by his son Constantine, whom he had by his first wife, Helena, whom he had repudiated. The same Constantine, afterwards the Great, succeeded him in his share of the government. Constantius was one of the most excellent characters among the later Romans, and it is to be regretted that we know so little about him. His administration of his provinces procured him great honour, for he took the most lively interest in the welfare of the people, and was so far from imitating the rapacity of other governors, that he was not even provided with such things as are necessary to men of his rank, though a vulgar appellation calls them luxuries. In his private life he seems, however, to have shown some affection. The Pagans praised him for his humanity, and the Christians for his impartiality and toleration. Theophanes calls him Χριστιάνος, or a man of Christian principles. His conduct during the persecution of the Christians by Diocletian was very humane. It is not known whence he received the surname of Chlorus, or the Pale, which is given to him only by later Byzantine writers. Gibbon (vol. ii. p. 118, note I. ed. 1815) observes, that any remarkable degree of paleness seems inconsistent with the rubor mentioned in the Panegyrics (v. 18). Besides his son and successor, Constantine, Constantius had by his second wife, Theodora, three sons and three daughters, who are mentioned in the genealogical table prefixed to the life of Constantius I. [Eutrop. ix. 14-23; Aurel. Vict. Caeas. 39, &c., Epit. 39; Zosim. ii. 7, &c.; Theophan. pp. 4-8, ed. Paris; Panegyric. Veter. iv, 3, vi. 4, 6; Euseb. Vit. Const. i. 13-21; Treb. Pollio, Claudius, 3. 13; Ael. Spart. Ael. Verus, 2; Vopiscus, Carinus, 16, 17, Aurelianus, 44, Probus, 22; Amm. Marc. xix. 2)] [W. P.]

and part of Illyricum, and Hannibaliannus over Pontus, Cappadocia, and Armenia Minor, with Cæsarea as the capital. The declaration of the army, whether preconcerted between them and the sons of Constantine or not, was agreeable to Constantius, who was apparently resolved to act in accordance with the same views. In a wholesale murder, where the troops were the executioners, the male descendants of Constantius Chlorus by his second wife perished through the cruel perfidy of Constantius, who spared the lives of only two princes, Flavius Julius Gallus and Flavius Claudius Julianus, the sons of Flavius Julianus Constantius, youngest son of Constantius Chlorus, who himself became a victim of his nephew's ambition. Besides those princes, the patrician Optatus and the praefectus praetorio Ablavius were likewise massacred. It would be difficult to exculpate Constantius from the part which he took in this bloody affair, even if it were true that his crime was not so much that of a murderer as that of a cool spectator of a massacre which he could have prevented.

After this the three sons of Constantine the Great had an interview at Sirmium in Pannonia, and made a new division of the empire (September, 337), in which Constantine, the eldest, received Gaul, Spain, Britain, and part of Africa; Constans was master as emperor, and cement their alliance by a marriage with the daughter of Magnentius, and of Magnentius with Constantina, eldest sister of Constantius; they threatened him with the consequences of a war should he decline those propositions. Constantius dismissed the ambassadors with a haughty refusal, and, sending one of them back to Magnentius, ordered the others to be put in prison as the agents of a rebel. His conduct towards Vetranio tended to a reconciliation; but while he promised to acknowledge him as co-emperor if he would join him against Magnentius, he secretly planned treachery. Having bribed or persuaded the principal officers of Vetranio to forsake their master if it should suit his plans, he advanced towards Sardica, now Sophin, where he met with Vetranio, both of them being at the head of an army, that of Vetranio, however, being by far the stronger. Had Vetranio, a straightforward veteran, who could disobey but was not made for more refined perfidy, now acted in the spirit of Constantius, he could have seized his rival in the midst of his camp; but the result was very different. On a plain near Sardica a tribunal was erected, where the two emperors showed themselves to their troops, who filled the plain apparently for the purpose of being witnesses of a ceremony by which the empire was to have two lawful heads. Constantius first addressed the armed crowd, and artfully turning upon his "legitimate" opinion, that a son of the great Constantine was alone worthy to reign, suddenly met with a thunder of applause from his own troops as well as those of Vetranio, who, either spontaneously or in accordance with the instructions of their officers, declared that they would obey no emperor but Constantius. Vetranio at once perceived his situation: he took off his diadem, knelt down before Constantius, and acknowledged him as his master, himself as his guilty subject. Constantius evinced equal wisdom: he raised Vetranio from the ground, bribed or persuaded the principal officers of Vetranio, who, either spontaneously or in accordance with the instructions of their officers, declared that they would obey no emperor but Constantius. Vetranio at once perceived his situation: he took off his diadem, knelt down before Constantius, and acknowledged him as his master, himself as his guilty subject. Constantius evinced equal wisdom: he raised Vetranio from the ground, embraced him, and, as he despaired a throne, assigned him a pension, and allowed him to spend the rest of his days at Prusa. (A. D. 351.)

Constantius now turned his arms against Magnentius, after having appointed his cousin Gallus as Caesar and commander-in-chief of the army against the Persians. At Marsa, now Esek, a town on the river Drave in Hungary, Magnentius was routed (28th of September, A.D. 351) in a bloody battle, in which Constantius evinced more piety than courage, but where the flower of both armies perished. The conquest of Illyricum and Hannibaliannus over the extensive province of Illyricum, was forced by his troops to imitate the example of Magnentius, and he likewise assumed the purple. It was now time for Constantius to prove with his sword that none but a son of the great Constantine should rule over Rome. At the head of his army he marched from the Persian frontier to the West. At Heraclea in Thrace ambassadors of Magnentius waited upon him, proposing that he should acknowledge their master as emperor, and cement their alliance by a marriage of Constantius with the daughter of Magnentius, and of Magnentius with Constantina, eldest sister of Constantius; they threatened him with the consequences of a war should he decline those propositions. Constantius dismissed the ambassadors with a haughty refusal, and, sending one of them back to Magnentius, ordered the others to be put in prison as the agents of a rebel. His conduct towards Vetranio tended to a reconciliation; but while he promised to acknowledge him as co-emperor if he would join him against Magnentius, he secretly planned treachery. Having bribed or persuaded the principal officers of Vetranio to forsake their master if it should suit his plans, he advanced towards Sardica, now Sophin, where he met with Vetranio, both of them being at the head of an army, that of Vetranio, however, being by far the stronger. Had Vetranio, a straightforward veteran, who could disobey but was not made for more refined perfidy, now acted in the spirit of Constantius, he could have seized his rival in the midst of his camp; but the result was very different. On a plain near Sardica a tribunal was erected, where the two emperors showed themselves to their troops, who filled the plain apparently for the purpose of being witnesses of a ceremony by which the empire was to have two lawful heads. Constantius first addressed the armed crowd, and artfully turning upon his "legitimate" opinion, that a son of the great Constantine was alone worthy to reign, suddenly met with a thunder of applause from his own troops as well as those of Vetranio, who, either spontaneously or in accordance with the instructions of their officers, declared that they would obey no emperor but Constantius. COIN OF CONSTANTIUS II.

CONSTANTIUS III., emperor of the West, A.D. 421, was born in Illyria in the latter part of the 4th century of our era. He became early known by his military deeds, and was beloved at the court of the emperor Honorius, as well as among the people and the soldiers, for his talents and amiable yet energetic character, which were enhanced by extraordinary manly beauty. When the tyrant Constantine, after his return from Italy, was besieged in Arles by his rebellious and successful general, Gerontius, Constantius was dispatched by Honorius to reduce Gaul and Spain to obedience; but the emperor refrained from sending troops over to Britain, since this country was then in a hopeless state of revolt against everything Roman. It is related under Constantine the tyrant [p. 031] how Constantius, whose first lieutenant was Ulpianus, a Goth, compelled Gerontius to raise the siege and to fly to the Pyrenees, where he perished. Constantius then continued the siege; but, although closely confined, his adversary found means to send one Edobicus or Edovinchus into Germany, for the purpose of calling the nations beyond the Rhine to his assistance. Edovicus soon returned at the head of a body of Frankish and Alemannic auxiliaries; but, instead of surprising Constantius, the latter surprised him, having suddenly left his camp, and marched to attack the barbarians, whom he and Ulpianus met with beyond the Rhine and defeated entirely. Edovicus was murdered by a friend in whose house he had taken refuge, and the murderer presented the head of Edovicus to the victor, expecting a recompense. With the virtue of an ancient Roman, Constantius refused to accept the hideous present, and ordered the murderer to be turned out of his camp straightway. Constantius hastened back to Arles, resumed the interrupted siege, and forced Constantine to surrender, whose fate is related in his life.
CONSTANTIUS.

Honorius with the consulship (A. D. 414), and was also created comes and patrician. In A. D. 414 he marched against Ataulphus, who supported the claims of the rival emperor Attalus, but was defeated and compelled to give him up to his victor in 416. [ATTALUS.] The reward of Constantius was the hand of Placidia, the sister of Honorius, who, after being a captive of the West-Gothic kings, Ataulphus (to whom she was married), Sigericus, and Wallia, since 410, was given up in 417 by Wallia, who became an ally of the Romans. Constantius afterwards induced him to cede the conquests which he had made in Spain to Honorius, and Wallia received in compensation Aquitania II. and probably also Nevompompania, or Aquitania III. From this time Toulouse became the capital of the West-Gothic kings. In 421 (8th of February), Honorius conferred upon Constantius the dignity of Augustus and the authority of a co-emperor of the West. Theodosius II., emperor of the East, having refused to recognize him as Augustus, Constantius prepared to make war against him; but, before actual hostilities had broken out, he died at Ravenna, on the 11th of September, 421, after a short reign of not quite seven months. After his accession he was more severe than he used to be, but it seems that he does not deserve reproaches for it, since he showed that severity in restoring domestic peace to Italy and Rome, where ambitious men of all nations caused disturbances of the worst description. His children by Placidia were Flavius Placidius Valentinianus, afterwards Valentinian III., emperor, and Justa Grata Honoria, afterwards betrothed to Attila. Only gold coins of Constantius have been found; they are very rare. (Zosim. lib. v. ult. and lib. vii., the chief authority; Sozom. ix. 13—16; Oros. vii. 42, 43; Philostorg. xii. 4, 12; Theoph. pp. 66—72, ed. Paris; Prosper, Chron. Theodosii Aug. IV. Cons. &c.) [W. COIN OF CONSTANTIUS III.

CONSTANTIUS GALLUS. [CONSTANTIUS.]

CONSTANTIUS, a native of Gaul, was private secretary to Attila and his brother Bleda, to whom he was recommended by Aetius. Constantius was a very rapacious man. Having been sent to the court of Theodosius II. to negotiate a lasting peace, he promised to promote the interest of the emperor if he would give him a rich woman in marriage. Theodosius offered him the hand of a daughter of Saturninus, Comes Domestorum, who was very rich, but who had been carried off by Zeno, Prefectus Orienti. Constantius having complained about it to Attila, this king threatened to invade Greece if the emperor did not produce the woman, and as Theodosius was unable to do so, Attila availed himself of the circumstance as a pretext for making war upon the emperor. During this war (A. D. 441) he laid siege to Sirmium. The bishop of Sirmium sent a considerable quantity of gold and silver vessels belonging to his church to Constantius, requesting that he would keep them as his ransom in case the town should be taken and he fall into the hands of the victors. But Constantius kept those vessels for himself, and pledged them to a banker of the name of Sylvanus. When after the capture of Sirmium and the captivity of the bishop, Attila was informed of the robbery, he requested Theodosius to give up Sylvanus and his property, and Theodosius having refused to comply with the demand, Attila prolonged the war on that ground. Constantius was afterwards charged with high treason, and crucified by order of his master. (Pelasgus, in Excerpt. de Legat. pp. 54, 57, 69, ed. Paris.) [W. P.]

CONSTANTIUS, a presbyter of Lyons, wrote a biography of Germans, bishop of Auxerre, who died in A. D. 448. This work, entitled Vita S. Germani Episcopi Austrigotorum, appears from the second dedication to have been completed about A. D. 488, and is contained in the compilations of Surius and of the Bollandists under the Saints of July. It was rendered into verse by Ericus, a Benedictine monk of Auxerre, who lived about A. D. 989, and translated into French by Arnauld d'Andilly.

Some persons have ascribed to Constantius the "Vita S. Justi Lugdunensis Episcopi," who died in A. D. 390, but there is no evidence that he was the author. This performance also will be found in Surius under September 2nd, and has been translated into French by Le Maître de Sacy in his "Vies des Pères du Desert." [W. R.]

CONSUS, an ancient Roman divinity, whose name is derived from some consus, i. e. consos (Plut. Rom. 14, c. 10, Eutull. de Spect. 9), while others regard it as a contraction of consuli. (Pseudo-Ascon. in Cie. Verr. ii. 10.) All we know about the nature of this divinity is limited to what may be inferred from the etymology of the name, and from the rites and ceremonies which were observed at his festival, the Consualia. (Dict. of Ant. v. v.) With regard to the former, some call him the god of secret deliberations, and others the hidden or mysterious god, that is, a god of the lower regions. The story about the introduction of his worship throws no light upon the question, since both explanations are equally in accordance with it. When after the building of Rome the Romans had no women, it is said, and when their suit to obtain them from the neighbouring tribes was rejected, Romulus spread a report, that he had found the altar of an unknown god buried under the earth. The god was called Consus, and Romulus vowed sacrifices and a festival to him, if he succeeded in the plan he devised to obtain wives for his Romans. (Plut. l. c.; Dionys. ii. 30, &c.) Livy (i. 9) calls the god Neptunus Equestris. Hartung (Die Relig. d. Rom. ii. p. 87) has pointed out reasons sufficient to shew, that Consus must be regarded as an infernal divinity; this notion is implied in the tradition of his altar being found under the earth, and also in the fact that mules and horses, which were under the especial protection of the infernal divinities, were used in the races at the Consualia, and were treated with especial care and solemnity on that occasion. [L. S.]

COON (Kōν'), a son of Antener and brother of Iphidamas, who wounded Agamemnon, but was afterwards slain by him. He was represented on the chest of Cypselus. (Hom. H. ii. 748, &c., xix. 53; Paus. v. 13, § 1.) [L. S.]

COHEN or COPHES (Κοθήν, Κόθης), son of the satrap Artabazus [No. 4, p. 368, b.], was appointed to convey to Damascus the treasures of Dareius, when the latter marched from Babylon to meet Alexander, b. c. 333. (Arr. Anab. ii. 15; comp. Curt. iii. 10.) The favour with which Alexander regarded Artabazus was extended also to Cohen, whom we find mentioned among the young Asiatic nobles that were enrolled in the body of cavalry called Αὐγύμα, in the re-organization of the army in b. c. 124. (Arr. Anab. vii. 6; comp. Polyb. v. 23, 63, xxxi. 3.) [E. E.]

COPONIUS, the name of a Roman family, which originally came from Tiber. The name occurs in an inscription found at Tibur.

1. T. COPONIUS, of Tibur, a man of distinguished merit and rank, was made a Roman citizen upon the condemnation of C. Masso, whom he accused. (Cic. pro Ballb. 23.)

2. M. COPONIUS, had a celebrated law-suit respecting an inheritance with M. Curius. b. c. 93. The cause of Coponius was pleaded by Q. Scaevola, and that of Curius by L. Crassus, in the court of the centumviri. (Cic. de Orat. i. 39, ii. 32, Brut. 52.) [Curius.]

3. 4. T. and C. COPONIUS, two grandsons of No. 1, are spoken of by Cicero in b. c. 56 as two young men of great acquirements. (Cic. pro Ballb. 23, pro Cael. 10.) C. Coponius is probably the same as No. 6.

5. COPONIUS, was left in command of Carsee in the expedition of Crassus against the Parthians, b. c. 53. (Plut. Cesar. 27.) He may also have been the same as No. 6.

6. C. COPONIUS, one of the prae tors on the breaking out of the civil war in b. c. 49. He espoused the side of Pompey, followed him into Greece, and had the command of the Rhodian ships conjointly with C. Marcellus. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 12, &c.; Cas. B. C. iii. 5, 26; Cic. de Div. i. 32, ii. 55.) Coponius was proscribed by the triumvirs in b. c. 43, but his wife obtained his pardon from Antony by the sacrifice of her honour. (Appian, B. C. iii. 40.) He is afterwards mentioned shortly before the battle of Actium as the father-in-law of Silus, and as a greatly respected member of the senate. (Vell. Pat. ii. 63.)

The following coin was probably struck by order of this Coponius. It contains on the obverse the head of Apollo, with the inscription Q. SCINITIUS 111 vii (that is, of the mint), and on the reverse a club with the skin of a lion upon it, and the inscription C. COPONIUS Pr. S. C. The reverse no doubt has reference to Hercules, whose worship prevailed at Tibur.

COPO'NIUS, a Roman sculptor, author of the fourteen statues of nations conquered by Pompey, which were placed at the entrance of the porticos belonging to the theatre of Pompey at Rome, which gave to this entrance-hall the name of Porticus ad Nationes. This was built by Pompey himself, and afterwards restored by Augustus. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4, §§ 12, 13; Suet. Claud. 46; Sert. Virg. Aen. viii. 720; Thiersch, Epoch. p. 296; Urlichs, Beschreib. der Stadt Rom, iii. 3, p. 59.)[L. U.]

COPREUS (Κόπρευς), a son of Peopas and father of Periphetes. After having murdered Iphitus, he fled from Elis to Mycenae, where he was purified by Eurystheus, who employed him to inform Heracles of the labours he had to perform. (Hom. H. ix. 639; Apollod. i. 5, § 1.) Euripides in his "Heracleidae" makes him the herald of Eurystheus. [L. S.]

CORAX (Kὀραξ), a Sicilian, who, after the expulsion of Thrasybulus from Syracuse (b. c. 467), by his oratorical powers acquired so much influence over the citizens, that for a considerable time he was the leading man in the commonwealth. The great increase of litigation consequent on the confusion produced by the expulsion of the tyrants and the claims of those whom they had deprived of their property, gave a new impulse to the practice of forensic eloquence. Corax applied himself to the study of its principles, opened a school of rhetoric, and wrote a treatise (entitled Τίτπρητική) embodying such rules of the art as he had discovered. He is commonly mentioned, with his pupil Tisias, as the founder of the art of rhetoric; he was at any rate the earliest writer on the subject. His work has entirely perished. It has been conjectured (by Garnier, Mom. de l'Institut, de France, Classe d'Histoire, vol. ii. p. 44, &c., and others), though upon very slight and insufficient grounds, that the treatise entitled Ρητορικά ad Alexandrum, found amongst the works of Aristotle, is the supposed lost work of Corax. (Cic. Brut. 12, de Orat. i. 20, iii. 21; Aristot. Rhet. ii. 24; Quintil. iii. i; Mongitior, Bibl. Sicul. i. p. 146, &c., ii. p. 267, &c.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredlsamkeit, i. § 27, note 5, &c., ii. § 68, notes 6, 37.) [C. P. M.]

CORBLES and ORSUA, two Spanish chiefs, and cousins-german, fought in the presence of Scipio at New Carthage in Spain, b. c. 206, for the sovereignty of the town of Ibis. (Liv. xxviii. 21; Val. Max. ix. 11, &c.)

CORBULO, CN. DOMITIUS, a son of Vestilia, who was married first to Herdonius, afterwards to Pompeius, and at last to Orfitus. He was accordingly a brother of Caesonia, the wife of Caligula. He was invested with the praetorship as early as the reign of Tiberius, and after the expiration of this office was commissioned by Tiberius and afterwards by Caligula to superintend the improvement of the high-roads in Italy, which the carelessness of the magistrates had allowed to fall into decay. While engaged upon this undertaking he committed acts of cruelty and extortion, probably in compliance with commands which he received from Caligula, who rewarded his proceedings with the honour of consul successus in a. d. 39. In the reign of Claudius, however, he was taken to account for these proceedings, and those who had been injured by him were indemnified as far as was possible. In 47, however, Corbulo obtained the command of an army in Germany, and fought with great success against the Chauci under their leader Gennascus. He maintained excellent discipline among his troops, and acted with great prudence, as his career was thus checked without any disaster; but to prevent his soldiers from becoming demoralized by inactivity, he made them dig a canal between the Meuse and the Rhine, of 23,000 paces in length, in order to prevent the inundation of the country by the tide of the sea.

In 54, shortly after the accession of Nero, Corbulo was entrusted with the supreme command against the Parthians, whose king, Vologeses, had invaded Armenia and expelled its king, Rhihamistus, who was under the protection of the Romans. But as Vologeses was engaged in quelling an insurrection of his own son, Vardanes, he withdrew his troops from Armenia, and gave the most distinguished members of the family of the Arsacidæ as hostages to the Romans. But, a few years later, A.D. 58, the war broke out anew, and Corbulo fought with great success against Tiridates, the brother of Vologeses, who now claimed the throne of Armenia. Corbulo took the towns of Artaxata and Tigranocerta, and secured the throne to Tiridates, to whom Nero had given the kingdom of Armenia. In 63, Vologeses and Tiridates renewed the war; and, as Corbulo had to protect Syria, Caesennius Paetus was sent into Armenia; but he conducted the war with so much inability and want of success, that Corbulo was in the end glad to see Vologeses willing to conclude a treaty by which both the Romans and Parthians were obliged to evacuate Armenia.

But Tiridates soon after took possession of Armenia, and then sent an insulting letter to Rome, requesting Nero's sanction to his title of king of Armenia. This conduct occasioned a renewal of the war, and Corbulo marched with a strong army into Armenia. But the Parthians had become tired of incessant warfare: they sued for peace, and Tiridates condescended to lay down his crown before a statue of Nero, in order to receive it back at Rome from the hands of the emperor himself. Corbulo sent Annius, his son-in-law, to accompany Tiridates to Rome, in order to attest his own fidelity to the emperor.

Corbulo was one of the greatest generals of the time, and amid the universal hatred which Nero had drawn upon himself, Corbulo remained faithful to him. His power and influence with the army were very great, and if he had placed himself at the head of an insurrection, he would have been sure of obtaining the imperial dignity. But he seems never to have entertained such a thought: the reward he earned for his fidelity was—death. For, in A.D. 67, when Nero was in Greece, he invited Corbulo to come to him. As soon as the latter landed at Cenchrea, Nero gave orders for his execution. When Corbulo was informed of his fate, he plunged his sword into his breast, exclaiming, "Well deserved!" (Plin. H. N. ii. 70, vi. 8, 13, vii. 6; Tac. Ann. iii. 31, ix. 1, &c., xii. 6, &c., xv. 28, &c., xi. 1, &c., 56, &c., Hist. i. 76; Dion Cass. lix. 15, lx. 1, &c., 16, &c., lxii. 17; Frouin. Strateg. iv. 2, 7, ii. 9, 1.)

CORDAC (Koßiaka), a surname of Elias, derived from an indecent dance called Kößiaka, which the companions of Pelopa are said to have performed in honour of the goddess after a victory which they had won. (Paus. vii. 22. § 1.)

CORDAS, AELEUS, or JUNIUS CORDAS, apparently different designations of the same individual—an historian perpetually quoted by Capito-lins in his biographies of Albinus, the Maximins, the Gordians, and Maximus with Balbinus. He appears to have been an accurate chronicler of trivial facts. (Capit. Alam. c. 11.)

CORDAS, CAESIUS, governor of Crete, with the title of proconsul, in the reign of Tiberius, was accused by Anachusus Prisci of extortion in his province. The accusation was supported by the inhabitants of Cyrene, which was included in the province of Crete, and Cordas was condemned. (Tac. Ann. iii. 38, 70.)

CORDAS, CREAMUTOUS, a Roman historian, who, after having lived long and blamelessly, was impeached by two of his own clients before Tiberius of having praised Brutus and denounced Cassius as the "list of the Romans." Tacitus says, "Tasius, "noe ac tune primum audito." His real offence, however, was the freedom of speech in which he had indulged against Sejanus, for the work in which the objectionable passages occurred had been published for many years, and had been read with approbation by Augustus himself. Perceiving from the relentless aspect of the emperor that there was no room for hope, Cordas delivered an apology, the substance of which has been preserved or fabricated by Tacitus, appealing to the immunity enjoyed under similar circumstances by all preceding ananlists, and then quitting the senate-house retired to his own mansion, where he starved himself to death. (A. D. 25.) The subservient fathers ordained that his works should be burned by the adeles in the city, and by the public authorities wherever elsewhere found, but copies were so much the more eagerly treasured in concealment by his daughter Marcia and by his friends, who afterwards gave them again to the world with the full permission of Caligula. A few scanty fragments are contained in the seventh of the Suetonius of Seneca.

(Tac. Ann. iv. 34, 35; Sueton. Octav. 35, Tib. 61, Calig. 16; Seneq. Suvor. vii., and especially his Consoliato addressed to Marcia, the daughter of Cremutius Cordus, cc. 1 and 22; Dion Cass. liv. 24.)

CORDAS, JUNIUS. [Cordus, Cremutius.] CORDAS, MUCIUS. This surname was borne by some of the Scaevolae [Scaevolak], and occurs on the annexed coin of the Mucia gens. The obverse represents two heads, the one crowned with laurel and the other with a helmet, which would appear from the letters on each side to represent Honos and Virtus: the letters KALIENI underneath refer to some members of the Fufin gens. [Caelus.] On the reverse two women are standing, the one on the left representing Italia and the one on the right Roma, the former holding a cornucopia in her hand, and the latter with a sceptre in her hand and her foot on a globe beneath is Cordus. Who the Calenus and Cordus are, mentioned on the coin, is quite uncertain. The figures of Italy and Roma would seem to refer to the times when harmony was established between 312 CORINNA.

CORIOLANUS.

She was named Mosia (the Fly). We have mention of a younger Corinna of Thbes, also named Mosia, who is probably the same with the contemporary of Pindar. And so also is probably a Myia or Corinna of Thespiae who is mentioned (Suidas, s. v. KÔpav). The fragments that are left may be found in Ch. Wolf's Poët. octo fragm. et log. Hamburg, 1734, and in A. Schneider's Poët. Græc. Fragm. Giessen, 1802. [C. P. M.]

CORINNUS (KÔpivos), was, according to Suidas (s. a.), an epic poet, a native of Ilium, who lived before Homer, in the time of the Trojan war, and wrote an Iliad, from which Homer borrowed the argument of his poem. He also, according to the same authority, sang the war of Dardanus with the Paphliagonians. He is likewise said to have been a pupil of Palamedes, and to have written in the Doric characters invented by the latter. (Suidas, s. a.; Eudocia, p. 271; Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. i. 16.)

CORINTHUS (KÔpivos), according to the local tradition of Corinth, a son of Zeus and the founder of the town of Corinth. (Paus. ii. i. § 1; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 155.) There are two other mythical beings of this name. (Paus. ii. i. § 8; Apollod. iii. 16. § 1) [L. S.]

CORIOLANUS, C., or more properly, Cn. Marcius, the hero of one of the most beautiful of the early Roman legends, was said to have been the son of a descendant of king Ancus Marcus. His mother's name, according to the best authorities, was Veturia (Plutarch calls her Volurnina). He lost his father while yet a child, and under the training of his mother, whom he loved exceedingly, grew up to be a brave and valiant man; but he was likewise noted for his imperious and proud temper. He was said to have fought in the battle by the lake Regillus, and to have won a civic crown in it. To explain his surname, Coriolanus, the legend told how in a war with the Volscians their capital, Corioli, was attacked by the Romans. When the enemy made a sally, Marcus at the head of a few brave men drove them back, and then, single-handed (for his followers could not support him), drove the Volscians before him to the other side of the town. So in memory of his prowess the surname Coriolanus was given him. But his haughty bearing towards the commons, unless they gave up their tribunes. Coriolanus advised that it should not be distributed to the commons, unless they gave up their tribunes. For this he was impeached and condemned to exile. He now took refuge among the Volscians, and promised to assist them in war against the Romans. Attius Tullius, the king of the Volscians, found a pretext for a quarrel, and war was declared. Coriolanus was appointed general of the Volscian army. He took many towns, and advanced plundering and burning the property of the commons, but sparing that of the patricians. At the close of the campaign he was killed in a battle with the Romans under the command of Cnaeus Marcius, or Caius Marcius, who was called Coriolanus. His body was brought back to the town of Corbulo, and his heart was put into the temple of Hercules. (Plut. Cn. Marcius, i. 44, § 6.)

CORK, of Corinth, mentioned among the mythic accounts (Eudocia, p. 270; Welcker, in Creuzer's Ad Apoll. Rhod. xi. 44.) It is probably this Corfidius of Corinth, whose return to life an amusing tale is related by Pliny on the authority of Varro. (H. N. vii. 52.)

CORINNA (KÔpava), a Greek poetess, a native of Tanagra in Boeotia. According to some accounts (Eudocia, p. 270; Welcker, in Creuzer's Melanen, i. pp. 10-17), she was the daughter of Acheiadores and Procratia. On account of her long residence in Thbes, she was sometimes called a Theban. She flourished about the beginning of the fifth century B.C. She was a contemporary of Pindar, whom she is said to have instructed (Plut. de Glor. Athen. iv. p. 348, a), and with whom she strove for a prize at the public games at Thbes. According to Aelian (V. H. xii. 25), she gained the victory over him five times. Pausanias (ix. 22. § 3) does not speak of more than one victory, and mentions a picture which he saw at Tanagra, in which she was represented binding her hair with a fillet in token of her victory, which he attributes as much to her beauty and to the circumstance that she wrote in the AEolic dialect, as to her poetical talents. At a later period, when Pindar's fame was more securely established, she blamed her contemporary, Myrta, for entering into a similar contest with him. (Apoll. Dyscolus in Wolf, Corinnae Carm. p. 56, &c.) The AEolic dialect employed by Corinna had many Boeotian peculiarities. (Eustath. ad Od. vol. i. p. 376. 10, ad II. vol. ii. p. 384. 22, ed. Lips.; Wolf, L. c.) She appears to have intended her poems chiefly for Boeotian ears; hence the numerous local references connected with Boeotia to be found in them. (Paus. ix. 20. § 1; Steph. Bys. s. v. Ἑθήναι; Eustath. ad II. vol. i. p. 213. 2, ed. Lips.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 1177.) They were collected in five books, and were chiefly of a lyrical kind, comprising choral songs, lyrical mones, parthenia, epigrams, and erotic and heroic poems. The last, however, seem to have been written in a lyrical form. Among them we find mentioned one entitled Telam, and one the Sextos against Thbes. Only a few unimportant fragments have been preserved.

Statues were erected to Corinna in different parts of Greece, and she was ranked as the first and most distinguished of the nine lyrical Muses.
CORIPPUS.

Now, Johannes Cuspianus "De Caesaribus et Imperatoribus" declares, that he seized in the royal library at Buda a poem in eight books, entitled Johannes by Flavius Cresconius Corippus, the subject of which was the war carried on against the Africans by Johannes Patricius, and he quotes the first five lines beginning

"Signa, duces gentesque feras, Martisque ruinas."

Moreover, we can prove from history that Cuspianus was at Buda between the years 1510 and 1515. Secondly, it is known that as late as 1552 a MS. "De Bellis Libycis" was preserved in the monastery of the Monte Casino, bearing the name of Cresconius, the first word being "Victoris." This does not correspond, it will be observed, with the commencement given by Cuspianus; but the difference, as we shall soon see, is only apparent. Both of the above MSS. have disappeared, and left no traces behind them. Lastly, in the Vallicellian library at Rome is a MS. of the tenth century, containing a collection of ancient canons, to which the transcriber has prefixed the following note: "Concordia Canonum a Cresconio Africano episcopo digesta sub capitulis trecentis: iae minum Cresconius bella et victorias, quas Johannes Patricius apud Africanum Saracensem esse, hexametrica versionem descriptit." &c. From this it was inferred by many scholars, that Cresconius must have flourished towards the end of the seventh century, since we learn from Cedrenus that, in 697, the Arabs overran Africa, and were expelled by a certain Johannes Patricius despatched thither by the emperor Leontius; hence also Corippus and Cresconius were generally distinguished from each other by their dates, being supposed to be the author of the panegyric upon Justin, the latter of the Concordia Canonum and the poem "de Bellis Libycis." Various other conjectures were formed and combinations imagined which are now not worth discussing, since a great portion of the doubt and difficulty was removed by Mazzuchelli in 1814, who discovered the long-lost Johannes in the library of the Marquis of Trivulzi at Milan, where it had been overlooked in consequence of having been inserted in the catalogue as the production of a Johannes de Arctio, who lived towards the close of the 14th century, and who appears to have transcribed it into the same volume with his own barbarous effusions. The Praefatio to this Johannes begins

"Victoris, proceres, praesumi diecae lauros, while the first lines of the poem itself are the same with those quoted by Cuspianus, thus establishing the identity of the piece with that contained in the MSS. of Buda and Monte Casino, and enabling us to determine the full name of the author as given at the head of this article. The theme is a war carried on in Africa against the Moors and Vandals during the reign of Justinian, about the year 550, by a proconsul or magister militum named Johannes, who is the hero of the lay. The campaign in question is noticed by Procopius (B. V. i. 28, B. G. iv. 17) and Paulus Diaconus. (de Gestis Longobard. i. 23.) Of Johannes we know nothing except what we are told by Procopius and by the poet himself. He was the brother of Pappus; had served along with him on two previous occasions in Africa, under Belissarius in 533, and under Germanus in 537; his father was named Evantus; his wife was the daughter of a king; his son was called Peter; he had been employed in the East against the Persians, and had been recalled from hence to head an expedition against the rebellious Moors. (Procop. Hist. 34; Jahn. i. 197, 380, vii. 576.)

Although the designation and age of Corippus are thus satisfactorily ascertained, and the author of the Johannis is proved to be the same person with the panegyrist of Justinian's nephew, we have no means of deciding with equal certainty whether he is to be identified with the African bishop Caesarius who compiled a Canonum Brevarium and a Concordia Canonum, the former being a sort of index or table of contents to the latter, which comprises an extensive and important corpus of the laws of the Church, arranged not chronologically according to the date of the several councils, but systematically according to the nature of the subjects, and distributed under three hundred titles. Saxe and most writers upon the history of ecclesiastical literature place the prelate in the reign of Tiberius III. as low as A.D. 698, this epoch being assigned to him on the double supposition that he was the composer of the Libyan War and that this was the Libyan War of Leontius; but the latter hypothesis has now been proved to be false. The epithets Africani and Grammatici—attached, as we have already seen, to the name of Corippus in the editions of the panegyric, the former pointing out his country, which is clearly indicated by several expressions in the work itself, the latter a complimentary designation equivalent at that period to "learned,"—convey the sum total of the information we possess concerning his personal history.

With regard to his merits, the epigrammatic censure of Baillct, that he was a great flatterer and a little poet, is perhaps not absolutely unjust; but if we view him in relation to the state of literature in the age when he flourished, and compare him with his contemporaries, we may feel inclined to entertain some respect for his talents. He was evidently very read in Virgil, Lucan, and Claudian; the last two especially seem to have been his models; and hence, while his language is wonderfully pure, we have a constant display of rhetorical declamation and a most ambitious striving after splendid of diction. Nor is the perusal of his verses unattended with profit, inasmuch as he frequently sheds light upon a period of history for which our authorities are singularly imperfect and obscure, and frequently illustrates with great life and vigour, the manners of the Byzantine court. In proof of this, we need only turn to the 45th chapter of Gibbon, where the striking description of Justin's elevation, and the complicated ceremonies which attended his coronation, is merely a translation "into simple and concise prose" from the first two books of Corippus. The text, as might be anticipated from the circumstance that each poem depends upon a single MS., that one of these has never been collated or even seen by any modern scholar, and that the other was transcribed at a late period by a most ignorant scribe,—is miserably defective; nor can we form any reasonable expectation of its being materially improved.

The Epiteto Princes of the Panegyric is generally marked by bibliographers as having been printed by Plantin, at Antwerp, in 1581; but Funkeius (De iuret ac decrepiti. L. L. Sceutetius, p. 247) speaks as if Ruiz had previously published an edition at Madrid in 1579; to this, or these, succeeded the edition of Thomas Dempster, 8vo., Paris, 1610; of Rivinus, 8vo., Leipzig, 1663; of Ritterhusius, 4to., Altdorf, 1664; of Gosteiisius, 8vo., Altdorf, 1743; and of Foggini, 4to. Rome, 1777, which completes the list.

The Johannis, discovered as described above, was first printed at Milan, 4to., 1820, with the notes of Mauluchelli.

Both works will be found in the best form in the new Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae at present in the course of publication at Bonn.

The Canbnun Brevatium and the Concordia Canxonum are printed entire in the first volume of the Bibliotheca Juris Canonicus published by Voelius and Justellus at Paris, fol. 1661.

The Brevarium was first published at Paris by Pithou in 1568, 8vo., and is contained in the Bibliotheca Patrum Latina, vol. ix. [W. R.]

CORISCUS (Kopiscus), is mentioned, with Erastus, as a disciple of Plato, by Diogenes (iii. 31, s. 46), who also states, that Plato wrote a letter to Erastus and Coriscus. (iii. 36, s. 61.) They were both natives of Scepsis in the Troas. (Diog. L.: Stabh. viii. p. 408.)

CORNELII. 1. One of the noble women at Rome, who was said to have been guilty of poisoning the leading men of the state in B.C. 321, the first instance in which this crime is mentioned in Roman history. The accusers were informed by a slave-girl of the guilt of Cornelia and other Roman matrons, and in consequence of her information they detected Cornelia and her accomplices in the act of preparing certain drugs over a fire, which they were compelled by the magistrates to drink, and thus perished. (Liv. viii. 18; comp. Val. Max. ii. 5; § 3; August. de Civ. Dei, iii. 17; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Veneficium.)

Family of the Cincinni.

2. Daughter of L. Cnina, one of the great leaders of the Marian party, was married to C. Caesar, afterwards dictator. Caesar married her in B.C. 83, when he was only seventeen years of age; and when Sulla commanded him to put her away, he refused to do so, and chose rather to be deprived of her fortune and to be proscribed himself. Cornelia bore him his daughter Julia, and died before his quaestorship. Caesar delivered an oration in praise of her from the Rostra, when he was quaestor. (Plut. Caes. 1, 5; Suet. Caes. 1, 5, 6; Vell. Pat. ii. 41.)

3. Sister of the preceding, was married to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was proscribed by Sulla in B.C. 82, and killed in Africa, whither he had fled. [AHERNOBARBUS, No. 6.]

Family of the Scipiones.

4. The elder daughter of P. Scipio Africanus the elder, was married in her father's lifetime to P. Scipio Nasica. (Liv. xxxvii. 37; Polyb. xxxii. 13.)

5. The younger daughter of P. Scipio Africanus the elder, was married to Tl. Sempronius Gracchus, censor B. C. 169, and was by him the mother of the two tribunes Tiberius and Caius. Gracchus espoused the popular party in the commonwealth, and was consequently not on good terms with Scipio, and it was not till after the death of the latter, according to most accounts, that Gracchus married his daughter. According to other statements, however, Cornelia was married to Gracchus in the life-time of her father, and Scipio is said to have given her to Gracchus, because the latter interfered to save his brother L. Scipio from being dragged to prison. (Plut. T. Grach. 1; Liv. xxxviii. 57.) Cornelia was left a widow with a young family of twelve children, and devoted herself entirely to their education, rejecting all offers of a second marriage, and adhering to her resolution even when tempted by Ptolemy, who offered to share his crown and bed with her. Of her numerous family three only survived their childhood,—a daughter, who was married to Scipio Africanus the Younger, and her two sons Tiberius and Cains. Cornelia had inherited from her father a love of literature, and united in her person the severe virtues of the old Roman matron with the superior knowledge, refinement, and civilization which then began to prevail in the higher classes at Rome. She was well acquainted with Greek literature, and spoke her own language with that purity and elegance which pre-eminently characterizes well educated women in every country. Her letters, which were extant in the time of Cicero, were models of composition, and it was doubtless mainly owing to her judicious training that her sons became in after-life such distinguished orators and statesmen. (Comp. Cic. Brut. 58.) As the daughter of the conqueror of Hannibal, the mother of the Gracchi, and the mother-in-law of the taker of Carthage and Numantia, Cornelia occupies a prouder position than any other woman in Roman history. She was almost idolized by the people, and exercised an important influence over her two sons, whose greatness she lived to see,—and also their death. It was related by some writers that Ti. Gracchus was urged on to propose his laws by the reproaches of his mother, who upbraided him with her being called the mother-in-law of Scipio and not the mother of the Gracchi; but though she was doubtless privy to all the plans of her son, and probably urged him to persevere in his course, his lofty soul needed not such inducements as these to undertake what he considered necessary for the salvation of the state. Such respect was paid to her, that by her son Cains, that he dropped a law upon her intercession which was directed against M. Octavius, who had been a colleague of Tiberius in his tribunate. But great as she was, she did not escape the foul aspersions of calumny and slander. Some attributed to her, with the assistance of her daughter, the death of her son-in-law, Scipio Africanus the Younger (Appian, B. C. ii. 20); but this charge is probably nothing but the base invention of party malice. She bore the death of her sons with unbounded hospitality; she was constantly surrounded by Greeks and men of letters; and the various kings in alliance with the Romans were accustomed to send her presents, and receive the like from her in return. Thus she reached a good old age, honoured and respected by all, and the Roman people erected a statue to her, with the inscription, CORNELIA, MOTHER OF THE GRACCHI. (Plut. T. Grach. 1, 8; C. Grach. 4, 19; Oros. v. 12; Vell. Pat. ii. 7.)

6. Daughter of P. Cornelius Scipio (also called Q. Cæcilius Metellus Scipio, on account of his adoption by Q. Metellus), consul in B. c. 52, was first married to P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir, who perished, in B. c. 53, with his father, in the expedition against the Parthians. In the next year she married Pompey the Great. This marriage was not merely a political one; for Pompey seems to have been captivated by her. She was still young, possessed of extraordinary beauty, and distinguished for her knowledge of literature, music, geometry, and philosophy. In B. c. 49, Pompey sent her, when he abandoned Italy, with his youngest son Sextus to Lebes, where she received her husband upon his flight after the battle of Pharsalin. She accompanied him to the Egyptian coast, saw him murdered, and fled first to Cyprus and afterwards to Cyrene. But, pardoned by Caesar, she soon afterwards returned to Rome, and received from him the ashes of her husband, which she preserved on his Alban estate. (Plut. Pomp. 56, 66, 74, 76, 78—80; Appian, B. C. ii. 83; Dion Cass. xl. 51, xlii. 5; Vell. Pat. ii. 53; Lucan, iii. 23, v. 725, viii. 40, &c.)

Family of the Sullae.

7. Sister of the dictator Sulla, was married to Nonius, and her son is mentioned as grown up in B. c. 88. (Plut. Sull. 10.)

8. Daughter of the dictator Sulla, was married to Q. Pompeius Rufus, who was murdered by the Marian party, in B. c. 88, at the instigation of the tribune Sulpicius. (Liv. Epit. 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 18; Plut. Sull. 8.)

9. Another daughter of the dictator Sulla, was married first to C. Memmius, and afterwards to T. Annius Milo. She is better known by the name of Fausta. (Fausta.)

CORNELIA ORISTILLA. [ORISTILLA.]
CORNELIA PAULLA. [PAULLA.]
CORNELIA GENSI, patrician and plebeian, was one of the most distinguished Roman gentes, and produced a greater number of illustrious men than any other house at Rome. All its great families belonged to the patrician order. The names of the patrician families are:—Arvina, Blasio, Cethegus, Cinna, Cosius, Dolabella, Lentulus (with the agnomens Caudius, Codi- annus, Crus, Gaeticus, Lupus, Maluginensis, Marcellinus, Niger, Rufius, Scipio, Spinther, Sura), Maluginensis, Mammula, Merenda, Mbrula, Rufinus, Scapula, Scipio (with the agnomens Afri cus, Atactucus, Astina, Barbetius, Calves, Hipollitus, Nosicus, Serapeo), Sisenna, and Stella (with the agnomen Pedius). The names of the plebeian families are:—Balbus, Blasio, Cethegus, Cinna, Lentulus, Scipio, Sisenna, and Stella. Under the empire the number of cognomens increased considerably; of these an alphabetical list is given under Cornelius. The following cognomina occur on coins of this gens:—Balbus, Blasio, Cethegus, Cinna, Lentulus, Scipio, Sisenna, Stella. Under the empire the number of cognomens increased considerably; of these an alphabetical list is given under Cornelius.

856 CORNELIUS.

3. C. CORNELIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 67; whom Cicero defended. See below.

4. C. CORNELIUS, a Roman knight, and one of Cicero's crew, undertook, in connection with L. Varrutneatus, to murder Cicero in B.C. 63, but their plan was frustrated by information conveyed to Cicero through Curius and Fulvia. When accused subsequently, he could obtain no one to defend him; but he escaped punishment probably on account of the information he gave respecting the conspirators. When P. Sulla was accused in B.C. 62 of participation in the conspiracy, Cornelius was ably defended by Cicero (part of whose speech is extant), and was acquitted by a majority of votes. [CORNINUS, Nos. 5 and 6.]

6. C. CORNELIUS, a centurion in the army of young Octavianus, was at the head of the embassy sent to Rome in B.C. 43, to demand in the name of the army the consulship for their general. When the senate hesitated to comply with their demands, Cornelius threw back his cloak, and pointing to the hilt of his sword, exclaimed, "This shall make him consul, if you won't." [Suet. Aug. 26.]

C. CORNELIUS, of a plebeian branch of the Cornelius gens, was quaestor of Pompey the Great. In the year B.C. 67, he was tribune of the plebs, and proposed a law in the senate to prevent the leading of money to foreign ambassadors at Rome. The proposition was not carried, since many of the senators derived profit from the practice, which had led to shameful abuses by the bribery and extortions which it covered. He then proposed that no person should be released from the obligations of a law except by the populares. The senate had of late exercised a power, analogous to that of the British Parliament in passing private acts, which exempt individuals in certain cases from the general provisions of the law. This power the senate was unwilling to be deprived of, and the tribune Servilius Globulus, a colleague of Cornelius, was persuaded to interpose, and prohibit the reading of the rogation by the clerk. Cornelius thereupon read it himself, and a tumult followed. Cornelius took no part in the riot, and evaded it by being content with a law, which made the same as the friend of Phrynichus, as Mai supposes, is uncertain, though there is nothing to oppose the supposition. [L. S.]

CORNELIUS. Many plebeians of this name frequently occurred towards the end of the republic without any cognomen. [CORNELIA GENR.] Their great number is no doubt owing to the fact mentioned by Appian (B. C. i. 100), that the dictator Sulla bestowed the Roman franchise upon 10,000 slaves, and called them after his own name, "Cornelii," that he might always have a large number among the people to support him. Of these the most important are:

1. C. CORNELIUS, a secretary (scriba) in Sulla's dictatorship, lived to become city quaestor in the dictatorship of Caesar. (Sall. Hist. in Or. Lex.; Cic. de Off. ii. 8.)

2. C. CORNELIUS PHAGITA, the commander of a company of soldiers, into whose hands Caesar fell when he was proscribed by Sulla in B.C. 82. It was with difficulty that Cornelius allowed him to escape even after receiving a bribe of two talents, but Caesar never punished him when he afterwards obtained supreme power. (Suet. Aug. 74; Plut. Cæs. i. 329.)

3. C. CORNELIUS, tribune of the plebs, B.C. 51, whom Cicero defended. See below.

4. C. CORNELIUS, a Roman knight, and one of Cicero's crew, undertook, in connection with L. Varrutneatus, to murder Cicero in B.C. 63, but their plan was frustrated by information conveyed to Cicero through Curius and Fulvia. When accused subsequently, he could obtain no one to defend him; but he escaped punishment probably on account of the information he gave respecting the conspirators. When P. Sulla was accused in B.C. 62 of participation in the conspiracy, Cornelius was ably defended by Cicero (part of whose speech is extant), and was acquitted by a majority of votes. [CORNINUS, Nos. 5 and 6.] In his tribuneship, he was the successful proposer of a law, of which the importance can scarcely be over-rated. In order to check the partiality of occasional edicts, it was enacted by the lex Cornelia "ut remissor ex edictis aut perpetuis jus decidendum." [Dict. of Ant. s. c. Edictum.]

Cornelius was a man of blameless private life, and, in his public character, though he was accused of factiousness by the nobles, seems to have advocated useful measures. [Asconius, in Cic. pro Cor. ; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 21, 23; Drummann's Gesch. Röm. ii. p. 613.]

CORNELIUS, succeeded Fabianus as bishop of Rome on the 4th of June, A.D. 231. He is chiefly remarkable on account of the controversy which he maintained with Novatianus in regard to the readmission of the Lapsi, that is, Christians who after baptism, influenced by the terrors of persecution, had openly fallen away from the faith. Cornelius was disposed to be lenient towards the lapseans and sought full evidence of their contrition, while Novatianus denied the power of the church to grant forgiveness under such circumstances and restore the culprits to her communion. The result of the dispute was, that, upon the election of Cornelius, Novatianus refused to acknowledge the authority of his opponent, who summoned a council, by which his own opinions were fully confirmed. Upon this the religious warfare raged more fiercely than ever; Novatianus was irregularly chosen bishop by some of his own partizans, and thus arose the schism of the Novatians. [NOVATIANUS.] Cornelius, however, enjoyed his dignity for but a very brief period. He was banished to Civita Vecchia by the emperor Gallus, in A.D. 252, where he soon after died, or, according to some accounts, suffered martyrdom. He is known to have written several Epistles, two of which addressed to Cyprian will be found in the works of that prelate, and in Constant's "Epistolae Pontificum," p. 125, while a fragment of a third is preserved in the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius. [vi. 43.][CYPRIANUS.]

CORNELIUS, SERVITUS. In the Graeco-Roman Epitome Legum, composed about A.D. 945 by one Ematus, and preserved in Ms. at Florence (Cod. Laurent. ixxx. 6), it is stated, that Servius Cornelius was employed by the emperor Hadrian, in conjunction with Salvius Julianus, to collect, arrange, and remodel the edictum pontificum. This version (which, though the lateness of its date diminishes its value, is the most explicit of the few that relate to this obscure part of legal history) is given by Kienzle. CORNADES (Koppaides), an intimate friend of Epicurus, is spoken of by Cicero (de Fin. v. 31) as paying a visit to Arcesilaus. The MSS. of Cicero have Cameades, but there can be little doubt that Corinaides is the correct reading, since the latter is mentioned by Pindar (non posse suaviter viei secundum Epicur. p. 1089) as a friend of Epicurus, and the former could not possibly have been the friend of Epicurus, as Cameades died in b. c. 129, and Epicurus in b. c. 209.

1. Sp. Oppius Cornicen, a plebeian, one of the second decemvirates, b. c. 450. When the other decemvirs had to march against the enemy, Cornicen was sent as the colleague of App. Claudius to take care of the city; and it was he who convoked the senate when the people rose in arms upon the death of Virginia. In the next year, he was sent to prison on the evidence of an old soldier, whom, after twenty-seven years of service, he had ordered to be scourged without any cause; but Cornicen, fearing the result of a trial, put an end to his own life in prison. (Liv. iii. 35, 41, 49, 50, 58; Dionys. x. 56, xi. 23, 44, 46.)

2. (Oppius) Cornicinus, a senator, the son-in-law of Sex. Atilius Serranus, tribune of the plebs, b. c. 57. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 2.)

CORNIFICIA. 1. Daughter of Q. Cornificius [Cornificius, No. 2], was sought to be scourged without any cause; but Cornicen, fearing the result of a trial, put an end to his own life in prison. (Liv. iii. 35, 41, 49, 50, 58; Dionys. x. 56, xi. 23, 44, 46.)

2. Sister of the poet Cornificius, is said by Hieronymus (Chron. Ruesch. Ol. 184. 4) to have written some excellent epigrams, which were extant in his time.

CORNIFICIA, the last surviving daughter of M. Aurelius, was put to death by Caracalla, and a very interesting account of her last moments and last words has recently come to light in the fragments of Dion Cassius discovered by Mai. (Mai, Fragment. Vatian., ii. p. 230.) [W. R.]

CORNIFICIA GENS, plebeian, seems to have come originally from Rhegium. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 25.) No persons of this name occur till the last century of the republic; and the first who obtained any of the higher honours of the state was Q. Cornificius, praetor, b. c. 66. On coins the name is written Cornificius, which is also the form used by Dion Cassius (xlviii. 21).

CORNIFICIUS. 1. Cornificius, secretary (s Scriba) of Verres in his praetorship, b. c. 74. (Cic. in Verr. i. 57.)

2. Q. Cornificius, was one of the judges on the trial of Verres, and tribune of the plebs in the following year, b. c. 69. He probably obtained the praetorship in 66, and was one of Cicero's competitors for the consulship in 64. His failure, however, did not make him an enemy of the great orator; he seems to have assisted him in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy, and it was to his care that Cethegus was committed upon the arrest of the conspirators. Subsequently in b. c. 62, Cornificius was the first to bring before the senate the sacrilege of Claudius in violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. He probably died some time after this event, and in his death Cicero, addressing Brutus, says: "He is called by Asenius "vir sobrius ac sanctus." (Cic. in Verr. Act. i. 10; Ascon. in Tog. Cent. p. 82; Cic. ad Att. i. 1; Sall. Cat. 47; Appian, B. C. ii. 5; Cic. ad Att. i. 13.)

3. Q. Cornificius, son of No. 2, is first mentioned in b. c. 50, as betrothing himself to a daughter of Aurelia Orestilla, the beautiful but profligate widow of Catiline. (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 7.) In the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, he served in 48 as the quaestor of the former, by whom he was sent into Ilyricum with the title of propretor. By his prudence and military skill, Cornificius reduced the province to a state of obedience, and rendered no small service to Caesar's cause. (Hist. B. Alex. 42.) He seems to have returned to Rome in the following year, and was then probably rewarded by Caesar with the augurate, as we find, from Cicero's letters, that he was in possession of that office in the next year. He also formed an intimate friendship with Cicero, several of whose letters to him are extant. (Ad Fam. xii. 17—30.)

Cornificius did not remain long in Rome. In b. c. 46, we find him in Syria, where he was observing the movements of Cassius Bnaeus, and in the beginning of the following year he was appointed by Caesar governor of Syria. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 18, 19.) This office, however, he did not hold long, for on the death of Caesar, in b. c. 44, he was in possession of the province of Old Africa. This he maintained for the senate against L. Calvisius Sabinius, and continued to adhere to the same party on the formation of the triumvirate, in 43. He sent troops to the assistance of Sex. Pompey, and gave shelter and protection to those who had been proscribed by the triumvirs. He refused to surrender his province to T. Sextius, who commanded the neighbouring province of New Africa, and who had ordered him, in the name of the triumvirs, to do so. Hereupon a war broke out between them. The details of this war are related somewhat differently by Appian and Dion Cassius; but so much is certain, that Cornificius at first defeated T. Sextius, but was eventually conquered by the latter, and fell in battle. (Appian, B. C. iii. 85, iv. 36, 53—56; Dion Cass. xlviii. 17, 21; Liv. Epic. 123.)

Cornificius was a man of literary habits and tastes. Cicero speaks highly of his judgment when he sends him in b. c. 45 a copy of his "Orator," but seems to banter him somewhat respecting his oratory. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 17, 18.) Many have attributed to him the authorship of the "Rhetorica ad Herennium." Some remarks are made on this subject below.

The following coin refers to this Cornificius. It bears on the obverse the head of Ammon, and on the reverse June holding a shield and crowning a man who has a litus in his right hand, with the legend Q. CORNIFICIUS AVEVR IMP. From the head of Ammon, it would appear to have been struck in Africa, and the title of Emperor was probably given him by his soldiers after his victory over T. Sextius.

4. L. CORNIFICIUS, was one of the accusers of Milo in a. c. 53, after the death of Clodius. (Ascon. in Milon. pp. 40, 54, ed. Orelli.) The P. Cornificius, a senator, also mentioned by Asconius (In Milon. p. 37), is probably the same person.

5. L. CORNIFICIUS, probably, from his praenomen, the son of No. 4, was the accuser of M. Brutus in the court by which the murderers of Caesar were tried. He afterwards commanded the fleet of Octavianus in the war against Sex. Pompey, and by his boldness and bravery saved the fleet when it was in great danger off the coast of Sicily (a. c. 38), and took the ship of Democles, the admiral of the Pompeian squadron. Cornificius again distinguished himself in the campaign of a. c. 36. He had been left by Octavianus with the land forces at Tauromentum, where they were in circumstances of the greatest peril; but by a most bold and dangerous march he arrived at Mylae, and united his army with Agrippa's. For these services he was rewarded with the consulship in the following year, a. c. 35; and he considered himself entitled to such honour from saving the lives of the soldiers, that he was accustomed afterwards at Rome to ride home upon an elephant whenever he supped out. Like the other generals of Augustus, Cornificius was obliged afterwards to expend some of his property in embellishing the city, and accordingly built a temple of Diana. (Plut. Brut. 27; Appian, B. C. v. 86, 86, 111-118; Dion Cass. xlix. 5-7; Vell. Pat. ii. 79; Dion Cass. xlix. 18; Suet. Aug. 29.)

Quintilian speaks (iii. 1. § 21, ix. 3, §§ 89, 98) of one Cornificius as the writer of a work on Rhetoric; and, as of some of the extracts which Quintilian gives from this work agree in many respects both in form and substance with the "Rhetorica ad Herennium," several critics have ascribed the authorship of the latter treatise to Cornificius. But the difficulties in which this matter is involved are pointed out under Cicero, p. 727, b.; and even if the "Rhetorica ad Herennium" which were written by Cornificius, there is no reason to identify him either with Q. Cornificius, the father, or the son [No. 2 or 3], as is usually done. There are also chronological difficulties in this supposition which are pointed out in the Prolegomena to the first volume (p. ix.) of the complete edition of Cicero's works by Schmitz. (Lips. 1814.) The author of the work on Rhetoric referred to by Quintilian may be (though the matter is quite uncertain) the same as the writer of the "Etyma," of which the third book is quoted by Macrobius (Sat. i. 9), and which must have been composed at least subsequently to a. c. 44, as it contained a quotation from Cicero's "De Natura Deorum," which was published in that year. The etymologies of Cornificius, frequently quoted by Festus, were taken undoubtedly from this work, and are rather worse than the usual wretched etymologies of the ancients. Thus, for instance, sarea is derived from aevus, because "aqua feratur natans ut avis:" oscillare from os et caudare: sulpitae from noxae "quod nova petantur conjugi," the word for marriage being of course of no consequence.

Again, there is a poet Cornificius mentioned by Ovid (Trist. ii. 430), and also by Macrobius, who has preserved an hexameter line and a half of a poem of his, entitled "Glaucus." (Sat. vi. 5.)

Donatus, in his life of Virgil (§§ 67, 76), likewise speaks of a Cornificius who was an enemy and a dilettante of the Mantuan bard, and Servius tells us, that Cornificius is intended under the name of Amyntas in two passages of the Eclogues. (Serv. ad Virg. Edid. ii. 89, v. 8.) Now, it seems probable enough that the poet mentioned by Ovid and Macrobius are the same; but his identity with the detractor of Virgil is rendered doubtful by the statement of Hieronymus (Chron. Euseb. Ol. 134. 4), that the poet Cornificius perished in a. c. 41, deserted by his soldiers. Heyne, who is followed by Clinton, remarks, that, if the date of Hieronymus is correct, the poet Cornificius must be a different person from the detractor of Virgil, as the latter had not risen to eminence so early as a. c. 41; but Weichert (Poetorum Latium Sorbim, p. 167) observes, that as the "Ciceri" was written in a. c. 44 and some of the Eclogues before a. c. 41, the rising fame of Virgil may have provoked the jealousy of Cornificius, who is described by Donatus as a man "perversae naturae." At all events, it is likely enough that the poet Cornificius is the same as the Cornificius to whom Catullus addresses his 38th poem.

CORNU'TUS, occurs as an agnomen in the family of the Camerini, who belonged to the patrician Sulphicia gens (Camerinii), and also as a cognomen of several plebeians whose gens is unknown.

1. C. CORNUTUS, tribute of the plebs in b. c. 61, is described by Cicero as a well-meaning man, and resembling Cato in his character, whence he is called Pseudo-Cato. In 57 he held the office of consul, he was ordered by the senate to superintend their funeral. When Octavianus shortly after came to Rome, to expel the last of the consuls, he was ordered by the senate to superintend their funeral. When Octavianus shortly after demanded the consulship for himself, and advanced towards Rome upon the senate refusing to grant it, the three legions stationed in the city went over to Octavianus, and M. Cornutus, who had the command of one of them, put an end to his life. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 12, 16, Philipp. xiv. 14; Val. Max. v. 2. § 10; Appian, B. C. iii. 92.)

CORNUTUS.

CORNUTUS, a Roman historian, who, according to the account of Suidas (s. e. Κορωύτος, where, however, the account of the philosopher L. Annaeus Cornutus and the historian are jumbled together in one article), seems to have been a contemporary of Liby, but very inferior to him in point of merit. His great wealth and the circumstance of his having no children, attracted crowds of admirers around him, but no further particulars are known about him. (G. J. de Martini, Disput. lit. de L. Annaeo Cornuto, p. 8, &c. [L. S.])

CORNUTUS, L. ANNAEUS (Ἀνναῖος Κορωύτος), one of the commentators on Aristotle, concerning whose life but few particulars are known. The work of Digenes Laëritius is believed to have contained a life of Cornutus, which, however, is lost. (Salmas, Exercit. Plut. p. 888, &c.) Our principal sources of information are Suidas (s. e. Κορωύτος)—where, however, only the last words of the article refer to the philosopher, and all the rest to Cornutus the historian—and Endochi (p. 273).

Cornutus was born at Leptis in Libya, and came, probably in the capacity of a slave, into the house of the Amæni, which was distinguished for its love of literary pursuits. The Amæni emancipated him (whence his name Annaeus), and he became the teacher and friend of the poet Persius, on whose intellectual culture and development he exercised a very great influence. He was sent into exile by Nero, for having too frequently criticized the literary attempts of the emperor. (Dion Cass. lxxi. 20.) This happened, according to Hieronymus in his Chronicle, in A. D. 68. The account of Dion Cassius furnishes a characteristic feature of the defence peculiar to the Stoics of that time, to whom Cornutus also belonged, as we see from the fifth satire of Persius. That he was a man of very extensive knowledge is attested by the authority of Dion Cassius, as well as by the works he wrote.

One of the most important of the philosophical productions of Cornutus was his work on Aristotle's Categories, which is referred to by the later commentators, Simplicius and Porphyrius. (Schoi. Aristot. p. 49, b. 13, p. 80, a. 22, ed. Brandis; Simplic. fol. 5, a., ed. Basili.) He seems to have been very partial to the study of Aristotle, for he wrote a work against Athenodorus, an opponent of the Aristotelian philosophy, which was not, however, preserved. His letter to Hone's emendation bore the title Αὐτερογραφία πρὸς Ἀθηνοδόρον. (Simplic. p. 47, b. 22, ed. Brandis; Porphyry, Epos. Arist. Cat. p. 21, ed. Paris; Simplic. fol. 15, b.) He also wrote a philosophical work, entitled Ἐλληνικὴ Θεωρία, which is probably still extant, and the same as the much mutilated treatise Περὶ τῶν ἔννοιῶν, edited by Gale in his "Opus. Mythol. Phys. Eth." p. 139. (Ritter, Gesch. d. Philos. iv. p. 202.) Others, however, consider this treatise as a mere abridgment of the original work of Cornutus.

The other philosophical productions of Cornutus, which were very numerous, are completely lost, and not even their titles have come down to us. He also wrote on historical and grammatical subjects. Thus he made, as a commentary on all Virgil's poems, which he dedicated to the poet Silius Italicus. (Suringar, Hist. Crit. Scholiast. Lat. l. i. p. 116, &c.) According to the fashion of the time, he also tried his hand in tragedy, in conjunction with his friend Seneca and his pupils Lucan and Persius (Wolcker, Griech. Trag. iii. p. 1456, &c.); and he is even said to have made attempts at writing satires. (Wernsdorff, Polit. Lat. Min. iii. p. xxvii. 4.) A minute account of his relation to the poet Persius, as well as of his pupils and his literary merits, is given by Ger. Jo. de Martini, Disputatio Literaria de L. Annaeo Cornuto, Lugd. Bat. 1825, and in Otto Jahn's Prolegomena to his edition of Persius, Lipsiae, 1813, pp. viii.—xviii. (Comp. Stahr, Aristoteles bei d. Itomei, p. 71, &c.) [A. S.]

CORNUTUS, CAECILIUS, a man of perenarian rank in the reign of Tiberius, who was implicated, in a. d. 24, in the affair between young Vibia Severus and his father, and put an end to his life to escape an unjust verdict. (Tac. Ann. iv. 26.)

CORNUTUS TERTULLUS was consul successively in a. d. 101 together with Playa the Younger, who mentions him several times as a person of great merit. (Epist. iv. 17, v. 15, vii. 21, 31.)

CORYBIUS (Κόρυβης), a Phrygian, a son of Mygdon, was one of the heroes that fought in the Trojan war on the side of the Trojans. He was one of the authors of Cassandria, and was slain by Neoptolemus or Dianodes. (Paus. ix. 27. § 1; Virg. Aen. ii. 341.) [L. S.]

CORYBOUS (Κόρυβος), an Elean, who gained a victory in the stadium at the Olympic games in Ol. i. (a. c. 776.) According to tradition, he slew the demon Poene, who Rhesus had sent to the country of the Argives. He was represented on his tomb in the act of killing Poene, and his statue, which was made of stone, was one of the most ancient that Pausanius saw in the whole of Greece. (Paus. i. 43. § 7, 44. § 1, v. 8 § 3, viii. 26 § 2; Strab. viii. p. 585.) [L. S.]

CORYBOUS, architect at the time of Pericles, who began the temple of Demeter at Eleusis, but died before he had completed his task. (Plut. Peri. 13.) [L. U.]

CORONATUS, a senator, who voted for the acquittal of Brutus and Cassius, who, after the murder of Caesar, called upon the court to condemn the murderers of Caesar. The life of Silicius was spared at the time, but he was afterwards included in the proscription, and perished in b. c. 43. Plutarch calls him P. Silicius, and Appian Iliacus. (Dion Cass. xxvi. 49; Plut. Brut. 27; Appian, B. G. iv. 27.)

CORONATUS, styled in MSS. Vir Clarissimus, the author of three pieces in the Latin Anthology (ed. Burn. i. 176, v. 155, 157, or Nos. 549—551, ed. Meyer). The first, consisting of twenty-nine hexameters, is a poetical amplifica-
Vivo cquidem, vitamque extrema per omnia checking the advance of Pyrrhus. (Appian, 860)

CORUNCANIUS. CORUNCANIUS.

(i. p. 605, Coruncanius is inferred to have a late period.

a. s. 29.) It might be a. d. 25; Phileon, Michael, (c.) He is probably the same as the Statilius Corvinus who conspired against the emperor Claudius. (Suet. Claud. 13.)

n. c. 254, Coruncanius was created pontifex maximus, and was the first plebeian who ever filled that office (Liv. Epit. xviii.), although, before that time, his brother Jurist, P. Sempronius Sophus, and other plebeians, had been pontifices. (Liv. x. b.) In n. c. 246, he was appointed dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia, in order to prevent the necessity of recalling either of the consuls from Sicily; and he must have died shortly afterwards, at a very advanced age (Cic. de Senect. 6), for, in Liv. Epit. xix. Cucullus Metellus is named as pontifex maximus.

Coruncanius was a remarkable man. He lived on terms of strict friendship with M. Curio and other eminent statesmen of his day. He was a Roman eago (Sapiens), a character more practical than that of a Greek philosopher, but he was sufficiently versed in the learning of the times. That philosophy which placed the highest good in pleasure he rejected, and, with M. Curio, wished that the enemies of Rome, Pyrrhus and the Sam-"
Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 8. § 35), which has given occasion to much controversy. He says that Coruncanius was the first who publicly professed law, since, before his time, jurists endeavoured to conceal the jus civile, and gave their time, not to students, but to those who wanted their advice. The statement as to the early concealment of the law has been supposed to be fabulous (Puchta, Institutionen, i. p. 391); but here it is proper to distinguish between the rules applicable to ordinary dealings on the one hand, and the technical regulations of the calendar, of procedure and of religious rites, on the other. Schrader (in Hugo's Civil. Mag. v. p. 187) assumes that it was usual for jurists before Coruncanius to admit patrician students—those at least who were destined for the college of pontiffs—to learn law by being present at their consultations with their clients. He further thinks that Coruncanius did not profess to give any systematic or peculiar instruction in the theory of law, and certainly there are passages which prove that such theoretic instruction was not common in the time of Cicero. (Cic. Brut. 89, de Amic. 1, de Leg. i. 4, de Off. ii. 13.) Schrader therefore comes to the conclusion, that Coruncanius first publicly professed law only in the sense, that it was the first to allow his pupils; and, secondly, that the pupils of Coruncanius were not left to gain knowledge merely by seeing business transacted and hearing or reading the opinions given by their master to those who consulted him, but that they received special instruction in the general doctrines of law.

The two Coruncani who were sent n. c. 329 as ambassadors from Rome to Tarentum, queen of Illyricum, to complain of the maritime depredations of her subjects, and one of whom at least was put to death by her orders, were probably the sons of the jurist. (Appian, de Rebus Illyr. 7; Polyb. ii. 8; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 6.) By Polybius they are called Calus and Lucius; by Pliny, P. Junius and Tiberius.

Titus for Tiberius, and Coruncanius for Coruncanius, are ordinary corruptions of the jurist's name. (Rutilius, Vita T. Corvum, c. 5; Heinecevius, Hist. Juv. Civ. § 118; Schweppes, R. R. C. i. § 53; L. A. Würfel, Epist. de T. Coruncanius, Hal. 17.)

CORVUS, a surname in the Aqua and Valeria gentes. In the latter, the lengthened form Corvus was adopted after the time of M. Valerius Corvus. [See below, No. 3, and CORVINUS.]

1. L. AQUILLIUS CORVUS, consul tribune in n. c. 388. (Liv. vi. 4.)

2. M. VALERIUS CORVUS, one of the most illustrious men in the early history of the republic, was born about n. c. 371 in the midst of the struggles attending the Licinian laws. Being a member of the great Valerian house, he had an early opportunity of distinguishing himself, and we accordingly find him serving in n. c. 349 as military tribune in the army of the consul L. Furius Camillus in his campaign against the Gauls. His celebrated exploit in this war, from which he obtained the surname of "Corvus," or "Raven," is, like many other of the achievements of the early Roman heroes, mingled with fable. A Gallic warrior of gigantic size challenged to single combat any one of the Romans. It was accepted by Valerius after obtaining the consent of the consuls, and as he was commencing the combat, a raven settled upon his helmet, and, as often as he attacked the Gaul, the raven flew at the face of the foe, till at length the barbarian fell by the sword of Valerius. A general battle then ensued, in which the Gauls were entirely defeated.

In n. c. 346 Corvus was consul a second time with G. Postelius Libo. He carried on war against the Volsci, defeated them in battle, and then took Satrium, which he burnt to the ground with the exception of the temple of Mater Matuta. He obtained a triumph on his return to Rome. (Liv. vii. 27; Consorin. de Die Nat. 17.)

In n. c. 343 Corvus was consul a third time with A. Cornelius Cossus Arvino. Young as he was, Corvus was already regarded as one of the very first generals of the republic, and the state therefore looked up to him to conduct the war against the Samnites, which had broken out in this year. His popularity with the soldiers was as great as his military talents, and he consequently possessed unbounded influence over his troops. He was distinguished by a kind and amiable disposition, like the other members of his house; and in the camp he was in the habit of competing with the common soldiers in the athletic games which amused their leisure hours. It was fortunate for the Romans that they had such a general in the great struggle they were now entering upon. After a hard-fought and most bloody battle, Corvus entirely defeated the Samnites on mount Gaurus above Cumae; a battle which, as Niebuhr remarks, seldom as it is mentioned, is one of the most memorable in the history of the world, since it was a presage of the result of the great contest which had then begun between Subellians and Latins for the sovereignty of the world. Meanwhile the colleague of Corvus had been in the greatest danger in the mountain passes near Caudium, where the Romans met with such a disaster twenty-one years afterwards; but the army was saved by the valour of P. Decius. Corvus seems to have joined his colleague shortly afterwards, and with their united forces, or with his own alone, he gained another brilliant victory over the Samnites near Sessula. Forty thousand shields of those who had been slain or had fled, and a hundred and seventy standards are said to have been piled up before the consul. His triumph on his return to Rome was the most brilliant that the Romans had yet seen. Corvus gained these two great victories in his twenty-ninth year, and he is another instance of the fact which we so frequently find in history, that the greatest military talents are mostly developed at an early age. (Liv. vii. 26—32; Appian, Sil. 1.)
CORVUS.

In the year following, B.C. 313, Corvus was appointed dictator in consequence of the mutiny of the army. The legions stationed at Capua and the surrounding Campanian towns had openly rebelled, marched against Rome, and pitched their camp within eight miles of the city. Here they were met by Corvus at the head of an army; but before proceeding to use force, he offered them peace. This was accepted by the soldiers, who could place implicit confidence in their favourite general and a member likewise of the Valerian house. Through his influence an amnesty was granted to the soldiers, and this was followed by the enactment of several important laws. Another account, however, of this revolt has been preserved, and the whole subject has been investigated by Niebuhr (iii. p. 63, &c.) at great length. (Liv. vii. 40—42.)

In B.C. 335 Corvus was elected consul a fourth time with M. Attilius Regulus, since the Sicilian war had joined the Ausonians of Cales, and the senate was anxious that the war should be entrusted to a general on whom they could entirely depend. The consuls accordingly did not draw lots for their provinces, and that of Cales was given to Corvus. He did not disappoint their expectations. Cales was taken by storm, and, in consequence of the importance of its situation, the Romans settled there a colony of 2,500 men. Corvus obtained the honour of a triumph, and also the surname of Calemenus from the conquest of the town. (Liv. viii. 16.)

With the exception of the years B.C. 332 and 320, in which he acted as interrex (viii. 17, ix. 7), we do not hear of Corvus again for several years. The M. Valerius, who was one of the legates of the dictator L. Papirius Cursor in the great battle fought against the Samnites in B.C. 309, is probably the same as our Corvus, since Livy says, that he was created praeator for the first time with Q. Caecidius Noctua in B.C. 299, son apparently of the preceding, was consul in B.C. 296, &c.)

In B.C. 301, in consequence of the dangers which threatened Rome, Corvus, who was then in his 70th year, was again summoned to the dictatorship. Etruria was in arms, and the Marsi, one of the most warlike of the neighbouring people, had also risen. But the genius of Corvus again triumphed. The Marsi were defeated in battle; several of their fortified towns, Millonia, Plistena, and Fretilia, were taken; and the Marsi were glad to have their ancient alliance renewed on the terms of Corvus. But, before continuing active operations, he had to return to Rome to renew the auspices. In his absence, his master of the horse was attacked by the enemy while on a foraging expedition, and was shut up in his camp with the loss of several of his men and some military standards. This disaster caused the greatest terror at Rome; a "justitium" or universal cessation from business was proclaimed, and the gates and walls were manned and guarded as if the enemy were at hand. But the arrival of Corvus in the camp soon changed the posture of affairs. The Etruscans were defeated in a great battle; another triumph was added to the laurels of Corvus. (x. 5—6.)

In B.C. 299 Corvus was elected consul a sixth time in place of T. Manlius Torquatus, who had been killed by a fall from his horse while engaged in the Etruscan war. The death of so great a man, and the superstitious feeling attending it, induced the people unanimously to appoint Corvus to the vacant office. The Etruscans, who had been elated by the death of Torquatus, no sooner heard of the arrival of Corvus, than they kept close within their fortifications, nor could he provoke them to risk a battle, although he set whole villages on fire. (x. 11.)

From this time, Corvus retired from public life; but he lived nearly thirty years longer, and reached the age of a hundred. His health was sound and vigorous to the last, and he is frequently referred to by the later Roman writers as a memorable example of the favours of fortune. He was twice dictator, six times consul, and had filled the curule chair twenty-one times. He lived to see Pyrrhus driven out of Italy, and the dominion of Rome firmly established in the peninsula. He died about B.C. 217, seven years before the commencement of the first Punic war. (Cic. de Sacq. 17; Val. Max. viii. 13. § 1; Plin. H. N. vii. 48. § 49; Niebuhr, iii. p. 124.)

Valerius Corvus was elected consul in B.C. 210, and was created praetor for the commencement of the first Punic war. (Cic. de Sacq. 17; Val. Max. viii. 13. § 1; Plin. H. N. vii. 48. § 49; Niebuhr, iii. p. 124.)

Corynus, who was created praetor for the commencement of the first Punic war, and was the Sha's son by Corvus. (Cic. de Sacq. 17; Val. Max. viii. 13. § 1; Plin. H. N. vii. 48. § 49; Niebuhr, iii. p. 124.)

At the end of the year B.C. 209 Corvus was elected consul, and was created praetor for the commencement of the first Punic war. (Cic. de Sacq. 17; Val. Max. viii. 13. § 1; Plin. H. N. vii. 48. § 49; Niebuhr, iii. p. 124.)

Corythus Corvus was erected by Augustus in his own forum along with the statues of the other great Roman heroes. (Gell. ix. 11; comp. Suet. Aug. 31.)

2. M. Valerius M. F. M. N. Maximus Corpusin, son apparently of the preceding, was consul in B.C. 289; but his name occurs only in the Fasti.

Corybantes. [Carnilli and Corybantes.]

Corycia (Korycia or Korikia), a nymph, who became by Apollo the mother of Lycurgos or Lycourgos, and from whom the Corycian cave in mount Parnassus was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. x. 5. § 52, 92. § 2.) The plural, Corycia, is applied to the daughters of Plisias. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 710; Ov. Met. i. 320, Harv. ii. 221.)

Corydus (Korydos), a surname of Apollo, under which the god had a temple eighty stadia from Corone, on the sea-coast. (Paus. iv. 34. § 4, &c.)

Corylas. [Cytys, No. 1.]

Coryphaeus (Koryphaia), the godhead who inhabits the summit of the mountain, a surname of Artemis, under which she had a temple on mount Corypheon, near Epidauros. (Paus. ii. 28. § 2.) It is also applied to designate the highest or supreme god, and is consequently given as an epithet to Zeus. (Paus. ii. 4. § 5.)

Coryphasia (Koryphasia), a surname of COSCONIUS.

Athena, derived from the promontory of Coryphaea, on which she had a sanctuary. (Paus. iv. 36. § 2.) [L. S.]

CORYTHIA/LLIA (Κορυθαίαλλα), a surname of Artemis at Sparta, at whose festival of the Titheion, on which she had a sanctuary. (Paus. iv. p. 139.) [L. S.]

CORYTHUS (Κόρυθος). 1. An Athenian hero, a son of Jupiter, and husband of Electra, the daughter of Atlas, by whom he became the father of Jason and Dardanus. He is described as king of Tuscia, and as the founder of Corythus. (Conon; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 167, vii. 207, x. 719.)

2. A son of Paris and Oenone. He loved Helen and was beloved by her, and was therefore killed by his own father. (Parthen. Erotr. 34.) According to other traditions, Oenone made use of him for the purpose of provoking the jealousy of Paris, and thereby causing the ruin of Helen. (Conon, Narrat. 22; Tzetz. ad Lyce. 57.)

Others again call Corythus a son of Paris by Helen. (Dictys. Crct v. 5.) There are four other mythical personages of this name. (Ptolem. Hith. p. 611; Ov. Met. x. 123, xii. 290; Paus. i. 4. § 8.) [L. S.]

CORYTHIA'LLIA (Κορυθαιλλία), a surname of Athena, derived from the promontory of Coryphaea, at whose festival of the Titheion, on which she had a sanctuary. (Athen. iv. p. 139.) [L. S.]

COSCONIUS. 1. M. Cosconius, military tribune in the army of the praetor P. Quinctilius Varus, fell in the battle fought with Mago in the land of the Insubrian Gauls, b. c. 203. (Liv. xxx. 18.)

2. M. Cosconius, perhaps grandson of the preceding, praetor in b. c. 135, fought successfully with the Sertorians in Thess. (Liv. Epit. 56.)

3. C. Cosconius, praetor in the Social war, b. c. 89, distinguished himself in the command of one of the Roman armies. According to Livy (Epit. 75) Cosconius and Lucceius defeated the Samnites in battle, slew Marius Egnatius, the most distinguished of the enemy's generals, and received the surrender of very many towns. Appian (B. C. i. 52) says, that Cosconius burnt Salapia, took possession of Camine, and then proceeded to besiege Canusium; but a Samnite army came to the relief of the town, which defeated Cosconius and obliged him to fall back upon Camine. Trebatus, the Samnite general, following up his advantage, crossed the Aufidus, but was attacked, immediately after his passage of the river, by Cosconius, defeated with a loss of 15,000 men, and fled with the remnant to Canusium. Heremone, Cosconius marched into the territories of the Larinates, Venuvini, and Apulians, and conquered the Poediculi in two days. Most modern commentators identify Egnatius and Trebatus, and suppose that Appian has made a mistake in the name (Schweigh. ad App. l. c.); but Livy and Appian probably speak of two different battles.

The above-named Cosconius seems to be the same with the C. Cosconius who was sent into Ilyricum, with the title of proconsul, about b. c. 78, and who conquered a great part of Dalmatia, took Salona, and, after concluding the war, returned to Rome at the end of two years' time. (Oros. vi. 4; Oros. v. 23; comp. Cic. pro Cluent. 33.)

4. C. Cosconius Calidianus, adopted from the Calidias gens, a Roman orator of little merit, distinguished for his vehement action and gestelication (Cic. Brut. 69), is perhaps the same person as the preceding or succeeding.

5. C. Cosconius, praetor in b. c. 63, the same year that Cicero was consul, obtained in the following year the province of Further Spain, with the title of proconsul, and was, it seems, on his return accused of extortion, but acquitted. He was one of the twenty commissioners appointed in b. c. 58 to carry into execution the agrarian law of Julius Caesar for dividing the public lands in Campania, but he died this year, and his vacant place was offered to Cicero by Caesar, who wished to withdraw him from the threatened attack of Clodius. This offer, however, was refused by Cicero. (Cic. pro Sall. 14, in Vatin. 5; comp. Val. Max. viii. 1. § 8; Cic. ad Att. ii. 19, ix. 2, A; Quintil. xii. i. § 16.)

6. C. Cosconius, tribune of the plebs in b. c. 59, when he was one of the colleagues of P. Vatinus, acedile in 57, and one of the judges in the following year, 56, in the trial of P. Sextius. In the same year, C. Cato, the tribune of the plebs, purchased of Cosconius some bestiarii which the latter had undoubtedly exhibited the year before in the games of his neddleship. It seems that Cosconius subsequently obtained the neddleship, for Flutarch states, that Cosconius and Galba, two men of praetorian rank, were murdered by Caesar's soldiers in the mutiny in Campania, b. c. 47, and we know of no other Cosconius who is likely to have been praetor. (Cic. in Vitat. 7, ad Q. Fr. ii. 6; Plut. Cæs. 51; comp. Dion. Cass. xiii. 52, Bouv.averi òbo.)

7. Cosconius, a writer of Epigrams in the time of Martial, attacked the latter on account of the length of his epigrams and their lascivious nature. He is severely handled in two epigrams of Martial. (ii. 77, iii. 69; comp. Wellhert, Poeticarum Latinarum Reliquiae, p. 249, &c.)

Varro speaks (L. L. vi. 36, 69, ed. Muller) of a Cosconius who wrote a grammatical work and another on "Actiones," but it is uncertain who he was.

It is also doubtful to which of the Cosconii the following coin refers. It contains on the obverse the head of Pallas, with L. Cosc. M. f., and on the reverse Mars driving a chariot, with L. Lic. CN. Dom. It is therefore supposed that this Cosconius was a trimvir of the mint at the time that L. Licinius and On. Domitius held one of the higher magistracies; and as we find that they were censors in b. c. 92, the coin is referred to that year. (Beckel. v. p. 196.)

COSMAS. 863

COSMAS. 386

COSMAS, a Thracian chief, and priest of Juno, whose stratagem for securing the obedience of his people is related by Polyenaus. (Stratog. vii. 22.)

COSMAS (Κόσμας), a celebrated physician, saint, and martyr, who lived in the third and fourth centuries after Christ. He is said to have been the brother of St. Damianus, with whose name his own is constantly associated, and under which article the particulars of their lives and deaths are mentioned. A medical prescription attributed to them is preserved by Arnaldus Villanovanus (Antidot. p. 453, in Opera, ed. Basili. 1585), and there are several Greek homilies still extant in MS., written or preached in their honour. Their memory is observed by the Greek and Roman Churches on the 27th of September. (Acta Socot. Sept. vol. vii. p. 428; Birner, De Cosmo et Doro. Commencements, Helmet. 1751, 4to.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ix. p. 68, xiii. 128, ed. vet.; Zovorius, Nomenclator Sacrorum Professiorum Mediorum; Czarpoonius, De Medicis ab Ecclesia Sanctis habitis.)

COSMAS (Kosmas), of Jerusalem, a monk, the friend and companion of John of Damascus, and afterwards bishop of Maiuma in Palestine (about A.D. 743), was the most celebrated composer of hymns in the Greek church, and obtained the surname of melodis. Among his compositions was a version (επεραστις) of the Psalms of David in Iambic metre. Many of his hymns exist in MS., but no complete edition of them has been published. Fabricius mentions, as a rare book, an Aldine edition of some of them. Thirteen of them are printed in Gallandi's Bibliae Patrum. Several of the hymns of Cosmas are acrostics. (Suid. s. v. Ιωάννης ο Δαμασκινο; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. xi. pp. 173—181, viii. 596.)

COSMAS (Kosmas), commonly called Indicopleustes (Indian navigator), an Egyptian monk, who flourished in the reign of Justinian, about A.D. 535. In early life he followed the employment of a merchant, and was extensively engaged in traffic. He navigated the Red Sea, advanced to India, visited various nations, Ethiopia, Syria, Arabia, Persia, and almost all places of the East. Impelled, as it would appear, more by curiosity than by desire of gain, eager to inspect the habits and manners of distant people, he carried on a commerce amid dangers sufficient to appeal the most adventurous. There is abundant reason for believing, that he was an attentive observer of every thing that met his eye, and that he carefully registered his remarks upon the scenes and objects which presented themselves. But a migratory life became irksome. After many years spent in this manner, he bade adieu to worldly occupations, took up his residence in a monastery, and devoted himself to a contemplative life. Possessed of multifarious knowledge acquired in many lands, and dauntless according to the standard of his times, he began to embody his information in books. His chief work is his Topographia Christianorum liber, Expositio in Ostataeum; the former, as containing the opinion of Christians concerning the earth, the latter, because the first part of the work treats of the tabernacle of Moses and other things described in the Pentateuch. The same writer affirms, that many of Cosmas's narratives are fabulous. The monk, however, relates events as they were commonly received and viewed in his own time. His dictum is plain and familiar. So far is it from approaching elegance or elevation, that it is even below mediocrity. He did not aim at pompous or polished phraseology; and in several places he modestly acknowledges that his mode of exposition is homely and inelegant.

Manuscripts vary much in the contents of the work. It was composed at different times. At first it consisted of five books; but in consequence of various attacks, the author added the remaining seven at different periods, enlarging, correcting, and curtailing, so as to make best use of the materials of those who still contended that the earth was spheric. This accounts for the longer and shorter forms of the production in different manuscript copies. The entire treatise was first published by Bernard de Montfaucon, from a MS. of the tenth century, in Greek and Latin, in his Collectio Nova Patrum et Scriptorum Graecorum, 4to. Paris, 1766, vol. vi. This was copied by Cosmas, and is given, with notes, in the second book of the Topography. It appears, however, from the researches of Mr. Salt, that Cosmas has made two different inscriptions into one, and that while the first part refers to Ptolemy Euergetes, the second relates to some Ethiopian king, whose conquests are commemorated on the inscription. The author also inserts in the work, in illustration of his sentiments, astronomical figures and tables. We meet too with several passages from writings of the fathers now lost, and fragments of epistles, especially from Athanasius.

Photius (cod. 26) reviewed this production without mentioning the writer's name, probably because it was not in the copy he had before him. He speaks of it under the titles of Χριστιανον βίον, "Christianorum liber, Expositio in Ostatheum;" the former, as containing the opinion of Christians concerning the earth; the latter, because the first part of the work treats of the tabernacle of Moses and other things described in the Pentateuch. The same writer affirms, that many of Cosmas's narratives are fabulous. The monk, however, relates events as they were commonly received and viewed in his own time. His dictum is plain and familiar. We learn from Cosmas himself, that he composed a Universal Cosmography, as also Astronomical tables, in which the motions of the stars were described. He was likewise the author of a Commentary on the Canticles and an exposition on the Psalms. These are now lost. Leo Allatius thinks that he wrote the Chronicon Alexandrinum; but it is more correct to affirm, with Cave, that the author of the Chronicle borrowed largely from Cosmas, copying without scruple, and in the same words, many of his observations. (Montfaucon, Novo Collectum Patrum, vol. ii.; Cave, Historia Literaria, vol. i. pp. 515-158, Oxford, 1749; Pichon, Bibl. Græca; vol. iv. p. 221.)

Cosmas was likely to have joined to his edition of Harmenopulus in the supplementary volume of Meermann's Thesaurus, as also of Cosmas in the style of Indicopleustes, although he is in the index of proper names subjoined to his edition of Harmenopulus. The names of Cosmas are now lost. Leo Allatius thinks that Cosmas was employed by the emperor in the composition of his laws. Hence Assemani (Bibl. Orient., vol. ii. c. 29, pp. 582-584) is disposed to ascribe to Cosmas a legal work which is preserved in manuscript in the Royal Library at Vienna. It is a system or compendium of law, divided into 50 titles, and composed in the first year of Romanus Senior; although Reiz, in the index of proper names subjoined to his edition of Harmenopulus in the supplementary volume of Meermann's Thesaurus, is inclined to think that Magister was a family surname. In Leundavius (J. G. R. ii. pp. 166, 167) are two sententiae (§§ 1-2) of Cosmas in the style of imperial constitutions, as if he had been authorized by Romanus to frame legal regulations. It further appears from a Novell of Romanus, published in the collection of Leundavius (l. p. 168), that Cosmas was employed by the emperor in the composition of his laws. Hence Assemani (Bibl. Jur., vol. iv. p. 255.) [S.D.]

Whether he is the same person as Cossus, a freedman of Nero, or whether he was different from both, is altogether uncertain. [P. S.]

1. L. Cosinius, of Tibur, received the Roman franchise in consequence of the condemnation of T. Caecilius, whom he had accused. (Cic. pro Balb. 23) He is perhaps the same as the Cosinius who was one of the legates in the army of the praetor P. Varinius, and who fell in battle against Spartacus, B. c. 73. (Plut. Cassius. 9.)

2. L. Cosinius, a Roman knight and son of the preceding (Cic. pro Balb. 23), was a friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Varro. Cicero mentions his death in B. c. 45, and expresses his grief at his loss. (Cic. ad Att. i. 19, 20, i. 1, ad Philam. iii. 29; Var. *R. R. ii. 1; Cic. ad Att. iii. 46.)

3. L. Cosinius Anchialus, a freedman of Nero, was curule by Cicero but only by Ser. Sulpicius in B. c. 46. (Cic. ad Fian. iii. 23.)

4. Cosinius, a Roman knight and a friend of Nero's, was poisoned by mistake by an Egyptian physician, whom the emperor had sent for in order to cure his friend. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 4. s. 30.)

Cossus, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens. This family produced many illustrious men in the fifth century before the Christian era, but afterwards sunk into oblivion. The name "Cossus" was afterwards revived as a praenomen in the family of the Lentuli, who belonged to the same gens. The Cossi and Maluginenses were probably one family originally. Although these surnames are united, as for instance, in the case of Ser. Cornelius Cossus Maluginensis, consul in B. c. 485. [MALUGINENSES.]

Afterwards, however, the Cossi and Maluginenses become two separate families.

1. Ser. Cornelius M. P. L. N. Cossus, one of the three consular tribunes in B. c. 434, though other authorities assign consules to this year. (Diod. xii. 53; Liv. iv. 25.)

2. Ser. Cornelius (M. P. L. N.) Cossus, probably brother of the preceding, was consul in B. c. 428 with T. Quintius Memphis Cincinnatus. II., and two years afterwards, B. c. 426, one of the four consular tribunes, when he was entrusted with the care of the city, while his three colleagues had the conduct of the war against Veii. But the latter having met with a repulse, Cossus nominated Aemilius Mamaricus dictator, who in his turn appointed Cossus master of the horse.

It was this Cossus who killed Lar Tolumnius, the king of the Veii, in single combat, and dedicated his spoils in the temple of Jupiter Feretrix—the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won. But the year in which Tullius was slain, was a subject of dispute even in antiquity. Livy following, as he says, all his authorities, places it in B. c. 437, nine years before the consulship of Cossus, when he was military tribune in the army of Mam. Aemilii Mamercinius dictator, who in his turn appointed Cossus master of the horse.

This Cossus had won these spoils. But as the year of Cossus' consulsip was, according to the annalists, the second of the three instances in which the spolia opima were won. But the year in which Tullius was slain, was a subject of dispute even in antiquity. Livy following, as he says, all his authorities, places it in B. c. 437, nine years before the consulsip of Cossus, when he was military tribune in the army of *Mam. COSSUTIA.

the title of consul, either on account of his having filled that dignity or in consideration of his holding at the time the consular tribunate. (Liv. iv. 19, 20, 30—32; Plut. Romul. 16, Marcell. 8; Niebuhr, ii. p. 458, &c.; Propert. iv. 10. 23, &c., who gives quite a different account.)

3. P. CORNELIUS A. P. N. COSSUS, consular tribune in b. c. 415. (Liv. iv. 49; Diod. xiii. 34.)

4. CN. CORNELIUS A. F. M. N. COSSUS, consular tribune in b. c. 414, and consul in 409 with L. Furius Medullinus II., the year in which plebeian questions were first created. (Liv. iv. 49, 54; Diod. xiii. 38.)

5. A. CORNELIUS A. F. M. N. COSSUS, brother of No. 3, consul in b. c. 413 with L. Furius Medullinus. (Liv. iv. 51; Diod. xiii. 43.)

6. P. CORNELIUS A. F. M. N. COSSUS, brother of Nos. 3 and 5, consular tribune in b. c. 408, in which year a dictator was appointed on account of the war with the Volsci and Aquil. (Liv. iv. 56; Diod. xiii. 104.)

7. P. CORNELIUS M. F. L. N. RUTIUS COSSUS, dictator in b. c. 408, defeated the Volsci near Antium, laid waste their territory, took by storm a fort near lake Fucinus, by which he made 3000 prisoners, and then returned to Rome. He was consular tribune in b. c. 406. (Liv. iv. 56, 58.)

8. CN. CORNELIUS P. E. A. N. COSSUS, consular tribune in b. c. 406, when he was left in charge of the city while his colleagues marched against Veii, consular tribune a second time in 404, and a third time in 401, in the last of which years he laid waste the country of the Cenapentes, but the enemy did not venture upon a battle. Cossus was a moderate man in the party struggles of his day. He caused a third stipendium to be paid to those horsemen, who were not supplied with a horse by the state, and was supposed to have procured the elevation of his half-brother or cousin, the plebeian P. Licinius Calvis, to the consular tribunate in b. c. 400. (Liv. iv. 58, 61, v. 10, 12.)

9. P. CORNELIUS MALUGINUS Cossus, consular tribune b. c. 395, when he ravaged the territory of the Falisci, and consul in 393 with L. Valerius Potitus; but he and his colleague were obliged to resign their office in consequence of some defect in the election, and L. Lucretius Flavius Tricipitus and Ser. Sulpius Caramelus were appointed in their stead. (Liv. v. 24; Fasti.)

10. A. CORNELIUS COSSUS, was appointed dictator b. c. 385, partly on account of the Volscian war, but chiefly to crush the designs of Mallius. The dictator at first marched against the Volsci, whom he defeated with great slaughter, although their forces were augmented by the Luatini, Hernici and others. He then returned to Rome, threw Mallius into prison, and celebrated a triumph for the victory he had gained over the Volsci. (Liv. vi. 11—16.)

11. A. CORNELIUS COSSUS, consular tribune in b. c. 393, and a second time in 367, in the latter of which years the Licinian laws were passed. (Liv. vi. 36, 42.)

12. A. CORNELIUS COSSUS ARVINA. [ARVINA.] COSSUTIA, the first wife of C. Julius Caesar, belonged to an equestrian family, and was very rich. She was betrothed to Caesar by his parents, while he was very young, but was divorced by him in his seventeenth year, that he might marry Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna. (Suet. Aug. 1), never attained to any importance. It is conjectured by some from Cicero's mention of the Cossutianae tabulae, near Caecena, in Gallia Cisalpina (ad Fam. xvi. 27), that the Cossuti came originally from that place. On coins of this gens we find the cognomens Maridius and Sabula, but none occur in history.

COSSTIUS. [Cappio, p. 602, a.]

M. COSSUTIUS, a Roman knight, a man of the greatest respectability and integrity, who lived in Sicily during the administration of Verres, and defended Xeno before the latter. (Cic. Ver. iii. 22, 80.)

COSSUTIUS, a Roman architect, who rebuilt at the expense of Antiochus Epiphanes of Syria the temple of the Olympian Zeus at Athens, about b. c. 168, in the most magnificent Corinthian style. The temple, however, in its present form, which had been deprived of its pillars by Sulla, was finished by Hadrian. (Vitr. Procul. vii.; Liv. xii. 20; Vell. Pat. i. 10; Athen. v. p. 594a, n.; Strab. ix. p. 396; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5; Jacobs, Annal. ii. p. 249; Büch. Corp. Inscri. i. n. 362, 363.)

COTISO, a king of the Dacians, who was conquered in the reign of Augustus by Lentulus. (Flor. iv. 12; Hor. Carm. iii. 8. 18.) He seems to be the same as the Cotiso, king of the Getae, to whom, according to M. Antony, Augustus betrothed his daughter Julia, and whose daughter Augustus himself sought in marriage. (Suet. Aug. 63.)

Q. COTTIUS, surnamed ACHILLES on account of his bravery, accompanied, as a legate, the consul Q. Metellus Macedonicus in his campaign against the Celtiberi in Spain, b. c. 143, and distinguished himself by slaying two of the enemy in single combat. (Val. Max. iii. 2. § 21.)

COTTA, AURELIUS. 1. C. AURELIUS COTTA, was consul in b. c. 252, with P. Servilius Geminus, and both consuls carried on the war in Sicily against the Carthaginians with great success. Among several other places they also took Himera, but its inhabitants had been secretly removed by the Carthaginians. Afterwards Cotta borrowed ships from Hiero, and having united them with the remants of the Roman fleet, he sailed to Lipara, the blockade of which he left to his tribune, C. Cassius, with the express order not to engage in a battle; but, during the absence of the consul, Cassius notwithstanding himself to be drawn into an engagement, in which many Romans were killed. On being informed of this Cotta returned to Lipum, besieged and took the town, put its inhabitants to the sword, and deprived Cassius of his office of tribune. Cotta was celebrated for the strict discipline which he maintained among his troops, and of which several instances are on record. During the siege of Lipum one of his own kinsmen, P. Aurelius Pecu- nius, was scourged and degraded to the rank of a common soldier, because through his fault a part of the camp was set on fire, in consequence of which almost the whole camp fell into the hands of the enemy. It was probably during the same campaign, that he acted with great rigour towards the equites who refused to obey his commands. (Frontin. Strateg. iv. 1. § 32.) At the close of his consulship Cotta triumphed over the Carthaginians and Sicilians. In 248 he obtained the consulship a second time, together with his former colleague, P. Servilius Geminus, and again fought in Sicily against the Carthaginians. Carthalo in vain endeavored to make a diversion by attacking the coasts of Italy, but further particulars are not known about him. (Zonar. viii. 14, 16; Oros. iv. 9; Cic. Acad. ii. 26; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 1; Val. Max. ii. 7; 8. 4; Fast. Capit.)

2. M. Aurelius Cotta, was plesian aedile in b. c. 216, and had in 212 the command of a detachment at Puteoli under the consul App. Claudius Pulcher. Nine years later, b. c. 208, he was appointed decemvir suorum, in the place of M. Pompeius Matho. The year after this he was sent as ambassador to Philip of Macedonia, and protected the Roman allies who had to suffer from the inroads of the Macedonians. After the conclusion of the war against Carthage, he urged the necessity of proceeding with energy against Philip. He died, in b. c. 201, as decemvir suorum, in which office he was succeeded by M. Acilius Glabrio. (Liv. xxiii. 30, xxiv. 22, xxx. 38, xxxi. 26, 42, xxxii. 3, 5, 50.)

3. C. Aurelius Cotta, was praetor urbanus, in b. c. 202, and consul in 200, with P. Sulpinius Galba. He obtained Italy as his province, and with it the command in the war against the Dolans, Insubrians and Cenomanians, who, under the command of Hamilcar, a Carthaginian, had invaded the Roman dominion. The praetor, L. Furius Parmepus, however, had the merit of conquering the enemies; and Cotta, who was indignant at the laurels being snatched from him, occupied himself chiefly with plundering and ravaging the country of the enemy, and gained more booty than glory while they in their turn plundered and ravaged, with a triumph. (Liv. xxx. 26, 27, xxxi. 5, 6, 10, 11, 21, 22, 47, 49; Zonar. ix. 15; Oros. iv. 20.)

4. M. Aurelius Cotta, was legate of L. Cornelius Scipio, in b. c. 189, during the war against Antiochus. He returned to Rome with the ambassadors of Antiochus, with Eumenes and the Rhodians, to report to the senate the state of affairs in the East. (Liv. xxxvii. 52.)

5. L. Aurelius Cotta, was tribune of the soldiers, in b. c. 181, and commanded, together with Sex. Julius Caesar, the third legion in the war against the Ligurians. (Liv. xl. 27.)

6. L. Aurelius Cotta, was tribune of the people in b. c. 154, and in reliance on the invincible character of his office he refused paying his creditors, whereby however his colleagues declared, that unless he satisfied the creditors they would support them in their claims. In b. c. 144, he was consul together with Sex. Sulpiadius Galba, and disputed in the senate which of them was to obtain the command against Viriathus in Spain; but Scipio Aemilius carried a decree that neither of them should be sent to Spain, and the command in that country was accordingly prolonged to the proconsul Fabius Maximus Aemilius. Subsequently Cotta was accused by Scipio Aemilius, and although he was guilty of several acts of injustice, he was acquitted, merely because the judges wished to avoid the appearance of Cotta having been crushed by the overwhelming influence of his accuser. Cotta was defended on that occasion by Q. Metellus Macedonicus. Cicero states that Cotta was considered a venterator, that is, a man cunning in managing his own affairs. (Val. Max. vi. 4. § 2, b. § 4, vii. § 11; Cic. pro Murena. 26, pro Font. 13, Brut. 21, Dein in Cocc. 21; Tact. Ann. iii. 66.)

7. L. Aurelius Cotta, was consul in b. c. 119, and proposed in the senate that C. Marius, who was then tribune of the people, should be called to account for a law (lex Maria) which he had brought forward relative to the voting in the comitia, and which was levied on the influence of the optimates. Marius, who was summoned accordingly, appeared in the senate, but, instead of defending himself, threatened Cotta with imprisonment unless he withdrew his motion. L. Cecilius Metellus, the other consul, who supported Cotta, was really thrown into prison by the command of Marius, none of whose colleagues would listen to the appeal of the consul, so that the senate was compelled to yield. (Plut. Mar. 4; Cic. de Leg. iii. 17.) From Appian (Ilyr. 10) it might seem as if Cotta had taken part with his colleague Metellus in the war against the Ilyrians, but it may also be that Appian mentions his name only as the counsel of that year, without wishing to suggest anything further.

8. L. Aurelius Cotta, was tribune of the people in b. c. 95, together with T. Didius and C. Norbanus. When the last of them brought forward an accusation against Q. Caepio, Cotta and Didius attempted to interfere, but Cotta was pulled down by force from the tribunal (templust). He must afterwards have held the office of praetor, since Cicero calls him a praetorius. Cicero speaks of him several times, and mentions him as a friend of Q. Lutatius Catulus; he places him among the orators of mediocrity, and states that in his speeches he purposely abstained from orators' conceit, formality and rusticity which more resembled the style of an uneducated peasant, than that of the earlier Roman orators. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 47, iii. 11, 12, Brut. 36, 74.)

9. L. Aurelius Cotta, brother of No. 8, was born in b. c. 124, and was the son of Rutilla. He was a friend of the tribune M. Livius Drusus, who was murdered in b. c. 91; and in the same year he sued for the tribuneship, but was rejected, and a few months afterwards went into voluntary exile to avoid being condemned by the lex Varia, which ordained that an inquiry should be made as to who had either publicly or privately supported the claims of the Italian allies in the case of consulship. Cotta did not return to Rome till the year b. c. 82, when Sulla was dictator, and in 75 he obtained the consulsiphip, together with L. Octavius. In that year he excited the hostility of the optimates by a law by which he endeavoured to raise the tribuneship from the condition into which it had been thrown by Sulla. The exact nature of this law, however, is not certain. (Cic. Fragm. Corn. p. 80 ed. Orelli, with the note of Ascon.; Sallust, Hist. Fragm. p. 210, ed. Gerlach.) A lex de judicibus privatis of Cotta is likewise mentioned by Cicero. (Fragm. Corn. p. 440) which, however, was abolished the year after by his brother. In his consulship Cotta also concluded a treaty with Hiempsal of Mauretania. On the expiration of his office he obtained Gaul for his province, and although he did not carry on any real war in it, he yet demanded a triumph on his return. His request was granted, but on the day before the solemnity was to take place, a wound which he had received many years before burst open, in consequence of which he died the same day. Cotta 3 k 2 was one of the most distinguished orators of his time; he is placed by the side of P. Sulpicius and C. Caesar, and Cicero entertained a very high opinion of him. Cicero, who at an early period of his life, and when Sulla still had the power in his hands, pleased the case of a woman of Arretium against Cotta, characterizes him as a most acute and subtle orator; his arguments were always sound, but calm and dry, and his oratory was never sublime or animated. We still possess a specimen of it among the fragments of Sallust's Historiae. He appears to have occupied himself also with the study of philosophy, for Cicero introduces him as one of the interlocutors in the "De Oratore," and as maintaining the cause of the Academics. (Cic. de Orat. i. 7, ii. 23, iii. 8, Brut. 49, 55, 86, 88, 90, Orat. 30, 38, ad Att. xii. 29, in Verr. i. 50, iii. 7, de Leg. Agr. ii. 22, in Pison. 26; Sallust, Hist. Fragm. ii. p. 206, ed. Gerl.; Appian, de B.C. i. 37. Compare Meyer, Fragm. Orat. Rom. p. 538, &c., 2nd ed.)

10. M. Aurelius Cotta, a brother of No. 9, was consul in b.c. 74, together with L. Licinius Lucullus. In this year the war against Mithridates broke out again, and while the conduct of it was entrusted to Metellus, Cotta obtained Bithynia for his province, and a fleet to protect the Propontis. When Mithridates marched into Bithynia with his army, Cotta retreated to Chalcedon, in the port of which his fleet was stationed. In the neighbourhood of Chalcedon a battle was fought, in which Cotta was not only defeated and obliged to take refuge within the walls of Chalcedon, but lost his whole fleet of sixty-four sail. Mithridates, who had to direct his attention towards another quarter, left Cotta at Chalcedon. During this campaign Cotta dismissed his quaestor, P. Oppius, whom he suspected of being bribed by the enemy and plotting against him. On his return to Rome, therefore, Cotta brought an accusation against Oppius, who was acquitted by Cicero. Afterwards Cotta himself was charged by C. Carbo with having been guilty of extortion in his province of Bithynia, and was condemned. His son, M. Aurelius Cotta, took revenge for this hostility of Carbo towards his father, by accusing Carbo of the same crime, on the very same day that he (M. Cotta) assumed the manly gown. (Liv. Epit. 93; Etrop. vi. 6; Sall. Fragm. Hist. lib. iv.; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 67; Plut. Locull. 5, 6, 8; Cic. in Verr. v. 13, pro Mun. 18, pro Opp. Fragm. p. 444 ed. Orelli; Dion. Cass. xxxvi. 23; Appian, Mithrid. 71; Val. Max. v. 4, § 4.)

11. L. Aurelius Cotta, a brother of Nos. 9 and 10, was praetor in n.c. 70, in which year he carried the celebrated law (lex Aurelia jactitati), which entrusted the judicium to courts consisting of senators, equites, and the tribuni aerarii. The main object of this law was to deprive the senators, equites, and the tribuni aerarii of their exclusive right to act asJudiccs, and to transfer the judicium from the senate to the equites. P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus formed a plan with Catiline for murdering the consuls and most of the senators. This conspiracy however was discovered and frustrated. The year after his consulate, b.c. 64, Cotta was censor, but he and his colleague abstained on account of the machinations of the tribunes. In 63, when Cicero had suppressed the Catilinarian conspiracy, in the debates upon which in the senate Cotta had taken a part, he proposed a specialisation for Cicero; and he afterwards showed the same friendship for the unfortunate orator, as he was the first to bring forward in the senate a motion for the recall of Cicero from his exile. During the civil war Cotta belonged to the party of Caesar, whose mother Aurelia was his kinswoman, and when Caesar was alone at the head of the republic, it was rumoured that Cotta, who then held the office of quindecimvir, would propose in the senate to confer upon Caesar the title of king, since it was written in the libri fatales that the Parthians, against whom Caesar was preparing war, could be conquered only by a king. After the murder of Caesar, Cotta rarely attended the meetings of the senate from a feeling of despair. He is praised by Cicero as a man of great talent and of the highest prudence. (Ascon. in Cornel. pp. 64, 67, 73, &c.; Cic. in Verr. ii. 71, in P. Clod. 7, de Leg. Agr. ii. 17, in Catil. iii. 8, Philipp. ii. 6, pro Dom. 26, 32, pro Sest. 34, ad Att. xii. 21, de Leg. ii. 19, ad Fam. xii. 2; Suet. Cæs. 79; Liv. Epit. 97; Vell. Pat. iii. 32; Corn. Nep. Attic. 4; Plut. Cic. 27. Comp. Orelli, Onom. Tull. ii. p. 90.)

12. Aurelius Cotta Messallinus, a son of the orator Messalla, who was adopted into the Aurelia gens. In the reign of Tiberius, with whom he was on terms of intimacy, he made himself notorious for the gratuitous harshness and animosity with which he acted on several occasions. This drew upon him an accusation of the most illustrious senators in a. d. 32, for having spoken disrespectfully of Tiberius; but the emperor himself sent a written defence to the senate, by which course of procured his acquittal. Tacitus characterises him as nobilis quidem, sed egenus el per flagitia infimus. (Plin. H. N. x. 27; Tacit. Ann. ii. 32, iv. 20, v. 3, vi. 5, &c.)

On coins of the Aurelia gens we find the names of M. Cotta and L. Cotta, but there are no means of identifying them with any of the preceding personages. Of the two coins annexed the obverse of the former represents the head of Pallas, the reverse Hercules in a biga drawn by two centaurs; the obverse of the latter represents the head of COTYLA.

Vulcan with forcipae behind him, the reverse an eagle standing on a thunderbolt. [L. S.]

COTT, L. AURUNCULIUS, served as legate in the army of C. Julius Caesar in Gaul, and distinguished himself no less by his valour than by his foresight and prudence. In b.c. 54, when Caesar, on account of the scarcity of provisions in Gaul, distributed his troops over a great part of the country for their winter-quarters, Cotta and Q. Titurius Sabinus obtained the command of one legion and five cohorts, with which they took up their position in the territory of the Eburones, between the Meuse and the Rhine. Soon after, Ambiorix and Catuleuces, the chiefs of the Eburones, caused a revolt against the Romans, and attacked the camp of Cotta and Sabinus only fifteen days after they had been stationed in the country. Cotta, who apprehended more from the cunning than from the open attacks of the Gauls, trusted Cotyla with the command of the legions nearest to them. After some debates, Cotta gave way for the sake of concord among his forces. The Romans were drawn into an ambuscade by the Gauls, and Cotta, who neglected none of the duties of a general in his perilous position, received a wound in his face while addressing the soldiers; but he still continued to fight bravely, and refused entering into negotiations with the enemy, until shortly after he and the greater part of his soldiers were cut down by the Gauls. (Caesar, B. G. ii. 11, v. 24-37; Dion Cass. x. 5, 6; Sueton. Cces. 25; Appian, B. C. ii. 150; Plut. Florus, iii. 10; Eutrop. iv. 14.) [L. S.]

M. and P. COTTII, of Tauroceniun in Sicily, two Roman knights, witnesses against Verres. (Cic. Verr. v. 64.)

COTTIUS, son of Donnus, was king of several Ligurian tribes in those parts of the Alps, which were called after him, the Cottian Alps. He maintained his independence when the other Alpine tribes were subdued by Augustus, till at length the emperor purchased his submission, by granting him the sovereignty over twelve of these tribes, with the title of Prefectus. Cottius then proceeded upon made roads over the Alps, and shewed his gratitude to Augustus by erecting (u. c. 8) at Segusio, now Suza, a triumphal arch to his honour, which is extant at the present day, and bears an inscription, in which the prefect is called M. Julius Cottius, and the names of the people are enumerated, of which he was prefect. His authority was transmitted to his son, who also bore the name of M. Julius Cottius, and upon whom the emperor Claudius conferred the title of king. But upon the death of this prince, his kingdom was reduced by Nero into the form of a Roman province. (Ann. Macc. xiv. 10; Strab. iv. p. 204; Pln. H. N. iv. 110; 116; Orell. Inscr. No. 626; Dion. Cass. ix. 24; Sueton. Nero, 29; Aur. Vict. Cces. 5, Epit. 5; Eutrop. vii. 14.)

COTYLA, L. VARIVS, one of Antony's most intimate friends and boon companions, although Cicero says that Antony had him whipped on two occasions, during a banquet, by public slaves. He was probably dead in b.c. 44, as he is called in the following year a man ofaedilecian rank. When Antony was besieging Mutina, in b.c. 43, he sent Cotyla to Rome, to propose terms to the Senate; and when after he had met at Mutina he had collected another army in Gaul, and recrossed the Alps later in the year, he entrusted Cotyla with the command of the legions, which he left behind in Gaul. (Cic. Philipp. v. 2, viii. 8, 10, 11, xiii. 12; Plut. Ant. 18, who calls him Cotyla.)

COTYS or COTTYTO (Κότυς or Κοτύττω), a Thracian divinity, whose festival, the Cottytia (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), resembled that of the Phrygian Cybele, and was celebrated on hills with riotous proceedings. In later times her worship was introduced at Athens and Corinth, and was connected, like that of Dionysus, with licentious frivolity. Her worship appears to have spread even as far as Italy and Sicily. Those who celebrated her festival were called Σέβης, from the purifications which were originally connected with the solemnity. (Strab. x. p. 470; Hesych. Suid. s. vu. Κότως, Σαυσαρνής; Horat. Epod. xvii. 56; Juven. ii. 92; Virg. Catul. v. 19; A. Meineke, Quest. Scn. p. 41, &c.) [L. S.]

COTYS (Κότυς). 1. A king of Paphlagonia, seems to have been the same whom Xenophon (Anab. v. 5. § 12, &c.) calls Corylos. Otya also is only another form of the name. A vassal originally of the Persian throne, he had thrown off his allegiance to Artaxerxes II., and, when summoned to court, as a test probably of his loyalty, had refused obedience. He therefore listened readily to the recommendation of Spithridates to enter into alliance with Sparta, and having met Agesilaus for this purpose on his entrance into Paphlagonia, he left with him a considerable reinforcement for his army. For this service Agesilas rewarded Spithridates by negotiating a marriage for his daughter with Cotys, u. c. 395. (Xen. Hell. iv. 1. § 3, &c.) The subject of the present article has been identified by some with Thysus, whom Datames conquered and carried prisoner to Artaxerxes about u. c. 364; but this conjecture does not appear to rest on any valid grounds. (See Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. l. c.) [Thyus.]

2. King of Thrace from u. c. 382 to 356. (See Suid. s. vu., where his reign is said to have lasted twenty-four years.) It is not, however, till towards the end of this period that we find anything recorded of him. In u. c. 364 he appears as an enemy of the Athenians, the main point of dispute being the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus, and it was at this time that he first availed himself of the aid of the adventurer Charidemus on his desertion from the Athenian service [see p. 684, b.]. He also secured the valuable assistance of Iphocrates, to whom he gave one of his daughters in marriage, and who did not scruple to take part with his father-in-law against his country. (Dem. c. Aristoc. pp. 683, 669, 672; Pseudo-Arist. Oecon. ci. 26; Nep. Iph. 3; Anaxand. ap. Athen. iv. p. 131.) In u. c. 362, Miltiades, a nephew of Cotys, overpowered and killed Cotys, and engaged the Athenians on his side by promises to redeem the Chersonesus to them; but Cotys sent them a letter, outbidding his adversary in promises, and the Athenians passed a decree in the king's favour. It has been thought that this was the same decree which conferred on him the gift of citizenship. (See Thibald's Greece, vol. v. p. 217; Polyb. ad Ath. p. 161, where he is called "Sintless.")
The effect of it certainly was so to discourage Miltocyes that he abandoned the struggle, while Cotys, having gained his point, never dreamed of fulfilling his promises. (Dem. c. Aristocr. p. 655, c. Polyd. 1207.) [Auctores, No. 2.] In the same year he vigorously opposed Ariobarzanes and the other revolted satraps of the western provinces. Here again he proved his hostility to Athens, which sided with the rebels, while another motive with him for the course he took seems to have been, that the satraps protected the cities on the Hellespont, over which he desired to establish his own authority. Having besieged Susus, which belonged to Ariobarzanes, he was compelled, apparently by Timotheus, to raise the siege; but the town soon after revolted from Athens and submitted to Cotys, who, having in vain tried to persuade Iphicrates to aid him [Iphicrates], again bought the services of Charidemus, made him his son-in-law, and prosecuted the war with his assistance. (Xen. Ages. ii. § 26; Nep. Timoth. 1; Dem. de ici. Lib. ii. p. 196, c. Aristocr. pp. 653, 664, 673, 674.) This appears to have occurred in B. c. 359, and in the same year, and not long after Philip's accession, we find him supporting the claims of the pretender Pausanias to the Macedonian throne; but the bribes of Philip induced him to abandon his cause. (Diod. xvi. 3, 3.) For his letter to Philip, perhaps on this occasion, see Hesiod. Ap. Athen. vi. p. 248. In B. c. 358, he was assassinated by Python or Parrhon and Heracleides (two citizens of Aenus, a Greek town in Thrace), whose father he had in some way injured. The murderers were honoured by the Athenians with golden crowns and the franchise of the city. (Arist. de Phod. Lib. p. 193; Dem. Aristocr. p. 196.) For his letter to Philip, perhaps on this occasion, see Hesiod. Ap. Athen. vi. p. 248.

6. A king of a portion of Thrace, and perhaps one of the sons of No. 5. (See Tac. Ann. ii. 64—67, iii. 38; Vell. Pat. ii. 129; Or. ex Pont. ii. 9.)

7. King of the Bosporus, which he received from the Romans on the expulsion of his brother Mithridates. As only a few cohorts under Julius Aquila had been left in the country to support the new king, who was himself young and inexperienced, Mithridates endeavoured to recover his dominions by force of arms, A. d. 50; but he was conquered and carried prisoner to Rome. (Tac. Ann. xii. 15—21.)

The second of the coins figured on p. 777, a. belongs to this Cotys, who is sometimes called Cotys L., king of the Bosporus. The coin given below belongs to Cotys II., who reigned under Hadrian, and is mentioned by Arrian in his Periplus. The obverse represents the head of Cotys, the reverse that of Hadrian. (Echhel, ii. pp. 376, 378.) [E. E.]

CRANAEA (Kραναῖα), a surname of Artemis, derived from a temple on a hill near Plateia in CRASSINUS.

Phocis, in which the office of priest was always held by youths below the age of puberty, and for the space of five years by each youth. (Paus. 34. § 4.)

[LS.]

CRANA'US (Κραναύς), an autochthon and king of Attica, who reigned at the time of the flood of Deucalion. He was married to Pedias, by whom he became the father of Cranae, Cranaechme, and Atthis, from the last of whom Atticus was believed to have derived its name. He was deprived of his kingdom by Amphictyon, his son-in-law, and after his death he was buried in the demes of Lampce, where his tomb was shewn as late as the time of Pausanias. (Apollod. ill. 14. § 5, &c.; Paus. i. 2. § 3, 31. § 2.)

CRANE. [Cardell.]

CRANTOR (Κράντωρ), of Soli in Cilicia, left his native country, and repaired to Athens, in order to study philosophy, where he became a pupil of Xenocrates and a friend of Polome, and one of the most distinguished supporters of the philosophy of the older Academy. As Xenocrates died B.C. 315, Crantor must have come to Athens previous to that year, but we do not know the date of his birth or his death. He died before Polome and Crantes, and the dropy was the cause of his death. He left his fortune, which amounted to twelve talents, to Arceaus ; and this may be the reason why many of Crantor’s writings were ascribed by the ancients to Arceaus. His works were very numerous. Diogenes Laeritus says, that he left behind Commentaries (εποποιήσεως), which consisted of 30,000 lines; but of these only fragments have been preserved. They appear to have related principally to moral subjects, and, accordingly, Horace (Ep. i. 2. 4.) classes him with Chrysippus as a moral philosopher, and speaks of him in a manner which proves that the writings of Crantor were much read and generally known in Rome at that time. The most popular of Crantor’s works at Rome seems to have been that “On Grief” (De Lucta, Πείρας Πέμφων), which was addressed to his friend Hippocrates on the death of his son, and from which Cicero seems to have taken almost the whole of the third book of his Tuscanian Disputations. The philosopher Panmystus called it a “ golden” work, which deserved to be learnt by heart word for word. (Cic. Acad. li. 44.) Cicero also made great use of it while writing his celebrated “Consolation” on the death of his daughter Tullia, and several extracts from it are preserved in Plutarch’s treatise on Consolation addressed to Apollonius, which has come down to us.

Cranter was the first of Plato’s followers who wrote commentaries on the works of his master. He also made some attempts in poetry; and Diogenes Laeritus relates, that, after sealing up a collection of his poems, he deposited them in the temple of Athena in his native city, Soli. He is accordingly called by the poet Theocritus, in an epitaph which he composed upon him, the friend of the Muses; and we are told, that his chief favorites among the poets were Homer and Euripides. (Diog. Laer. ix. 24—27; Orelli, Gesammelte Werke, ii. p. 201; Schneider in Zimmerman’s Zeitschrift Für Alterthumswissenschaft, 1836, Nos. 104, 105; Kayser, De Crantor Academico, Heidelberg, 1841.)

[A. S.]

CRASSINUS or CRASSUS, a surname borne in early times by many members of the patrician Claudia gens. [Claudius, p. 767.]

CRASSITIUS.

CRASSIPES, “ thick-footed,” the name of a patrician family of the Furia gens.

1. M. FURIUS CRASSIPES, was one of the three commissioners appointed in B.C. 194 to found a Latin colony among the Bruttii, and he with his colleagues accordingly led, two years afterwards, 3700 foot soldiers and 300 horsemen to Vibo, which had been previously called Hippumnos. Crassipes was elected praetor, in B.C. 137, and obtained the province of Gaul. Desiring to obtain a pretext for a war, he deprived the Ccnomani of their arms, though they had been guilty of no offense; but when this people appealed to the senate at Rome, Crassipes was commanded to restore them their arms, and to depart from the province. He obtained the praetorship a second time in B.C. 135, and received Sicily as his province. (Liv. xxxiv. 53, xxxvi. 40, xxxviii. 42, xxxix. 5, xli. 28, xlii. 33, xliii. 1.)

2. FURIUS CRASSIPES, married Tullia, the daughter of M. Tullius Cicero, after the death of her first husband, C. Piso Frugi. The marriage contract (απονοσία) was made on the 6th of April, B.C. 56. She was, however, shortly afterwards divorced from Crassipes, but at what time is uncertain; it must have been before B.C. 50, as she was married to Dolabella in that year. Cicero notwithstanding continued to live on friendly terms with Crassipes, and mentions to Atticus a conversation he had with him, when Pompey was setting out from Brundisium, in B.C. 49. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. v. 1, vi. 1, ad Pansa. i. 7. § 11, 3. § 20, ad Att. iv. 5, 12, vide. i. 12, ad Att. ix. 11.) There is a letter of Cicero’s (ad Pansa. iii. 9) addressed to Crassipes, when he was quaestor in Bithynia, B.C. 55, recommending to his notice the company that farmed the taxes in that province.

3. P. FURIUS CRASSIPES, curator aedile, as we learn from coins (a specimen of which is given below), but at what time is uncertain. The obverse of the coin annexed represents a woman’s head crowned with a tower, and by the side a foot, through a kind of jocular allusion to the name of Crassipes; on the reverse is a curule seat.

L. CRASSITIUS, a Latin grammarian, was a native of Tarentum and a freedman, and was famed Pasicles, which he afterwards changed into Pansa. He was first employed in assisting the writers of the mimes for the stage, afterwards gave lectures on grammar, and at length wrote a commentary on the obscure poem of C. Helvius Cinna, entitled Smyrna, which gained him great renown: his praises were celebrated in an epigram preserved by Suetonius, but the meaning of it is difficult to understand. He taught the sons of many of the noblest families at Rome, and among others Julius Antonius, the son of the triumvir, but eventually he gave up his school, in order to be compared to Verrius Flaccus, and betook himself to the study of philosophy. (Smün. Ilustr. Gramm. 18; Weichert, Poes. Latin. Reliqu. p. 184.)

It is not impossible that this Crassitus was originally the slave of the Crassiti or Crassicites, CRASSUS, M. AQUILIUS, was praetor in B.C. 43, and was sent by the senate into Picenum to levy troops, in order to resist Octavianus, when he marched upon the city in this year, in order to demand the consulsship. Crassus was seized in a slave's dress, and brought to Octavianus, who did not punish him at the time, but afterwards included his name in the proscription. (Appian, B.C. iii. 93, 94.) It is thought by some commentators that we ought to read Acilius instead of Aquilius. If this conjecture be correct, the Crassus mentioned above would be the same as the Acilius, who was included in the proscription, and whose escape is related by Appian. (B.C. iv. 39.)

CRASSUS, L. CANIDIUS, was with Lepidus in Gaul, in B.C. 43, when Antony was compelled to seek refuge there, and was the main instrument in bringing about the union between the armies of Lepidus and Antony. Three years later, B.C. 40, he was consul suffectus with L. Cornelius Balbus, and afterwards he was one of the legates of Antony, whom he accompanied in his campaign against the Parthians. In B.C. 38, when Antony returned from that expedition, Candidus Crassus remained in Armenia, and continued the war against those nations with considerable success, for he defeated the Armenians, and also the kings of the Iberians and Albanians, and penetrated as far as the Caucasus. In the campaign which Antony made against the Parthians in B.C. 36, Crassus was as unfortunate as the other Roman generals, all of whom suffered great losses, and were compelled to retreat. In B.C. 32, when Antony resolved upon the war with Octavian, Crassus was commissioned to lead the army, which was stationed in Armenia, to the coast of the Mediterranean. On the outbreak of the war many of Antony's friends advised him to remove Cleopatra from the army, but Crassus who was bribed by the queen, opposed this plan, and she accordingly accompanied her lover to the fatal war. Shortly afterwards, however, Crassus also advised Antony to send her back to Egypt, and to fight the decisive battle on the land and not on the sea. This time his advice was disregarded. During the battle of Actium, Crassus who had the command of Antony's land forces, could only act the part of a spectator. After the unfortunate issue of the seafight, Crassus and his army still held out for seven days in the hope that Antony would return; but in the end Crassus in despair took to flight, and followed his master to Alexandria, where he informed him of the issue of the contest and of the fate of his army. After the fall of Antony Crassus was put to death by the command of Octavianus. He died as a coward, although in times of prosperity he had been in the habit of boasting, that death had no terrors for him. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 21; Dion Cass. xlviii. 32, xlix. 24; Plut. Ant. 34, 42, 56, 63, 65, 68, 71, Comparat. Dem. c. Ant. 1; Vell. Pat. ii. 85, 87; Oros. vi. 19.) [L.S.]

CRASSUS, LICINIUS.

STEMMA CRASSORUM.

(A.)

C. Licinius Varus.

1. P. Licinius Crassus, Cos. B.C. 171.

3. C. Licinius Crassus, Tr. Pl. B.C. 145. (?)

4. C. Licinius [Crassus]?

5. Licinia, vestal, B.C. 123.

(B.)

7. P. Licinius Crassus Dives.

10. Licinia, (?) married Claudius Asellus.

12. Licinia, married C. Sempronius Gracchus.

16. P. Licinius Crassus Dives, died b. c. 87. 15. P. Licinius Crassus, Dives. 17. M. Licinius Crassus, triumvir, marr. Tertulla.

18. P. Licinius Crassus Dives,
Decoctor. 19. M. Licinius Crassus Dives, Quaestor of Caesar. 20. P. Licinius Crassus Dives, Legate of Caesar, marr. Cornelia.

(C.)

23. L. Licinius Crassus, orator; Cos. b. c. 95; marr. Mucia.

24. Licinius, married
Scipio Nasica. 25. Licinia, married
C. Marius. 26. L. Licinius Crassus Scipio, son of
No. 24, and adopted by No. 23.

(D.) Other Licinii Crassii of uncertain pedigree.

27. Licinius Crassus Dives, Pr. b. c. 59.

28. P. Licinius Crassus Junianus, Tr. Pl.
b. c. 53.

1. P. Licinius C. f. P. n. Crassus, was grandson of P. Licinius Varus, who was praetor
b. c. 208. In b. c. 176 he was praetor, and pleaded that he was bound to perform a solemn sacrifice
as an excuse for not proceeding to his province, Hither Spain. In b. c. 171 he was consul, and ap¬unted to the command against Persians. He advanced through Epurus to Thessaly, and was defeated by the king in an engagement of cavalry.
(Liv. xli., xlii., xliii.) During his command, he oppressed the Athenians by excessive requisitions of corn to supply his troops, and was accused on this account to the senate.

2. C. Licinius C. f. P. n. Crassus, brother of
No. 1, was praetor in b. c. 172, and in b. c. 171 served as legatus with his brother in Greece, and commanded the right wing in the unsuccessful battle against Persians. In b. c. 168 he was consul, and in the following year went to Macedon¬ion, instead of proceeding to Cisalpine Gaul, which was his appointed province. (Liv. xiv. 17.)

3. C. Licinius Crassus, probably a son of No.
2, was tribune of the plebs b. c. 145, and, accord¬ing to Cicero (de Amic. 25) and Varro (de Re Rust. 1. 2), was the first who in his orations to the people turned towards the forum, instead of turn¬ing towards the comitium and the curia. Plutarch
(C. Gracch. 5) attributes the introduction of this mark of independence to C. Gracchus. He intro¬duced a rogation in order to prevent the colleges of priests from filling up vacancies by co-optation, and to transfer the election to the people; but the measure was defeated in consequence of the speech of the then praetor, C. Laelius Sapiens. (Cic. Brut.

(Husfelda, Uber die Stelle des Varro von den Licinern, Heldelb. 1887.)

4. C. Licinius (Crassus), probably a son of
No. 3. ( Dion Cass. Frag. xxi.)

5. Licinia. [Licinia.]

6. P. Licinius C. f. P. n. Crassus, Dives, was the son of P. Licinius Varus, and was the first Licinius with the surname Dives mentioned in history. In b. c. 212, though a young man who had never sat in the curule chair, he defeated two distinguished and aged consuls, Q. Fulvius Flac¬cus and T. Manlius Torquatus, in a hard-fought contest for the office of pontifex maximus. (Liv.
xxv. 5.) In b. c. 211 he was curule aedile, and gave splendid games, remarkable for the crowds with foliage of gold and silver, that were then first exhibited at Rome (Plin. H. N. xxvi. 4); in b. c.
210 he was magister equitum of the dictator Q.
Fulvius Flaccus, and in the same year obtained the censorship, but abdicated (as was usual) in con¬sequence of the death of his colleague. In b. c.
208 he was praetor. In b. c. 205 he was consul with Scipio Africanus, and undertook the task of keeping Hannibal in check in the country of the Bruttii. Here he succeeded in rescuing some towns from the enemy, but was able to do little in consequence of a contagious disease which attacked him and his army. (Liv. xxxix. 10.)
In the following year he united his forces with those of the consul Sempronius, to oppose Han¬nibal in the neighbourhood of Croton, but the Ro¬mans were defeated. In b. c. 203, he returned to Rome, and died at an advanced age, b. c. 185, when his funeral was celebrated with games and feasts which lasted for three days, and by a fight of 120 gladiators. (xxxix. 46.) He possessed many gifts of nature and fortune, and added to them by his own industry. He was noble and rich, of commanding form and great corporeal strength, and, in addition to his military accom¬plishments, was extremely eloquent, whether in addressing the senate or haranguing the people. In civil and pontifical law he was deeply skilled.
(Liv. xxix. 10.) Valerius Maximus (i. 1. § 6) gives an example of his religious severity in condemning a Vestal virgin to be burnt, because one night she neglected her charge of guarding the everlasting fire.

7. P. Licinius Crassus Dives, son of No. 6.

8. P. Licinius Crassus Dives Mucianus, was the adopted son of No. 7. (Cic. Brut. 26.) His natural father was P. Mucius Scaevola, who was consul b. c. 175. In the year b. c. 131 he was consul and pontifex maximus, and, according to Livy, was the first priest of that rank who went beyond Italy. (Epit. lix.) As pontifex maximus, he forbade his colleague, Valerius Flac¬
Cnus, who was flamen Martialis, to undertake the command against Aristonicus, and imposed a fine upon him, in case of his leaving the sacred rites. The people remitted the fine, but slew their sense of due priestly subordination by ordering the flamen to obey the pontiff. (Cic. Phil. xi. 9.) Crassus, though his own absence was liable to similar objection, proceeded to oppose Aristonicus, who had occupied the kingdom of Pergamus, which had been bequeathed by Attalus to the Roman people. His expedition to Asia was unfortunate. He suffered a defeat at Encænus, who was flamen Martialis, to undertake the business of the city, and his head was brought to Aristonicus, who, in the same manner, was flamen to obey the pontiff. (Cic. Phil. xi. 8.)

It was abolished at the proposition of Durotius in the year b.c. 98. (Val. Max. viii. 2. § 12.) His body was buried at Smyrna, and his head was brought to Aristonicus, who, in the following year, surrendered to Perperna, and was put to death at Rome. He was so minutely skilful in the Greek language, that when he was proscribed in Asia, he was in the habit of giving judgment to those who resorted to his tribunal in any one of five dialects in which they preferred their claim. (Quintil. xi. 2, fin.) Cicero extols him as a good orator and jurist (Cic. Brut. 26; compare Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 4), and Cellius (Hist. Civil. Rom. i. 143) and many others, he has been confounded with L. Licinius Crassus, the orator. No. 23. (Rutilius, Vitae Cltorum, c. xvii.)

9. M. LICINIIUS CRASSIUS AGELASTUS, son of No. 7, and grandfather of Crassus the trimvir. He derived his cognomen from having never laughed (Plin. H. N. vii. 18), or, as Cicero says, he was not the less entitled to the designation, though Lucullus reports that he laughed once in his life. (Cic. de Fin. vi. 30.)

10. 11, 12. LICENIAE. [LICENIA.]

13. M. LICINIIUS CRASSUS, son of No. 9, was praetor b.c. 107.

14. P. LICINIIUS M. F. P. N. CRASSUS DIVES, brother of No. 13 and father of the trimvirs. He was the proposer of the lex Licinia, mentioned by Gellius (ii. 24), to prevent excessive expense and gluttony in banquets. The exact date of this law is uncertain, but it was alluded to by the poet Lucullus, who died before the consulsiphip of Crassus, which took place b.c. 97. The sumptuary law of Crassus was so much approved of, that it was directed by a decree of the senate to take effect immediately after its publication, and before it had been actually passed by the populus. (Macerob. ii. 13.) It was abolished at the proposition of Durotius in b.c. 98. (Val. Max. ii. 9. § 5.) The extravagance of the games and shows given by the nobles had now become unreasonably great, and Crassus during his aedileship yielded to the prevailing prodigality. (Cic. de Off. ii. 16.) During the consulsiphip of Crassus, the senate made a remarkable decree, by which it was ordained "ne homo immolaretur,"—a monstrous rite, says Phryn, which up to that time had been publicly solemnized. (Plin. H. N. xxx. 3.) After his consulship, he took the command in Spain, where he presided for several years, and, in the year b.c. 83, was honoured with a triumph for his successes in combating the Lusitanian tribes. In the social war, b.c. 90, he was the legate of L. Julius Caesar, and in the following year his colleague in the censorship (Festus, s. v. referri), and with him enrolled in new tribes certain of the Latini and Italii, who were rewarded for their fidelity with the rights of citizenship. In the civil war which commenced soon afterwards, he took part with Sulla and the aristocracy. When Marius and Cinna, after being proscribed, returned to Rome in the absence of Sulla, he stabbed himself in order to escape a more ignominious death from the hands of their partisans. (Liv. Epit. ixxx.)

15. P. LICINIIUS CRASSUS DIVES, son of No. 14, by Vennieia. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 24.) In b.c. 87, he was put to death by the horses of Fimbria, who belonged to the party of Marius, and, according to Florus (iii. 21. § 14), was massacred before his father's eyes. Appian (B. C. i. p. 394) differs from other historians in his account of this transaction. He relates that the father, after slaying his son, was himself slaughtered by the party in pursuit.

16. LICINIIUS CRASSUS DIVES, a younger brother of No. 15. His praenomen is unknown, and the only particulars of his history which have been recorded are the fact of his marriage in the lifetime of his parents, and his escape from the massacre of the Crassae. (Plut. Crass. 16.)

17. M. LICINIIUS P. F. M. N. CRASSUS DIVES, the younger son of No. 14. The date of his birth is not precisely recorded, but it is probable that he was born about the year b.c. 105, for Plutarch states, that he was younger than Pompey (Plut. Crass. 6), and that he was more than sixty years old when he departed (in the year b.c. 55) to make war against the Parthians. (ib. 17.)

In the year b.c. 87, when his father and brother suffered death for their resistance to Marius and Cinna, he was not considered of sufficient importance to be involved in the same doom; but he was closely watched, and after some time he thought it prudent to make his escape to Spain, which he had visited some years before, when his father had the command in that country. How he concealed himself in a cavern near the sea upon the estate of Vibius Pacilacus, and how he passed his life in this strange retreat, is related in detail by the lively and amusing pen of Plutarch. After a retirement of eight months, the death of Cinna (b.c. 84) relieved him from his voluntary confinement. He put himself at the head of a needy rabble, for whose sustenance he provided by marauding excursions, and, with 2500 men, made his way to Malaca. Thence, seizing the vessels in the port, he set sail for Africa, where he met Q. Metellus Pius, who had escaped from the party of Marius. He soon quarrelled with Metellus, and did not remain long in Africa, for when Sulla (b.c. 83) landed in Italy, Crassus proceeded to join that successful general.

He was now brought into competition with Pompey, who also served under Sulla. The mind of Crassus was of an essentially vulgar type. He was noted for envy, but his envy was low and cavilling: it was not energetic enough to be cruel and revengeful, even when successful, and it was so far under the control of pusillanimity and self-interest, as to abstain from the open opposition of manly hatred. It was with such feelings that Crassus regarded Pompey; and Sulla played off the rivals against each other. He understood his tools. He gratified Pompey by external marks of honour, and Crassus with gold. The ruling pas-tion of Crassus was avarice. He sought to increase the fortunes of his family he was willing to submit to servile dependence, to encounter any risk, and undergo any hardship. He undertook a service of considerable danger in levying troops for Sulla along the Marsi, and he afterwards
(b. c. 83) distinguished himself in a successful campaign in Umbria. He was personally brave, and, by fighting against the remains of the Marian faction, he was avenging the wrongs of his house.
Sulla put him in mind of this, and rewarded him by donations of confiscated property, or by allowing him to purchase at an almost nominal value
the estates of those who were proscribed. Crassus was reported to have sought for gain by dishonest means. He was accused of unduly appropriating the booty taken at Tudcr (an Umbrian colony not far from the Tiber), and of placing, without authoration, a name in the proscribed lists, in order that he might succeed to an inheritance.

The desire of wealth which absorbed Crassus was neither the self-sufficing love of possession, which enables the miser to despise the hiss of the people while he contemplates the coin in his chest, nor did it spring from that voluptuousness which enables the miser to despise the hiss of the people while he contemplates the coin in his chest,
and by lending money. At one time of his life, Crassus sought wealth because he loved the reputation of being rich, liked to have the power of purchasing vulgar popularity, and prized the kind of influence which the capitalist acquires over the debtor, and over the man who wants to borrow or hopes to profit. To these objects the administration of civil affairs and warlike command were, in his view, subordinate. He possessed very great ability and steady industry in obtaining what he desired, and soon began to justify his hereditary surname, Dives. He extended his influence by acting as an advocate before the courts, by giving advice in domestic affairs,
by canvassing for votes in favour of his friends,
and by lending money. At one time of his life, there was scarcely a senator who was not under some private obligation to him. He was affable in his demeanour to the common people, taking them by the hand, and addressing them by name.
Rich legacies and inheritances rewarded his usiduity and complaisance to the old and wealthy.
He was a keen and sagacious speculator. He bought multitudes of slaves, and, in order to increase their value, had them instructed in lucrative arts, and sometimes assisted personally in their education. Order and economy reigned in his household. He worked silver-mines, cultivated farms, and built houses, which he let at high rents.
He took advantage of the distresses and dangers of others to make cheap purchases. Was there a fire in the city, Crassus might be seen among the throng, bargaining for the houses that were burning or in danger of being burnt.
dream the night before, invited the consuls to be reconciled before they left office. Pompey remained cold and inflexible, but Crassus took the first step by offering his hand to his rival, in the midst of general acclamations. The reconciliation was hollow, for the jealousy of Crassus continued. He privately opposed the Gabinian regation, which commissioned Pompey to clear the sea of pirates; and the decree of the Manilian law, which conferred the command against Mithridates upon Pompey, rankled in the mind of Crassus. When Pompey returned victorious, Crassus, from timidity or disgust, retired for a time from Rome.

In the year b.c. 65, Crassus was censor with Q. Catulus, the firm supporter of the senate; but the censors, in consequence of their political discordance, passed the period of their office without holding a census or a muster of the equites. In the following year, Crassus failed in his wish to obtain the rich province of Egypt.

Crassus was suspected by some, probably without sufficient reason, of being privy to the first conspiracy of Catiline; and again, in the year b.c. 62, L. Torquinius, when he was arrested on his way to Catiline, affirmed that he was sent by Crassus with a message inviting Catiline to come with speed to the rescue of his friends at Rome; but the senate denounced the testimony of L. Torquinius as a calumny, and Crassus himself attributed the charge to the subornation of Cicero. (Sall. B. C. 48.) The interests of Crassus were opposed to the success of the conspiracy; for it would have required a man of higher order to seize and retain the helm in the confusion that would have ensued.

In the whole intercourse between Crassus and Cicero may be observed a real coldness, with occasional alternations of affected friendship. (Comp. Cic. ad Att. I. 14 and 16, ad Fam. xiv. 2, pro Sect. 17, ad Fam. i. 9, § 6, v. 8.) In his intercourse with others, Crassus was equally unsteady in his likings and enmities. They were, in fact, not deeply-seated, and, without the practice of much hypocrisy, could be assumed or withdrawn as temporary expediency might suggest.

It was from motives of self-interest, without actual community of feeling or purpose, that the so-called triumvirate was formed between Caesar, Pompey, and Crassus. Each hoped to gain the first place for himself by using the others for his purposes, though there can be no doubt that the confederacy was really most profitable to Caesar, and that, of the three, Crassus would have been the least able to rule alone. Caesar had already found Crassus a convenient friend; for in b.c. 61, when Caesar was about to proceed to his province in Further Spain, Crassus became security for his debts to a large amount. It may, at first view, excite surprise that a person of so little independent greatness as Crassus should have occupied the position that he filled, and that men of wider capacity should have entered into a compact to share with him the honours and profits of the commonwealth. But the fact is to be accounted for by considering, that the character of Crassus represented in many points a large portion of the public. While the young, the daring and the ambitious, the needy, the revolutionary, and those who adhered to Caesar—while the aristocracy, the party of the old constitution, those who affected the reputation of high principle and steady virtue, looked with greater favour upon Pompey,—there was a considerable mass of plain, moderate, practical men, who saw much that they liked in Crassus. Independently of the actual influence which he acquired by the means we have explained, he had the sympathy of those who, without being noble, were jealous of the nobility, and were rich or were occupied in making money. They sympathised with him, because the love of gain was a strong trait in the Roman character, and they saw that his unequal success in his pursuit was a proof of at least one unquestionable talent—a talent of the most universal practical utility. He was not without literary acquirement, for, under the teaching of the Peripatetic Alexander, he had gained a moderate proficiency in history and philosophy. There was no profigacy in his private conduct to shock decent and respectable mediocrity. He was not above ordinary comprehension. The many could appreciate a worldly and vulgar-minded but safe man, whose principles sat loosely but conveniently upon him, who was not likely to innovate rashly, and who, without the control of an influence to shame by an overstrained rigidity of virtue. Thus it was more prudent to combine with Crassus as an ally, than to incur the opposition of his party, and to risk the counter-influence of an enormous fortune, which made the name of Crassus proverbial for wealth. Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 47) values his estates in the country alone at two hundred millions of sesterces. He might have maintained no despicable army at his own cost. Without the means of doing this, he thought that no one deserved to be called rich. In other less stirring times he might have lived and died without leaving in history any marked traces of his existence; but in the period of transition and commotion which preceded the fall of the republic, such elements of power as he possessed could scarcely remain neglected and quiescent.

It was part of the triumviral contract—renewed at an interview between the parties in Luca—that Pompey and Crassus should be a second time consul together, should share the armies and provinces of the ensuing year, and should exert their influence to secure the prolongation for five years of Caesar's command in Gaul. Notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, backed by all the authority of Cato of Utica (who was forced on the day of election to leave the Field of Mars with his followers after a scene of serious riot and uproar), both Pompey and Crassus were elected consuls, b.c. 65. A law was passed at the suggestion of the tribune C. Trebonius, by which Syria and the two Spains, with the right of peace and war, were assigned to the consuls for five years, while the Gauls and Illyrians were handed over to Caesar for a similar period. In the distribution of the consular provinces, Crassus took Syria.

Crassus was anxious to distinguish himself in war. Pompey, he saw, had subjugated the Pirates and Mithridates; Caesar had conquered Gaul, and was marching his army victoriously to Germany and Britain. Mortified at successes which made him feel his inferiority to both, he chose rather to enter upon an undertaking for which he had no genius than to continue the pursuit of office or put influence at home. Armed by the lex Trebonia with power to make war, he determined to exert—cise his authority by attacking the Parthians. This was a stretch and perversion of the law, for the Parthians were not expressly named in the lex Trachonia, and the Senate, who constitutionally for the Parthians were not expressly named in the

The Romans were not very scrupulous in their career of conquest, and they often fought from motives of gain or ambition, but their ostensible reasons generally bore some show of plausibility, and a total disregard of form was offensive to a people who were accustomed in their international dealings to observe certain legal and religious technicalities. It was not surprising, therefore, that, apart from all political considerations, the feelings of common justice should excite a strong repugnance to the plans of Crassus, who, having gained his immediate object in obtaining Syria as his province, broke out into a display of childish vanity and boastfulness, which were alien from his usual demeanour. C. Atellus Capito, the tribune, ordered his officer to arrest Crassus, but was obliged to release him by the intercession of his colleagues. However, he ran on to the gate of the city to intercept the consul, who was anxious without delay to proceed to his destination, and resolved to set out at once without waiting for the termination of his year of office. Posted at the gate, Atellus kindled a fire, and with certain fumigations and libations and invocations of strange and terrible deities, mingled the most awful curses and imprecations against Crassus. This was done in pursuance of an ancient Roman rite, which was never solemnized on

The evil omen daunted Crassus. This was done in pursuance of an ancient Roman rite, which was never solemnized on

He was quite uninformed as to the character and resources of the enemy he was going to attack; fancied that he should have an easy conquest over unwarlike people; that countless treasures lay before him, and that it would be a matter of no difficulty to outstrip the glory of his predecessors, Scipio, Lucullus, Pompey, and push on his army to Bactria and

He did not attempt to take advantage of the intestine dissensions in Parthia, did not form any cordial union with the Armenians and other tribes who were hostile to the Parthians, and did not obtain correct information as to the position of the enemy's force, and the nature of the country. On the contrary, he listened to flatterers; he suffered himself to be grossly deceived and misled, and he alienated, by ill-treatment and insolence, those who might have been useful, and were disposed to be friendly. After crossing the Euphrates, and taking Zenodotium in Mesopotamia (a success on which he prided himself as if it were a great exploit), he did not follow up the attack upon Parthia, but gave time to the enemy to assemble his forces and concert his plans and choose his ground. He was advised by Cassius to keep the banks of the Euphrates, to make himself master of Seleucia (which was situated on a canal connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris), and to take Babylon, since both these cities were always at enmity with the Parthians. He chose, however, after leaving 7000 infantry and 1000 cavalry in garrison in Mesopotamia, to cross the Euphrates with the rest of his forces, and to pass the winter in northern Syria. In Syria he behaved more like a revenue officer than a general. He omitted to muster and exercise the troops, or to review the armour and military stores. It is true that he ordered the neighbouring tribes and chiefs to furnish recruits and bring supplies, but these requisitions he willingly commuted for money. Nor was his culpity satisfied by such gains. At Hierapolis there was a wealthy temple, dedicated to the Syrian goddess Derecto or Attargatis (the Ashtaroth of Scripture), who presided over the elements of nature and the productive seeds of things. (Plin. H. N. v. 19; Simb. xvi. in fn.) This temple he plundered of its treasures, which it took several days to examine and weigh. One of the ill omens mentioned by Plutarch occurred here. Crassus had a son Publius, who had lately arrived from Italy with 1000 Gallic cavalry to join his father's army. The son, on going out of the temple, stumbled on the threshold, and the father, who was following, fell over him. Josephus (Ant. xiv. 7, Bell. Jud. i. 8) gives a circumstantial account of the plunder of the temple at Jerusalem by Crassus, but the narrative is not free from suspicion, for Jerusalem lay entirely out of the route of Crassus, and was at a distance of between 400 and 500 Roman miles from the winter quarters of the army; and we believe that no historian but Josephus mentions the occurrence, if he believe it. He tells how the Jewish work "De Bello Judaico," (i. 21,) which is little more than an enlarged translation of Josephus, and passes under the name of Hegesippus. To the divine judgment for his sacrilege on this occasion, Dr. Prideaux (Conneanum, part 2) attributes the subsequent infortune of Crassus. According to this account, Eleazar, treasurer of the temple, had, for security, put a bar of gold of the weight of 300 Hebrew minae into a hollowed beam, and to this beam was attached the veil which separated the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies. Perceiving that Crassus intended to plunder the temple, Eleazar endeavoured to compound with him, by giving him the bar of gold on condition that he would spare the other treasures. This Crassus promised with an oath, but had no sooner received the gold, than he seized, not only 3000 talents in money, which Pompey had left untouched, but everything else that he thought worth carrying away, to the value of 8000 talents more.
Orodes (Arsaces XIV.), the king of Parthia, was himself engaged with part of his army, in an invasion of Armenia, but he despatched Surenas, the most illustrious of his nobles and a young accomplished general, into Mesopotamia with the rest of his forces, to hold Crassus in check. Before preceding to hostilities, he sent ambassadors to Crassus to say that if the Roman general made war by the authority of the senate, the war could only terminate by the destruction of one or other of the parties, but if at the prompting of his own desire, the king would take compassion on his old age, and allow him to withdraw his troops in safety. Crassus replied that he would give his answer at Seleucia. "Sooner," said the ambassador, Vagises, "shall hair grow on the palm of this hand, than thy eyes behold Seleucia." Artavasdes, the king of Armenia, requested Cras-sum to join him in Armenia, in order that they might oppose Orodes with their united forces; he pointed to the Roman general that Armenia being a rough mountainous country, the cavalry, of which the Parthian army was almost wholly composed, would there be useless, and he promised to take care that in Armenia the Roman army should be supplied with all necessaries. In Mesopotamia, on the other hand, the Romans would be exposed to extreme danger on their march through sandy deserts, where they would be unable to procure water and provisions. Crassus, however, determined to march through Mesopotamia, and engaged Artavasdes to supply him with auxiliary troops;
but the king never sent the promised forces, excusing himself on the ground that they were necessary for his own defence against Orodes.
Crassus, in pursuing the imprudent course which he determined upon, was misled by a crafty Arabian chieftain, called by Plutarch, Ariannes.* This Arab had formerly served under Pompey, and was well known to many in the army of Crassus, for which reason he was selected by Surenas to betray the Romans. He offered himself as a guide to conduct them by the shortest way to the enemy. He told the Roman general, that the Parthians durst not stand before him;
that unless he made haste, they would escape from him, and rob him of the fruits of victory. Cas-sius, the legate, suspected Ariannes of treachery, and warned Crassus, instead of following him, to retire to the mountains; but Crassus, deceived by Surenas to his own defence against Orodes.
Crassus, having ascertained that Crassus and the principal officers of the Roman army were shut up in Carrhae, and fearing that they might altogether escape, again had recourse to stratagem and treachery.
Crassus was induced to take a guide, Andromachus, who acted as a traitor, and led the army into dangerous defiles. Having escaped from this snare, he was forced by the mutinous threats of the soldiers, though his eyes were open to the inevitable result, to accept a perfidious invitation from Surenas, who offered a pacific interview, and held out hopes that the Romans would be allowed to retire without molestation. At the interview, a horse, with rich trappings, was led out as a present from the king to Crassus, who was forcibly placed upon the saddle. Octavius, seeing plainly that it was the object of the Parthians to take Crassus alive, seized the horse by the bridle. A scuffle ensued, and Crassus fell by some unknown hand. Whether he was despatched by an enemy, or by some friend who desired to save him from the disgrace of becoming a prisoner, is unce-

* From the Roman ignorance of oriental lan-grages, there is a great variation among historians in the oriental names that occur in the expedition of Crassus. Thus, this chieftain is called by Dion Cassius, Augustus or Abgarus, and by the compiler of the Historia Romanorum Paffichl, attributed Appian, he is called Acharus. Frons (ii. 11.
§ 7) names him Mazans. Again, the Armenian King is called by Dion Cassius (xI. 16) Artabazes.
taint. In the course of this expedition,—one of the most disastrous in which the Romans were ever engaged against a foreign enemy,—Crassus is said to have lost 20,000 men killed, and 10,000 taken prisoners. At the time of his death, Artavasdes had made peace with Orodes, and had given one of his daughters in marriage to Parthenus, the son of the Parthian. They were sitting together at the nuptial banquet, and listening to the representation of the Bacchus of Euripides, when a messenger arrived from Surenas, and brought in the head and hand of Crassus. To the great delight of the spectators, passages from the drama (L. 1108 &c.) were applied by the actors to the lifeless head. Orodes afterwards cursed melted gold to be poured into the mouth of his fallen enemy, saying, “Sate thyself now with that metal of which in life thou wert so greedy.” (Dion Cass, x. 27; Florus, xi. 11.)

Cic, Epist. passim. The Historia Romanae Pars Historiae, usually attributed to Appian, is a compilation from Plutarch. All the authorities are collected in Drummam, Gesch. Rom. iv. pp. 115–115.)

M. Licinius Crassus Divus, son of No. 15, and known by the designation of Deceutor; for, though originally very rich, his prodigality and dissipation were so inordinate, that he became insolvent, and his creditors sold his goods. After this, he was often taunted by being addressed as Crassus Divus. (Val. Max., vi. 9, § 12.)

19. M. Licinius Crassus Divus, the elder son of the triumvir (No. 17) by Tertulla. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 8.) From his resemblance to the senator Axius, there was a slander that his mother had been unfaithful to her husband. After his younger brother Publius had left Caesar, Marcus became Caesar’s successor in Gaul, and at the breaking out of the civil war, in b. c. 49, he was prefect in Cisalpine Gaul. (Cic. B. G. v. 24; Justin xili. 4.) It is possible that he was the husband of the Caelia or Metalia, who appears by an inscription in Gruter (p. 377, No. 7) to have been the wife of M. Crassus, and has by some genealogists been wrongly given to the triumvir. (Drunnman, Gescl., Rome ii. p. 55.)

20. P. Licinius M. f. Crassus Divus, younger son of the triumvir, was Caesar’s legate in Gaul from b. c. 58 to the second consulship of his father. In b. c. 58, he fought against Ariovistus; in the following year, against the Veneti and other tribes in north-western Gaul; and in b. c. 56, he distinguished himself in Aquitania. In the next winter, Caesar sent him to Rome with a party of soldiers who were intended to forward the election of the triumvir Pompey and Crassus, and he also brought home 1000 Gallic cavalry, who afterwards took part in the Parthian war. Notwithstanding the mutual dislike of Cicero and Crassus, and the tribunivir Pompey and Crassus, he also brought home 1000 Gallic cavalry, who afterwards took part in the Parthian war. Notwithstanding the mutual dislike of Cicero and Crassus, the triumvir, Publius was much attached to the great orator, and derived much pleasure and benefit from his society. In b. c. 56, he strove to prevent the banishment of Cicero, and with other young Romans appeared in public clad in mourning; and, on his return to Rome, in b. c. 55, he exerted himself to procure a reconciliation between Cicero and his father. (Cic. ad Qua. Fr. ii. 9, § 2.) At the end of the year, in b. c. 54, he followed the triumvir to Syria, and, in the fatal battle near Carrhae, behaved with the utmost gallantry. (Plut. Crass. 25.) Seeing that he could not rescue his troops, he refused to provide for his own safety, and, as his hand was disabled by being transfixed with an arrow, he ordered his sword-bearer to run him through the body. Though he was more ambitious of military renown than of the fame of eloquence, he was fond of literature. He was a proficient in the art of dancing (Macrobi. b. 10, § 5.), and under the teaching of his friend and freedman Apollonius, became well skilled in Greek. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 16.)

There is extant a Roman denarius (post, p. 882) which has been usually supposed to refer to him, although the name inscribed and the device on the reverse would equally or better apply to his grandfather, Publius the censor, No. 14. See below, p. 882, a. (Eckhel, v. p. 232; Spanh. ii. p. 99.)

21. M. Licinius M. f. Crassus Divus, son of No. 19. In b. c. 30, he was consul with Octavian, and in the following year, as proconsul of Macedonia, he fought with success against the surrounding barbarians. (Liv. Epit. cxxiv., cxxv.)

22. M. Licinius M. f. Crassus Divus, son of No. 21, was consul b. c. 14. (Dion Cass. liv. 24.)

23. L. Licinius C. f. Crassus Dives, the son of M. Licinius Crassus, Divus. His pedigree is unknown. He was born b. c. 140, was educated by his father with the greatest care, and received instruction from the celebrated historian and jurist, L. Caecilius Antipater. (Cic. Brut. 26.) At a very early age he began to display his oratorical ability. At the age of twenty-one (or, according to Tacitus, Dial. de Orrat. c. 34, two years earlier) he accused C. Carbo, a man of high nobility and eloquence, who was hated by the aristocratic party to which Crassus belonged. Val. Maximus (vi. 5, § 6) gives an instance of his honourable conduct in this case. When the slave of Carbo brought to Crassus a desk filled with his master’s papers, Crassus sent back the desk to Carbo with the seal unbroken, together with his slave in chains. Carbo escaped condemnation by poisoning himself with cantharides (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 21, Brut. 27); and Crassus, pitying his fate, felt some remorse at the eagerness and success of his accusation. (Cic. Verr. iii. 1.) In the following year (b. c. 116) he defended the proposal of a law for establishing a new colony at Narbo in Gaul. The measure was opposed by the senate, who feared that by the assignation of lands to the poorer citizens, the aequorium would suffer from a diminution of the rents of the ager publicus; but, on this occasion, Crassus preferred the quest of popularity to the rebuff of the aequorium. (Cic. Brut. 43, de Orrat. ii. 18.) By eloquence above his years, he succeeded in carrying the law, and proceeded himself to found the colony. In b. c. 114, he undertook the defence of his kinswoman, the vestal Licia, who, with two other vestals, Marcia and Aemilia, were accused of incest; but, though upon a former trial his client had been acquitted by L. Caelius Mettius, pontifex maximus, and the whole college of pontiffs, the energy and ability of his defence were unable to prevail against the severity of L. Cassius, the se corporis reorum, who was appointed inquestor by the people for the purpose of reviewing the former lenient sentence. (Vell. i. 12; Cic. de Orrat. ii. 55, de Orrat. ii. 16; Macrobi. i. 10; Clinton, Fis. ii. c. 114; Ascur. in Milit. p. 46, ed. Oriell.) In his quaestorship he was the colleague of Q. Mucius Scenavo, with whom, as colleague, he served every other office except the tribunate of the plebs and the censorship. In his quinquerium he travelled through Macedonia to Athens on his return from Asia, which seems to have been his province. In Asia he had listened to the teaching of Scepsius Metrodorus, and at Athens he received instruction from Charmadas and other philosophers and rhetoricians; but he did not remain so long as he intended in that city, from unreasonable resentment at the refusal of the Athenians to repeat the solemnization of the mysteries, which were over two days before his arrival. (Cic. de Orat. iii. 69.) After his return to Rome, we find him engaged in pleading the causes of his friends. Thus, he defended Sergius Orata, who was accused of appropriating the public waters for the use of his oyster fisheries. (Val. Max. i. 1 § 1.) He was engaged, on behalf of the same Orata, in another cause, in which the following interesting question arose:—How far is a vendor, selling a house to a person from whom he had previously purchased it, liable to damages for not expressly mentioning in the conveyance a defect in title that existed at the time of the former sale, and of which the purchaser might therefore be supposed to be cognizant? (Cic. de Off., dc Oral.)

In Asia he had listened to the teaching of appropriating the public waters for the use of his province. In Asia he had listened to the teaching of his oyster fisheries. (Val. Max. i. 1 § 1.) He was engaged, on behalf of the same Orata, in another cause, in which the following interesting question arose:—How far is a vendor, selling a house to a person from whom he had previously purchased it, liable to damages for not expressly mentioning in the conveyance a defect in title that existed at the time of the former sale, and of which the purchaser might therefore be supposed to be cognizant? (Cic. de Off., dc Oral.)

In r.c. 106 he spoke in favour of the lex Servilia, by which it was proposed to restore to the equites the judiciary, which were then in the hands of the senatorial order. The contests for the power of being selected as judges, which divided the different orders, prove how much the administration of justice was perverted by partiality and faction. As there is much confusion in the history of the judiciary, it may be proper to mention some of the changes which took place about this period. In r.c. 122, by the lex Sempronia of C. Gracchus, the judiciary were transferred from the senate to the equites. In r.c. 106, by the lex Servilia of Q. Servilius Caepio, they were restored to the senate, and it is not correct to say (with Walter, Gesch. des Römischen Rechts, i. p. 244, and others), that by this lex Servilia both orders were admitted to share the judiciary. The lex Servilia of Caepio had a very brief existence; for about r.c. 104, by the lex Servilia of C. Servilius Glanis, the judiciary were again taken from the senate and given to the knights. Much error has arisen from the existence of two laws of the same name and of nearly the same date, but exactly opposite in their enactments. The speech of Crassus for the lex Servilia of Caepio was one of remarkable power and eloquence (Cic. Brut. 43, de Orat. i. 59), and expressed the strength of his devotion to the interests of the state. It was probably in this speech that he attacked Memmius (Cic. de Orat. ii. 59, 66) who was a strenuous opponent of appropriating the public waters for the use of his oyster fisheries. (Val. Max. iv. 5 § 4.) He was elected, r.c. 95, with his constant colleague, Q. Saeveola, the pontifex maximus, who must be carefully distinguished from the augur of the same name. During their consulship was passed the Lex Licinia Mucia de Cecivis regunda, to prevent persons passing as citizens who were not entitled to that character, and to compel all who were not citizens to depart from Rome. The rigour and inhumanity of this law seems to have been one of the promoting causes of the social war. (Ascom. in Cic. pro Cornel.; Cic. de Orat. iii. 11.) During the term of his office, he had occasion to defend Q. Servilius Caepio, who was tried by the equites, and was accused of majestas by the tribune C. Norbanus (Cic. Brut. 35); but Caepio was condemned. Crassus was now anxious to seek for renown in another field. He hastened to his province, Hither Gaul, and explored the Alps in search of an enemy; but he found no opposition, and was obliged to content himself with the subjagation of some petty tribes, by whose depredations he asserted that the province was disturbed. For this trifling success he was not ashamed to ask a triumph, and would perhaps have obtained his demand from the senate, had not his colleague Scaevola opposed such a misapplication of the honour. (Val. Max. iii. 7 § 4; Cic. in Pison. 25.) With this exception, his conduct in the administration of his province was irreproachable. This was admitted by C. Carbo (the son of the Carbo whom he had formerly accused), who accompanied him to Gaul, in order to seek out the materials of an accusation; but Crassus disarmed his opponent by courteously inquiring, and employing Carbo in the planning and execution of affairs.

One of the most celebrated private causes in the annals of Roman jurisprudence was the contest for an inheritance between M. Curius and M. Coponius, which was heard before the centumviri under the presidency of the praetor T. Manilius, in the year r.c. 93. Crassus, the greatest orator of the day, pleaded the cause of Curius, while Q. Saeveola, the greatest living lawyer, supported the claim of Coponius. The state of the case was this. A testator died, supposing his wife to be pregnant, and having directed by will that if the son, who should be born within the next ten months, should die before becoming his own guardian, M. Curius should succeed as heir in his place. (Cic. Brut. 52, 53.) No son was born.—Saeveola argued that this was a casus omissus, and insisted upon the strict law, according to which Curius could have no claim unless a son were first born, and then died while under guardianship. Crassus contended for the equitable construction, according to which the testator could not be supposed to intend any difference between the death of no son being born, and the case of a son being born and dying before arriving at the age of puberty. The equitable construction contended for by Crassus was approved, and Curius gained the inheritance.

In r.c. 92 he was made censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus. A new practice had sprung up in Rome of sending youths to the schools of persons who called themselves Latin rhetoricians. Crassus disapproved the novelty, as tending to

"Antequam in sumnum tuteam pervenirem," s. c. before attaining the age of 14 years, at which age a son would cease to be under the guardianship of another. The phrase has been misunderstood by Drumm.
idleness, and calculated rather to encourage effrontery than to sharpen intellect. He thought that the Latins in almost every valuable acquirement excelled the Greeks, and was displeased to see his countrymen stoop to an inferior imitation of Greek customs. The censors suppressed the schools by a proclamation, which may be found in the Dialogue de Oratoribus and in Gellius (xv. 11), and deserves to be referred to as an example of the form of a censorial edict. Though the two censors concurred in this measure, they were men of very different habits and temperas, and passed the period of their office in strife and discord. Crassus was fond of elegance and luxury. He had a house upon the Palatium, which, though it yielded in magnificence to the mansion of Q. Catulus upon the same hill, and was considerably inferior to that of C. Aquilius upon the Viminal, was remarkable for its size, the taste of its furniture, and the beauty of its grounds. It was adorned with pillars of Hymentian marble, with expensive vases, and triclinia inlaid with brass. He had two goddesses, carved by the hand of Mentor, which served rather for ornament than for use. His gardens were provided with fish-ponds, and some noble lotus-trees shaded his walks with their ample foliage. Ahenobarbus, his colleague, found fault with such corruption of manners (Plin. H. N. xvii. 1), estimated his house at a hundred million (sestertium milliaries), or according to Valerius Maximus (ix. 1. § 4) six million (seragies sestertio) sesterces, and complained of his crying for the loss of a lamprey, as if it had been a daughter. It was a tame lamprey, which used to come at the call of Crassus, and feed out of his hand. Crassus made a public speech against his colleague, and by his great powers of ridicule, turned him into derision; jested upon his name (Sueton. Nero, 2), and to the accusation of weeping for a lamprey, replied, that it was more than Ahenobarbus had done upon the loss of any of his three wives. (Aelian, Hist. Animæ. viii. 4.) On many occasions, he availed himself of his power of exciting a laugh against his opponent (Cic. de Or. ii. 59, 60, 70), and was not scrupulous as to the mode. Thus, though he carefully avoided everything that might impair his own dignity, and might seem to his audience to savour of buffoonery, he sometimes jested upon personal deformities, as may be seen by reference to his sally upon L. Aelius Lamia in his speech for C. Aculeo (Cic. de Or. ii. 65), and his answer to the troublesome witness, as reported by Pliny. (H. N. xxxv. 4.) Shortly before his death, he spoke in favour of Cn. Plancus in opposition to the charge of M. Annius. This was a strong measure, adopted usually by the highest magistrates to constrain the performance of public duties, or to punish contumacious contempt of public authority. Crassus repelled the lictor, and said that he could not respect the character of consul in a man who refused to treat him as a senator. "If you want to restrain me, it will not do to seize my goods.* You must tear out this tongue. Even then, with my very breath I will continue to denounce your lawless conduct." At his dictation a vote of the senate was passed by which they vindicated their own patriotism; but the passionate vehemence of this contention shattered his health and brought on a fever. He returned to his dwelling, was seized with a shivering fit, and in seven days was dead.

Such was the end of one of the greatest orators that Rome ever produced. In an age abounding with orators he stood pre-eminent. (Vell. Pat. ii. 3.)

The dialogue of Corunamius, Cato, and the Greeks, had been succeeded by a medium style, which, without sacrificing strength to artificial rules, was more polished and ornamented. His sentences were short and well-turned. In debate he was self-possessed and pertinacious, and his lively wit gave a peculiar zest to his reply. He employed words in common use, but he always employed the best and most proper words. His mode of stating his facts and arguments was wonderfully clear and concise. Though peroratus, he was perorōrēs. In early life he had disciplined his taste by the excellent practice of carefully translating into Latin the most celebrated specimens of Grecian eloquence. In the treatise De Oratore, Cicero introduces him as one of the principal speakers, and he is understood to express Cicero's own sentiments. Few of his speeches were preserved in writing, and of those few the greater part, if we may judge from the fragments that remain, consisted of senatorial orations and harangues to the people. His chief excellence seems to have lain in this style rather than in judicial oratory; yet, in the judgment of Cicero, he was eloquentium jurisprudentissimus. (Gull. Grotius, de Vit. J.Clorum. i. 7. § 9; Meyer, Oratorum Romanorum Fragmenta. pp. 291—317; Drumman, Gesch. Roms. iv. p. 62.)

24 and 25. Licinian. [Licinia.]

26. L. Licinius Crassus Scipio, grandson of Crassus the orator [No. 23], one of whose daughters married his father P. Scipio Nasica, who was praetor, r. c. 94. His grandfather, having no son, adopted him by his testament, and made him heir to his property. (Cic. Brut. 58; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 3. s. 8.)

27. Licinius Crassus Dives, of uncertain pedigree, was praetor in r. c. 59, when L. Vetius was accused before him of conspiracy against the life of Pompey. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 24. § 2.)

* "Non tibi illa sunt caedenda." (Cic. de Or. iii. 1.) Caedenda here implies securē nota sole. It is probable that, as a symbol of taking legal possession, the praetor pasted the cornices with notes, and that the ceremony was analogous to the manus injecctio in personal arrest.

3 l
It has been conjectured that his praenomen was Publius, and that he was identical with No. 18.

28. P. LICINIUS CRASSUS, was praetor in B.C. 57, and favoured Cicero's return from exile. (Cic. post. Redit. in Sen. 9.) Orelli (Onom. Tull.) thinks that the name affords evidence of the spuriousness of the speech in which it is found.

29. P. CRASSUS JUNIUS, one of the gens Junia, adopted by some Licinius Crassus. His name appears on coins. (Spanh. ii. pp. 104, 179; Eichels v. pp. 153, 154, 233.) He was tribune of the plebs in B.C. 51, and a friend of Cicero. (Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 3. § 3.) In the civil war he fought for Pompey, and served with the title legatus propraetore under Metellus Scipio in Africa, where, after the battle of Thapsus, he made his escape to the sea. (Plut. Cato Maj. 70, fn.)

30. M. LICINIUS CRASSUS MUCIANUS. [Mucianus.]

The annexed coin of the Licinia gens is the one referred to on p. 379, b., and supposed to have been struck by P. Crassus [No. 20], as it bears the legend P. (indistinct in the cut) Crassus M. F. The obverse represents the head of Venus, and the reverse a man holding a horse, which is supposed to refer to the ceremony of the public inspection of the horses of the equites by the censors. (Dict. of Aut. s. v. Equites.) [J. T. G.]

CRASSUS, OCTACILIUS. 1. M. OCTACILIUS CRASSUS, was consul in B.C. 263 with M. Valerius Maximus, and crossed with a numerous army over to Sicily. After having induced many of the Sicilian towns to surrender, the consul advanced against Hiero of Syracuse. The king, in compliance with the desire of his people, concluded a peace, which the Romans gladly accepted, and in which he gave up to them the towns they had taken, delivered up the Roman prisoners, and paid a contribution of 200 talents. He thus became the ally of Rome. In B.C. 246 Crassus was consul a second time with M. Fabius Licaeus, and carried on the war against the Carthaginians, though nothing of any consequence seems to have been accomplished. (Polyb. i. 16 &c.; Zonar. viii. 9; Diod. iv. 10; Oros. iv. 7; Gellius, x. 6.)

2. T. OCTACILIUS CRASSUS, apparently a brother of the former, was consul in B.C. 261, with L. Valerius Flaccus, and continued the operations in Sicily against the Carthaginians after the taking of Agrigentum; but nothing is known to have been accomplished during his consulship. (Polyb. i. 20.) [L. S.]

CRASSUS, PAPIRIUS. 1. M. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 441 with C. Furius Paculus. (Liv. iv. 12; Diod. xii. 35.)

2. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 436 with M. Cornelius Maluginenius. They led armies against Veii and Falerii, but as no enemy appeared in the field, the Romans contented themselves with plundering and ravaging the open country. (Liv. iv. 21; Diod. xii. 41.) Crassus was censor in B.C. 424.

3. C. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS was consul in B.C. 430 with L. Julius Julius. These consuls discovered, by treacherous means, that the tribunes of the people intended to bring forward a bill on the aequatio multurn, and in order to anticipate the favour which the tribunes thereby were likely to gain with the people, the consuls themselves proposed the measure and carried the law. (Liv. iv. 30; Cic. de Re Publ. 35; Orelli, loc. cit. xvi. 72.)

4. C. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS was consular tribune in B.C. 394. (Liv. iv. 18.)

5. SP. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS, consular tribune in B.C. 392. He and L. Papiius Crassus, one of his colleagues, led an army against Veii, and fought with success against that town and its allies, the Praenestines. (Liv. vi. 22.)

6. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS, consular tribune in B.C. 392, and again in B.C. 376. (Livy, vii. 22; Diod. xv. 71.)

7. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS, consular tribune in B.C. 368. (Liv. vi. 30; Diod. xv. 78.)

8. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS was made dictator in B.C. 340 while holding the office of praetor, in order to conduct the war against the revolted Latins, since the consuls Manlius was ill at the time. Crassus marched against Antium, but was encamped in its neighbourhood for some months without accomplishing anything. (In B.C. 336 he was made consul with K. Dullius, and carried on a war against the Ausonians of Cales. In 330 he was consul a second time, and carried on a war against the inhabitants of Privernun. They were commanded by Vitruvius Plancus who was conquered by the Romans without much difficulty. In 323 Crassus was magistrate equum to the dictator L. Papirius Cursor, and in 318 he was invested with the censorship. (Liv, viii. 12, 18, 20; Diod. xvii. 29, 92; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 21.)

9. M. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS, apparently a brother of the preceding, was appointed dictator in B.C. 332 to conduct the war against the Gauls, who were then believed to be invading the Roman dominion; but the report proved to be unfounded. (Liv. viii. 17.)

10. L. PAPIRIUS CRASSUS was magistrate equum to the dictator T. Manlius Torquatus, in B.C. 320. (Fast. Cap.)

[LS.]

CRATINUS, one of Caesar's veterans, who had been the primipilus in the tenth legion in the year before the battle of Pharsalus, and who served as a volunteer in the campaign against Pompey. It was he who commenced the battle of Pharsalus, B.C. 48, saying that, whether he survived or fell, Caesar should be indebted to him: he died fighting bravely in the foremost line. (Caes. i. 27. 91, 92; Flor. iv. 2. § 46; Lucan, vii. 471, &c.; Appian, B. C. ii. 82; Plut. Pompe. 71, Caes. 41.)

CRATAEUS (Krapardos), according to several traditions, the mother of Scylla. (Hom. Od. xii. 124; Od. Met. xiii. 749; Hesych. s. v.; Plin. H. N. iii. 10.) [LS.]

CRATERUS (Krapados), one of the most distinguished generals of Alexander the Great, was a son of Alexander of Orestis, a district in Macedonia, and a brother of Amphotermus. When Alexander the Great set out on his Aegiotic expedition, Craterus commanded the πετρεπόμυς, Subsequently we find him commanding a detachment of cavalry, as in the battle of Arbela and in the Indian campaign; but it seems that he had no permanent office, and that Alexander employed...

him on all occasions where a general of able and independent judgment was required. He was a man of a noble character, and although he was strongly attached to the simple manners and customs of Macedonia, and was averse to the conduct which Alexander and his followers assumed in the East, still the king loved and esteemed him, next to Hephaestion, the most among all his generals and friends. In c. 324 he was commissioned by Alexander to lead back the veterans to Macedonia, but as his health was not good at the time, Polyperchon was ordered to accompany him and support him. It was further arranged that Antipater, who was then regent of Macedonia, should lead reinforcements to Asia, and that Craterus should succeed him in the regency of Macedonia. But Alexander died before Craterus reached Europe, and in the division of the empire which was then made, Antipater and Craterus received in common the government of Macedonia, Greece, the Illyrians, Triballians, Agrarians, and Epeirus, as far as the Cenanian mountains. According to Dercippus (ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 64, ed. Bekker), the government of these countries was divided between them in such a manner, that Antipater had the command of the armies and Craterus the administration of the civil government. When Craterus arrived in Europe, Antipater was involved in the Lamic war, and was in a position in which the arrival of his colleague was a matter of the utmost importance to him, and enabled him to crush the daring attempts of the Greeks to recover their independence. After the close of this war Craterus divorced his wife Amastris, who had been given him by Alexander, and married Phila, the daughter of Antipater. Soon after Craterus accompanied his father-in-law in the war against the Aetolians, and in B. C. 321 in that against Perdiccas in Asia. Craterus had the command against Eumenes, while Antipater marched through Cilicia to Egypt. Craterus fell in a battle against Eumenes, which was fought in Cappadocia, and Eumenes on the same day lost his elder brother in arms, honoured him with a magnificent funeral, and sent his ashes back to Macedonia. (Arrian, Anab., ap. Phot. Bibl. pp. 69, 224; Q. Curtius; Diod. xviii. 16, 18, xix. 59; Plut. Alex. 47, Phoc. 25; Corn. Nep. Eum. 4; comp. Antipater, Amastris, Alexander.) [L. S.]

CRATERUS (Σκάρασις), a brother of Antigenus Gonatas, and father of Alexander, the prince of Corinth. (Phileon, de Mirab. 32; Justin, Prolog. xxxvi.) He distinguished himself as a diligent compiler of historical documents relative to the history of Attica. He made a collection of Attic inscriptions, containing decrees of the people (συνεχείας σωστευμένης), and out of them he seems to have constructed a diplomatic history of Athens. (Plut. Aristod. 32, Com. 13.) This work is frequently referred to by Harpocration and Stephanus of Byzantium, the latter of whom (σ. τ. Νόθοφθιος) quotes the ninth book of it. (Comp. Pollux, viii. 126; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ais. 1073, Rev. 323.

With the exception of the statements in these and other passages, the work of Craterus, which must have been of great value, is lost. (Niebuhr, Kleine Schrif. 1. p. 225, note 39; Beckh, Pref. to his Corp. Inscrip. i. p. lx.) [L. S.]

CRATERUS (Κρατέρος), a Greek physician, who is mentioned in Cicero’s Letters (ad Att. xii. 18, 14) as attending the daughter of Atticus, Atticus (called also Caecilius or Pompeus), B. C. 45. He is mentioned also by Horese (Stit. ii. 3. 101), Persius (Stit. iii. 65), and Galen (De Compr. Medicam. sec. Locos. vii. 5, vol. xiii. p. 96, De Anit. ii. 8, vol. x. p. 147); and he may perhaps be the same person who is said by Porphyry (De Abstin. ad Animal. 1. 17, p. 61, ed. Cantab.), to have cured one of his slaves of a very remarkable disease. (W. A. G.) CRATERUS, a sculptor of the first rank, after Clearchus, whose statues, executed together with Pythodorus, were much admired, and were regarded as a great ornament of the palace of the Caesars. (Pinn. H. N. xxxvi, 4 § 11.) The words “παλατίνας δομος Κασαρον,” in that passage, compared with the preceding ones, “Τιτο Ιμπερατορος δομος,” are to be understood of the imperial palaces on the Palantine hill, and fix the date of Craterus to the time of the first emperors. [L. U.]

CRATES (Κράτες), of Athens, was the son of Antigenes of the Thrissian demus, the pupil and friend of Polemo, and his successor in the chair of the Academy, perhaps about B. C. 270. The intimate friendship of Crates and Polemo was celebrated in antiquity, and Diogenes Laërtius has preserved an epigram of the poet Antagoras, according to which the two friends were united after death in one tomb. The most distinguished of the pupils of Crates were the philosopher Arcesilaus, Theodorus, the founder of a sect called after him, and Bion Borystenites. The writings of Crates are lost. Diogenes Laërtius says, that they were on philosophical subjects, on comedy, and also on orations; but the latter were probably written by Crates of Tralles. [Crates of Tralles.] (Diog. Lecrit. iv. 21-23.) [A. S.]

CRATES (Κράτες), of Athens, a comic poet, of the old comedy, was a younger contemporary of Cratinus, in whose plays he was the principal actor before he betook himself to writing comedies. (Diog. Lecrit. iv. 23; Aristoph. Elpist. 356-440, and Schol.; Anon. de Com. p. xxix.) He began to flourish in Ol. 62, 4, B. C. 419, 418 (Bunel, History of Comedy). The character of by Aristophanes in such a way as to imply that he was dead before the Knights was acted, Ol. 38, 4, B. C. 424. With respect to the character of his dramas, there is a passage in Aristotle (Poet. 5) which has been misunderstood, but which seems simply to mean, that, instead of making his comedies vehicles of personal abuse, he chose such subjects as admitted of a more general mode of depicting character. This is confirmed by the titles and fragments of his plays and by the testimony of the Anonymous writer on Comedy respecting his imitator, Pherecrates (p. xxix). His great excellence is attested by Aristophanes, though in a somewhat ironical tone (t. c.; comp. Ath. iii. p. 117, c), and by the fragments of his plays. He excelled chiefly in mirth and fun (Aristoph. l. c.; Anon. de Com. l. c.), which he carried so far as to bring drunken persons on the stage, a thing which Ephipparchus had done, but which no Attic comedian had ventured on before. (Ath. x. p. 429, a.) His example was followed by Aristophanes and by later comedians; and with the poets of the new comedy it became a very common practice. (Dion Chrys. Orat. 32, p. 391, b.) Like the other great comic poets, he was made to feel strongly both the favour and the inconvenience of the people. (Aristoph. l. c.) The Scholast on this passage says, that Crates used to bribe the spectators,—a charge which Meineke 3 L 2 thinks may have been taken from some comic poet who was an enemy to Crates. There is much confusion among the ancient writers about the number and titles of his plays. Suidas has made two doubt that he is wrong. Other grammarians assign to him seven and eight comedies respectively. (Anon. de Com. pp. xxix. xxxiv.) The result of Meineke's analysis of the statements of the ancient writers is, that fourteen plays are ascribed to Crates, namely, Γέττονς, Διώνος, Ἡρως, Θηρία, Ὑγαρός, Λάμα, Μέτωκος, Ὀφριακός, Παῦσας, Πεδίτα, Ὑγαρός, Σάμων, Ὑλάμα, Φλάργυρος, of which the following are suspicious, Διώνος, Ὑγαρός, Μετωκος, Ὀφριακος, Πεδίτα, Φλάργυρος, thus leaving eight, the number mentioned by the Anonymous writer on Comedy, namely, Γέττονς, Ἡρως, Θηρία, Λάμα, Παῦσας, Πεδίτα, Σάμων, Ὑλάμα. Of these eight plays fragments are still extant. There are also seventeen fragments, which cannot be assigned to their proper plays. The language of Crates is pure, elegant, and simple, with very few peculiar words and constructions. He uses a very rare metrical peculiarity, namely, a spondee ending on the anapestic tetrometer. (Poll. vi. 53; Athen. iii. p. 119, c.; Meineke, Comment. de Recit. Comm. Att. Antiq. pp. 266—283.)

CRATES (Κράτης), of Mallus in Cilicia, the son of Timocrates, is said by Suidas (c. v.) to have been a Stoic philosopher, but is far better known as one of the most distinguished of the ancient Greek grammarians. He lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, and was contemporary with Aristarchus, in rivalry with whom he supported the fame of the Pergamene school of grammar against the Alexandrian, and the system of anomaly (anomaly (δομαλία) against that of analogy (δομάλα) of the latter of which sciences he regarded as quite subordinate to the former. The office of the critic, according to Crates, was to investigate everything which could throw light upon literary and historical questions for which Homer furnishes an occasion, it was the direct consequence of his opinion of the critic's office, that he should undertake them, nor do the results of his inquiries quite deserve the contempt with which Wolf treats them. Among the ancients themselves he enjoyed a reputation little, if at all, inferior to that of Aristarchus. The school which he founded at Pergamus flourished a considerable time, and was the subject of a work by Ptolemy of Ascalon, entitled περὶ τῶν Κρατητίου αδιάφων. To this school Wolf refers the catalogues of ancient writers which are mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (ἐν τοῖς Περγαμωνίων ποίησις, ii. p. 116, 5, ed. Syllburg), who mentions the school of the name of Πολύπης, Phegennotes, (p. 112, 27). They are also called Κρατητίους. Among the catalogues mentioned by Dionysius there can be no doubt that we ought to include the lists of titles (δοιμακοδωμα) of dramas, which Athenaeus (viii. p. 336, c.) states to have been composed by the Pergamenes.

Besides his work on Homer, Crates wrote commentaries on the Theognos of Hesiod, on Euripides, on Aristophanes, and probably on other ancient authors, a work on the Attic dialect (περὶ Ἀττικῶν διαλέκτον), and works on geography, natural history, and agriculture, of all which only a few fragments exist. Some scholars, however, think, that the Crates of Pergamus, whose work on the wonders of various countries is quoted by Pliny (H. N. vii. 2) and Aelian (H. A. xvii. 9), was a different person. The fragments of his works are collected by C. F. Wegener (De Aulo Atticorum Litt. Atticarum Fragmenti, Havn. 1836, 8vo.) There is also one epigram by him in the Greek Anthology (ii. 3, Brucke and Jacobs) upon Choriclis. This epigram is assigned to Crates on the authority of its title, Κρατητίου γραμματικῆς. But Diogenes Laërtius mentions an epigrammatic poet of the same name, as distinct from the grammarian.

CRATES.

CRATES (Κράτης), a very ancient Greek musician, the disciple of Olympus, to whom some ascribed the composition for the flute, which was called ῥός Πολυκέφαλος, and which was more usually attributed to Olympus himself. (Plut. de Mus. 7, p. 1133, e.) Nothing farther is known of him. [P. S.]

CRATES (Κράτης), of Tarsus, an Academic philosopher, is expressly distinguished by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 114, 117) from Crates of Athens, with whom he has been often confounded. [A.S.]

CRATES (Κράτης) of Tiberias, the son of Ancondas, repaired to Athens, where he became a scholar of the Cynic Diogenes, and subsequently one of the most distinguished of the Cynic philosophers. He flourished, according to Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 87), in n. c. 328, was still living at Athens in the time of Demetrius Phil colorus (Athen. x. p. 422, e; Diog. Laërt. vi. 90), and was at Tiberias in n. c. 307, when Demetrius Phil colorus withdrew thither. (Plut. Mor. p. 69, c.)

Crates was one of the most singular phenomena of a time which abounded in all sorts of strange characters. Though heir to a large fortune, he renounced all and bestowed it upon his native city, since a philosopher had no need of money; or, according to another account, he placed it in the hands of a banker, with the charge, that he should deliver it to his sons, in case they were simpletons, but that, if they became philosophers, he should distribute it among the poor. Diogenes Laërtius has preserved a number of curious tales heaped up against the garrison for the purpose of establishing an independent government, she quelled the sedition, and, having crucified thirty of the popular leaders, held the town firmly in subjection for Cassander. [See p. 620.] In n. c. 308, however, she was induced by Ptolemy Lagi to betray Co rinth and Sicyon to him, these being the only places, except Athens, yet possessed by Cassander in Greece. Cratesipolis was at Corinth at the time, and, as her troops would not have consented to the surrender, she introduced a body of Ptolemy's forces into the town, pretending that they were a reinforcement which she had sent for from Sicyon. She then withdrew to Patrai in Achaia, where she was living, when, in the following year (n. c. 307), she held with Demetrius Pollo retes the remarkable interview to which each party was attracted by the fame of the other. (Diod. xix. 65, 70.)

CRATESPPIDAS (Κατησππίδας), a La codaemonian, was sent out as admiral after the death of Mindarus, n. c. 410, and took the command at Chios of the fleet which had been collected by Pasippidas from the allies. He effected, however, little or nothing during his term of office beyond the seizure of the acropolis at Chios, and the restoration of the Chian exiles, and was succeeded by Lysander. (Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 1; Diod. xiii. 65, 70.)

CRATEUS (Κράτευς), a Greek herbalist (ψηφόμαχος) who lived about the beginning of the first century B. C., as he gave the name Μιθριδατις to a plant in honour of Mithridates. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 26.) He is frequently quoted by Pliny and Dioscorides, and is mentioned by Galen (De Simplex. Medicam. Temperam. ac Facult. vi. proem. vol. xi. pp. 795, 797; Comment. in Hippocr. De Nat. Huiu.,” ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 134; De Antid. i. 2, vol. xiv. p. 7), among the eminent writers on

Of the charges which Suidas brings against the moral character of Cratinus, one is unsupported by any other testimony, though, if it had been true, it is not likely that Aristophanes would have been silent upon it. Probably Suidas was misled by a passage of Aristophanes (Acharn. 848, 850) which refers to another Cratinus, a lyric poet. (Schol. l. c.) The other charge which Suidas brings against Cratinus, that of habitual intemperance, is sustained by many passages of Aristophanes and other writers, as well as by the confession of Cratinus himself, who appears to have treated the subject in a very amusing way, especially in his Heron. (See further on this point Meinecke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 47—49.)

Cratinus exhibited twenty-one plays and gained nine victories (Suid. s. v.; Eudoc. p. 271; Anon. de Com. p. xxix), and that παραφήνη, according to the Scholiast on Aristophanes. (Elyt. 528.)

Cratinus was undoubtedly the poet of the old comedy. He gave it its peculiar character, and he did not, like Aristophanes, live to see its decline. Before his time the comic poets had aimed at little beyond exciting the laughter of their audience; it was Cratinus who first made comedy a terrible weapon of personal attack, and the comic poet a severe censor of public and private vice. An anonymous ancient writer says, that to the pleasing in comedy Cratinus added the useful, by accusing evil-doers and punishing them with comedy as with a public scourge. (Anon. de Com. p. xxxii.) He did not even, like Aristophanes, in such attacks unite mirth with satire, but, as an ancient writer says, he hurled his reproaches in the plainest form at the bare heads of the offenders. (Plat. p. 339), although it is manifestly wrong in joining Cratinus with that of Plato with that of Cratinus. Accordingly we find, that the political freedom of Athens and this license of her comic poets rose upon their protection from their resentment. And accordingly we find, that the political freedom of Athens and this license of her comic poets rose and fell together. Nay, if we are to believe Cicero, the law itself granted them impunity. (De Repub. iv. 10: "apud quos [Gracce] fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod vellet comediae de quo vellet nominatin dicere.")

The free constitution of Athens inspired him with courage to attack the offenders, and secured for him protection from their resentment. And accordingly we find, that the political freedom of Athens and this license of her comic poets rose and fell together. (See further on this point Meinecke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 47—49.)

Cicero, the law itself granted them impunity. (De Repub. iv. 10: "apud quos [Gracce] fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod vellet comediae de quo vellet nominatin dicere.")

The free constitution of Athens inspired him with courage to attack the offenders, and secured for him protection from their resentment. And accordingly we find, that the political freedom of Athens and this license of her comic poets rose and fell together. Nay, if we are to believe Cicero, the law itself granted them impunity. (De Repub. iv. 10: "apud quos [Gracce] fuit etiam lege concessum, ut quod vellet comediae de quo vellet nominatin dicere.")

The same thing is stated, though not so distinctly, byThemistius. (Orat. viii. p. 110, b.) This flourishing period lasted from the establishment of the Athenian power after the Persian war down to the end of the Peloponnesian war, or perhaps a few years later (about n. c. 460—393). The exercise of this license, however, was not altogether unsupported. In addition to what could be done personally by such men as Crito and Alcibiades, the law itself interfered on more than one occasion. In the archaenphism of Morychides (n. c. 440—439), a law was made prohibiting the comic poets from holding a living person up to ridicule by bringing him on the stage by name (ὑφεσμά τοι µη κωμιδάτων ὀνόματι, Schol. Arist. Acharn. 67; Meineke, Hist. Crit. p. 40). This law remained in force for the two following years, and was annulled in the archonship of Euthymenes. (n. c. 437-136.) Another restriction, which probably belongs to about the same time, was the law that no Arceophanes should write comedies. (Plut. Bell. an Pac. praest. Ath. p. 348, c.) From n. c. 436 the old comedy flourished in its highest vigour, till a series of attacks was made upon it by a certain Socrates and the Oikourous, with great probability, of having been Aristophanes (b. c. 405). This Symmambus carried a law, µη κωμιδάται δοεοατί τυν, probably about n. c. 416-415, which did not, however, remain in force long. (Schol. Arist. Acharn. 1149; Meineke, p. 41.) That the brief aristocratical revolution of 411 B. C. affected the liberty of comedy can hardly be doubted, though we have no express testimony. If it declined then, we have clear evidence of its revival with the restoration of democracy in the Πραγματικά of Aristophanes and the Oikourous. (b. c. 405.) It cannot be doubted that, during the rule of the thirty tyrants, the liberty of comedy was restrained, not only by the loss of political liberty, but by the exhaustion resulting from the war, in consequence of which the chooruses could not be maintained with their ancient splendour. We even find a play of Cratinus without Chorus or Parabasis, namely, the Οἰσινιαί, but this was during the 88th Olympiad, when the above-mentioned law was in force. The old comedy, having thus declined, was at length brought to an end by the attacks of the dithyrambic poet Cinesias, and of Agyrrhus, and was succeeded by the Middle Comedy (about n. c. 393-392; Meineke, pp. 43, 49).

Besides what Cratinus did to give a new character and power to comedy, he is said to have made changes in its outward form, so as to bring it into better order, especially by fixing the number of actors, which had before been indefinite, at three. (Anon. de Com. p. xxxii.) On the other hand, however, Aristotle says, that no one knew who made this and other such changes. (Poli. v. 4.) The character of Cratinus as a poet rests upon the testimonies of the ancient writers, as we have no complete play of his extant. These testimonies are most decided in placing him in the very first rank of comic poets. By one writer he is compared to Aeschylus. (Anon. de Com. p. xxiv.) There is a fragment of his own, which evidently is no vain boast, but expresses the estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries. (Schol. Arist. Eusid. 596.) Amongst several allusions to him in Aristophanes, the most remarkable is the passage in the Knights referred to above, where he likens Cratinus to a rapid torrent, carrying everything before it, and says that for his many victories he deserved to drink in the Pryanumeion, and to sit anointed as a spectator of the Dionysia. But, after all, his highest praise is in the fact, that he appeared at the Dionysia of the following year, not as a spectator, but as a competitor, and carried off the prize above Aristophanes himself. His style seems to have been somewhat grandiloquent, and full of trapes, and altogether of a lyric cast. He was very bold in inventing new words, and in changing the meaning of old ones. His cho- ruses especially were greatly admired, and were for a time the favourite songs at banquets. (Aristophanes, l. c.) It was perhaps on account of the dithyrambic character of his poetry that he was likened to Aeschylus, and it was no doubt for the same reason that Aristophanes called him ταφρος-φλαγων (Ran. 357; comp. Eryx. Mag. p. 747, 50; Apollon. Lex. Hor. p. 156, 20.) His metres seem to have parakein of the same lofty character. He sometimes used the epic verse. The Cratini- meus of the grammarians, however, was in use before his time. (Tolynus.) In the in- vention of his plots he was most ingenious and felicitous, but his impetuous and exuberant fancy was apt to derange them in the progress of the play. (Platonius, p. xxvii.) Among the poets who imitated him more or less the ancient writers enumerate Empolis, Aristophanes, Crates, Telecleides, Strattis, and others. The only poets whom he himself is known to have imitated are Homer and Archilochus. (Platonius, l. c.; Bergk, p. 156.) His most formidable rival was Aristophanes. (See, besides numerous pas- sages of Aristophanes and the Scholia on him, Schol. Stat. p. 330.) Among his enemies Aristophanes mentions ςενί δεν Καλλιάν (l. c.). What Callias he means is doubtful, but it is most natural to suppose that it is Callias the son of Hippo- lians.

There is much confusion among the ancient writers in quoting from his dramas. Meineke has shown that the following plays are wrongly attributed to him:—Γλαῦνος, Θραύνος, Ἱρίνος, Ἀλαξίς, Κρήνας, Ψυχωπάτα, Ἀλλοτρογύμονας. These being deducted, there still remain thirty titles, some of which, however, certainly belong to the younger Cratinus. After all deductions, there remain twenty-four titles, namely, Ἀρχιχαλκος, Βουκλίς, Αδριανός, Δένταλος, Δραστέριος, Βουλαγαντίον ἐν Πληκτρί, Ἑυδίνος, Κρήνας, Κλέας, Κρήνας, Αδωνίς, Δίκτας, Δίκτας, Νικέ, Οἰσινίας, Παντώτα, Πευκά, Πευκά, Ποτήρι, Σάτυρος, Σαρπίδας, Τριφόνιος, Χειμαξάγονος, Χεί- ρωτας, Τραχα. The difference between this list and the statement of the grammarians, who give to Cratinus only twenty-one plays, may be reconciled on the supposition that some of these plays had been lost when the grammarians wrote, as, for example, the Σάτυρος καὶ Χειμαξάγονος, which are mentioned only in the Didascalia of the Κύρις καὶ Ἀχαρνιάς.

The following are the plays of Cratinus, the date of which is known with certainty:

B. C.

About 438. Ἀρχιχαλκος.

In 435. Χειμαξάγονος, 2nd prize. Aristophanes was first, with the Αχαρνιάς.

424. Σάτυρος, 2nd prize. Aristophanes was first, with the Κύρις καὶ Ἀχαρνιάς.

423. Ποτήρι, 1st prize.

2nd. Αμειπάς, Κληνος, 3rd. Aristoph. Νευτόλα." Ant., the first part of which is upon Cratinus only.)

2. Cratinus the younger, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, was a contemporary of Plato the philosopher (Diog. Laert. iii. 26) and of Corydus (Athen. vi. p. 241, c.), and therefore flourished during the middle of the 4th century B.C., and as late as 232 B.C. (Clinton, Fast. Hell. ii. xiii.). Perhaps he even lived down to the time of Ptolemy Philadæphus (Athen. xi. p. 469, c., compared with vi. p. 242, a.), but this is improbable. The following plays are ascribed to him:—

Γίγγατες, Θηραλαύνης, Ομοῦσας (doubtful), Τυκέλαιους, Ἐκιρέων; in addition to which, it is probable that some of the plays which are ascribed to the elder Cratinus, belong to the younger.

CRATYPUS, a legal professor at Constantinople and comes serarum largitionum, who was charged in addition to which, it is probable that he also gave an account of every-thing that was omitted in the work of Thucydides. The period to which Cratippus appears to have carried his history, is pointed out by Plutarch (de Glor. Athen. 1) to have been the time of Conon. (Comp. Marcellin. Vit. Thucyd. § 33; Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 834.)

2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Mytilene, who was a contemporary of Pompey and Cicero. The latter, who was connected with him by intimate friendship, entertained a very high opinion of him, for he declares him to be the most distinguished among the Peripatetics that he had known (de Off. ii. 2), and thinks him at least equal to the greatest men of his school. (De Diæta. i. 3.) Cratippus accompanied Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, and endeavoured to comfort and rouse the head of the Roman republic, Cicero obtained from him the Roman franchise for Cratippus, and also induced the council of the Areopagus at Athens to invite the philosopher to remain in that city as one of her chief ornaments, and to continue his instructions in philosophy. (Plut. Cic. 24.) After the murder of Caesar, Brutus, while staying at Athens, also attended the lectures of Cratippus. (Plut. Brut. 24.) Notwithstanding the high opinion which Cicero entertained of the knowledge and talent of Cratippus, we do not hear that he wrote on any philosophic subject, and the only allusions we have to his tenets, refer to his opinions on divination, on which he seems to have written a work. Cicero states that Cratippus believed in dreams and supernatural inspirations (Favor), but that he rejected all other kinds of divination. (De Divin. i. 3, 32, 50, 70, 71, ii. 48, 52; Tertull. de Anim. 46.)

CRATOR (Καρω), a freedman of M. Aurelius Verus, wrote a history of Rome from its foundation to the death of Venus, in which the names of the consuls and other magistrates were given. (Theophr. ad Antioch. iii. extr.)

CRATOS (Κρόω), the personification of strength, is described as a son of Uranus and Ge. (Hes. Theog. 383; Aeschyl. Prom. Init.; Aristoph. Nub. 714.)

CRATYLYS (Κρατύλος), a Greek philospher, and an elder contemporary of Plato. He professed the doctrines of Heraclitus, and made Plato acquainted with them. (Aristot. Metaphys. i. 6; Appul. de Dogmat. Plat. p. 2, ed. Elm. Olympiod. Vit. Plat. p. 79, ed. Fischer.) The time at which Plato was instructed by Cratylus, is stated by Diogenes Laërtius (iii. 6) to have been after the death of Socrates; but there are several circumstances which prove that Plato must have been acquainted with the doctrines of Heraclitus at an earlier period, and K. F. Hermann has pointed out that it must have been in his youth that Plato acquired his knowledge of that philosophy. One among the dialogues of Plato is named after his master, Cratylus, and in the principal speaker in it, the doctrines of Heraclitus are recommended. The author of that dialogue is a different person from the Cratylus who taught Plato the doctrines of Heraclitus, but the arguments adduced in support of this opinion do not seem to be satisfactory. (Stallbaum, de Cratyl. Platonico System der Plast. Philos. i. pp. 46, 106, 492, &c.; Lersch, Sprachphilos. der Alten, i. p. 29, &c.)

CREMUTIUS CORDUS. [CORUS.]

CREON. (Κρόω). 1. A mythical king of Corinth, a son of Lycaethus. (Hygin. Fab. 25, calls him a son of Menoeceus, and thus confounds him with Creon of Thebes.) His daughter, Glauce, married Jason, and Medea, who found herself forsaken, took vengeance by sending Glauce a garment which destroyed her by fire when she put on it.
it on. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 20.) According to Hyginus (l. c.) Medea's present consisted of a crown, and Creon perished with his daughter, who is there called Creusa. (Comp. Diod. iv. 54.)

2. A son of Menoeceus, and king of Thebes. After the death of Laius, Creon gave the kingdom to Oedipus, who had delivered the country from the Sphinx; but after Oedipus had laid down the government, Creon resumed it. His tyrannical conduct towards the Argivics, and especially towards Antigone, is well known (from the Oedipus and Antigone of Sophocles). Creon had a son, Haemon, and two daughters, Henioche and Pyrrha. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 8, 7. § 1; Paus. ix. 10. § 3.) A third mythical Creon is mentioned by Apollodoros. (ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

CREON (Kρών), a Greek rhetorician of uncertain date, who is mentioned in three passages of Suidas (s. v. ἐπικρατουσάνως, ἐπιθρόνηων, καὶ κατακλώων) as the author of a work on rhetoric (ἐπιτομή), of which the first book was quoted, but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CREOPHYLUS (Κρεόφυλος). 1. One of the earliest epic poets of Greece, whom tradition placed as the author of a work on rhetoric (παινείον) and (ς. ω. ἑπικοσθέντων, ποιήσων, καὶ παλαιότερον) of which the first book quoted, but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CREOPHYLUS. (Κρεόφυλος). 1. One of the earliest epic poets of Greece, whom tradition placed in direct connexion with Homer, as he is called his friend or even his son-in-law. (Plat. Rep. x. 600, b; Callim. Epigramm. 6; Strab. xiv. 638, &c.; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 2; Eustath. ad Homer. ii. 730; Suidas, s. v.) Creophylus is said to have received Homer into his house, and to have been a native of Chios, though other accounts describe him as a native of Samos or Ios. The epic poem Οἰλαξία or Οἰλαξία ἀνέθη, which is ascribed to him, he is said, in some traditions, to have received from Homer as a present or as a dowry with his wife. (Proclus, op. Hesiod. p. 496, ed. Graec.; Schol. ad Plat. p. 421, ed. Bekker; Suidas, s. v.) Tradition thus seems to point to Creophylus as one of the most ancient Homeridae, and as the first link connecting Homer himself with the subsequent history of the Homeric poems; for he was thought to have preserved and taught the Homeric poems, and handed them down to his descendants, from whom Lycurgus, the Spartan lawyer, is said to have received them. (Plat. Lyc. 4; Heracleid. Pont. Politi. Fragment. 2; Isamb. VII. Pythag. ii. 9; Strab. xiv. 639.) This poem Οἰλαξία contained the contest which Hercules, for the sake of Iole, undertook with Eurytus, and the final capture of Oechalia. This poem, from which Panyasis is said to have copied (Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 266), is often referred to, both with and without its author's name, but we possess only a few statements derived from it. (Plat. Leu. p. 177, ed. Porson; Teetus. Chrys. xiii. 659; Cremer, Anecd. p. 827; Schol. ad Soph. Trach. 266; Bekker, Anecd. p. 728.) Pansanias (iv. 2 § 3) mentions a poem Πηραδία by Creophylus, but this seems to be only a different name for the Οἰλαξία. (Comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 276.) The Heraclean which the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1557) ascribes to Cinnachos, is likewise supposed by some to be a mistake, and to allude to the Οἰλαξία of Creophylus. (Wecker, Der Episck. Cyclus. p. 219, &c.; Willmer, De Cyc. Episc. p. 52, &c.; K. W. Muller, De Cyclo. Graeco. Episc. p. 62, &c.)

2. The author of Annals of Ephesus (ἐποικία ἡπερίπατων), to which Athenaeus (viii. p. 361) refers. [L. S.]

CRESERIUS, the name of a Roman equestrian family, which was distinguished for the strict discipline of its members, but of which otherwise only very little is known. Among the judges in the case of Verres, one M. Crepereius is mentioned by Cicero (in Verri. l. 10), and it is added, that as he was tribunos militaris designatus, he would not be able to take a part in the proceedings after the 1st of January of b. c. 69.

There are several coins on which we read the name Q. Crepereius M. F. Roccus, and from the representations of Venus and Neptune which appear on those coins, it has been inferred, that this person had some connexion with Corinth, perhaps after its restoration by J. Caesar, since those divinities were the principal gods of Corinth. (Havercamp, in Morell. Thesaur. Numism. p. 145, &c.) In the reign of Nero we meet with one Crepereius Gallus, a friend of Agrippina, who perished in the ship by means of which Agrippina was to be destroyed. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 5.) [L. S.]

CREPEREIUS CALPURNIA'NUS (Κρέπερειος Καλπυρνίανος), a native of Pompeipolis, is mentioned by Lucian (Quom. Hist. comiss. 18) as the author of a history of the wars between the Romans and Parthians, but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CRES (Κρῆς), a son of Zeus by a nymph of mount Ida, from whom the island of Crete was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κρῆς; Paus. viii. 53. § 3.) According to Diodorus (v. 64), Cres was an Eteocretan, that is, a Cretan autodochon. [L. S.]

CRESCENS, a Cynic of Megapolis, (probably the city in Arcadia, though some believe that Rome is meant by that appellation,) who lived in the middle of the second century after Christ, contemporary with Justin Martyr. The Christian writers speak of his character as perfectly infamous. By Tatian (Or. adv. Graec. p. 157, &c.) he is accused of the most flagrant enormities, and is described as a person who was not prevented by his cynical profession from being "wholly enslaved to the love of money." He attacked the Christians with great acrimony, calling them Atheists; but his charges were refuted by Justin, who tells us, that, in consequence of the refutation, he was apprehensive lest Crescens should plot his death. But whether he was really the cause of Justin's martyrdom or not is uncertain; for, although he is accused of the most flagrant crimes, yet the charge is only made to rest on a statement of Tatian, which however merely is, that "he who advised others to despise death, was himself so much in dread of death, that he plotted death for Justin as a very great evil," which is not an uncommon statement of his inconsistencies (Justin. Apollog. ii. 116; Euseb. H. E. iv. 16; Neander, Kirchengesch. i. p. 131.) [G. E. L. C.]

CRESCONIUS. [CORIFUS.] CRE'SILAS (Κρήσιλας), an Athenian sculptor, a contemporary of Phidias and Polyclitus. Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 19), in narrating a competition of five most distinguished artists, and among them Phidias and Polyclitus, as to who should make the best Amazon for the temple at Ephesus, mentions Cresilas as the one who obtained the third prize. But as this is an uncommon name, it has been changed by modern editors into Ctesilas or Ctesilus; and in the same chapter (§ 13) an artist, "Desilus," whose wounded Amazon was a cele-bated statue, has also had its name changed into Ctesilas, and consequently the beautiful statues of a wounded Amazon in the Capitol and the Lion are considered as an imitation of the work at Ephesus. Now this is quite as unfounded a supposition as the one already rejected by Wichelmann, by which the dying gladiator of the Capitol was considered to represent another celebrated statue of Ctesilas, who wrought "vulneratum deficientem, in quo possit intelligi, quantum restet animae." and it is the more improbable, because Pliny enumerates the sculptor in an alphabetic order, and begins the letter D by Desilaus. But there are no good reasons for the insertion of the name of Ctesilas. At some of the late excavations at Athens, there was discovered in the wall of a cistern, before the western frontside of the Parthenon, the following inscription, which is doubtless the identical base ment of the existing warrior:—

HEMÖYOKOS

DIEITETEOY2

ATAPXEN.

KREaIAAS

EIOXEN.

By this we learn, that the rival of Phidias was called Ctesilas, as two manuscripts of Pliny exhibit, and that the statue praised by Pliny is the same as that which Pausanias (i. 23. § 2) describes at great length. It was an excellent work of bronze, placed in the eastern portico within the Propylea, and dedicated by Hermoykon to the memory of his father, Diotrephes, who fell pierced with arrows, b. c. 413, at the head of a body of Thracians, near Mycalessus in Boeotia. (Thuc. vii. 29, 30.) Besides these two celebrated works, Ctesilas executed a statue of Pericles the Olympian, from which, perhaps, the bust in the Vatican is a copy. (Ross, 1840, No. 59: Paus. vii. 29, 30.) Besides these two celebrated works, Ctesilas executed a statue of Pericles the Olympian, from which, perhaps, the bust in the Vatican is a copy. (Ross, Kunstblatt, 1840, No. 12 and 38.)

CRESTIUS (Kpérastos), a surname of Dionysus of Argos, where he had a temple in which Ariadne was said to be buried. (Paus. ii. 23. § 7.)

CRESTPHONTES (Kpérísthóntes), a Hemeleid, a son of Aristomachus, and one of the con querors of Peloponnesus, who obtained Messenia for his share. But during an insurrection of the Messenian nobles, he and two of his sons were slain. A third son, Aepytus, was induced by his mother, Merope, to avenge his father. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 4, &c.; Paus. ii. 18. § 6, iv. 3. § 3, 31. § 9, viii. 5. § 4; comp. AEYTUS.)

CRETHEUS (Kprétous), a son of Asteroi, and wife of Minos. According to others, she was the mother of Pasiphae by Helios. (Apollod. iii. 3. § 1; Dio. iv. 60.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Apollod. iii. 3. § 1; Dio. iii. 71.)

CRETHEUS or CATERUS (Kprétous), a son of Minos by Pasiphae or Crete, and king of Crete. He is renowned in ancient story on account of his tragic death by the hands of his own son, Althe menes. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2, ill. i. § 2; Dio. iv. 59; Paus. viii. 53. § 2; ALTHEMENES.)

CRETHEUS (Kprétous), a son of Aeolus and Enarete, was married to Tyro, the daughter of Salmonus by his mother, he became the father of Aeson, Phoebus, Anythaus, and Hippolyto. He is called the founder of the town of Iolcus. (Hom. Od. xi. 236, 258; Apollod. i. 9. § 11; comp. Paus. viii. 35. § 5.) According to another tradition, Cretetus was married to Demodice or Bindice, who loved Phrixus, and as her love was rejected by t he latter, she cunniugously accused him to Cretheus of having been guilty of improper conduct. (Hygin. Fab. ii. 29; Paus. iii. 29.)

CRETHEUS (Kprétous), a son of Diocles and brother of Orchilus of Phere, was slain by Aeneas in the Trojan war. (Hom. Il. v. 542; Paus. iv. 30. § 2.)

CRETICUS, an agnome of Q. Caelinius Metellus, consul, b. c. 69, and of several of the Metelli. [METELLUS.]

CRETICUS SILANUS. [Silanus.]

CREUSA (Kpréousa). 1. A daughter of Oce nus and Ge. She was a Naid, and became by Peneius the mother of Hypseus, king of the Lapithae, and of Sibbe. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 50; Dio. iv. 69.)

2. A daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithene, was married to Xuthus, by whom she became the mother of Achaeus and Ion. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3, iii. 15. § 1; Paus. viii. 1. § 1.) She is also said to have been beloved by Apollo (Paus. ii. 23. § 4), and Ion is called her son by Apollo, as in the "Ion" of Euripides.

3. A daughter of Priam and Hecabe, and the wife of Aeocides, who became by her the father of Ascansus and Iulus. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 3.)

CRE'TICUS SILANUS. [Silanus.]

CREUSSA (Kpréseura). 1. A daughter of Oceanus and Ge. She was a Naid, and became by Peneius the mother of Hypseus, king of the Lapithae, and of Sibbe. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 50; Dio. iv. 69.)

2. A daughter of Erechtheus and Praxithene, who married to Xuthus, by whom she became the mother of Achaeus and Ion. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3, iii. 15. § 1; Paus. viii. 1. § 1.) She is also said to have been beloved by Apollo (Paus. ii. 23. § 4), and Ion is called her son by Apollo, in the "Ion" of Euripides.

CORN (Kornat). 41. She called her son by Amnis by Apollo. When Aeneas fled from Troy, she followed him; but she was unable to discover his traces, and disappeared. Aeneas then returned to seek her. She then appeared to him as a shade, consoled him, revealed to him his future fate, and informed him that she was kept back by the great mother of the gods, and was obliged to let him depart. (Virg. Aen. xi. 343, 376, 378, 752, 775, &c.) In the Lesche of Delphi Aeneas was represented by Polygnotus among the captive Trojan women. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) A fourth personage of this name is mentioned by Hyginus. (Pah. 25; comp. OECHON, No. 1.)

CRINAGORAS (Kprínagoras), a Greek epigrammatic poet, the author of about fifty epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a native of Mytilene, among the eminent men of which city he is mentioned by Strabo, who speaks of him as a contempor ary. (xiii. p. 617, sub fin.) There are several allusions in his epigrams, which refer to the reign of Augustus, and on the authority of which Jacobs believes him to have flourished from n. c. 61 to a. d. 60. We may also collect from his epigrams that he lived at Rome (Ep. 24), and that he was richer in poems than in worldly goods. (Ep. 33.)

He mentions a younger brother of his, Eucleides. (Ep. 12.) From the contents of two of his epigrams Reiske inferred, that they must have been written by a mere ancient poet of the same name, but this opinion is refuted by Jacobs. Crinagoras often shews a true poetical spirit. He was included in the Anthology of Philip of Thessalonica. (Jacobs, Anth. Græc. pp. 376—378; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. iv. p. 470.)

CRINAS, a physician of Marseilles who practised at Rome in the reign of Nero, a. d. 54—60, and introduced astrology into his medical practice. He was required a large fortune, and is said by Pliny (H. N. xxv. § 5) to have left at his death to his native city the immense sum of ten million sesterces (ventus H. S.) or about 78,125l., after having spent nearly the same sum during his life in building the walls of the city. (W. A. G.)
CRISPINUS (Χρίσπινος) is the name which, from a comparison of Diodorus (xv. 47), it has been proposed to substitute for Anippus in Xen. Hell. vi. 2, § 36. He was sent by Dionysius I. of Syracuse to Corcyra to aid the Spartans with a squadron of ten ships, n. c. 573; but through his imprudence he fell, together with nine of his ships, into the hands of Iphicrates. The latter, in the hope of extorting from him a large sum of money, threatened to sell him for a slave, and Crispinus slew himself in despair. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2. §§ 4, 53, &c.; comp. Schneld. ad loc.; Wesseling. ad Diod. i.e.; Diod. xvi. 57.) [E.E.]

CRINIS (Κρίνις), a Stoic philosopher who is referred to several times by Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 62, 68, 76), and seems to have founded an independent school within the boundaries of the Stoic system, since the authority of his followers (οἱ περὶ Κρίνις) is sometimes quoted. He wrote a work called διολογική τέχνη, from which Diogenes Laërtius (vii. 71) gives an opinion. He is mentioned also by Arrian. (Dios. Epicl. viii. 2.) Suidas speaks of a Crin as who was a priest of Apollo, and may be the same as the one mentioned in a scholion (ad Hom. II. i. 396). [L.S.]

2. The ninth of the family of the Asclepiades, tetrarch of Siphnos, and a brother of Cleomynades II., who probably lived in the ninth and eighth centuries n. c. (Id. ibid.) He is called "king Crisamis" (Paus. Epist. ad Artas., in Hipper. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770), but the country over which he reigned is not mentioned. By some writers he is said to have been the father, not of Cleomynades II., but of Theodorus II. [W.A.G.]

CRISPINA, daughter of Brittus Prasens [Præses], was married to Commodus (a. d. 177), and, having proved unfaithful to her husband, was divorced a few years after his accession to the throne, banished to Capreae, and there put to death. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 33, lxxvi. 4; Capitolin. M. Aurel. 27; Lamprid. Commend. 5.) [W. R.]

CRISPINUS, CALVIA, a Roman lady of rank, of the time of the emperor Nero. She partook largely in the general corruption among female of that period. She lived with Nero and his eunuch Porus, and was entrusted with the superintendence of the latter's wardrobe. She is said to have been given to stealing and to have secreted all on which she could lay her hand. Her intercourse with Nero was of such a kind, that Tacitus calls her the instructor of Nero in voluptuousness. In a. d. 68, shortly after the death of Nero, she went to Africa to urge Claudius Macer to take up arms to avenge the death of the emperor. She thus intended to cause a famine at Rome, by preventing grain being imported from Africa. Claudius Macer was put to death by the command of Gaia, and the general indignation of the people demanded that Crispinilla should also pay for her guilt with her life, but she escaped the danger by various intrigues and a cunning use of circumstances. Afterwards she rose very high in public favour through her marriage with a man who had been consul; she was spared by Gaia, Otho, and Vitellius, and her wealth, together with the circumstance of her having no children, procured her great influence at the time. (Tacit. Hist. i. 73; Dion. Cass. lxxxi. 12.) [L.S.]

CRISPINUS. 1. A person ridiculed by Horace (Sat. i. 9, 4, 30), according to the state-

m of the scholiasts on that passage, a bad poet and philosopher, who was surmamed Areteologus, and wrote verses upon the Stoics. This is all that is known about him, and it is not improbable that the name may be a fictitious one, under which Horace intended to ridicule some philosophical poetaster.

2. A late Greek rhetorician, concerning whom nothing is known, but a sentiment of his, taken from a work Αναδιανοια, is preserved in Sto-bæus. (Flor. xviii. 21.)

3. Of Lampasaecus, wrote a life of St. Parthenius of Lampaeus, who is said to have been a bishop in the time of Constantine the Great. A Latin version of that Life is printed in the collections of the lives of the Saints by Surius and Bollandus under the 7th of February. A MS. containing the Greek original exists in the imperial library at Vienna. (Fabric. xi. p. 597.) [L.S.]

T. CRISPINUS was quaestor about n. c. 69, but is otherwise unknown. (Cic. pro Pison. loci Niebel. 1.)

CRISPINUS, L. BRUTTIUM QUINTIUS, was consul a. d. 224, and fourteen years afterwards (a. d. 238) persuaded the inhabitants of Aquileia to shut their gates and defend their walls against the savage Maximinus, whose rage when he found his attacks upon the city failed to those excesses which caused his assassination. [Maximinus.] (Capitolin. Max. auct., c. 21; Herodian. viii. 4.) [W. B.]

CRISPINUS CAEPIO. [Caepio, p. 555, b.]

CRISPINUS, QUINTICIUS, Crispinus occurs as an agnomen in the family of the Penni.

Capitolinii of the Quinctii gens. [Curtius, 606, a.] The full name of the L. Quinctius Crispinus, who was praetor in b. c. 106, and who claimed in b. c. 184, on account of his victories in Spain, was probably L. Quinctius Pennus Capitolinus Crispinus. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8, 30, 42.) [L.S.

CRISPINUS, RUTFIUS, a Roman eques and contemporary of the emperors Claudius and Nero.

He was prefectus praetorio under Claudius, who employed him in arresting and dragging to Rome.
VIBERIUS ASIATICUS. For this service he was rewarded by a large sum of money and the insignia of the equestrian order. In A. D. 53 he was removed from his office at the instigation of Agrippina, who believed him to be attached to the children of Messalinus. Crispinus was married to the notorious Poppea Sabina, who had a son by him, bearing the same name as his father. She afterwards became the mistress of Nero, and the circumstance, that she had once been the wife of Crispinus, was a sufficient reason for the tyrant to send Crispinus into exile to Sardinia, A. D. 66, under the pretext of his being an accomplice in a conspiracy. Shortly after when Crispinus received the sentence of death, he put an end to his own life. (Tacit. Ann. xi. 1, 4, xii. 43, xiii. 45, xv. 71, xvi. 17; Senec. Octavia, 728 &c.; Plut. Galba, 19.) His son, Italus Crispinus, was likewise put to death by Nero. (Suet. Nero, 35.)

CRISPUS, a person mentioned three times by Cicero as coheir of Mustelus. (Ad Att. i. 6, iii. 3, 5.) [L. S.]

CRISPUS, brother of Claudius Gothicus and father of Claudius, who by her husband Eutropius was the mother of Constantius Chlorus. Thus Crispus was the great-grandfather of Constantinus Magnus. [W. R.]

CRISPUS, FLAVIUS JULIUS, eldest of the sons of Constantinus Magnus and Minervina, derived his name without doubt from his great-grandfather [Crispus], the brother of Claudius Gothicus. Having been educated, as we are told by St. Jerome, under Laetanius, he was nominated Caesar on the 1st of March, A. D. 317, along with his brother Constantius and the younger Licinius, and was invested with the consularship the year following. Entering forthwith upon his military career, he distinguished himself in a campaign against the Franks, and soon after, in the war with Licinius, gained a great naval victory in the Hellespont, A. D. 323. But unhappily the glory of these exploits excited the bitter jealousy of his step-mother Fausta, at whose instigation he was put to death by his father in the year A. D. 326. [Constantinus, p. 835.] (Euseb. Chron. ad ann. 317; Sozomen. Hist. Eccl. i. 5; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 100.)

A great number of coins, especially in small brass, are extant bearing the name and effigy of this youth, commonly with the titles Caesar and Princeps Iuventutis annexed; on the reverse of one we read the words Akamantis Devicta, which may refer to his success in the West, but the legends for the most part commemorate the exploits of his father rather than his own achievements. [W. R.]

CRISPUS, JU'LIUS, a distinguished tribune of the praetorians, put to death by Septimius Severus during the Parthian war (A. D. 198), because, being weary of the hardships of the campaign, he had quoted as a sort of paean on the ambitious projects of the emperor the lines in Virgil from the speech of Druces (Aen. xi. 372), CRITIAS.

"Sicelit, ut Turno contingat regia conjux, Nos, animae viles, inhumata inflecto turba, Sternitur campis . . . . "

a fact of no great importance in itself, except so far as it corroborates the accounts of Spartianus, regarding the vindictive cruelty of Severus in all matters affecting his personal dignity. (Dion Cass. lxxx. 10; Sir. Philostr. Spartan. Sect. 14.) [W. R.]

CRISPUS, MA'RCIUS, served as tribune in Caesar's army during the African war. (Hirtius, Bell. Afr. 77.) He is probably the same as the Q. Marcius Crispus, who is frequently mentioned by Cicero as a brave and experienced soldier. In n. c. 43, he was in Bithynia as proconsul, and when L. Murcus solicited his assistance against Bassus, Crispus came with his three legions to Syria. When C. Cassius came to the East, both Crispus and L. Murcus surrendered their legions to him. (Cic. in Pison. 23, Phil. xi. 12, ad Pomp. xii. 11, 12, ad Brut. ii. 5; Dion. Cass. xxvii. 27; Appian. B. C. iii. 77, iv. 566.) [L. S.]

CRISPUS PASSIE/NUS, the husband of Agrippina, and consequently the step-father of the Emperor Nero. He was a man of great wealth and distinction, and in A. D. 42 he was raised to the consulate. He is praised both by Seneca the philosopher (Quaest. Nat. iv. Praef., de Benef. i. 15), and by Seneca the rhetorician (Controv. ii. 13) as one of the first orators of the time, especially for his acuteness and subtlety. Quintilius too (vi. 1, § 50, 3, § 74, x. 1, § 24) speaks of him with high esteem and quotes passages from his orations. [L. S.]

CRISPUS, VIBIUS, a Roman orator of great wealth and influence. He was a native of Vercelli and a contemporary of Quintilian. His speeches were most remarkable for their pleasant and elegant style; they were of the judicial kind, and Quintilian places those which he had delivered in civil cases above those spoken on state or public affairs. Vibius Crispus is also mentioned among the delators of his time. Some fragments of his orations are preserved in Quintilian. (Tacit. Hist. ii. 10, iv. 23, 41, Annal. xiv. 28, de Oraal. 8; Quintil. v. 13, § 48, vii. 5, §§ 15, 17, x. 1, § 119, xii. 10, § 11; Dion Cass. xiv. 2.) [L. S.]

CRISUS or CRISUS (Këpsos), a son of Phocus and husband of Antiphaestus, by whom he became the father of Strophius. He is called the founder of Crissa or Cirra. (Paus. i. 29, § 4; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 33.) [L. S.]

CRITIAS (Kërites), 1. Son of Dropidos, a contemporary and relation of Solon's. He lived to the age of more than 90 years. His descendant Critias, the son of Callaescharis, is introduced in the "Timaeus" of Plato (pp. 20—25), as repeating from the old man's account the fable of the once mighty Atlantis, professing to have been derived by Solon from the priests of Egypt. (Comp. Plat. Charr. pp. 155, 157, ad fin.)

2. Son of Callaescharis, and grandson of the above. He was one of the pupils of Socrates, by whose instructions he profited but little in a moral point of view, and, together with Alcibiades, gave a colour by his life to the charge against the philosophers of corrupting the youth. Xenophon says, that he taught the company of Sokrates without any desire of real improvement, but because he wished, for political purposes, to gain skill in confounding an adversary. We learn, however, from the same authority, that he lived a temperate life as long as his connexion with his great master lasted. (Xen. Mem. i. 2. §§ 12—18, 39.) From a fragment of Critias himself (ap. Plut. Alex. 33) it appears that he was mainly instrumental in procuring the recall of Alcibiades from banishment. At the time of the murder of the generals who had been victors at Argo in b.c. 406, we find him in Thessaly fomenting a sedition of the Pelasgians against their lords, and endeavouring to set up democracy in conjunction with one Prometheus, which has been supposed by some to be a surname of Jason of Phene. According to Xenophon, he had been banished by a sentence of the people, and this it was which afterwards made him so rancorous in his tyranny. (Xen. Mem. ii. 3. §§ 15, 36; Schol. ad loc.) On his return to Athens he became leader of the oligarchical party, and was chosen to be one of the body called Ephori, probably not a public and legal office, but one instituted among themselves by the oligarchs for the better promotion of their ends.

(Proc. aner. p. 124; Thrillwaw's Græcia, vol. iv. p. 160; Herrmann, Polit. Ant. § 163.) He was one of the 30 tyrants established in b.c. 404, was conspicuous above all his colleagues for rapacity and cruelty, sparing not even Socctes himself, and took the lead in the prosecution of Thersamenus when he set himself against the continuance of the reign of terror. He was slain at the battle of Munychia in the same year, fighting against Timabulus and the exiles. (Xen. Hell. i. 2. §§ 12-38; Diod. iv. 4; Plat. Apol. p. 32, c; Cie. Tusc. Quaest. i. 40.)

Cicero tells us (De Orat. ii. 22), that some speeches of Critias were still extant in his time, and speaks of them as marked by the vigour of matter which distinguished those of Pericles and by a greater copiousness of style. A work of his on politics is also frequently referred to by several writers (Ath. x. p. 483; Ael. V. H. x. 13, 17; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 2; comp. Plat. Timae. p. 20); some fragments of his elegies are still extant, and he is supposed by some to have been the author of the Peiritho'àus and the Sisyphus (a satyric drama), which are commonly reckoned among the dramas of Aristophanes.

[CRITOBU'LUS (Κρίτοβυλος), son of Criton, and a disciple of Socrates. He did not however profit much by his master's instructions, if we may trust the testimony of Aeschines the Socratic (ap. Athen. v. p. 220, a; comp. Casiab. ad loc.), by whom he is represented as destitute of refinement and sordid in his mode of living. (Comp. Plat. Phaed. p. 57; Xen. Mem. i. 2. §§ 8, 11; Athen. v. p. 188, d; Diog. Laert. ii. 121.)]

CRITODEMUS. (Κριτοδημος), a Greek surgeon, said by Piny (H. N. viii. 71) to have extracted an arrow from the eye of Philip the son of Amyntas, king of Macedon, (probably at the siege of Methone, b.c. 355) so skillfully that, though he could not save his sight, he prevented his face from being disfigured. He is also mentioned by Quintus Curtius (ix. 5) as having been the person who extracted the weapon from the wound which Alexander received in storming the principal fortress of the Mallians, b.c. 326.

CRITODEMUS. (Κριτοδημος), a Greek surgeon of the family of the Asclepiads, and a native of the island of Cos, who is said by Arrian (vi. 14) to have been the person who extracted the weapon from the wound which

CRITOLAUS (Κρίτωλος), the Peripatetic philosopher, was a native of Phaselis, a Greek colony in Lycia, and studied philosophy at Athens under Ariston of Ceos, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school. The great reputation which Critolaus enjoyed at Athens, as a philosopher, an orator, and a statesman, induced the Athenians to send him to Rome in B.C. 155, together with Carneades the Academic and Diogenes the Stoic, to obtain a remission of the fine of 500 talents which the Romans had imposed upon Athens for the destruction of Oropus. They were successful in the object for which they came; and the embassy excited the greatest interest at Rome. Not only the Roman youth, but the most illustrious men in the state, such as Scipio Africanus, Laelius, Furinus, and others, came to listen to their discourses. The novelty of their doctrines seemed to the Romans of the old school to be fraught with such danger to the morals of the citizens, that Cato induced the senate to send them away from Rome as quickly as possible. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 22; Gall. vii. 14; Macrob. Saturn. i. 5; Cic. de Orat. ii. 37, 38.) We have no further information respecting the life of Critolaus. He lived upwards of eighty-two years, but died before the arrival of L. Crassus at Athens, that is, before B.C. 111. (Lucian, Macrob. 20; Cic. de Orat. i. 11.)

Critolaus seems to have paid particular attention to Rhetoric, though he considered it, like Aristotle, not as an art, but rather as a matter of practice (φαίνεται). Cicero speaks in high terms of his eloquence. (Quintil. ii. § 23; Sext. Ephemeris, ii. p. 291; Cic. de Fin. v. 5.) Next to Rhetoric, Critolaus seems to have given his chief attention to the study of moral philosophy, and to have made some additions to Aristotle's system (comp. Cic. Tusc. vi. 17; Sext. Empir. adv. Mathem. ii. 12, p. 291; Cic. de Fin. v. 5.) Critolaus is mentioned by Plutarch (Paracl. min. c. 6, 9) as the author of a work on Epictetus, and of another entitled Παραμένεια; and Gellius (xi. 9) also speaks of an historical writer of this name. Whether the historian is the same as the Peripatetic philosopher cannot be determined. A grammatician Critolaus is mentioned in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. Εὐξίνος). (Comp. Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 422, ed. Westermann.) [A.S.]

CRITOLAUS (Κρίτωλος), an Achaean, who succeeded Diacus, in B.C. 147, as strategus of the Achaeans, and was as bitter an enemy of the Romans as his predecessor. As soon as he entered upon his office, he began insulting the Roman ambassadors and breaking off all negotiations with them. After their departure for Italy, he had recourse to all the demagogic artifices that he could devise, in order to render the rupture between the Romans and Achaean irremissible. During the ensuing winter he travelled from one town to another, inflaming the people by his furious speeches against the Romans. He concluded his orations with a speech upon the populace in the towns of Greece, and resort to the most inquisitive means to obtain their favour. Thus he extorted a promise from the magistrates of several towns to take care that no debtor should be compelled to pay his debts before the war with Rome should be brought to a close. By these and similar means he won the enthusiastic admiration of the multitude, and when this was accomplished, he summoned an assembly of the Achaeans to meet at Corinth, which was attended by the dregs of the nation, and which conducted its proceedings in the most riotous and tumultuous manner. Four noble Romans, who attended the meeting and tried to speak, were driven from the place of assembly and treated with the grossest insults. It was in vain that the moderate men among the Achaean endeavoured to bring Critolaus and his partizans to their senses. Critolaus surrounded himself with a body-guard, and threatened to use force against those who opposed his plans, and further depicted them to the multitude as traitors of their country. The moderate and well-meaning persons were thus intimidated, and withdrew. War was thereupon declared against Lacedaemon, which was under the especial protection of Rome. In order to get rid of all restraints, he carried a second decree, which conferred dictatorial power upon the strategi. The Romans, or rather Q. Caecilius Metellus, the prector of Macedonia, had shown all possible forbearance towards the Achaean, and a willingness to come to a peaceable understanding with them. This conduct was explained by Critolaus as a consequence of weakness on the part of the Romans, who, he said, did not dare to venture upon a war with the Achaean. In addition to this, he contrived to inspire the Achaean with the prospect of an advantageous peace with Rome. But this hope was almost completely disappointed, and the Achaean rushed into a war with the gigantic powers of Rome, in which every sensible person must have seen that destruction awaited them. In the spring of B.C. 146, Critolaus marched with a considerable army of Achaean towards Thermopylae, partly to rouse all Greece to a general insurrection against Rome, and partly to chastise Heracleia, near mount Oeta, which had abandoned the cause of the Achaean. Metellus now offered his hand for reconciliation; but when his proposals were rejected, and he himself suddenly appeared in the neighbourhood of Heraclea, Critolaus at once raised the siege of the town, quitted his position, and fled southward. Metellus followed and overtook him near the town of Scarphea in Locris, where he gained an easy but brilliant victory over the Achaean. A great number of the latter fell, and 1000 of them were made prisoners by the Romans. Critolaus himself was never heard of after this battle. Livy (Epit. 52) states, that he poisoned himself, but it seems more probable that he perished in the sea or on the marashes on the coast. Critolaus was the immediate cause of the war which terminated in the destruction of Corinth and put an end to the political existence of Greece. His plan of opposing Rome at that time by force of arms was the off-spring of a mad brain, and the way in which he proceeded in carrying it into effect shewed what a contemptible and cowardly demagogue he was. (Polyb. xxxviii. 2, &c.; xi. 1, &c.; Paus. vii. cc. 14 &c. 15; Florus Hist. Polyb. Tom. iii. lib. 38, § 4; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iv. p. 304, &c.) [L.S.] for his love and affection for his master, whom he generously supported with his fortune (Diog. Laërt. ii. 29, 121), than as a philosopher himself. Accordingly, whenever he is introduced in Plato's dialogues, his attachment to Socrates is extolled, and not his philosophical talents. It was Criton who had made every arrangement for the escape of Socrates from prison, and who tried, in vain, to persuade him to fly, as we see from Plato's dialogue named after him; and it was Criton also who closed the eyes of the dying philosopher. (Plat. Phædon, p. 118, a.) Criton applied his great riches, which are mentioned by Socrates in a jocose way in the Euthydemus of Plato (p. 304, c.), to the noblest purposes. His sons, of whom he possessed four according to Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 121), and two according to Plato (Euthydem. p. 360, with Heindorfi's note), were likewise disciples of Socrates. The eldest of them was Critobulus.

Criton wrote seventeen dialogues on philosophical subjects, the titles of which are given by Diogenes Laërtius (i. c.). Among these there was one named after him; and it was the only work on this subject mentioned in the history of Greek literature before the work of Aristotle. (The passages in Plato's writings, in history of Greek literature before the work of Aristotle, i. pp. 804, 836.)

2. Of Athenis, a comic poet of the new comedy, of very little note. Of his comedies there only remain a few lines and three titles, Αἰσχροι, Φθορικοι, and Μεγαρικοι. (Pollux. ix. 4. 15, x. 7. 85; Ath. iv. p. 173, b.; Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. i. p. 484, iv. pp. 537, 538.)

3. Of Naxus. (Eudoxus.)

4. Of Pireia, in Macedonia, wrote historical and descriptive works, entitled Παλαμενδης, Συρακουσιων κτισις, Περαια, Σικυονικα, Σιφανακουσιων παρεχομεναι, and περη της αρχης των Μακεδων. (Suid. & c. v.) Immediately before, Suidas has the entry, Κρινος ηγητος εν τε τω Γερμον. (Comp. Suid. s. v. γερμος; Steph. Byz. Περια.) Whether this was the same person is not known. (Voss. Hist. Graec. p. 423; Westermann; Ebert, de Crit. Ted. Flerolai in Diss. Soc. i. p. 138.)

5. Of Athenis. (Eudoxus.)

CRITON (Kριτών). 1. Of Aegae, a Pythagorean philosopher, a fragment of whose work, περι της πρωτογενειας και γενετουρη, is preserved by Stobaeus. (Serin. 3; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. i. pp. 484, iv. pp. 537, 538.)

CRIUS (Kρίος), a Roman, who was aedilis cerealis in n. c. 44. This office had been instituted by J. Caesar, and Critonius and M. Fannius were the first who filled it. Appian (B. C. ii. 23) relates the following occurrence respecting Critonius. When the Cerealia were celebrated, shortly after the murder of Caesar, and Octavius erected the golden sella with a crown in honour of Caesar,—a distinction which had been conferred upon the dictator by a senatusconsultum,—Critonius declared that he would not suffer Caesar to be thus honoured in the games for which he (Critonius) himself had to pay the expenses. This conduct of a man who had belonged to the party of Caesar, and had been promoted by him (comp. Cic. ad Att. xiii. 21), is indeed surprising; but it may have been the consequence of a strong republican enthusiasm. Another more serious difficulty is contained in the fact, that the Cerealia, at which Octavius is here represented to have been present, were celebrated in the early part of April (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ceres.), that is, before the time at which Octavius is known to have returned to Rome. Unless, therefore, we suppose that there is some blunder in the account of Appian, we must believe that the celebration of the games in that year was postponed on account of the great confusion that followed after the murder of Caesar. (Drumann, Gesch. Roms, i. p. 123.)

The annexed coin refers to this Critonius. It bears on the obverse the head of Ceres, and on the reverse two men sitting, with the legend, Μ. ΦΑΝ. Λ. ΚΑΙΡ., and it was doubtless struck by order of M. Fannius and L. Critonius in the year that they were aediles cereales. ([L. S.]}

CRIUS or CRIUS (Κρίος), a son of Uranus and Ge, and one of the Titans, who was the father of Astraenus, Pallus, and Pentes. (Hesiod. Theog. 375; Apollod. i. 1. § 3, 2. § 2.)

CRIUS (Κρίος), son of Polycritus, and one of the chief men of Aeigina. When the Aeiginetans, in n. c. 491, had submitted to the demand of Darius Hyssapris for earth and water, Cleomenes I., king of Sparta, crossed over to the island to apprehend those who had chiefly advised the measure, but was successfully resisted by Critus on the ground that he had not come with authority from the Spartan government, since his colleague Dema-ratus was not with him. Cleomenes, being obliged to withdraw, consigned himself by a play on the words Κρόνος and ορίσεις (to limit, or to form a limit), to the command of a war-drummer from his army, and put to death, as seems probable, by the mode of exit to which the Persians were accustomed, under the form of ruin, as he would soon need all the defence he could get. (Herod. vi. 50; comp. v. 75.) It was supposed that the resistance had been privately encouraged by Demaratus (vi. 61, 64), and on the deposition of the latter, and the appointment of Leotychides to the throne (vi. 65, 66), Cleomenes again went to Aegina with his new colleague, and, having seized Cyrus and others, delivered them into the custody of the Athenians. (vi. 73; comp. 85, &c.) Polybius, the son of Cyrus, distinguished himself at the battle of Salamis, b. c. 480, and wiped off the reproach of Medamid. (vii. 92.) [E. E.]

CRIXUS (Κρίξως), a Gaul, was one of the two principal generals in the army of Spartacus, b. c. 73. Two Roman armies had already been defeated by the revolted gladiators and slaves, when Crixus was defeated in a battle near mount Garginus by the consul L. Gellius, in b. c. 72. Crixus himself was slain, and two-thirds of his army, which consisted of 50,000 men, were destroyed on the field of battle. Spartacus soon after sacrificed 300 Roman captives to the manes of Crixus. (Appian, B. C. i. 116, &c.; Liv. Epit. 94, 96; Sall. Fragm. Hist. lib. iii.) [L. S.]

CROBYLUS (Κρόβυλος), an Athenian comic poet, who is reckoned among the poets of the new comedy, but it is uncertain whether he really belonged to the middle or the new. About his age we only know for certain, that he lived about or after b. c. 394, but not how long after. Some writers have identified him with Hegesippus. [Hegesippus.]

CROCEATAES (Κροκέατας), a surname of Zeus, derived from a place, Croceae, near Gythium in Laconia. (Paus. iii. 21. § 4.) [L. S.]

CROCON (Κρόκον), the husband of Sosara and father of Meganeirion. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1; Paus. i. 39. § 2; comp. Arcas.) [L. S.]

CROCUS, the beloved friend of Smilax, was changed by the gods into a saffron plant, because he loved without being loved again. According to another tradition, he was metamorphosed by his friend Hermes, who had killed him in a game of discus. (Or. Met. iv. 263; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iv. 182.) [L. S.]

CROESUS (Κρόης), the last king of Lydia, of the family of the Mermnadæ, was the son of Alyattes; his mother was a Carian. At the age of thirty-five, he succeeded his father in the kingdom of Lydia. (n. c. 560.) Difficulties have been raised about this date, and there are very strong reasons for believing that Croesus was associated in the kingdom during his father's life, and that the earlier events of his reign, as recorded by Herodotus, belong to this period of joint government. (Clinton P. H. ii. 297, 298.) We are expressly told that he was made satrap of Adramytton and the plain of Thebe about n. c. 574 or 572. (Nicol. Dumusc. p. 248, ed. Cor., supposed to be taken from the Lydian history of Xanthus; Fischer, Griechische Zeitungen, s. a. 572 b, c.) He made war first on the Ephesians, and after-wards on the other Ionian and Aeolian cities of Asia Minor, all of which he procured to pay tribute to him. He also sent embassies to the king of Persia to subdue the insular Greeks also, when either Bias or Pittacus turned him from his purpose by a clever fable (Herod. i. 27); and instead of attacking the islanders he made an alliance with them. Croesus next turned his arms against the peoples of Asia Minor west of the river Halys, all of whom he subdued except the Lycians and Cilicians. His dominions now extended from the northern and western coasts of Asia Minor, to the Halys on the east and the Taurus on the south, and included the Lydians, Phrygians, Myrians, Mariandynians, Chalybes, Phaphugians, the Thyrians and Bithynians; Trachians, the Carians, Ionians, Dorians, Aeolians, and Pamphylians. The fame of his power and wealth drew to his court at Sardis all the wise men (σοφοίναι) of Greece, and among them Solon. To him the king exhibited all his treasures, and then asked him who was the happiest man he had ever seen. The reply of Solon, teaching that no man should be deemed happy till he had finished his life in a happy way, may be read in the beautiful narrative of Herodotus. After the departure of Solon, Croesus was visited with a divine retribution for his pride. He had two sons, of whom one was dumb, but the other excelled all his comrades in many accomplishments. His name was Atys. Croesus had a dream that Atys should perish by an iron-pointed weapon, and in spite of all his precautions, an accident fulfilled the dream. His other son lived to save his father's life by suddenly regaining the power of speech when he saw Croesus in danger at the taking of Sardis. Adrastus, the unfortunate slayer of Atys, killed himself on his tomb, and Croesus gave himself up to grief for two years. At the end of that time the growing power of Cyrus, who had recently subdued the Median kingdom, excited the apprehension of Croesus, and he conceived the idea of putting down the Persians before their empire became firm. Before, however, venturing to attack Cyrus, he looked to the Greeks for aid, and to their oracles for counsel; and in both points he was deceived. In addition to the oracles among the Greeks, he consulted that of Ammon in Libya; but first he put their truth to the test by sending messengers to inquire of them at a certain time what he was then doing. The replies of the oracles of Amphipolus and that of the Delphi at Pytho were correct; that of the latter is preserved by Herodotus. To these oracles, and especially to that at Pytho, Croesus sent rich presents, and charged the bearers of them to inquire whether he should march against the Persians, and whether there was any people whom he ought to make his allies. The reply of both oracles was, that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, and both advised him to make allies of the most powerful among the Greeks. He of course understood the response to refer to the Persian empire, but instead of listening to the premonition after the event, he carried on his own; and he sent presents to each of the Delphians, who in return granted to him and his people the privileges of priority in consulting the oracle, exemption from charges, and the chief seat at festivals (αριστουργηθήναι καὶ ἀκτελεῖν καὶ προδημίαν), and that any one of them might at any time obtain certain rights of citizenship (γεινήσαι Αδειρών). Croesus, having now the most unbounded confidence in the oracle, consulted it for the third time, asking whether his monarchy would last long. The Pythia replied that he should flee along the Hermus, when a mule became king over the Medes. By this mule was signified Cyrus, who was descended of two different nations, his father being a Persian, but his mother a Lydian named Sandanis (Herod. i. 71), and having some time before made a league with Amasis, king of Egypt, and Labynetus, king of the Babylonians, marched across the Halys, which was the boundary between the Medo-Persian empire and his own. The pretext for his aggression was to avenge the wrongs of his brother-in-law Astynges, reached him. Croesus, having now fully determinded by the Lacedaemonians, on whom he had previously conferred a favour. All that they did for him, however, was to send a present, which never could endure the noise or odour of the camels. Cyrus is said to have employed the stratagem of a Lydian named Sardanis (Herod. i. 71), and having some time before made a league with Amasis, king of Egypt, and Labynetus, king of the Babylonians, marched across the Halys, which was the boundary between the Medo-Persian empire and his own. The pretext for his aggression was to average the wrongs of his brother-in-law Astynges, whom Cyrus had deposed from the throne of Medin. He wasted the country of the Cappadocians (whom the Greeks called also Syrians) and took their strongest town, that of the Pterii, near Sinope, in the neighbourhood of which he was met by Cyrus, and they fought an indecisive battle, which was broken off by night. (n. c. 546.) The following day, as Cyrus did not offer battle, and as his own army was short-handed for the Persians in numbers, Croesus marched back to Sardis, with the intention of summoning his allies and recruiting his own forces, and then renewing the war on the return of spring. Accordingly, he sent heralds to the Egyptians, Babylonians, and Lacedaemonians, requesting their aid at Sardis in five months, and in the meantime he disband his all mercenary troops. Cyrus, however, pursued him with a rapidity which he had not expected, and appeared before Sardis before his approach could be announced. Croesus led out his Lydian cavalry to battle, and was totally defeated. In this battle Cyrus is said to have employed the stratagem of opposing his camel to the enemy's horses, which could not bear it; when the camels were caught, Croesus, being now shut up in Sardis, sent again to hasten his allies. One of his emissaries, named Eurybatus, betrayed his counsels to Cyrus (Eurybatus), and before any help could arrive, Sardis was taken by the boldness of a Mardian, who found an unproctected point in its defences, after Croesus had reigned 14 years, and had been besieged 14 days. (Near the end of 546, n. c.) Croesus was taken alive, and devoted to the flames by Cyrus, together with 14 Lydian youths, probably as a thanksgiving sacrifice to the god whom the Persians worship in the symbol of fire. But as Croesus stood in letters upon the pyre, the warning of Solon came to his mind, and having broken a long silence with a groan, he thrice uttered the name of Solon. Cyrus inquired who it was that he called on, and, upon hearing the story, repented of his purpose, and ordered the fire to be quenched. When this could not be done, Croesus prayed aloud with tears to Apollo, by all the presents he had given him, to save him now, and immediately the fire was quenched by a storm of rain. Believing that Croesus was under a special divine protection, and no doubt also struck by the warning of Solon, Cyrus took Croesus for his friend and counsellor, and gave him for an abode the city of Burene, near Ecbatana. In his expedition against the Massagetae, Cyrus had Croesus with him, and followed his advice about the passage of the Araxes. Before passing the river, however, he sent him back to Persia, with his own son Cambysses, whom he charged to honour Croesus, and Croesus to advise his son. When Cambysses came to the throne, and invaded Egypt, Croesus accompanied him. In the affair of Prexapae and his son, Croesus at first acted the part of a flattering courtier, though not, as it seems, without a touch of irony (Herod. iii. 34); but, after Cambysses had murdered his brother, Croesus boldly admonished him, and was obliged to fly for his life from the presence of the king. The servants of Cambysses concealed him, thinking that their master would repent of having wished to kill him. And so it happened; but when Cambysses heard that Croesus was alive, he said that he was glad, but he ordered those who had saved him to be put to death for their disobedience. Of the time and circumstances of Croesus's death we know nothing. A few additional, but unimportant incidents in his life, are mentioned by Herodotus. Ctesias's account of the taking of Sardis is somewhat different from that of Herodotus. (Herod. i. 6, 7, 26—94, 130, 155, 207, 296, iii. 14, 34—36, 3. vi. 37, 125, viii. 35; Ctesias, Periplus, 4, ed. Lion, ap. Phot. Cod. 72, p. 36, Bekker; Phot. Hec. act. Phot. Cod. 190, p. 146, b. 21, 148, k. 31; Plut. Sol. 27; Diod. ix. 2, 25—27, 29, 31—34, xvi. 56; Justin i. 7.) Xenophon, in his historical romance, gives some further particulars about Croesus which are unsupported by any other testimony and opposed to that of Herodotus, with whom, however, he for the most part agrees. (Cyp. 5, i. 1, iv. 1.2, vi. 2, vii. 1—4, viii. 2.) [P. S.]

CROMUS (Kρούσας), a son of Poseidon, from whom Cromyon in the territory of Corinth was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 1. § 3.) A son of Lycon likewise bore this name. (Paus. vii. 3. § 1.)

CRONIDES or CRONION (Χρονίδης οr Χρονιόν), a patronymic from Cronus, and very commonly given to Zeus, the son of Cronus. (Hom. Il. i. 528, ii. 111, κε.)

CRONUS (Χρόνος), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Zeus by the nymph Himalia (Diod. v. 55), and the other a suitor of Hippodameia, who was killed by Oenomaus. (Paus. vi. 21. § 7.)

CRONUS (Χρόνος), a Pythagorean philosopher. (Porphyry, Vit. Phil. 29; Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. 19.)

Nemesius (de Anim. 2, p. 35) mentions a work of his πεπληρεγγευσις, and Origen is said to have diligently studied the works of Cronus. (Suid. s.v. Χρονίδης.) Porphyry also states, that he endeavoured to explain the fables of the Homerian poems in a philosophical manner. This is all we know about Cronius, although he appears to have been very distinguished among the later Pythagoreans.

[L. S.] CRO'NIUS, an engraver of gems, who lived between the times of Alexander and Augustus. (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 4; Viscontì, Oeuv. d'art. ii. P. 1238.)

[L. U.] CRONUS (Karvos), a son of Uranus and Ge, and the youngest among the Titans. He was married to Rhea, by whom he became the father of Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, Poseidon, and Zeus. Cheiron is also called a son of Cronus. (Hesiod. Theog. 137, 452, &c.; Apollod. i. 1 § 3, &c.) At the instigation of his mother, Cronus unsealed his father for having thrown the Cyclopes, who were likewise his children by Ge, into Tartarus. Out of the blood thus shed sprang up the Erinyes. When the Cyclopes were delivered from Tartarus, the government of the world was taken from Uranus and given to Cronus, who in his turn lost it through Zeus, as was predicted to him by Ge and Uranus. [Zeus.] The Romans identified their Saturnus with the Cronus of the Greeks. [Saturnus.]

CROTUS (KrToas), a son of Pan by Eupheme, the nurse of the Muse, with whom he was brought up, and at whose request he was placed among the stars as Sagittarius, as he had been a skilful archer. (Hygin. Fab. 524; Poët. Astr. ii. 77.) [L. S.]

CRUS, an agnomen of L. Cornelius Lentulus, consul, b. c. 49. [Lentulus.]

CTEATUS. [Moliones.]

CTESIAS. [KrIeias.] 1. Of Cnidus in Caria, and a son of Ctesochoi or Ctescharus. (Suid. s. v. Krijkras; Eudociin, p. 268 ; Tzetze. Chal. i. 82.) Cnidus was celebrated from early times as a seat of medical knowledge, and Ctesias, who himself belonged to the family of the Asclepiadæ, was a physician by profession. He was a contemporary of Xenophon; and if Herodotus lived till b. c. 425, or, according to some, even till b. c. 408, Ctesias may be called a contemporary of Herodotus. He lived for a number of years in Persia at the court of King Artaxerxes Mæmon, as private physician to the king. (Strab. xiv. p. 656.) Diodorus (ii. 33) states, that Ctesias was made prisoner by the king, and that owing to his great skill in medicine, he was afterwards drawn to the court, and was highly honoured there. This statement, which contains nothing to suggest the time when Ctesias was made prisoner, has been referred by some critics to the war between Artaxerxes and his brother, Cyrus the Younger, b. c. 401. But, in that case, Ctesias could not have been in the country during that war, as accompanying the king. (Xen. Anab. i. 8, § 27.) Moreover, if as Diodorus and Tzetzes state, Ctesias remained seventeen years at the court of Persia, and returned to his native country in b. c. 398 (Diod. xiv. 46; comp. Plut. Artax. 21), it follows, that he must have gone to Persia long before the battle of Cunaxa, that is, about b. c. 415. The statement, that Ctesias entered Persia as a prisoner of war, has been doubted; and if we consider the favour with which other Greek physicians, such as Democedes and Hippocrates were treated and how they were sought for at the court of Persia, it is not improbable that Ctesias may have been invited to the court; but the express statement of Diodorus, that he was made a prisoner cannot be met with by such a mere probability. There are two accounts respecting his return to Cnidus. It took place at the time when Conon was in Cyprus. Ctesias himself had simply stated, that he asked Artaxerxes and obtained from him the permission to return. According to the other account, Conon sent a letter to the king, in which he gave him advice as to the means of humbling the Lacedaemonians. Conon requested the bearer to get the letter delivered to the king by some of the Greeks who were staying at his court. When the letter was given for this purpose to Ctesias, the latter inserted a passage in which he made Conon desire the king to send Ctesias to the west, as he would be a very useful person there. (Plut. Artax. 21.) The latter account is not recommended by any strong internal probability, and the simple statement of Ctesias himself seems to be more entitled to credit. How long Ctesias survived his return to Cnidus is unknown.

During his stay in Persia, Ctesias gathered all the information that was attainable in that country, and wrote—1. A great work on the history of Persia (Περσίδος) with the view of giving his contemporaries a more accurate knowledge of that empire than they possessed, and to refute the errors current in Greece, which had arisen partly from ignorance and partly from the national vanity of the Greeks. The materials for his history, so far as he did not describe events of which he had been an eye-witness, he derived, according to the testimony of Diodorus, from the Persian archives (Συνθετικα), or the official history of the Persian empire, which was written in accordance with a law of the country. This important work of Ctesias, which, like that of Herodotus, was written in the Ionic dialect, consisted of twenty-three books. The first six contained the history of the great Assyrian monarchy down to the foundation of the kingdom of Persia. It is for this reason that Strabo (xiv. p. 656) speaks of Ctesias as ανεργος ἃ υστεροκαὶ ἢ τά Περσίδα. The next seven books contained the history of Persia down to the end of the reign of Xerxes, and the remaining ten carried the history down to the time when Ctesias left Persia, i. e. to the year b. c. 380. (Diod. xiv. 46.) The form and style of this work were of considerable merit, and its loss may be regarded as one of the most serious for the history of the East. (Dionys. Hal. De Comp. Verb. 10; Demetr. Phal. De Elocut. §§ 212, 215.) All that is now extant of it is a meagre abridgment in Photius (Cod. 75), and a number of fragments which are preserved in Diodorus, Athenaeus, Plutarch, and others. Of the first portion, which contained the history of Assyria and Persia, this abridgment in Photius, and all we possess of that part is contained in the second book of Diodorus, which seems to be taken almost entirely from Ctesias. There we find that the accounts of Ctesias, especially in their chronology, differ considerably from those of Berosus, who likewise derived his information from eastern sources. These discrepancies can only be explained by the fact, that the annals used by the two historians were written in different places and under different circumstances. The chronicles used by Ctesias were written by official persons, and those used by Berosus were the work of priests; both therefore were written from a different point of view, and neither was perhaps strictly true in all its details. The part of Ctesias's work, which contained the history of Persia, that is, from the sixth book to the end, is somewhat better known from the extracts which Photius made from it, which are still extant. Here again Ctesias is frequently at variance with other Greek writers, especially with Herodotus. To account for this, we must remember, that he is expressly reported to have written his work with the intention of correcting the erroneous notions about Persia in Greece; and if this was the case, the reader must naturally be prepared to find the accounts of Ctesias differing from those of others. It is moreover not improbable, that the Persian chronicles were as partial to the Persians, if not more so, as the accounts written by Greeks were to the Greeks. These considerations sufficiently account, in our opinion, for the differences existing between the statements of Ctesias and other writers; and there appears to be no reason for charge them, as some have done, with wilfully falsifying history. It is at least certain, that there can be no positive evidence for such a serious charge. The court chronicles of Persia appear to have contained chiefly the history of the royal family, the occurrences at the court and the seraglio, the intrigues of the women and eunuchs, and the insurrections of satraps to make themselves independent of the great monarch. Suidas (s. v. Παμφίλα) mentions, that Pammphila made an abridgment of the Persian chronicles, which is perhaps the same as the Musaeus (which he regards as a fictitious name) of Ephesus to whom Suidas and Eudocia ascribe an epic poem, Persica, in ten books. But this is a mere conjecture, in support of which little can be said.

Another work, for which Ctesias also collected his materials during his stay in Persia, was—2. A treatise on India (Ἰνδική) in one book, of which we likewise possess an abridgment in Photius, and a great number of fragments preserved in other writers. The description refers chiefly to the north-western part of India, and is principally confined to a description of the natural history, the produce of the soil, and the animals and men of India. In this description truth is to a great extent mixed up with fables, and it seems to be mainly owing to this work that Ctesias was looked upon in later times as an author who deserved no credit. But if his account of India is looked upon from a proper point of view, it does not in any way deserve to be treated with contempt. Ctesias himself never visited India, and his work was the first in the Greek language that was written upon that country: he could do nothing more than lay before his countrymen that which was known or believed about India among the Persians. His Indica must therefore be regarded as a picture of India, such as it was conceived by the Persians. Many things in his description which were formerly looked upon as fabulous, have been proved by the more recent discoveries in India to be founded on facts.

Ctesias also wrote several other works, of which, however, we know little more than their titles: they were—3. Περὶ Ορεων, which consisted of at least two books. (Plut. de Fluv. 21; Stob. Proril. C. 18.) 4. Περὶ λαυκὸν Άσσαν (Steph. Byz. s. v. Αργοσ), which is perhaps the same as the Periγηγερεις of which Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Καταστὴ) quotes the third book. 5. Περὶ Ποταμῶν (Plut. de Fluv. 19), and 6. Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὴν Άσσαν φάνων. It has been inferred from a passage in Calen (v. p. 852, ed. Basil.), that Ctesias also wrote a description of the accounts of his medical works have come down to us.

The abridgment which Photius made of the Persian and Indica of Ctesias were printed separately by H. Stephens, Paris, 1557 and 1594, 8vo., and were also added to his edition of Herodotus. After his time it became customary to print the remains of Ctesias as an appendix to Herodotus. The first separate edition of those abridgments, together with the fragments preserved in other writers, is that of A. Lion, Gotingen, 1823, 8vo., with critical notes and a Latin translation. A more complete edition, with an introductory essay on the life and writings of Ctesias, is that of Bähr, Frankfort, 1824, 8vo. (Compare Fabric. Bibli. Graec. ii. p. 710, &c.; Retzvig, Ctesii Cnidii Fliti cum appendice de libris Ctesiae, Hanov. 1827, 8vo.; K. L. Bluin, Herodot und Ctesias, Heidelb. 1836, 8vo.)

2. Of Ephesus, an epic poet, who is mentioned by Plutarch (de Fluv. 18) as the author of an epic poem, Νηπωρίας. His age is quite unknown. Welcker (De Epic. Cyc. p. 50) considers this Ctesias to be the same as the Musaeus (which he regards as a fictitious name) of Ephesus to whom Suidas and Eudocia ascribe an epic poem, Persica, in ten books. But this is a mere conjecture, in support of which little can be said.

CTESIBIIUS (Κτεσιβίους). 1. A Greek historian, who probably lived at the time of the first Ptolemies, or at least after the time of Demosthenes, for we learn from Plutarch (Dem. 5), that Hennipus of Smyrna referred to him as his authority for some statement respecting Demosthenes. According to Apollodorus (ap. Plut. de Longev. 2), Ctesibius died during a walk at the age of 104, and according to Lucian (Maecrob. 22), at the age of 124 years. Whether he was the author of a work, Περὶ Φιλοσοφίας, referred to by Plutarch (Περὶ Φιλοσοφίας 844, e), is uncertain.

2. A Cynic philosopher, a native of Chalise and a friend of Menemendas. According to Athenaeus, who relates an anecdote about him, he lived in the reign of Antigonus, king of Macedonia. (Athen. i. p. 15, iv. p. 162.)

CTESIBIIUS (Κτεσιβίους), celebrated for his mechanical inventions, was born at Alexandria, and lived probably about B.C. 250, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Euergetes, though Athenaeus (iv. p. 174) says, that he flourished in the time of the second Euergetes. His father was a barber, but his own taste led him to devote himself to mechanics. He is said to have invented a elecyspydra or water-clock, a hydraulic organ (διπταλις) and other machines, and to have been the first to discover the elastic force of air and apply it as a moving power. Vitruvius (lib. viii. præf.) mentions him as an author, but none of his works remain. He was the teacher, and has been supposed to have been the father, of Hero Alexandrinus, whose treatise called βελαιωνίδες has also sometimes been attributed to him. (Vitruv. ix. 9, x. 12; Plin. H. N. vii. 37; Athen. iv. p. 174, xi. p. 497; Philo Byzant. ap. Vet. Math. pp. 56, 67, 72; Fabric. Bibli. Graec. vol. ii. p. 591.)

CETEIESCLES (Κτεσίπτελες), the author of a chronological work (χρονολογία κ ὁχρονολογία), of which two fragments are preserved in Athenaeus (vi. p. 272, x. p. 445).

CETEIESCLES, the author of a beautiful statue at Sames, about which a similar story is told by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 606, a) as that respecting the injury sustained by the Cadician Venus of Praxiteles.

CUBA.

CTESIDE'MUS, a painter celebrated for two pictures, representing the conquest of Oechalia and the story of Laocoon. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 40, § 33.) He was the master of Antiphilus. (Plin. xxxv. 37), a contemporary of Apelles. [L. U.]

CTESIUS. [CERNISIUS.]

CTESI'LOCHUS, a painter, the pupil and perhaps brother of Apelles, known by a ludicrous picture representing the birth of Bacchus. (Plin. xxxv. 40, § 33; Suid. s. v. Ἀρτεμίς.) [L. U.]

CTESIPHON (Κτεσιφών). 1. A son of Leosthenes of Anaphylus, was accused by Aesines for having proposed the decree, that Demosthenes should be honoured with the crown. [AESCHINEN; DEMOSTHENES.]

2. An Athenian, who was sent in B. C. 346 as ambassador to king Philip of Macedonia, with the view of recovering the ransom which Phrynon of Rharnus had been obliged to pay during the truce of the Olympic games to pirates who were in the pay of Philip. On his return from Macedonia, Ctesiphon confirmed the report which had been brought to Athens by Eubean ambassadors, that Philip was inclined to make peace with the Athenians. After this, Ctesiphon was one of the ten ambassadors who treated with Philip about peace. (Dem. de Fals. Leg. pp. 344, 371; Argum. ad Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 336; Aeschin. de Fals. Leg. cc. 4, 12, 14; Harpocrat. s. v. Κτεσιφών.)

3. The author of a work on Beocia, of which Plutarch (Parall. Min. 12) quotes the third book. Whether he is the same as the Ctesiphon who wrote on plants and trees (Plut. de Fluv. 14, 18) is uncertain.

4. An Athenian poet, who wrote a peculiar kind of martial songs called Καλλάρας, and seem to have lived at the court of the Attali at Pergamus. (Athen. xv. p. 697.) [L. S.]

CTESIPHON, artist. [CERNISIphon.]

CTESIPPUSS (Κτεσιππός). 1. The name of two sons of Hercules, the one by Deianeira, and the other by Astydameia. (Apollod. ii. 7, § 6; Paus. ii. 19, § 1, iii. 16, § 5.)

2. A son of Polythcrees of Same, one of the suitors of Penelope, was killed by Philoctetes. (Hom. Od. xx. 288, &c.; xxii. 285, &c.) [L. S.]

CTESIPPUSS (Κτεσιππός). 1. [CHAIRIAS, p. 676, b.]

2. The author of a history of Scythia, of which the second book is quoted by Plutarch. (De Flor. 5.) [L. S.]

CTESIUS (Κτεσίου). the protector of property, occurs as a surname of Zeus at Phlya, and of Hennes. (Athen. xi. p. 473; Paus. i. 31, § 2.) Ctesius occurs also as a proper name. (Hom. Od. 1. 413.) [L. S.]

CTESYLLA (Κτεσύλλα), a beautiful maiden of the island of Cos, of whom and Hermocares Antoninus Liberalis (Met. 1) relates nearly the same story which other writers relate of Cydippe and Acontius. [ACONTIUS.] Buttmann (Mythol. ii. p. 153, &c.) thinks that Ctesylla was originally an attribute of some ancient national divinity at Cos—Aphrodite Ctesylla was worshipped there—who was believed to have had some love affair with a mortal. [L. S.]

CUBA, CUNIN'NA, and RUMIN'NA, three Roman kids, who were worshipped as the protectors of infants sleeping in their cradles, and to whom libations of milk were offered. (Censor signifi-

CULEO'LIUS, a cradle, and rumus or rumus was in ancient Latin the same as mamma, a mother's breast. (August. de Civit. Dei, iv. 10, &c.; Lactant. i. 20, § 36; Varr. ap. Non. p. 167, ap. Domat. ad Terrat. Ethn. i. 1. 14.) [L. S.]

CUB'DIUS. [CORNADAR.]

CULLEO'LE or CULE'O, the name of a plebeian family of the Terentia gens.

1. Q. TerentiUS CULLEO, belonged to a family of praetorian rank, and was a senator of considerable distinction. (Val. Max. v. 2, § 5.) He was taken prisoner in the course of the second Punic war, but at what time is uncertain, and obtained his liberty at the conclusion of the war in B. C. 201. To shew his gratitude to P. Scipio, he followed his triumphal car, wearing the pilus or cap of liberty, like an emancipated slave; and subsequently, on the death of Scipio, he attended his funeral, walking before the bier with the cap of liberty again on his head, and he likewise distributed mulsum, or sweet wine, among the attendants of the funeral.

In B. C. 195, Culeo was one of the three ambassadors who were sent to Cartage to complain that Hannibal was forming the design of making war upon the Romans in conjunction with Antiochus. In B. C. 187 Culeo was praetor peregrinus, and he was appointed by the senate in this year as the commissioner to conduct the inquiry respecting the money of Antiochus, which was said to have been misappropriated by L. Scipio Asiacus and his legates. This appointment was made under a plebiscitum which had been carried chiefly through the influence of Cato the censor, and which referred to the senate to nominate a commissioner to inquire into those cases. The respect which Culeo had paid to P. Scipio was well known, and the friends of the Scipios probably supported his appointment for that reason; though it is stated, on the other hand, that his nomination to the office was brought about by the enemies of Scipio, because he was in reality an enemy to the family, and had been guilty of hypocriay in the honours he had paid to his deliverer from captivity. But however this may be, L. Scipio and others were condemned by him; from which we may conclude, either that he was in reality in league with the party opposed to the Scipios, or that their guilt was so clear that he dared not acquit even his friends.

In B. C. 184, Culeo was an unsuccessful candidate for the consulship, and in 181 was one of the three ambassadors sent by Cato, Memmisinus and Cartage to ask for assistance in the war against Perseus. (Liv. xxx. 43, 45, xxxii. 47, xxxvi. 42, 55, xxxix. 32, xli. 35; Val. Max. v. 2, § 5; Plut. Apophth. p. 196.)

2. Q. TerentiUS CULLEO, was tribune of the plebs, in B. C. 58, the year in which Cicero was banished. He was a friend of Cicero's, and did all in his power to prevent his banishment and afterwards to obtain his recall. He is mentioned by Cicero two years afterwards as one of the minor pontiffs. In the war which followed the death of Caesar we find Culeo in B. C. 43 passing over from the army of Antony to join Lelutus. Culeo was placed by Lepidus to guard the passage of the Alps; but he allowed Antony to cross them without offering opposition. (Cic. ad Att. iii. 13, de Harpocr. Resp. 6, ad Fam. x. 34, camp. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 2, ad Att. viii. 12; Appian. B. C. iii. 83.)

1. CULLEOL'US, proc然是，perhaps of Illyricum, about b.c. 60, to whom two of Cicero's letters are addressed (ad Fam. xill. 41, 42), was probably one of the Terenti.

CUMA'NUS, VENTI'DIUS. [Felix, An-

TONIUS.] CUNCTATOR, a surname given to Q. Fabius Maximus, who fought against Hannibal.

CUPY'DO was, like Amor and Voluptas, a modification of the Greek eros, whose worship was carried to Rome from Greece. (Cic. de Legat. i. 30, 14; Plaut. Chor. i. 1, 3; see Eros.) [L. S.]

C. CUPIENNIUS. 1. A person to whom Cicero wrote a letter in b.c. 44, entreating him to interest himself in the affairs of the inhabitants of Buthrotum, and reminding him of the friendship which had existed between the father of Cupiennius and Cicero himself. (Cic. ad Att. xvi. 16, b.)

2. The Cupiennius attacked by Horace (Sat. i. 2. 36) on account of his adulterous intercourse with Roman matrons, is said by the Scholiast on Horace to have been C. Cupiennius Libo of Cumae, a friend of Augustus.

There are some coins extant bearing the names of L. Cupiennius and C. Cupiennius; but who these persons were, is not known. (Eckhel, v. p. 109.)

CURA, the personification of Care, respecting whose connexion with an ingenuous allegorical story is related by Hyginus. (Foh. 220.) [L. S.]

CURETES. [Zos.]

CURIA GENS, plebeian, is mentioned for the first time in the beginning of the third century b.c., when it was rendered illustrious by M. Curius Dentatus. [Dentatus.] This is the only cognomen which occurs in the gens; for the other members of it, see Curius. [L. S.]

CURIATIA GENs. The existence of a patrician gens of this name is attested by Livy (l. 30, comp. Dionys. iii. 30), who expressly mentions the Curiiati among the noble Alban gentes, which, after the destruction of Alba, were transplanted to Rome, and there received among the Patres. This opinion is not contradicted by the fact that in b.c. 401 and 198 we meet with Curtiati who were tribunes of the people and consequently plebeians; for this phenomenon may be accounted for here, as in other cases, by the supposition that the plebeian Curiiati were the descendants of freedmen of the patrician Curiiati, or that some members of the patrician gens had gone over to the plebeians. The Alban origin of the Curiiati is also stated in the story about the three Curiiati who in the reign of Tullus Hostilius fought with the three Roman brothers, the Horati, and were conquered by the cunning and bravery of one of the Horati, though some writers described the Curiiati as Romans and the Horati as Alban. (Liv. i. 24, &c.; Dionys. iii. 11, &c.; Plut. Parall. Gr. et. Rom. 16; Flor. i. 2; Ann. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 4; Zonar. vii. 6; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, l. p. 348; comp. Horatius.) No members of the patrician Curiiatia gens, so far as our records go, rose to any eminence at Rome, and there are but few whose names have come down to us. The only cognomen of the gens in the times of the republic is Fustus. For the plebeians who are mentioned without a cognomen, see Curiiatius. [L. S.]

CURIATIUS. 1. P. Curiatius, tribune of the people in b.c. 401. The college of tribunes in that year laboured under great unpopularity, as two of them had been appointed by the co-optation of the college under the influence of the patricians. P. Curiiatius and two of his colleagues, M. Metilius and M. Minucius, endeavoured to counteract the unpopularity and turn the hatred of the people against the patricians by bringing a charge against Sergius and Virginius, two military tribunes of the year previous, whom they declared to be the authors of all mischief and the cause of the people's sufferings. Both the accused were condemned to pay a heavy fine, and the tribunes of the people were brought forward under an agrarian law, and prevented the tribune for the maintenance of the armies being levied from the plebeians. (Liv. v. 11, 12.)

2. C. Curiatius, tribune of the people in b.c. 138, is characterised by Cicero (de Leg. iii. 9) as a homo infimus. He caused the consuls of the year, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica (whom he nicknamed Serapio) and D. Junius Brutus to be thrown into prison for the severity with which they proceeded in levying fresh troops, and for their disregard to the privilege of the tribunes to exempt certain persons from military service. (Liv. Epit. 55; Val. Max. iii. 7. § 3.)

There are extant several coins, on which we read C. Curiatius, or C. Curius, and which may belong to this tribune or a son of his; but it is just as probable that they belonged to some patrician Curiatius, about whom history furnishes no information. (Eckhel, v. p. 109, &c.) One C. Scaevius Curius, who lived in the early period of the empire, is mentioned in an inscription in Orelli (No. 4046) as duumvir in the municipium of Veii. [L. S.]

CURIATIUS MATERNUS. [Materinus.] CURIO, the name of a family of the Scribonia gens.

1. C. Scribonius Curio, was appointed curio maximus in b.c. 174, in the place of C. Manlius Vulus, who had been carried off by the plague. (Liv. xii. 26.)

2. C. Scribonius Curio, praetor in b.c. 121, the year of C. Gracchus's death, was one of the most distinguished orators of his time. Cicero mentions one of his orations for Serr. Fulvius, who was accused of incest, and states, that when a young man he thought this oration by far the best of all extant orations; but he adds, that afterwards the speeches of Curio fell almost into oblivion. He was a contemporary of C. Julius Caesar Strabo, Cotta, and Antonius, and against the last of these he once spoke in the court of the centumviri for the brothers Cassius. (Cic. Brut. 32, de Invent. i. 43, de Orat. ii. 23, 33; Schol. Bob. in Argum. Orat. in Cicid. et Curion.; Pseud.-Cic. ad Herem. 22; Phil. H. N. vii. 41.)

3. C. Scribonius Curio, a son of the former. In b.c. 100, when the seditious tribune L. Appuleius Saturnius was murdered, Curio was with the consuls. In b.c. 90, the year in which the Marse war broke out, Curio was tribune of the people. He afterwards served in the army of Sulla during his war in Greece against Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, and when the city of Athens was taken, Curio besieged the tyrant Aristion in the acropolis. In b.c. 82 he was invested with the praetorship, and in 76 he was made consul together with Cn. Octavius. After the expiration of the consulship, he obtained Macedonia as his province, and carried on a war for three years in the north of his province against... the Dardanians and Moesians with great success. He was the first Roman general who advanced in those regions as far as the river Damasus, and on his return to Rome in 71, he celebrated a triumph over the Dardanians. Curio appears to have henceforth remained at Rome, where he took an active part in all public affairs. He acted as an opponent of Julius Caesar, and was connected in intimate friendship with Cicero. When the punishment of the Catilinarian conspirators was discussed in the senate, Curio also spoke, and afterwards expressed his satisfaction with Cicero's measures. In the trial of P. Clodius, for having violated the sacra of the Bonæ Deae, Curio spoke in favour of Clodius, probably out of enmity towards Caesar; and Cicero on that occasion attacked both Clodius and Curio most vehemently in a speech of which considerable fragments are still extant. This event, however, does not appear to have at all interrupted their personal friendship, for Cicero has written of him as a man on all occasions; he says, that he was one of the good men of the time, and that he was always opposed to bad citizens. In n. c. 57 Curio was appointed pontifex maximus; he died four years later, n. c. 53. Like his father and his son, Curio acquired in his time some reputation as an orator, and we learn from Cicero, that he spoke on various occasions; but of all the requisites of an orator he had only one, viz. elocution, and he excelled most others in the purity and brilliancy of his diction; but his mind was altogether uneducated; he was ignorant without being aware of this defect; he was slow in thinking and inventing, very awkward in his gestures, and without any power of memory. With such deficiencies he could not escape the ridicule of able rivals or of his audience; and on one occasion, probably during his tribuneship, while he was addressing the people, he was gradually deserted by all his hearers. His orations were published, and he also wrote a work against Caesar in the form of a dialogue, in which his son, C. Scribonius Curio, was one of the interlocutors, and which had the same deficiencies as his orations. (The numerous passages in which he is spoken of by Cicero are given in Orelli's "Oeconom. Tii. ii. p. 552, &c.; comp. Plut. Sull. 14; Appian, Mithrid. 60; Eutrop. vi. 2; Oros. iv. 23; Stat. Casu. 9, 49, 52; Dion Cass. xxviii. 16; Val. Max. ii. 14. 4 § 5; Plin. H. N. vii. 12; Solin. i. 6; Quintil. vi. 3. 70.)

4. C. Scribonius Curio, the son of the former, and, like his father, a friend of Cicero, and an orator of great nativity, talent, and eloquence, which however he left uneducated from carelessness and want of industry. Cicero knew him from his childhood, and did all he could to direct his great talents into a proper channel, to suppress his love of pleasure and of wealth, and to create in him a desire for true fame and virtue, but without any success, and Curio was and remained a person of most profligate character. He was married to Fulvia, who afterwards became the wife of Antony, and by whom Curio had a daughter who was as dissolute as her mother. Owing to his family connections and several other outward circumstances, he belonged to the party of Pompey, although in his heart he was favourably disposed towards Caesar. After having been questor in Asia, where he had discharged the duties of his office in a praiseworthy manner, he sued for and obtained the tribuneship for the eventful year n. c. 50. Curio, who was as reckless in squandering money as he was insatiable in acquiring it, had by this time contracted enormous debts, and he saw no way of getting out of his difficulties except by an utter confusion of the affairs of the republic. It was believed that he would direct his power and influence as tribune against Caesar, and at first he did so; but Caesar, who was anxious to gain over some of the influential men of the city, paid all Curio's debts on condition of his abandoning the Pompeian party. This scheme was perfectly successful; but Curio was too clever and adroit a person at once to turn his back upon his former friends. At first he continued to act against Caesar; and by and by he assumed an appearance of neutrality; and in order to bring about a rupture between himself and the Pompeian party, he brought forward some laws which he knew could not be carried, but which would afford him a specious pretext for deserting his friends. When it was demanded that Caesar should lay down his imperium before coming to Rome, Curio proposed that Pompey should do the same. This demand itself was as fair as the source from which it originated was impure. Pompey showed indeed a disposition to do anything that was fair; but it was evident that in reality he did not intend to do any such thing. Curio therefore now openly attacked Pompey, and described him as a person wanting to set himself up as a tyrant; but, in order not to lose every appearance of neutrality even now, he declared, that if Caesar and Pompey would not consent to lay down their imperium, both must be declared public enemies, and war must be forthwith made against them. This excited Pompey's indignation so much, that he withdrew to a suburban villa. Curio, however, continued to act his part in the senate; and it was decreed that Pompey and Caesar should each dismiss one of their legions, which were to be sent to Syria. Pompey cunningly evaded obeying the command by demanding back from Caesar a legion which he had lent him in n. c. 53; and Caesar sent the two legions required, which, however, instead of going to Syria, took up their winter-quarters at Capua.

Soon after, the consul Claudius Marcellus proposed to the senate the question, whether a successor of Caesar should be sent out, and whether Pompey was to be deprived of his imperium? The senate consented to the former, but refused to do the latter. Curio repeated his former proposal, that both the proconsuls should lay down their power, and when it was put to the vote, a large majority of the senators voted for Curio. Claudius Marcellus, who had always pretended to be a champion of the senate, now refused obedience to its decree; and as there was a report that Caesar was advancing with his army towards Rome, he proposed that the two legions stationed at Capua should be got ready at once to march against Caesar. Curio, however, denied the truth of the report, and prevented the consul's command being obeyed. Claudius Marcellus and his colleague, Ser. Sulpicius Rufus now rushed out of the city to Pompey, and solemnly called upon him to undertake the command of all the troops in Italy, and save the republic. Curio now could not interfere, as he could not quit the city in the character of tribune; he therefore addressed the people, and called upon them to demand of the consul not to permit Pompey to levy an army. But he was not a friend of Cicero and a relation (cognati) of C. Caecilius Caldox. He was quaestor urbanus in B. C. 61, and tribune of the people in

Among Cicero's letters to his friends there are three addressed to Curius (vii. 22-28), and one (vii. 29) is addressed by Curius to Cicero. He was a man of equestrian rank, and is called princeps ordinis equestris. He was the largest farmer of the public revenue, and acquired great wealth by his undertakings, which he spent in such a manner, that he seemed to acquire it only with the view of obtaining the means for shewing his kindness and benevolence. Notwithstanding his character, he was once accused of having embezzled sums of public money, and with having destroyed a document by fire; but he was most honourably acquitted. (Cic. pro Rabir. perd. 3, pro Rabir. Post. 2, 17.)

7. Q. CURIUS, a Roman senator, who had once held office, came forward in B.C. 64 as a candidate for the consulship; but he not merely lost his election, but, being a man of a bad character and a notorious gambler, he was even ejected from the senate. He was a friend of Catiline, and an accomplice in his conspiracy; but he betrayed the secret to his mistress Fulvia, through whom it became known to Cicero. Whether he perished during the suppression of the conspiracy, or survived it, is uncertain. In the latter case, he may have been the same as the Curius mentioned by Appian (B.C. v. 137), who was in Bithynia with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and attempted to betray him, for which he paid with his life. (Cic. de Petit. Cons. 3, in Tog. Cand. p. 426, and Acusm. in Tog. Cand. p. 96, ed. CURJOPEIUS [Codium.]

CURSO, the name of a family of the Papirii gens, which was probably given to the first who bore it from distinguishing himself in running.

1. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, censor in B.C. 393, and afterwards twice military tribune, in B.C. 387 and 385. (Liv. vi. 5, 11, ix. 34.)

2. SV. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a son of the former, was military tribune in B.C. 380. (Liv. vi. 27.)

3. L. PAPIRIUS CURSOR, a son of No. 2, does not occur in history till the time when he was made master equum to the dictator L. Papius Cassus in B.C. 340. In B.C. 333 he was made consul with C. Postelius Libo, and according to some annals he obtained the same office a second time in B.C. 326, the year in which the second Samnite war broke out. In the year following he was appointed dictator to conduct the war in place of the consul L. Camillus, who had been taken seriously ill. Cursor and his magistrate equum, Q. Fabius, afterwards surnamed Maximus, were the most distinguished generals of the time. Shortly after Fabius had taken the field, a doubt as to the validity of the auspices he had taken before marching against the enemy, obliged him to return to Rome and take them again. Q. Fabius was left behind to supply his place, but with the express command to avoid every engagement with the enemy during the dictator's absence. But Fabius allowed himself to be drawn into a battle with the Samnites near a place called Inbrinium or Imbrivium, and he gained a signal victory over the enemy. Papirius was fearfully exasperated at this want of military discipline, and hastened back to the army to punish the offender. He was prevented, however, from carrying his intention into effect by the soldiers, who sympathised with Fabius, and threatened the dictator with a mutiny. Fabius thereupon fled to Rome, where both the people and the Senate, although the consuls of the preceding year, were so much in favour of his action, that they were not disposed to punish him. Papirius was thus obliged to pardon, though without forgiving him, and returned to the army. He was looked upon by the soldiers as a tyrant, and in consequence of this disposition of his army, he was defeated in the first battle he fought against the enemy. But, after having descended to regain the good-will of the soldiers by promising them the booty which they might make, he obtained a most complete victory over the Sammites, and then allowed his men to plunder the country far and wide. The Sammites now sued for a truce, which was granted by the dictator for one year, on condition that they should clothe his whole army and give them pay for a year. Papirius thereupon returned to Rome, and celebrated a triumph.

In B.C. 320, Papirius Cursor was made consul the second (or the third) time, and again undertook the command against the Sammites in Apulia. It was however uncertain, even in the days of Livy, whether the consuls of that year conducted the war with two armies, or whether it was carried on by a dictator and I. Papius as his master equum. It is certain, however, that Papirius blockaded Luceria, and that his camp was reduced to such extremities by the Sammites, who cut off all supplies, that he would have been lost, had he not been relieved by the army of his colleague, Q. Publilius Philo. He continued his operations in Apulia in the year B.C. 319 also, for which he was likewise appointed consul. About this time the Tarentines offered to act as mediators between the Romans and the people interested on his behalf. Papirius, who now made a successful attack upon the camp of the Sammites: they were compelled to retreat and to leave Luceria to its fate. Seven thousand Sammites at Luceria are said to have capitulated for a free departure, without their arms and baggage; and the extreme distress of the enemy, who attempted to revolt against the Romans, were obliged to submit as subjects and give hostages. After these things were accomplished, he returned to Rome and celebrated his second triumph.

In B.C. 314 Papirius obtained the consulship for the fourth (or fifth) time. Although the war against the Sammites was still going on, neither Papirius nor his colleague Publilius Philo is mentioned by Livy as having taken part in the campaigns of that year, which were conducted by dictators, while the consuls are said to have remained at home. It is difficult to account for this state of things.

In B.C. 315 Papirius was invested with his fifth (or sixth) consulship. The war against the Samnites was still going on, but no battle was fought, although the Romans made permanent conquests, and thus gave the enemy a decided turn in their favour. It was, as Livy states, again doubtful as to who had the command of the Roman armies in that year. In B.C. 309 Papirius was made dictator to conduct the war against the Samnites, to save the army of C. Marcus, who was in great distress in Apulia, and to wipe off the disgrace of Caudium, which Rome had the year before suffered. His appointment to the dictatorship was a matter of some difficulty. Q. Fabius, who had once been his magister equitum, and had nearly been sacrificed by him, was ordered to nominate Papirius. The recollection of what had happened sixteen years before rendered it hard to feelings of Fabius to obey the command of the senate; but he sacrificed his own feelings to the good of the republic, and he nominated Papirius as the successor of himself, though he was by no means pleased with the word. Papirius now hastened with the reserve legions to the assistance of C. Marcus. The position of the enemy, however, was so formidable, that for a time he merely watched them, though it would have been more in accordance with his vehement temper to attack them at once. Soon after, however, a battle was fought, in which the Samnites were completely defeated. The dictator's triumph on his return to Rome was very brilliant, on account of the splendid arms which he had taken from the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttians; but it was of no avail, for the Romans soon after again incurred the displeasure of their former consulship had made such an impression upon the Romans, that they were looked up to as the only men capable of bringing the wearisome struggle with the Samnites to a close. They entirely realized the hopes of their nation, for the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttians were compelled to submit to the majesty of Rome. But we have no account of the manner in which those nations were thus reduced. On his return to Rome, Papirius celebrated his second triumph, and after this event we hear no more of him. (Liv. x. 9, 38, 39—47; Zonar. viii. 7; Oros. iii. 2, iv. 3; Frontin. de Aquaed. —250.)

CURTILIUS, a Roman who belonged to the party of Caesar, and who, after the victory of his party in B.C. 43, is described as in the possession of the town of Duroth, and he as well as his colleague ravaged Samnium, especially the territory of Antium. He then pitched his camp opposite the Samnite army near Aquilonia, at some distance from the camp of Carvilius. Several days passed before Papirius attacked the enemy, and it was agreed that Carvilius should make an attack upon Cominium on the same day that Papirius offered battle to the Samnites, in order to prevent the Samnites from obtaining any succour from Cominium. Papirius gained a brilliant victory, which he owed mainly to his cavalry, and the Samnites fled to their camp without being able to maintain it. They however still continued to fight against the two consuls, and even beat Carvilius near Herculanenum; but it was of no avail, for the Romans soon after again got the upper hand. Papirius continued his operations in Samnium till the beginning of winter, and then returned to Rome, where he and his colleague celebrated a magnificent triumph. The booty which Papirius exhibited on that occasion was sold, and his expenses were defrayed by the money among them, but delivered up everything to the treasury. He dedicated the temple of Quirinus, which his father had vowed, and adorned it with a solarium horologium, or a sun-dial, the first that was set up in public at Rome. He was made to the consulship again in B.C. 272, together with his former colleague, Carvilius, for the exploits of their former consulship had made such an impression upon the Romans, that they were looked up to as the only men capable of bringing the wearisome struggle with the Samnites to a close. They entirely realized the hopes of their nation, for the Samnites, Lucanians, and Bruttians were compelled to submit to the majesty of Rome. But we have no account of the manner in which those nations were thus reduced. On his return to Rome, Papirius celebrated his second triumph, and after this event we hear no more of him. CURTILIA GENS, an obscure patrician gens, of whom only one member, C. Curtius Philo, was ever invested with the consulship, B.C. 445. This consulship is one of the proofs that the Curtia gens must have been patrician, since the consulship at that time was not accessible to the plebeians; other proofs are implied in the stories about the earliest Curtii who occur in Roman history. The fact that, in B.C. 57, C. Curtius Peducaeanus was tribune of the people, does not prove the contrary, for members of the gens may have gone over to the plebeians. The cognomens which occur in this gens under the republic are PEDUCAEANUS, PHILU, and POSTUMUS or POSTUMUS. For those who are mentioned in history without a cognomen, see CURTIIUS.

CURTIUS, M. METTUS OR METTIUS CURTIUS, a Sabine of the time of Romulus. During the war between the Romans and Sabines, which arose from the rape of the Sabine women, the Sabines had gained possession of the Roman arx. When the Roman army was drawn up between the Palatine and Capitoline hills, two chiefs of the armies, Mettus Curtius on the part of the Sabines, and Hostius Hostilius on that of the Romans, opened the contest, in which the latter was slain. While Curtius was glorying in his victory, Romulus and a band of Romans made an attack upon him. Curtius, who fought on horseback, could not maintain his ground; he was chased by the Romans, and in despair he leaped with his horse into a swamp, which then covered the valley afterwards occupied by the forum. However, he got out of it with difficulty at the bidding of his Sabines. Peace was soon after concluded between the Romans and their neighbours, and the swamp was henceforth called lacus Curtius, to commemorate the event. (Liv. i. 12, &c.; Dionys. ii. 42; Varr. L. L. v. 143; Plut. Romul. 18.) This is the common story about the name of the lacus Curtius; but there are two other traditions, which though they likewise trace it to a person of the name of Curtius, yet refer us to a much later time. According to the first of these, it happened one day that the earth in the forum gave way, sank, and formed a great chasm. All attempts to fill it up were useless, and when at length the augurs were consulted about it, they declared, that the chasm could not be filled except by throwing into it that on which Rome's greatness was to be based, and that then the state should prosper. When all were hesitating and doubting as to what was meant, a noble youth of the name of M. Curtius came forward, and declaring that Rome possessed no greater treasure than a brave and gallant citizen in arms, he offered himself as the victim demanded, and having mounted his steed in full armour, he leaped into the abyss, and the earth soon closed over him. This event is assigned to the year B.C. 362. (Liv. vii. 6; Varro, l. c.; Val. Max. v. 6, 8, 2; Plin. H. N. xv. 18; Festus, s. v. Curtalacaum; Plut. Parallel. Min. 5; Stat. Silv. i. 1, 63, &c.; Augustin, de Civ. Dei, v. 18.) According to the second tradition, the place called lacus Curtius had been struck by lightning, and, at the command of the senate, it was enclosed in the usual manner by the consul C. Curtius Philo, B.C. 445. (Varr. L. L. v. 15.) This lake, which was called a bidenta, that is, a sacred spot struck by lightning, seems to be clear from what Pliny (H. N. xv. 18) relates of it. All that we can infer with safety from the ancient traditions respecting the lacus Curtius, is, that a part of the district which subsequently formed the Roman forum, was originally covered by a swamp or a lake, which may have obtained the name of Curtius from some such occurrence as tradition has handed down. This lake was afterwards drained and filled up, but on one occasion after this the ground seems to have sunk, a circumstance which was regarded as an ostentum fatale. In order to avert any evil, and at the same time symbolically to secure the duration of the republic, an altar was erected on the spot, and a regular sacrifice was offered there, which may same as our Q. Curtius, though it may be, as F. A. Wolf was inclined to think, that the rhetorician spoken of by Suetonius is the same as the historian. This total want of external testimony compels us to seek information concerning Q. Curtius in the work that has come down to us under his name; but what we find here is as vague and unsatisfactory as that which is gathered from external testimonies. There are only two passages in his work which contain allusions to the time at which he lived. In the one (iv. 4, in fin.), in speaking of the city of Tyre, he says, nunc turnen longa pace cumulta reverecont, sub totulo Romanum manusuetudinis acquiescit; the other, which is the more important one (x. 9), contains an encomium on the emperor for having restored peace after much bloodshed and many disputes about the possession of the empire. But the terms in which this passage is framed are so vague and indefinite, that it may be applied with almost equal propriety to a great number of epochs in the history of the Roman empire, and critics have with equal ingenuity referred the encomy to a variety of emperors, from Augustus down to Constantine or even to Theodosius. This total want of external testimony compels us to seek information concerning Q. Curtius Rufus. This total want of external testimony compels us to seek information concerning Q. Curtius Rufus.

The work itself is a history of Alexander the Great, and written with great partiality for the Macedonians. The deficiency of the first two books has been made up in the form of supplements by Bruno, Cellarius, and Freinsheim; but that of the last of these scholars, although the best, is still without any particular merit. The criticism of the text of Curtius is connected with great difficulties, for although the MSS. are deficient in one, yet some of them, especially those of the 14th and 15th centuries, contain considerable interpolations. Hence the text appears very different in the different editions. The first edition is that of Vindeelius de Spira, Venice, without date, though probably published in 1471. It was followed in 1480 by the first Milan edition of A. Zarota. The most important among the subsequent editions are the Juntinae, those of Erasmus, Chr. Bruno, A. Junius, F. Modius, Acidaldis, Radauer, Popma, Loccenius, and especially those of Freinsheim, Strassburg, 1640, and Ch. Cellarius, 1688. The best edition that was published during the interval between that and our own time is the variorum edition by H. Senckenburg, Delft and Leiden, 1724. The following are the best: 1. that of Schmieder (Göttingen, 1802), Koken (Leipsig, 1818), Zumpt (Berlin, 1826), Baumstark (Stuttgart, 1829), and J. Möttz. (Berlin, 1845.) Critical investigations concerning the age of Q. Curtius are prefixed to most of the editions here mentioned, but the following may be consulted in addition to them: Niebuhr "Zwei klassische Lat. Schriftsteller des dritten Jahrhunderts," in his Kleine Schriften, i. p. 305, &c.; Buttmann, Uber das Leben des Geschichtschreibers Q. Curtius Rufus. In Beziehung auf A. Hirt's Abhandl. über denselb. Gegenstand, Berlin, 1829; G. Pinterger, Uber das Zeitalter des Q. Curtius Rufus in Soedde's Archiv für Philologie, 1824, i. p. 91, &c. [L. S.]

CYANIPPOS (Ko'nnvpos), a son of Aegaeus and prince of Argos, who belonged to the house of the Biamides. (Paus. ii. 18. § 4, 30. § 5.) Apollodorus (i. 9. § 13) calls him a brother of Aegaeus and a son of Adrastus. [L. S.]

CYATHIUS (Kia'lo), the youthful cup-bearer of Oeneus, was killed by Heracles on account of a fault committed in the discharge of his duty. He was honoured at Phlius with a sanctuary close by the temple of Apollo. (Paus. ii. 13. § 8.) In other traditions Cyaxas is called Eurymenus. (Diod. iv. 36.)

CYAXARES (Καυσάρης), was, according to Herodotus, the third king of Media, the son of Phraortes, and the grandson of Deioces. He was the most warlike of the Median kings, and introduced great military reforms, by arranging his subjects into proper divisions of spearmen and archers and cavalry. He succeeded his father, Phraortes, who was defeated and killed while besieging the Assyrian capital, Ninus (Nineveh), in B.C. 634. He collected all the forces of his empire to avenge his father's death, defeated the Assyrians in battle, and laid siege to Ninus. But while he was before the city, a large body of Scythians invaded the northern parts of Media, and Cyaxares marched to meet them, was defeated, and became subject to the Scythians, who held the dominion of all Asia (or, as Herodotus elsewhere says, more correctly, of Upper Asia) for twenty-eight years (B.C. 634—607), during which time they plundered the Medes without mercy. At length Cyaxares and the Medes massacred the greater number of the Scythians, having first made them intoxicated, and the Median dominion was restored. There is a considerable difficulty in reconciling this account with that which Herodotus elsewhere gives (i. 73, 74), of the war between Cyaxares and Alyattes, king of Lydia. This war was provoked by Alyattes having sheltered some Scythians, who had fled to him after having killed one of the sons of Cyaxares, and served him up to his father as a Thyestean banquet. The war lasted five years, and was put an end to in the sixth year, in consequence of the terror inspired by a solar eclipse, which happened just when the Lydian and Median armies had joined battle, and which Thales had predicted. This eclipse is placed by some writers as high as in B.C. 605, by others as low as 585. But of all the eclipses between these two dates, several are absolutely excluded by circumstances of time, place, and extent, and on the whole it seems most probable that the eclipse intended was that of September 30, B.C. 610. (Bally, in the Philosophical Transactions for 1811; Olmann in the Schriften der Berl. Acad. 1812—13; Hales, Analysis of Chrologogy, i. pp. 76—78; Heidrich, Handbuch der Chrologie, i. p. 209, &c.; Fischer, Griechische Zeitstablen, i. a. 610.) This date, however, involves the difficulty of making Cyaxares, as king of the Medes, carry on a war of five years with Lydia, while the Scythians were masters of his country. But it is pretty evident from the account of Herodotus that Cyaxares still reigned, though as a tributary to the Scythians, and that the dominion of the Scythians over Media rather consisted in constant predatory incursions from positions which they had taken in the northern part of the country, than in any permanent occupation thereof. It was probably, then, from B.C. 615 to B.C. 610 that the war between the Lydians and the Medes lasted, till both parties being terrified by the eclipse, the two kings accepted the mediation of Syennesis, king of Cilicia, and Lycunetus, king of Babylon (probably the same as the Laytheme of Strabo), between whom was cemented by the marriage of Astyages, the son of Cyaxares, to Aryennis, the daughter of Alyattes. The Scythians were expelled from Media in B.C. 607, and Cyaxares again turned his arms against Assyria, and, in the following year, with the aid of the king of Babylon (probably the father of Nebuchadnezzar), he took and destroyed Ninus. [SARDANAPALUS.] The consequence of this war, according to Herodotus, was, that the Medes made the Assyrians their subjects, except the district of Babylon. He means, as we learn from other writers, that the king of Babylon, who had before been in a state of doubtful subjection to Assyria, obtained complete independence as the reward for his share in the destruction of Nineveh. The league between Cyaxares and the king of Babylon is said by Polybius, and Abydenus (ap. Phusc. Chron. Arm., and Syncell. p. 210, b.), to have been brought about by the betrothall of Amythia or Amytia, the daughter of Cyaxares, to Nabuchodonosar or Nabuchodonosor (Nebuchadnezzar), king of the son of Babylon. They have, however, by mistake put the name of Asadahges (Astyages) for that of Cyaxares. (Clinton, i. pp. 271, 278.) Cyaxares died after a reign of forty years (B.C. 594), and was succeeded by his son Astyages. (Herod. i. 73, 74, 103—106, iv. 11, 12, v. 20.) The Cyaxares of Dioscorus (ii. 32) is Deioces. Respecting the supposed Cyaxares II. of Xenophon, see Cyrus. [P. S.]

CYBELE. [RHEA.]

CYCHREUS or CENCHREUS (Κυχρέας), a son of Poseidon and Salamis, became king of the island of Salamis, which was called after him Cychrea, and which he delivered from a dragon. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυχρέας.)

CYCLIADAS (Κυκλιάδας) was strategus of the Achaeans in B.C. 208, and, having joined Philip V. of Macedon at Dyrrhachium, aid him in that invasion of Eolis which was checked by P. Sulpicius Galba. In B.C. 200, Cycliadas being made strategus instead of Philopoemen, whose military talents he by no means equalled, Nabis took advantage of the change to make war on the Achaeans. Philip offered to help them, and to carry the war into the enemy's country, if they would give him a sufficient number of their soldiers to garrison Chalcis, Oreus, and Corinth in the mean time; but they saw through his plan, which was to obtain hostages from them and so to force them into a war with the Romans. Cycliadas therefore answered, that their laws precluded them from discussing any proposal except that for which the assembly was summoned, and that they would relieve him from the hesitation, under which he had previously laboured, of being a mere creature of the king's. In B.C. 188 we find him an exile at the court of Philip, whom he attended in that year at his conference with Flaminims at Nicaea in Locris. After the battle of Cynoscephalae, b.c. minimis at Nicaca in Locris. After the battle of instigated by their mother, they assisted Cronus in usurping the government. But Cronus again threw them into Tartarus, and as Zeus released them in war against Cronus and the Titans, the Cyclopes provided Zeus with thunderbolts and lightning,

Pinto with a helmet, and Poseidon with a trident.

(Apollod. i. 1; Hes. Theog. 503.) Henceforth they remained the ministers of Zeus, but were afterwards killed by Apollo for having furnished

Zeus with the thunderbolts to kill Asclepius.

(Apollod. iii. 10. § 4.) According to others, however, it was not the Cyclopes themselves that were killed, but their sons. (Schol. ad Eurip. Aetn.

In the Homeric poems the Cyclopes are a gigantic, insolent, and lawless race of shepherds, who lived in the south-western part of Sicily, and devoured human beings. They neglected agriculture, and the fruits of the field were reaped by them without labour. They had no laws or political institutions, and each lived with his wives and children in a cave of a mountain, and ruled over them with arbitrary power. (Hom. Od. vi. 5, ix.

106, &c., 190, &c., 240, &c., x. 200.) Homer does not distinctly state that all of the Cyclopes were one-eyed, but Polyphemus, the principal among them, is described as having only one eye on his forehead. (Od. i. 59, ix. 290, &c.; comp.

Poly. ad Hym. Dian. vi. 5.) Hence the Cyclopes were no longer the servants of Zeus, but they disregard him. (Od. ix. 275; comp. Virg. Aen. vi. 636; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 55.)

A still later tradition regarded the Cyclopes as the assistants of Hephaestus. Volcanoes were the workshops of that god, and mount Etna in Sicily was considered as their abodes. As the assistants of Hephaestus they are no longer shepherds, but make the metal armour and ornaments for gods and heroes; they work with such might that Sicily and all the neighbouring islands resound with their hammering. Their number is, like that in the Homeric poems, no longer confined to three, but their residence is removed from the south-western to the eastern part of Sicily (Virg. Georg. iv. 170,

Aen. viii. 435; Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 56, &c.; Eurip. Cyc. 599; Val. Flacc. ii. 420.) Two of their names are the same as in the cosmogonic tradition, but new names also were invented, for we find one Cyclops bearing the name of Pyrmenon, and another that of Aemnas. (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 48; Virg. Aen. viii. 425; Val. Flacc. i. 583.)

The Cyclopes, who were regarded as skilful architects in later accounts, were a race of men who appear to be different from the Cyclopes whom we have considered hitherto, for they are described as a Thracian tribe, which derived its name from a king Cyclopes. They were expelled from their homes in Thrace, and went to the Cretans (Creto)

and to Libya. They are said to have inhabited

the place which in other human beings is occupied by the eyes, is marked in figures of the Cyclopes

by a line. According to the explanation of Plato

(ap. Strab. xiii. p. 592), the Cyclopes were beings typical of the original condition of uncivilized men;

but this explanation is not satisfactory, and the cosmogonic Cyclopes at least must be regarded as personifications of certain powers manifested in nature, which is sufficiently indicated by their names. (L. S.)

CYCNUS (Κυκνος). 1. A son of Apollo by Thyria or Hyria, the daughter of Amphinomus.

He was a handsome hunter, living in the district between Pleuron and Calydon, and although loved by many, repulsed all his lovers, and only one, Cycnus, persevered in his love. Cycnus at last imposed upon him three labours, viz. to kill a lion without weapons, to catch alive some monstrous vultures which devoured men, and with his own hand to lead a bull to the altar of Zeus. Phyllius accomplished these tasks, but as, in accordance with a request of Hercules, he refused giving to Phyllius a bull which he had received as a prize,

Cycnus was exasperated at the refusal, and leaped into lake Canopus, which was henceforth called after the Cycnus lake. His mother Thyria followed him, and both were metamorphosed by Apollo into swans. (Antonin. Lib. 12.) Ovid (Met. vii.

371, &c.), who relates the same story, makes the Cycnus lake arise from Hyria melting away

tears at the death of her son.

2. A son of Poseidon by Calyce (Calyca), Harpae, or Scamandridoe. (Hygin. Fab. 157; Schol.

ad Pind. Ol. ii. 147; Tzetz. ad Iliad. 233.)

He was born in secret, and was exposed on the sea-coast, where he was found by shepherds, who seeing a swan descending upon him, called him Cyenus. When he had grown up to manhood, he became king of Colone in Troas, and married Proclesia, the daughter of Laomedon or of Clytius (Paus. x. 14. § 2); by whom he became the father of Tenes and Hemithea. Dietyrs Cretensis (ii. 13) mentions different children of Proclesia, he married Philomene, a daughter of Craugasus, who fell in love with Tenes, her stepson, and not being listened to by him calumniated him, so that Cyenus in his anger threw his son together with Hemithea in a chest into the sea. According to others Cyenus himself leaped into the sea. (Verg. Aen. ii. 21.) Afterwards, when Cyenus learned the truth respecting his wife's conduct, he killed Philomene and went to his son, who had landed in the island of Tenedos, and had become king there. According to some traditions, Tenes did not allow his father to land, but cut off the anchor. (Conon, Narrat. 28; Paus. x. 14. § 2.) In the war of the Greeks against Troy, both Cyenus and Tenes assisted the Trojans, but both were slain by Achilles. As Cyenus could not be reunited with his wife by Achilles, he strangled him with the thong of his boot, or by striking him with a stone. (Comp. Diod. v. 83; Strabh. xiii. p. 604; Schol. ad Theod. iv. 49; Dict. Cret. ii. 12; &c.; Om. Met. xii. 144.) Ovid adds, that the body of Cyenus disappeared and was changed into a swan, when Achilles came to take away his armour.

3. A son of Ares and Pelopia, challenged Hercules to single combat at Ithaca, and was killed in battle. (Paus. iii. 21. § 5.) After the death of his son, Ruhnken refers to the tradition of Cydias would have been delivered in that year. (Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Odatt. Graec. p. lixvii.) 2. One of the early Greek poets whom Plutarch (De Fac. in Orb. Lan. p. 931, &c.) classes together with Mimnermus and Archilochus. Whether he is the same as the author of a song which was very popular at Athens in the time of Aristophanes, who however is called by the Scholiast (ad Nub. 996) Cydides of Hermione, is uncertain. (Plat. Charm. p. 135, &c.; Schneidowin, Detectus Pictum. et Mel. Graec. p. 573, &c.; Bergk, Poet. Lyrae. Carmina, p. 597, &c.) (L. S.)

CYDIPPE. [Acontius.] CYDIPPUS (Κῦδιππος), a surname of Mantinian, is mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 132) among those who had written on inventions (πεπληθυνμένοι); but nothing further is known about him. [L. S.]

CYDON (Κύδων), the founder of the town of Cydonia in Crete. According to a tradition of Tegen, he was a son of Tegeates or of Hermes by Acacallis, the daughter of Minos, whereas others described him as a son of Apollo by Acacallis. (Paus. viii. 53. § 2; Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυδων; Schol. ad Apollo. Rhod. iv. 1491.) (L. S.)

CYDONIA (Κυδωνία), a surname of Athena, under which she had a temple at Phriza in Elis, which was said to have been built by Clymenus of Cydonia. (Paus. vii. 21. § 5.)

CYDNIUS DEMETRIUS. [DEMETRICI.] CYLLARUS (Κύλλαρος), a beautiful centaur, who was married to Hylonomus, and was killed at the wedding feast of Peirithous. (Ov. Met. xii. 398, &c.) The horse of Castor was likewise called Cyllarus. (Verg. Georg. iii. 90; Val. Flacc. i. 426; Suidas, s. v.)

CYLLEN (Κύλλην), a son of Elatus, from whom mount Cyllene in Arcadia was believed to have received its name. (Paus. viii. 4. § 3.) (L. S.)

CYLLINE (Κύλλινη), a nymph, who became the mother of Lycon by Pelagius. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.) According to others, she was the wife of Lycaon. (Dionys. Hal. A. R. i. 13.)

CYLLINEUS (Κύλλινου), a surname of Hermes, which he derived from mount Cyllene in Arcadia, where he had a temple (Paus. viii. 17. § 1), or from the circumstance of Maia having given birth to him on that mountain. (Verg. Aen. viii. 139, &c.) (L. S.)

CYLLINEUS (Κύλλινος), the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Analyt. ii. p. 282; Jacobs, ii. p. 257), of whom nothing more is known. His name is spelled differently in... the intended bride to Alexander the Great, and daughter of Philip by Audata, an Illyrian woman. Her father gave her in marriage to her cousin Amyntas, by whose death she was left a widow in B. C. 336. [Amyntas, No. 3.]

In the following year Alexander promised her hand, as a reward for his services, to Langarus, king of the Agrianians, but the intended bridegroom was carried off by sickness. Cynane continued unmarried, and employed herself in the education of her daughter, Adia or Eurydice, whom she is said to have trained, after the manner of her own education, to martial exercises. When Arrhidæus was chosen king, B. C. 329, Cynane determined to marry Eurydice to him, and crossed over to Asia accordingly. Her influence was probably great, and her project alarmed Perdiccas and Antipater, the former of whom sent her brother Alectas to meet her on her way and put her to death. Alectas did so in defiance of the feelings of his troops, and Cynane met her doom with an undaunted spirit. In B. C. 317, Cassander, after defeating Olympics, buried Cynane with Eurycles and Arrhidæus at Aegae, the royal burying-place. [Arr. Annab. i. 5, op. Phil. p. 70, ed. Bekkl.; Satyr. op. CYNISCARIS (Kynisca), daughter of Arrhidæus II. king of Sparta, so named after her grandmother Zeuxidamis, who was also called Cyneisca. (Herod. vi. 71.) She was the first woman who kept horses for the games, and the first who gained an Olympic victory. (Paus. iii. 8. § 1.) Pausanias mentions an epigram by an unknown author in her honour, which is perhaps the same as the inscription he speaks of (vi. 1. § 2) in his account of her monument at Olympia. This was a group of sculpture representing Cynisca with a chariot, charioteer, and horses,—the work of Apellas. (Apellas.) There were also figures of her horses in brass in the temple of Olympian Zeus (Paus. vi. 12. § 9), and at Sparta she had near the gymnasium, called the Platanistas, an heroum. (iii. 246.) [L. S.]

CYNOBELLUS, one of the kings of Britain in the reign of Claudius, the capital of whose kingdom was Camalodunum. (Colchester or Mal- don.) He was the father of Caracalla, Togodumnus, and Adunnius. (Dion Cass. ix. 20, 21; Suet. Cal. 44; Oros. viii. 5.)

CYNORITES or CYNORTAS (Kynoritis), a son of Amyclas by Diomedes, and brother of Hyacinthus. After the death of his brother Argalus, he became king of Sparta and father of Oebalus or of Pericles. His tomb was shewn at Sparta not far from the Seine. (Paus. iii. 1. § 3, 13. § 1; Apollod. iii. 10. § 3; Schol. ad Iherip. Orest. 447.) [L. S.]

CYNOSURA. 911
CYPRIANUS.

CYNTHIA and CYNTHIUS (Κυνθια and Κυνθιος), surnames respectively of Artemis and Apollo, which they derived from mount Cynthus in the island of Delos, their birthplace. (Callim. Hyper. in Del. 10; Hor. Carm. i. 21. 2, iii. 28. 12; Lucan. i. 218.)

CYNULCUS. [Carnellus.]

CYNUS (Κυνος), a son of Opus, and father of Idoeocles and Larymna, from whom Cynus in Locris derived its name. (Paus. ix. *23. § 3; Pylh. iv. 383; Ol. iv. 25; Hor. Carm. i. 3. 1.) Another Cyparissus (Κυπαρισσος), a youth of Cos, a son of Telephus, was beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus or Silvanus. When he had inadvertently killed his favourite stag, he was seized with immoderate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress. (Ov. Aen. x. 120, &c.; Scrv. derate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress. [L. S.]

CYNUS (Κυνος), a son of Persaeus, who is said to have led colonists from Argos into Cynuca, a valley between Argolis and Laconia. (Paus. iii. 2. § 3.)

CYPRISSUS (Κυπρισσος), a youth of Cos, a son of Telephus, was beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus or Silvanus. When he had inadvertently killed his favourite stag, he was seized with immoderate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress. (Ov. Aen. x. 120, &c.; Scrv. derate grief, and metamorphosed into a cypress. [L. S.]

CYPRIA, CYPRIS, CYPRIGENIA, or CYPROYGENES (Κυπρια, Κυρις, Κυργενεια, Κυργογενη), surnames of Aphrodite, who was born in the island of Cyprus, which was also one of the principal seats of her worship. (Hor. Epist. i. v. 458; Pind. Ov. i. 120, xi. 125, Pyth. iv. 363; Tibull. iii. 3. 34; Hor. Carm. i. 3. 1.)

CYPRIANUS, THASCUS. This celebrated prelate was a native of Africa, born, although the exact year cannot be ascertained, about the beginning of the third century. We are not acquainted with the particulars of his life as long as he remained a Gentile; but it is evident from his writings that he must have been educated with no common care. St. Jerome and Lactantius assure us, that he practised the art of oratory, and taught rhetoric with distinguished success, and by this or some other honourable occupation he realised considerable wealth. About the year A.D. 246, he was persuaded to embrace Christianity by the hortations of Caccilius, an aged presbyter of the church at Carthage, and, assuming the name of the person whom he had thus been led to follow, united himself to the church at Carthage, and, assuming the name of the person whom he had thus been led to follow, united himself to the church at Carthage.

sents us with a very lively picture both of the man and of the times; and while we sometimes remark and regret a certain want of candour and decision, and a disinclination to enunciate boldly any great principles save such as were likely to flatter the prejudices of his clergy, we at the same time feel grateful in being relieved from the headstrong violence, the overbearing spiritual pride, and the arrogant impiety which disgrace the works of so many early controversialists. His character, indeed, and opinions were evidently, in no small degree, formed by the events of his own life. The clemency uniformly exhibited towards the Lapsi was such as might have been expected from a good man who must have been conscious that he had himself, on one occasion at least, considered it more expedient to avoid than to invite persecution, while the extreme views which he advocated with regard to the powers of the church were not surprising in a prelate whose authority had been so long and so fiercely assailed by a body of factious schismatics. On one point only is his conduct open to painful suspicion. His more than once alleged that he had received communications and directions direct from heaven, precisely too with reference to those transactions of his life which appeared most calculated to excite distrust or censure. Those who are not disposed to believe that such revelations were really vouchsafed, cannot fail to observe that the tone and temper of Cyprian's mind were so far removed from fanaticism, that it is impossible to imagine that he could have been deceived by the vain visions of a heated imagination.

In this style, which is accordingly formed upon the model of Tertullian, he exhibits much of the masculine vigour and power of his master, while he skilfully avoids his harshness and extravagance. He will, perhaps, allow us to demand from a great polemical divine. The fruits of his early training and practice as a rhetorician are manifested in the local arrangement of his matter, and in the copious, flowing, and sonorous periods which first appeared most calculated to excite distrust or censure. Those who are not disposed to believe that such revelations were really vouchsafed, cannot fail to observe that the tone and temper of Cyprian's mind were so far removed from fanaticism, that it is impossible to imagine that he could have been deceived by the vain visions of a heated imagination.

While Cyprian possessed an amount of learning, eloquence, and earnestness, which gained for him the admiration and respectful love of all who beheld the unlooked-for persecution of Valerian, hitherto considered the friend and protector of the Christian cause, Cyprian being at once pointed out by his high character and conspicuous station, was banished by Paternus the preconual to the maritime city of Curubis, whither he proceeded in September, A. D. 257, attended by his friend and constant companion, the deacon Pontius, to whom he communicated that he had received a revelation of approaching martyrdom. After having lived in this agreeable residence for eleven months, treated with the greatest indulgence and surrounded by every comfort, he was recalled by the new governor, Galerius Maximus, and returned to his villa in the neighbourhood of the city, from whence he was soon summoned to appear before the praetorium at Utica. Conscious of his approaching fate, he withdrew for a time into concealment, in consequence, say his enemies, of his courage having failed him, or, according to his own declaration, because he considered it more becoming to die in the midst of his own people than in the diocese of another prelate. It is certain that, upon the return of Maximus, Cyprian reappeared, resisted all the entreaties of his friends to seek safety in flight, made a bold and firm profession of his faith in the prætorium before the magistrate, and was beheaded in a spacious plain without the walls in the presence of a vast multitude of his sorrowing followers, who were freely permitted to remove the corpse and to pay the last honours to his memory with mingled demonstrations of grief and triumph.

While Cyprian possessed an amount of learning, eloquence, and earnestness, which gained for him the admiration and respectful love of all who beheld him, his zeal was tempered with moderation and charity to an extent of which we find but few examples among the ecclesiastics of that age and country, and was combined with an amount of prudence and knowledge of human nature which enabled him to restrain and guide the fiery spirits by whom he was surrounded, and to maintain unshaken to the close of his life that influence, stretching far beyond the limits of his own diocese, which he had established almost at the outset of his career. 2. The Unity of God. 3. The Advent of Christ, and his Cosubstantiality with the Father. This tract is expressly ascribed to Cyprian by Jerome in his Epist. ad Magon. Orat.

3. Testimoniares adversus Judaeos libri tres. A collection of remarkable texts from Scripture, divided into three books, and illustrated by remarks and applications. Those in the first are quoted for the purpose of proving that the Jews, by their disobedience, had, in accordance with prophecy, forfeited the protection and promises of God; those in the second demonstrate that the Christians had taken their place, and that Jesus was the Messiah foretold in the Old Testament; those in the third exhibit within a short compass the great moral and religious obligations of the Christian life. The precise date at which this compilation was arranged is unknown, but it probably belongs to the early part of Cyprian's career. It is quoted by Jerome (Dial. I. adv. Pelag.) and by Augustine (Contra duas Epist. Pelag. iv. 9, 16, 18, 23).

4. De Disciplina et Habitut Virginum liber, written in A. D. 248, the year in which he was raised to the episcopate, in imitation of the dissertations of Tertullian, "De Virginibus velandis," "De Habitu Mulierum," &c., the object being to enforce upon those holy maidens who had made a vow of celibacy the necessity of simplicity in their dress and manner of life. He commences with an encomium on virginity, insists upon the propriety of abstaining from all sumptuous apparel and vain ornaments, from paint, from frequenting baths, marriages, or public spectacles, and concludes with a general exhortation to avoid all luxurious indulgences. This book is referred to by Jerome (Epist. ad Domitrius, et Eustoch.) and by Augustin (De Doctrina Christi, i. 21).

5. De Oratone Dominico liber, written and despatched to Rome in A. D. 252, at a period when both Italy and Africa were distracted by the pretensions of Novatianus, with the view of bringing back to the bosom of the church those who had wandered from her pale or were wavering in their allegiance, by pointing out the danger and sin of schism, and by demonstrating the necessity of a visible union among all true Christians. This remarkable treatise is of the utmost importance to the student of ecclesiastical history, since here we first find the doctrine of Catholicism and of the form which was afterwards assumed by the bishops of Rome as the basis of Papal supremacy. It is quoted by Augustin (Contra duas ep. Pelag. iv. 21), and by Pontius (Vit. Cyprian.).

6. De Lapsis liber, written and despatched to Rome in the month of November, A. D. 252. It may be considered as a sort of supplement to the preceding work, explaining and defending the justice and consistency of that temperate policy which was adopted both by Cornelius and Cyprian with regard to the readmission of fallen brethren into the communion of the church. The tract is quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. vi. 33), by Augustin (De Adult. Conf. i. 23), and by Pontius (Vit. Cyprian.). See also Cyprian, Epist. 51.

including a few addressed to himself or to his clergy. This collection is of inestimable value, not only on account of the light which it throws on the life, character, and opinions of the prelate himself, but from the lively picture which it presents of the state of ecclesiastical affairs, and of a multitude of circumstances of the greatest importance in historical and antiquarian researches. Our limits preclude us from attempting to give any analysis of these documents; but we may remark, that the topics principally considered bear upon the questions, general and local, which we have noticed above as agitating the Christian community at this epoch, namely, the treatment of the Lapsi, the schism of Novatius and Feliciassimus, the schism of Novatianus, the baptism of infants, the rebaptising of heretics, to which we may add a remarkable discussion on a subject which has been revived in our own day, the necessity of employing wine in the sacrament of the Eucharist, in which Cyprian strongly denounces the tenets of the Aquirii or Encratites (Epis. 63), and employs many expressions which have been constantly appealed to by those opposed to the practice of the Roman church which denies the cup to the laity.

In most editions of Cyprian the tract De Gratia Dei, together with the fragment of a letter from Donatus prefixed to it, are set down as the first two epistles, by which arrangement the number is swelled to eighty-three. Three more were printed by Baluze, which, however, are now admitted to be spurious.

The following works are admitted as authentic by many editors, although they do not rest on such satisfactory evidence as the foregoing:—

1. De Spectaculis liber.
2. De Laude Martyrli ad Moyen et Maximum et ceteros Confessores.

The following works, although frequently found bearing the name of Cyprian, and many of them, probably, belonging to the same age, are now rejected by all:—

1. Ad Novatianum Haereticum, quod Leopis Spes Veniae non sit deneganda, ascribed by Erasmus to Cornelius. 2. De Disciplina et bona Pudicitiae, included in like manner by Erasmus to Cornelius. 3. De Aquarii or Encratites (Epis. 63). 4. De Montibus Sina et Sin contra Judaeos. 5. Oratio pro Martyribus—Oratio in Die Passionis suaet et Confessio S. Cyjivii—assigned by many to Cyprian of Antioch. 6. De Reprobatis. 7. De Caritatis Christiani Operibus, now recognized as the work of Arnold, abbot of Bonn Valis. 8. De Singularitate Clerici coram. 9. In Symbolum Apostolicum Exposito. The work of Rufinus. 10. Adversus Judaeos contra Judaeos. 11. In Relevationes Capitol. 12. Jo. Raplaiatos: in this work mention is made of the Frankish king Pepin. 12. De Unitaria Marvtrion, in which mention is made of the Turks! 13. De Doctrinon Abinomiacens Sacraum. 14. Disputatio Contraepiscopos, attributed to Cyprian by Paulinus Diaconus, and found in the Cottonian MS. 15. Three poems, the author or authors of which are unknown, have been ascribed to Cyprian—Genexis, Solomen, Ad Sententorem. The first seems to be the same with that assigned by Gemnadius to Salviansus, bishop of Marseille.

The editions of Cyprian are very numerous. The editio princeps was printed at Rome from a Parisian MS., under the inspection of Andrew, bishop of Aleria, by Swynheym and Pannartz, 1471, fol. The first edition in which any attempt was made to exhibit a pure text, and to separate the genuine from the spurious works, was that of Erasmus, whose labours are above all praise. It appeared at Basle, from the press of Froben, in 1520, fol. The two best editions are—1. That printed at Oxford, 1682, fol., and edited by John Fell, bishop of Oxford, to which we are subjoined the Annales Cypriani of John Pearson, bishop of Chester; reprinted at Bremen, 1680, fol., with the addition of the Dissertations Cyprianiæ of Dodwell, which had previously appeared in a separate form. On publication, 2. This object was commenced by Baluze, and completed by a monk of the fraternity of St. Maur, who is hence styled Maranus, Paris, fol. 1726. These two editions taken together contain everything that the student can possibly desire.

As ancient authorities we have a biography of Cyprian still extant drawn up by his confidential friend the deacon Pontius (Pontius), together with the preconscript acts relating to his martyrdom. Among modern lives we may specify those by Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Universelle, vol. xii. p. 208—376; by Tillenmont, Mémoires Ecclesiastiques, vol. iv. pp. 76—459; and by Maranus, prefixed to the edition of Baluze. No publication on this subject contains such an accurate investigation with regard not only to the prelate himself, but also to the whole complicated ecclesiastical history of the times, as the Annales Cypriani of Pearson, an abstract of which has been compiled by Schoenemann, and will be found in his Bibl. Patrum, Lat. i. pp. 80—100 (c. iii. § 3), and a vast mass of valuable matter is contained in the Dissertations Cyprianiæ of Dodwell.

CYPSEIUS (Κυψέλος), a son of Aeptus, father of Meropè and father-in-law of Cresphontes, was king of Basilia on the Alpheius in Arcadia. (Paus. iv. 3. § 3, vili. 5. §§ 4, 3, 29. § 4.)

CYPSELIUS, of Corinth, was, according to Herodotus (v. 92), a son of Acétion, who traced his descent to Caecamus, the companion of Perithous. Pausanias (ii. 4. §§ 4, v. 2. §§ 4, 17, § 2, and c. 18) describes Cypselus as a descendant of Melus, who was a native of Gomus near Sicyon, and accompanied the Dorians against Corinth. The mother of Cypselus belonged to the house of the Bacchaeidae, that is, to the Doric nobility of Corinth. According to the tradition followed by Herodotus, who married Acétion, because, being ugly, she was not liked by no one among the Bacchaeidae who would have her as his wife. Her marriage remained for some time without issue, and when Acétion consulted the oracle of Delphi about it, a son was promised to him, who should prove formidable to the ruling party at Corinth. When the Bacchaeidae were informed of this oracle, which at the same time threw light upon a previous mysterious oracle, they resolved for their own security to murder the child.
of Aeetion. But the persons who were sent out for this purpose were moved by the smiles of the infant, and spared his life. Afterwards, however, they made a second attempt, but they now could not find the child, for his mother had concealed him in a chest (εὐχέταν), from which he derived his name, Cypselus. When he had grown up to manhood, he came forward as the champion of the infant, and spared his life. Afterwards, however, that Juno, in her confusion of the dough against the nobles, and with the help of the people he expelled the Bacchiadai, and then established himself as tyrant. (Aristot. Politi. v. 8, &c.) The cruelties which he is charged with at the beginning of his reign were the result of the vehement opposition on the part of the Bacchiadai, for afterwards his government was peaceful and popular, and Cypselus felt so safe among the golden statue of Zeus, towards which the wealthy PolU. v. 8, published himself as tyrant. (Aristot. v. 9; Polyaen. v. 31.) Like most other Greek tyrants, Cypselus was very fond of splendour and magnificence, and be appears popular, and Cypselus felt so safe among the vehement opposition on the part of the Bacchiadai. His grateful de¬

The chest of Cypselus, consisting of cedar wood, ivory, and gold, and richly domed with figures in relief, of which Pausanias (v. 17, Ac.) has preserved a description, is said to have been acquired by one of the ancestors of Cypselus, who kept in it his most costly treasures. It afterwards remained in the possession of his descendants, and it was in this chest that young Cypselus was saved from the persecutions of the Bacchiadai. His grateful descendants dedicated it in the temple of Hera at Olympia, where it was seen by Pausanias about the middle of the second century after Christ. (Comp. Müller, Archael. d. Kunst. § 57, 2c; &c.; Thiersch, Epock. p. 166, &c.)

CYRENE. (Κυρινή), a daughter of Hyspecus or Peneius by Childamorpe, a granddaughter of Pelusius and Creusa, was beloved by Apollo, who carried her from mount Pelion to Libya, where Cyrene derived its name from her. She became by Apollo the mother of Aristacus. (Pind. Poth. iv. 5, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. i. 300, &c.; Diod. iv. 81; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 42, 317; Hygin. F. 161.) It is said that she founded seven towns in Africa, one of which was called Anthocypolis, Nomina, and Argeacus sons of Cyrene. (Comp. Aristarchus) There are two other mythical personages of the name of Cyrene. (Hygin. Fab. 14; Apollod. ii. 5, § 8.)

CYRIADES stands first in the list of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio (Aureolus), from whose brief, indistinct, and apparently inaccurate narrative we gather that, after having robbed his father, whose old age he had embittered by dissipation and vice, he fled to the Persians, stimulated Sapor to invade the Roman provinces, and, having assumed the purple together with the title of Augustus, was slain by his own followers after a short career of cruelty and crime. Gibbon thinks fit to assume that these events took place after the defeat and capture of Valerianus (A. D. 260); but our only authority expressly asserts, that the death of the usurper happened while the emperor was upon his march to the East (A. D. 258 or 259); and by that statement we must, in the absence of all other evidence, be content to abide. The medals published by Goltzus and Mediocharinus are rejected by numismatologists as unquestionably spurious. (Trebell. Poll. Triq. Tyr. i.)

CYRILLUS, a Graeco-Roman jurisprudent, who wrote shortly after the compilations of Justinian were formed. From the scholiast on the Basilica (vii. p. 89) it may be inferred, that he translated into Greek the Digest at length ( physic, Reiz. ad Theoph. p. 1246, § 17). He also composed a commentary on the Digest, which is cited by the name τοῦ Κυρίλλου, a word which does not mean an alphabetical register, or index in the modern sense. (Bus. i. pp. 180, 182.) Some have thought that, as τοῦ Κυρίλλου means a summary abridgment of the contents of the titles, so τοῦ Κυρίλλου means an extended commentary or paraphrase, which (H HELDT. p. 1077) mentions a suggestion made to him, that Κυρίλλου and τοῦ Κυρίλλου are used synonymously, the latter word being interpreted in the Glossae Nominae by διαπερίσταται. Cyrilus is designated, along with Stephenus (who also wrote an Index), by the name Κυρίλλου. (Bus. iii. p. 415.) On the authority of Ant. Augustinus, Suarez (Notit. Basil. § 19) cites Milt. Blastares (in Præf. Synapp.) to show that Cyrilus interpreted the Digest κατ᾽ εἰκοτηρίαν, but in the edition of Blastares published by Bp. Beveridge (Symbioticum, i.), the name of Cyrilus does not occur in the context referred to. Cyrilus also commented upon the Code. (Bus. ii. pp. 60, 61.) Sometimes he is quoted by the scholiasts on the Basilica, and sometimes his opinions are embodied in the text. (Bus. v. pp. 44, 82, 435, 1245, Bus. i. p. 410.) He does not appear to have commented upon the Novells; and Reiz (ad Theoph. pp. 1235, 1245) has observed, that both Cyrilus and Stephenus must have written before A. D. 555, when the 115th Novell was promulgated. In Bus. v. 225 is a quotation from Cyrilus stating the law de insucciso Testamento as it existed before it was altered by the 115th Novell, which an eminent jurist could scarcely have overlooked or been ignorant of. (Comp. Müller, Archael. d. Kunst. § 57, 2c; &c.; Thiersch, Epock. p. 166, &c.)

C. F. Zacharins seems to think that there were two jurists named Cyrilus: one, who was among the preceptors of the jurists that flourished in the time of Justinian, another, who was among the jurists that flourished in the period immediately after the compilation of the Corpus Juris. (Helius. J. G. R. § 14, 14. 15, 15, c.) Zacharins indeed does not expressly say that there were two, but, unless he thinks so, his mode of statement is calculated to mislead. The early Cyrilus is referred to (if Zacharins properly expresses his meaning) in Bus. i. pp. 583, 646 (ed. Heibach), in both of which passages he is designated by the honourable title Ερεμ. In the passage, p. 646, Ερεμ. Patacinius, who was a contemporary of Justinian, seems (as quoted by the Scholast) to call Cyrilus “the general schoolmaster of the world”; but the meaning is ambiguous, and the high-flown compliments to Cyrilus may be the Scholast’s own. It is the later Cyrilus (if Zacharins expresses what he intends) who, in Bus. i. p. 789 (ed. Heibach), cites Stephenus, his contemporary.

and brother-commentator. We do not agree with Zachariac in this hypothesis of two Cyrilli; and it is to be observed, that in Bas. l. p. 646 (ed. Heim bach) the supposed earlier Cyrillus of Zachariac is treated as the author of a commentary on the title de Pactis.)

In Bas. iii. pp. 59, 51 (ed. Fabrot.), Cyrillus is represented as quoting a constitution of Alexius Comnenus (A. D. 1081—1118), and, in Bas. v. p. 431 and vii. p. 89, mention is made of the edition of Cyrillus, which is supposed by Assenani and Pohl to mean his edition of the Basilica. Hence Assenani (Bild. Jur. Orient. ii. 20, p. 404) comes to the conclusion, that Cyrillus was posterior to Alexius; and Pohl (ad Soares. Notit. Basil. p. 69, n. σ) thinks, that there were two jurists of the name, one of whom was posterior to Alexius, and the passages of early jurists which are appended as notes to the text of the Basilica, interpolations and alterations were often made, in order to accommodate them to a later state of the law; and the apparent anachronisms thus produced occasion considerable difficulty in the legal biography of the lower empire. (Heimbach, de Basil. Orig. p. 31.)

The fragments of Graeco-Roman jurists appended by way of commentary to the 8th book of the Basilica were first published by Rubhken from a manuscript at Leyden in the 3rd and 5th volumes of Neumann's Thesaurus. Among them are frequent extracts from Cyrillus.

In the Glossae Nominae, of which Labbe made a collection that was published after his death (Paris, 1679, London, 1817), are Glossaries which have been commonly attributed to Philoxenus and Cyrilus. Cyrilus (ad Theoph. p. 1248) thinks it not improbable that these Glossaries were either edited by Philoxenus and Cyrilus, or extracted by others from their interpretations, but that they certainly have been interpolated and altered by later hands. Hambold (Just. Rom. pr. p. 169, n. k.) sees no sufficient reason for attributing to Cyrilus the Glossary that passes under his name. [J. T. G.]

CYRILLUS (Κύριλλος), ST., was a native of Alexandria, and nephew of Theophilus, bishop of the same place. The year of his birth is not known. After having been a presbyter of the church at Alexandria, he succeeded to the episcopal chair on the death of Theophilus, A. D. 412. To this office he was no sooner elevated than he gave full scope to those dispositions and desires that guided him through an active life. Unbounded ambition and vindictiveness, jealousy of opponents, ill-directed cunning, apparent zeal for the truth, and an arrogant desire to lord it over the churches, constituted the character of this vehement patriarch. His restless and turbulent spirit, bent on self-aggrandisement, presents an unfavourable portrait to the impartial historian. Immediately after his elevation, he entered with vigour on the duties supposed to devolve on the prelate of so important a city. He banished from it the Jews, who are said to have been attempting violence towards the Christians, threw down their synagogue and plundered it, quarrelled with Orestes, and set himself to oppose heretics and heathens on every side. According to Socrates, he also shut up the churches of the Novatians, took away all their sacred vessels and ornaments, and deprived Theopemptus, their bishop, of all he had. (Histor. Ecclis. vii. 7.)

But his efforts were chiefly directed against Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople; and the greater part of his life was passed amid agitating scenes, resulting from this perservering opposition. In consequence of an epistle written by Cyril to the Egyptian monks which had been carried to Constantinople, Nestorius and his friends were naturally offended. When Cyril understood how much Nestorius had been hurt by this letter, he wrote to him in justification of his conduct, and in explanation of his faith, to which Nestorius replied in a calm and dignified tone. Cyril's answer repeats the admonitions of his first letter, expounds anew his doctrine of the union of natures in Christ, and defends it against the consequences deduced in his opponent's letter. Nestorius was afterwards induced by Lampson, a presbyter of the Alexandrian church, to write a short letter to Cyril broaching the same Christian spirit.

In the mean time the Alexandrine prelate was endeavouring to lessen the influence of his opponent by statements addressed to the emperor, and also to the princesses Pulcheria, Arcadius, and Marcian; but Theodosius was not disposed to look upon him with a friendly eye because of such epistles; for he feared that the prelate aimed at exciting disagreement and discord in the imperial household. Cyril also wrote to Celestine, bishop of Rome, informing him of the heresy of Nestorius, and asking his co-operation against it. The Roman bishop had previously received some account of the controversy from Nestorius; though, from ignorance of Greek, he had not been able to read the letters and discourses of the Constantinopolitan prelate. In consequence of Cyril's statement, Celestine held a council at Rome, and passed a decree, that Nestorius should be deposed in ten days unless he recanted. The execution of this decree was entrusted to Cyril. The Roman prelate also sent several letters through Cyril, one of which, a circular letter to the Eastern patriarchs and bishops, Cyril forwarded with additional letters from himself. This circular was afterwards sent by John of Antioch to Nestorius. Soon after (A. D. 430), he assembled a synod at Alexandria, and set forth the truth in opposition to Nestorius's tenets in twelve heads or anathemas. A letter was also drawn up addressed to Nestorius, another to the officers and members of the church at Constantinople, inviting them to oppose their patriarch, and a third to the monks. With these letters bishops as legates to Nestorius, requiring of him to subscribe them if he wished to remain in the communion of the Catholic church and retain his see. Celestine's letter, which he had kept back till now, was also despatched. But Nestorius refused to retract, and answered the anathemas by twelve anti-anathemas. In consequence of these mutual excommunications and recriminatory letters, the emperor Theodosius the Second was induced to summon a general council at Ephesus, commonly reckoned the third ecumenical council, which was held A. D. 431. To this council Cyril and many bishops subservient to his views repaired. The pious Isidore in vain re- monstrated with the fiery Alexandrine prelate. Nestorius was accompanied by two imperial ministers of state, one of whom had the command of soldiers to protect the council. Cyril presided, and urged on the business with impatient haste. Nestorius and the imperial commissioners requested that the proceedings might be delayed till the arrival of John of Antioch and the other eastern bishops, and likewise of the Italian and Sicilian members; but no delay was allowed.

Nestorius was condemned as a heretic. On the 27th of June, five days after the commencement of the council, John of Antioch, Theodoret, and the 27th of June, five days after the commencement of the Italian and Sicilian members; but no delay was allowed.

Nestorius was compelled to return to his cloister at Antioch. The emperor, though at first opposed to Cyril, was afterwards urged upon by various representations, and by the intrigues of the monks, many of whom were bribed by the Alexandrian prelate. Such policy procured many friends at court, while Nestorius having also fallen under the displeasure of Pulchcria, the emperor's sister, was abandoned, and obliged to retire from the city into exile. Having triumphed over his enemy at Ephesus, Cyril returned to Egypt. But the deposition of Nestorius had separated the eastern from the western churches, particularly those in Egypt. In a. d. 433, Cyril and the eastern bishops were elected by the emperor to enter into terms of peace. In pursuit of such a proposal, Paul of Emesn, in the name of the Orientals, brought an exposition of the faith to Alexandria, sufficiently accurate conceptions in regard to points requiring careful treatment, and equally sound in metaphysical acumen, he was very defective. Theodoret, however, brings various accusations against him which cannot easily rest; and soon after the disputes were renewed, particularly between him and Theodoret. In such bools he continued to be involved till his death, a. d. 444.

According to Cave, Cyril possessed piety and indomitable zeal for the Catholic faith. But if we may judge of his piety by his conduct, he is scarcely entitled to this character. His learning was remarkable according to the standard of the times in which he lived. He had a certain kind of acuteness and ingenuity which frequently bordered on the mystical; but in philosophical comprehension and metaphysical acumen he was very defective. Theodoret brings various accusations against him, which represent him as an unamiable and even an unorthodox light. He charges him with holding that there was but one nature in Christ; but this seems to be only a consequence derived from his doctrine, just as Cyril deduced the substantial Trinity. To these a compendium of the only-begotten, the other proving that Christ is one and the Lord. These dialogues, when taken with the proceeding, make the eighth and ninth.

Scholia on the incarnation of the only-begotten. Far the greater part of the Greek text is wanting. They exist entire only in the Latin version of Mercator.

Another brief tract on the same subject. A treatise concerning the right faith, addressed to the emperor Theodosius. It begins with the third chapter.

Thirty paschal homilies. These were published separately at Antwerp in 1618.

Fourteen homilies on various topics. The last exist only in Latin.

Sixty-one epistles. The fourth is only in Latin. Some in this collection were written by others, by Nestorius, Aquila, John of Antioch, Celestine, bishop of Rome, &c., &c.

Five books against Nestorius, published in Greek and Latin at Rome, in 1608.

An explanation of the twelve chapters or anathemas.

An apology for the twelve chapters, in opposition to the eastern bishops.

An apology for the same against Theodoret.

An apology addressed to the emperor Theodosius, written about the close of a. d. 431.

Two books against Julian, written a. d. 433.

A treatise against the Anthropomorphites. A treatise upon the Trinity.

Of his lost works mention is made by Liberatus of "Three books against excerpts of Diodorus and Theodorus." Fragments of this work are found in the Acts of Synods. (5 Collat. 5.) Gemannus says, that he wrote a treatise concerning the termination of the Synagogue, and concerning the faith against heretics. Ephrem of Antioch speaks of a treatise on impassibility and another upon suffering. Eustathius of Constantinople cites a fragment from Cyril's oration against those who say that we should not offer up petitions for such as have slept in the faith. Nineteen homilies on Jeremiah were edited in Greek and Latin by Cur-
Cyrillus; but it has been ascertained that they belong to Origen, with the exception of the last, which was written by Clement of Alexandria. A liturgy inscribed to Cyril, translated from Arabic into Latin by Victor Scalco, was published at Augsburg, 1604, 4to. Cyril's works were published in Latin by George of Trebizond at Basel in 1546, 4 volumes; by Gennadius Hervetus at Paris, 1573, 1603, 2 vols. They were published in Greek and Latin by Aubert, six volumes, Paris, 1636, fol.

Cyrillus (Kyprianos), E., bishop of Jerusalem, was probably born at Jerusalem, a. d. 315. He was ordained deacon by Macarius in the church of his native place, about 334 or 335; and, by Maximus, who succeeded Macarius, he was elected presbyter, 345. When Maximus died, he was chosen to fill the episcopal chair, 351, in the reign of Constantius. It was about the commencement of his episcopate, on the 7th of May, 351, about 9 o'clock, a.m., that a great luminous cross, exceeding in brightness the splendour of the sun, appeared for several hours over mount Golgotha, and extended as far as the mountain of Olives. His letter to Constantinus, which is preserved, gives a full account of this phenomenon. Soon after, he became involved in disputes with Acacius, the Arian bishop of Caesarea, which embittered the people, who were delighted with his discourses. The larger council to which he appealed was held at Seleuceia, consisting of more than 160 bishops. Before it Acacius was summoned by Cyril to appear, but he refused. The latter was restored by the council. But his persevering adversary inflamed the mind of the emperor against him, and in conformity with the wish of Acacius a synod was summoned at Constantinople; Cyril was again deposed and sent into banishment in 360. At this council former charges were raked up against him, and new ones added by Acacius. On the death of Constantius, Cyril was recalled from exile, and restored a second time to his episcopate in 362. In the year 363, when attempts were made by Julian to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, he is said to have predicted, from a comparison of the prophecies in Daniel and the New Testament, that the enterprise would be defeated. Under Jovian and in the beginning of Valens's reign, he lived in the quiet possession of his office. On the death of Acacius, he appointed Philumenus over the church at Caesarea; but the Eutychians deposed the newly chosen bishop, and substituted one Cyril in his place. The bishop of Jerusalem, however, deposed him who had been elevated by the Eutychian party, and set over the Caesarea church Galasius, his sister's son. Soon after, by order of Valens, Cyril was banished a third time from Jerusalem, in 367. On the emperor's death, he returned to his native place, and resumed the functions of his office the third time, 376. Under Theodosius he continued in the undisturbed possession of the episcopal chair till his death. He seems, however, to have incurred the displeasure of his own church, rent and disfigured as it was with schisms, heresies, and moral corruption. Perplexed and uneasy, he asked assistance from the council of Antioch. (379.) Accordingly, Gregory of Nyssa was deputed by the council to go to Jerusalem and to pacify the church in that place. But the peace-maker departed without accomplishing the object of his mission. Cyril was present at the second general council held at Constantinople in 381, in which he was honoured with a high eulogy. It is supposed that he attended the council of Constantinople in 393. His death took place in 396.

His works consist of eighteen lectures to catechumens (Κατεχομένων), and five to the newly-baptized (μαθητευμένων κατεχουμένων πρὸς τοὺς νεοφώτιστους). These were delivered about the year 347, in his youth, as Jerome says, and when he was still presbyter. The first eighteen are chiefly doctrinal, consisting of an exposition of the articles in the creed of the church; while the last five respect the rights of baptism, chrism, and the Lord's supper. These treatises have very great value in the eyes of the theologian, insomuch as they present a more complete system of theology and a more minute description of the rites of the church at that early period than are to be found in any other writer of the same age. In their style and language there is nothing florid or ornithical; the composition is plain, didactic, and inelegant. The authenticity of these catechisms has been questioned by some, especially by Oudin (De Script. Ecl. Ant. vol. i. p. 459, et seq.), yet no good ground has been adduced for entertaining such doubts. It has been thought, with reason, that Cyril was once a Semi-Arian, and... that after the Nicene creed had been generally adopted, he approved of and embraced its dogmas. Epiphanius speaks in express terms of his Semi-Arianism, and even Touttee acknowledges the fact. His coldness towards the Niceans and his intimacy with the Eusebians, give colour to this opinion. But he was by no means disposed to carry out doctrines beyond the written word, or to wander into the regions of speculation. His published writings attest his orthodoxy and firm belief in the Nicene creed.

Among his works are also preserved a homily on the case of the paralytic man (John v. 1—16), and a letter to the emperor Constantius, giving an account of the luminous cross which appeared at Jerusalem, 351.

His writings were published in Latin at Paris, 1589, and his Catecheses in Greek at the same place, 1564, 8vo.; in Greek and Latin at Cologne, 1564. Prevotius edited them all in Greek and Latin at Paris in 1608, 4to.; and afterwards Dion Petavus at Paris, 1632, fol. They were reprinted from Prevotius's edition, at Paris in 1631, fol., along with the works of Symesius of Cyrene. A much better edition than any of the preceding was that of Thomas Miles, in Latin and Greek, Oxford, 1703, fol. The best is that of the Benedictine monk, A. A. Touttee, Paris, 1720, fol. The preface contains a very elaborate dissertation on the life and writings of Cyril. (See Touttee's preface: Cave's Historia Literaria, vol. i. pp. 211, 212, Oxford, 1740; Schröck, Kirchengeschichte, vol. xii. p. 343, &c.; Theodoret, Histor. Ecclesiast., libb. ii. and v.; Tillemont, Eccl. Mem., vol. viii.; Guerke, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, vol. i. pp. 344, 345, note 3, fünfte Auflage; Mordock's Moschein, vol. i. p. 241, note 16.) CYRILLUS (Κύριλλος), of SCYTOPHILES, a Palestinian monk, belonging to the sixth century. In the sixteenth year of his age he made a profession of the monastic life in his native place. Prompted by a desire to see sacred places, he visited Jerusalem, and, by the advice of his mother, put himself under the care of John the Silentary, by whom he was sent to the famous monastery of Laura. Leontius, prefect of the monastery, received him into the order of the monks. The time of his birth and death is alike unknown. About A. D. 557, he wrote the life of St. John the Silentary. This is still extant, having been published in Greek and Latin by Henschel and Peperbuch in the Acta Sanctorum, 13th of May. He also wrote the life of Euthymius the abbot, who died 472, which is extant, but in an interpolated form, by Simeon Metaphrastes, and published by Bollandus in Greek and Latin in his Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae, vol. ii., Paris, 1681, 4to. It is also in the Acta Sanctorum, January 20. In addition to these, he wrote the life of St. Sabas, the ancient Latin version of which, before it was corrupted by Simeon, was published by Bollandus in the Acta Sanctorum belonging to the 20th of January. It is given in Greek and Latin in Collectarius's Monumenta, vol. iii. p. 220. (Cave, Histor. Literar. vol. i. p. 529.) [S. D.]

CYRUS (Κύρος), two mythical personages, from the one of whom the island of Cyrus or Cyane (Corica) derived its name (Serv. ad Virg. {Eclog.} ix. 36; Herod. i. 167), and the other was regarded as the founder of Cyrus, a town in Caria. (Diod. v. 60.) [L. S.]
the accounts of the modern Persian writers it is impossible to separate the truth from the falsehood.

The account of Herodotus is as follows: In the year a. c. 594, Astyages succeeded his father, Cyaxares, as king of Media. He had a daughter whom he named Mandane. In consequence of a dream, which seemed to portend that her offspring should be master of Asia, he married her to a Persian named Cambyses, of a good house, but of a quiet temper. A second dream led him to send orders to kill it. Harpagus, moved with pity, and fearing the revenge of Mandane, instead of killing the child himself, gave it to a herdsman of Astyages named Mitridates, who was to expose it, and to satisfy Harpagus of its death. But while the herdsman was in attendance on Astyages, his wife had brought forth a still-born child, which the herdsman replaced by the child Mandane. Harpagus was enraged as the son of the herdsman, but was not yet called Cyrus. The name he bore seems from a passage of Strabo (xv. p. 729) to have been Agrabartes. When he was ten years old, his true parentage was discovered by the following incident. In the sports of his village, the boys chose him for their king, and he ordered them exactly as was done by the Median king. One of the boys, the son of a noble Median named Artembares, disobeyed his commands, and Cyrus cursed him to be severely scourged. Artembares complained to Astyages, who sent for Cyrus, in whose person and courage he discovered his daughter's son. The herdsman and Harpagus, being summoned before the king, told him the truth. Astyages forgiven the herdsman, but revered himself on Harpagus by serving up to him at a banquet the flesh of his own son, with other circumstances of the most refined cruelty. As to his grandson, by the advice of the Magians, who assured him that his dreams were fulfilled by the boy's having been a king in sport, and that he had nothing more to fear from him, he sent him back to his parents in Persia.

When Cyrus grew up towards manhood, and showed himself the most courageous and amiable of his fellows, Harpagus, who had concealed a truly oriental desire of revenge under the mask of practical lesson, excited them to revolt from the Median king. Among the Medes was easy for Harpagus to form a party in favour of Cyrus, for the tyranny of Astyages had made him odious. Having organized his conspiracy, Harpagus sent a letter secretly to Cyrus, inciting him to take revenge upon Astyages, and promising that the Medes should desert to him. Cyrus called together the Persians, and having, by an ingenious practical lesson, excited them to revolt from the Median supremacy, he was chosen as their leader. Upon hearing of this, Astyages summoned Cyrus, who replied that he would come to him sooner than Astyages himself would wish. Astyages armed the Medes, but was so intoxicated (σοφόλογον) as to give the command to Harpagus, "forgetting," says Herodotus, "how he had treated him." In the battle which ensued, some of the Medes deserted to Cyrus, and the main body of the army fled of their own accord. Astyages, having impaled the Magians who had deceived him, armed the youths and old men who were left in the city, led them out to fight the Persians, and was defeated and taken prisoner, after a reign of 55 years, in a. c. 559, for his kingdom, and thus the supremacy which they had held passed to the Persians. Cyrus treated Astyages well, and kept him with him till his death. The date of the accession of Cyrus is fixed by the unanimous consent of the ancient chroniclers. (African, op. Euseb. Præp. Evan. x. 10; Clinton, Fast. Hell. ii. a. c. 559.) It was probably at this time that Cyrus received that name, which is a Persian word (Kohr), signifying the Sun.

In the interval during which we hear nothing certain of Cyrus, he was doubtless employed in consolidating his newly-acquired empire. Indeed there are some notices (though not in Herodotus) from which we may infer that a few of the cities of Media refused to submit to him, and that he only reduced them to obedience after a long and obstinate resistance. (Xen. Anab. iii. 4. 7.)

The gradual consolidation and extension of the Persian empire during this period is also stated incidentally by Herodotus in introducing his account of the conquest of Lydia, which is the next event recorded in the life of Cyrus. It took place in 546 B.C. [CROESUS]

The Ionian and Aeolian colonies of Asia Minor now sent ambassadors to Cyrus, offering to submit to him on the same terms as they had obtained from Croesus. But Cyrus, who had in vain invited the Ionians to revolt from Croesus at the beginning of the war, gave them to understand, by a significant fable, that they must prepare for the worst. With the Milesians alone he made an alliance on the terms they offered. The other Ionian states fortified their cities, assembled at the Panionium, and, with the Aeolians, sent to Sparta for assistance. The Lacedaemonians refused to assist them, but sent Cyrus a message threatening him with their displeasure if he should meddle with the Greek cities. Having sent back a contemptuous answer to this message, Cyrus returned to the Median capital, Ecbatana, taking Croesus with him, and committing the government of Sardis to a Persian, named Tabalus. He himself was eager to attempt the conquest of Babylon, the Bactrian nation, the Scion, and the Egyptians. He had no sooner left Asia Minor than a revolt of the states which had lately formed the Lydian empire was raised by Pactyes, a Persian; but, after a long and obstinate resistance, the whole of Asia Minor was reduced by Harpagus. [Harpagus; Pactyes]. In the mean time, Cyrus was engaged in subduing the nations of Upper Asia, and particularly Assyria, which since the destruction of Ninus had Babylon for its capital. Its king was Labynetus, the Belshazzar of Daniel. [Labynetus] Cyrus marched against Babylon at the head of a large army, and in great state. He carried with him a most abundant supply of provisions for his table; and for his drink the water of the Chosepes, which flows by Susa, was carried in silver vessels. He passed the river Gyndes, a tributary of the Tigris, by diverting its water into a great number of rills, and arrived before Babylon in the second spring from the commencement of his expedition. Having defeated in battle the whole forces of the Babolyrians, he laid siege to the city, and after a long time he took it by diverting the course of the Euphrates, which flowed through the midst of it, so that his soldiers entered Babylon by the bed of the river. So entirely unprepared were the Baby-lornians for this mode of attack, that they were engaged in revelry (ēν ἐστρατεύσειν), and had left the gates which opened upon the river unguarded. This was in n. c. 538.

After Cyrus had subdued the Assyrians, he undertook the subjugation of the Massagetae, a peodle dwelling beyond the Araxes. Cyrus offered to the Persian queen Tomyris, the general of this people; but she refused the offer, saying that he woed not her, but the kingdom of the Massagetae. The details of the war which followed may be read in Herodotus. It ended in the death of Cyrus in battle. Tomyris caused his corpse to be found among the slain, and having cut off the head, threw it into a bag filled with human blood, that he might satiate himself (she said) with blood. According to Herodotus, Cyrus had reigned 29 years. Other writers say 30. He was killed in n. c. 529. (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. sub anno.)

The account of Ctesias differs considerably in some points from that of Herodotus. According to him, there was no relationship between Cyrus and Astyages. At the conquest of Media by Cyrus, Astyages fled to Ecbatana, and was there concealed by his daughter Amytis, and her husband, Spitamas, whom, with their children, Cyrus would have put to the torture, had not Astyages discovered himself. When he did so, he was put in fetters by Oeboras, but soon afterwards Cyrus himself set him free, honoured him as a father, and married his daughter Amytis, having put her husband to death for telling a falsehood. [ASTYG-AGES.] Ctesias also says, that Cyrus made war upon the Bactrians, who voluntarily submitted to him, when they heard of his reconciliation with Astyages and Amytis. He mentions a war with the Sacae, in which Cyrus was taken prisoner and ransomed. He gives a somewhat different account of the Lydian war. (Ctesias, Peri. c. 5 ; CROEUS.) Cyrus met with his death, according to Ctesias, by a wound received in battle with a nation called the Derbices, who were assisted by the Indans. Strabo also mentions the expedition against the

Sacae, in which Cyrus was taken prisoner and ransomed. He gives a somewhat different account of this war. Tomyris caused his corpse to be found in Herodotus. It ended in the death of Cyrus in battle. Tomyris caused his corpse to be found among the slain, and having cut off the head, threw it into a bag filled with human blood, that he might satiate himself (she said) with blood. According to Herodotus, Cyrus had reigned 29 years. Other writers say 30. He was killed in n. c. 529. (Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. sub anno.)

The chief points of difference between Xenophon and Herodotus are the following : Xenophon represents Cyrus as brought up at his grandfather's court, as serving in the Median army under his uncle Cyaxares, the son and successor of Astyages, of whom Herodotus and Ctesias know nothing; as making war upon Babylon simply as the general of Cyaxares, who remained at home during the latter part of the Assyrian war, and permitted Cyrus to assume without opposition the power and state of an independent sovereign at Babylon; as marrying the daughter of Cyaxares; and at length dying quietly in his bed, after a sage and Socratic discourse to his children and friends. The Lydian war of Cyrus is represented by Xenophon as a sort of episode in the Assyrian war, occasioned by the help which Croesus had given to the Assyrians in the first campaign of Cyrus against them.

Diodorus agrees for the most part with Her-dotus; but he says, that Cyrus was taken prisoner by the Scythian queen (evidently meaning Tomyris), and that she crucified or impaled him.

Other variations, not worth specifying, are given by the chronographers and compilers.

To form a complete and consistent life of Cyrus out of these statements is obviously impossible;
but the leading events of his public life are made out with tolerable certainty, namely, the detachment of Astyages, the conquest of the Lydian and Assyrian empires, his schemes to become master of all Asia and of Egypt, and his death in a battle with one of the Asiatic tribes which he wished to subdue. His acquisition of the Median empire was rather a revolution than a conquest. Herodutus expressly states, that Cyrus had a large party among the Medes before his rebellion, and that, after the defeat of Astyages, the nation vo-turnantly received him as their king. This was very natural, for besides the harshness of the government of Astyages, Cyrus was the next heir to the throne, the Medes were effeminate, and the Persians were hardy. The kingdom remained, as before, the united kingdom of "the Medes and Persians," with the difference, that the supremacy was transferred from the former to the latter; and then in process of time it became master of Mesopotamia and Syria by the conquests of Nebuchadnezzar. It was in fact a struggle between the Zend tribes, which formed the Medo-Persian empire, and the Semitic tribes under the king of Babylon, for the supremacy of Asia. We can scarcely determine whether Cyrus conquered Lydia before making any attack on Babylon, and we may in this matter Xenophon may have preserved something like the true succession of events. That Croesus was in alliance with Babylon is stated also by Herodotus, who, however, makes Croesus entirely the aggressor in the Lydian war. No clear account can be given of his campaigns in Central Asia, but the object of them was evidently to subdue the whole of Asia

as far as the Indus.

With respect to the main points of difference between Herodotus and the Cyropæudia, besides what has been said above of the historical value of Xenophon's book, if it could be viewed as a history at all, its real design is the great thing to be kept in view; and that design is stated by Xenophon himself with sufficient clearness. He wished to show that the government of men is not so dif-cult as is commonly supposed, provided that the rule be wise; and to illustrate this he holds forth the example of Cyrus, whom he endows with all virtue, courage, and wisdom, and whose conduct is meant for a practical illustration and his discourses for an exposition of the maxims of the Socratic philosophy, so far as Xenophon was capable of understanding it. Of course it would not have done to have represented this hero as an ideal of a philosophic king as the dethroner of his own ambitious schemes. It seems incredible that any one should rise from the perusal of the Cyropaedeia without the firm conviction that it is a romance, and, moreover, that its author never meant it to be taken for anything else; and still more incredible is it that any one should have recognized in the picture of Xenophon the verisimilitude of an Asiatic conqueror in the sixth century before Christ. That Cyrus was a great man, is proved by the empire he established; that he was a good man, by the vices of his country, we need not doubt; but if we would seek further for his likeness, we must assuredly look rather at Genghis Khan or Timour than at the Cyrus of Xenophon.

It has, however, been supposed, that the statement of Xenophon about Cyaxares II. is confirmed by Scripture; for that Dareius the Mede, who, according to Daniel, reigns after the taking of Babylon (for two years, according to the chronologers) and before the first year of Cyrus, can be no other (this is the utmost that can be asserted) than Cyaxares II. This matter seems susceptible of a better explanation than it has yet received.

1. Xenophon's Cyaxares is the son of Astyages; Dareius the Mede is the son of Astyages. Now, it is almost beyond a doubt that Ahasuerus is the Hebrew form of the Persian name or title which the Greeks called Xerxes, and Cyaxares seems to be simply the form of the same word used in the Median dialect. Cyaxares, the son of Phraortes, is called Ahasuerus in Tobit xiv. 15. It is granted that this argument is not decisive, but, so far as it goes, it is against the identification.

2. After the taking of Babylon, Dareius the Mede receives the kingdom, and exercises all the functions of royalty, with great power and splendour, evidently at Babylon. But in Xenophon it is Cyrus who does this, and Cyaxares never comes near Babylon at all after its capture, but remains in Media, totally eclipsed and almost superseded by Cyrus. There are other arguments which seem to show clearly that, whoever Dareius the Mede may have been (a point difficult enough to decide), he was not the Cyaxares of Xenophon. The matter cannot be further discussed here; but the result of a most careful examination of it is, that in some important points the statements of Xenophon cannot be reconciled with those of Daniel; and that a much more probable explanation is, that Dareius was a noble Median, who held the sovereignty as the vicerey of Cyrus, until the latter found it convenient to fix his court at Babylon; and there are some indications on which a conjecture might be founded that this vicerey was Astyages. It is quite natural that the year in which Cyrus began to reign in person at Babylon should be reckoned (as it is by the Hebrew writers) the first year of his reign over the whole empire. This view is confirmed by the fact, that in the prophecies of the destruction of Babylon it is Cyrus, and not any Median king, that is spoken of. Regarding this difficulty, then, as capable of being explained, it remains that Xenophon's statement about Cyaxares II. is entirely unsupported. Xenophon seems to have introduced Cyaxares simply as a foil to set off the virtues of Cyrus. In the passage of Aeschylos, which is sometimes quoted as confirming Xenophon [Astyages], the two kings before Cyrus are clearly Phraortes and Cyaxares, or Cyaxares and Astyages. At all events, no room is left for Cyaxares II. The most natural explanation seems to be, that Phraortes, in whose reign the Persians were subjected to the Medes, and who was therefore the first king of the united Medes and Persians, is meant in the line

The next line admirably describes Cyaxares, who took Ninus, and consolidated the empire.

"ΑΛΛΑΣ δ' εκείνοι πάλι τοῦ ἤρων ἤμεταρ.
"If so, Astyages is omitted, probably because he did not complete his reign, but was dethroned by Cyrus, who is thus reckoned the third Median-Persian king, Τάρας δ' ἀνταρτός Κύπρος. For the ἀνταρτός surely refers to the person who is called πρῶτος. On the other hand, the account which Herodotus gives of the transference of the Median empire to the Persians is in substance confirmed by Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, Anaximenes, Dion, Ctesias, Amynatas, Strabo, Cephalion, Justin, Plutarch, Polyaeus, and even by Xenophon himself in the Aeschylos, as above quoted. (See Clinton, i. pp. 262, 263.) Much light would be thrown on the subject if the date of Cyrus's birth could be fixed; but this is impossible. Dion says, that he was seventy at his death; but this is improbable for various reasons, and Herodotus evidently considered him much younger.

None but the sacred writers mention the edict of Cyrus for the return of the Jews. A motive for that step may be perhaps found in what Herodotus says about his designs on Egypt. The very remarkable prophecy relating to the destruction of Babylon and the restoration of the Jews by Cyrus is in Isaiah xiv. xiv., besides other important passages in Isaiah and Jeremiah, which predict the fall of Babylon without mentioning the name of Cyrus, and the corresponding history is in the books of Daniel, Ezra, and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23. The language of the proclamation of Cyrus, as recorded both in Ezra i. 2 and Chron. xxxvi. 22, seems to countenance the idea that he was acquainted, as he might easily be through Daniel, with the prophecy of Isaiah. "The Lord... hath charged me to build him an house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah" (compare Isaiah xlv. 13: but beyond this one point there is nothing to sustain the notion of Hales and others, that Cyrus was more than an unconscious instrument in accomplishing the designs of Providence. The contrary is intimated in Isaiah xiv. 5.

In the East Cyrus was long regarded as the greatest hero of antiquity, and hence the fables by which his history is obscured. The Persians remembered him as a father (Herod. iii. 89, 160), and his fame passed, through the Greeks, to the Europeans, and the classical writers abound with allusions to him. His sepulchre at Pasargadae was visited by Alexander the Great. (Arrian, vi. 29; Plut. Alex. 69.) Pasargadae is said to have been built on the spot where Cyrus placed his camp when he defeated Astyages, and in its immediate neighbourhood the city of Persepolis grew up. The tomb of Cyrus has perished, but his name is found on monuments at Murgab, north of Persepolis, which place, indeed, some antiquarians take for Paeonoma. (Herodotus, lib. i.; Ctesias, ed. Lion; Xenophon, Cyropoeia; Diodorus; Justin; Strabo; and other ancient authors; Clinton, Fast. Hell. i. ii. supplements; Heeren, Ideen (Asiatische Forsehungen) ; Schlosser, Univ. Geschicht. d. alt. Welt; Hückh, Vier. med. et. Para. Monum.) [P.S.]

CYRUS, THE YOUNGER, the second of the four sons of Dareius Nothus, king of Persia, and of Parysatis, was appointed by his father commander (εχεδρων οι στραταρχων) of the maritime parts of Asia Minor, and satrap of Lydia, Phrygia, and Cappadocia. (B.c. 407.) He carried with him a large sum of money to aid the Lacedaemonians in the Peloponnesian war, and by the address of Lysander he was induced to help them even more than his father had commissioned him to do. The bluntness of Callicratidas caused him to withdraw his aid, but on the return of Lysander to the command it was renewed with the greatest liberality. [CALLICRATIDAS; LYSANDER; TISSAPHERNES.] There is no doubt that Cyrus was already meditating the attempt to succeed his father on the throne of Persia, and that he sought through Lysander to provide for aid from Sparta. Cyrus, indeed, betrayed his ambitious spirit, by putting to death two Persians of the blood royal, for not observing in his presence a usage which was only due to the king. It was probably for this reason, and not only on account of his own ill health, that Dareius summoned Cyrus to his presence. (n. c. 405.) Before leaving Sardis, Cyrus sent for Lysander and assigned to him his revenues for the prosecution of the war. He then went to his father, attended by a body of 500 Greek mercenaries, and taking with him Tissaphernes, nominally as a mark of favour, but really for fear of what he might do in his absence. He arrived in Media just in time to witness his father's death and the accession of his elder brother, Artaxerxes Mnemon (n. c. 404), though his mother, Parysatis, whose favourite son Cyrus was, had endeavoured to persuade Dareius to appoint him as his successor, on the ground that he had been born after, but his brother Artaxerxes before, the accession of Dareius. This attempt, of course, excited the jealousy of Artaxerxes, which was further enflamed by information from Tissaphernes, that Cyrus was plotting against his life. Artaxerxes, therefore, arrested his brother and condemned him to death; but, on the intercession of Parysatis, he spared his life and sent him back to his satrapy. Cyrus now gave himself up to the design of dethroning his brother. By his address, he endeavoured to corrupt those of the Persians who past between the court of Artaxerxes and his own; but he relied chiefly on a force of Greek mercenaries, which he raised on his own hand. Parysatis took a cruel revenge on the Persian who had been the physician of Li via, the wife of Drusus Augustus, and was rewarded with the highest colours. It is enough to say that his ambition was gilded by all those brilliant qualities which win men's hearts.

CYRUS, a rhetorician, of uncertain age, is the author of a work Προ uv Ιανώ τον αριθμόν ἐπί Σεράρας written by the same person. (Fabric. Biblior. Graec. vi. pp. 102, 128; Walz, l. c.; Westermann, Geschicht.e der Griech. Baulustumkeit, § 104.) [P.S.]

CYRUS (Κυρος), the name of several physicians.

1. Cyrus (called also in some editions Σύρος), a native of Alexandria, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He was first a physician and scholar, and afterwards became a monk. He is said to have been an eloquent man, and to have written against Nestorius. (S. Gemmadius, de Illustr. Vir. c. 81.)

2. A physician at Edessa, one of whose medicines is quoted by Albinus (ii. 2, 91, p. 292), and who attained the dignity of Archiater. He must have lived between the second and fifth centuries after Christ, as the office of Archiater was first conferred on Andromachus, the physician of Nero. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Archiater.)

3. A physician, probably of Lampsacus, son of Apollonius, who obtained the dignity of Archiater. He is mentioned in a Greek inscription found at Lampsacus, as having, besides many other acts of liberality, presented to the senate one thousand Attic drachmae, i.e. (reckoning the drachma to be worth nine pence three farthings) forty pounds, twelve shillings, and six pence. (Spon, Miscell. Erud. vii. p. 142, quoted by Fabric. Biblior. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 124, ed. vet.)

4. A physician at Rome in the first century B. c., mentioned in a Latin inscription as having been the physician of Livius, the wife of Drusus.
Caesar, who afterwards married the emperor Augustus. (Spor, quoted by Fabric. i. c.)

4. Cyrus, St., was a native of Alexandria, where he practised medicine gratuitously and with great reputation. He was a Christian, and took every opportunity of endeavouring to convert his patients from paganism. During the persecution of Diocletian he fled to Arabia, where he was said to have healed diseases not so much by his medicines as by miraculous powers. He was put to death with many tortures by the command of the prefect Soter, who afterwards married the emperor Augustus. (Spor, quoted by Fabric.)

5. Cyrus, St., died a martyr in Alexandria, A. D. 300; and his remains were carried to Rome, and there buried. His memory is celebrated on the thirty-first of January both by the Romish and Greek churches. (Acta Sanctor., Novem. Gregor.: Bezoius, Nomenc. Sanctorum. Professione Medicor.; C. B. Cyprianus, De Mortiis ob Eccles. pro Sanctis habitis.)

[C. W. G.]

CYRUS, THEODORUS PRODROMUS. [Theodorus.]

CYTHE'MA, CYTHÈREMIA, CYTHRÈRIS (Koêpês, Koêpêsma, Koêpôs), different forms of a surname of Aphrodite, derived from the town of Cythera in Crete, or from the island of Cyther, where the goddess was said to have first landed, and where she had a celebrated temple. (Hom. Od. viii. 298; Herod. i. 105; Paus. iii. 23, § 1; Anacreon, v. 8; Horat. Carm. i. 4. 5.)

CYTHE'RIS, a celebrated courtezian of the time of Ciceron, Antony, and Gallus. She was originally the freedwoman and mistress of Volumnius Eutropus, and subsequently she became connected in the same capacity with Antony, and with Gallus the poet, to whom, however, she did not remain faithful. Gallus mentioned her in his poems under the name of Lycoris, by which name she is spoken of also by the Scholastikus Cruciatus on Horace. (Sat. 1. ii. 255, 10, 77; comp. Serv. ad Verg. Ecog. x. 1; Cic. Phil. ii. 24, ad Att. x. 10, 16, ad Fam. ix. 26; Plut. Ant. 9; Plin. H. N. viii. 16.)

[CYTHERIUS PHILOXENUS. [Philoxenus.]

CYTHE'RUS, TIHEODORUS PRODROMUS. [Ptolemaeus.]

CYTISSO'RIUS (Karistos), a son of Phrixus and Chalciope or Inoë. (Apollod. i. 9, § 1; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 1123, 1149.)

CYZICUS (Kizios), a son of Aeuneus and Aenete, the daughter of Eusorus. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 948; Val. Flacc. iii. 3.) According to others, he was himself a son of Eusorus, and others again made him a son of Apollo by Stilba. (Hygin. Fab. 16; Conon, Narrat. 41; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l. c.) He was king of the Doliones at Cyzicus on the Propontis. In compliance with an oracle he received the Argonauts kindly, when they landed in his dominion. When, after their departure, they were cast back upon the shore by a storm and landed again at night-time, they were mistaken by the Doliones for a hostile people; and a struggle ensued, in which Cyzicus was slain by Heracles or Jason. On the next morning the mistake was discovered, and the Argonauts mourned for three days with the Doliones over the death of their king, and celebrated funeral games in his honour. (Apollod. i. 9, § 18; Conon, Narrat. 41, who gives a different account.)

[CYZICUS. 925] drawn up by Sergius, in which he clearly stated that there was but one will in Christ. This was subscribed by Cyrus, a circumstance that served to confirm its truth in the eyes of many. Cyrus died A. D. 640. Besides the Libellus Satisfactionis, he wrote three letters to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, which are still extant. Both are printed in the Concilia, vol. vi. (Cave, Histor. Lievar. vol. i.; Murdock's Mosheim, vol. i.; Guericke's Handbuch, vol. i.; Gieseler's Text-book, by Cunningham, vol. i.) DACTYLI.

DABAR, the son of Massagoura, of the family of Masinissa, but whose father was the son of a concubine, was an intimate friend of Bocchus, the king of Mauretania, by whom he was sent to Sulla to negotiate the peace which ended in the surrender of Jugurtha. Dabar was afterwards present at the interview between Bocchus and Sulla. (Sall. Jos. 103, 104.)

DACTYLI (Δακτυλοί), the Dactyls of mount Ida in Phrygia, fabulous beings to whom the discovery of iron and the art of working it by means of fire was ascribed. Their name Dactyls, that is, Fingers, is accounted for in various ways; by their number being five or ten, or by the fact of their serving Rhea just as the fingers serve the hand, or by the story of their having lived at the foot (πόδου Δακτυλῶν) of mount Ida. (Pollux, ii. 4; Strab. x. p. 473; Diod. v. 64.) Most of our authorities describe Phrygia as the original seat of the Dactyls. (Diod. viii. 7; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. l. 1126; Strab. l. c.) There they were connected with the worship of Ithys. They are sometimes confounded or identified with the Curetes, Cabeiri, Cabeissi, and Telchines; or they are described as the fathers of the Cabeiri and Corybantes. (Strab. x. p. 466; Schol. ad Arat. 33; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iv. 153.) This confusion with the Cabeiri also accounts for Samothrace being in some accounts described as their residence (Diod. v. 64; comp. Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 41); and Diodorus states, on the authority of Cretan historians, that the Dactyls had been occupied in incantations and other magic pursuits; that thereby they excited great wonder in Samothrace, and that Orpheus was their disciple in these things. Their connection or identification with the Curetes even led to their being regarded as the same as the Roman Penates. (Arnob. iii. 40.) According to a tradition in Clemens Alexandrinus (Struvi. i. p. 369) the Dactyls did not discover the iron in the Phrygian Ida, but in the island of Cyprus; and others again transfer them to mount Ida in Crete, although the ancient traditions of the latter island scarcely contain any traces of early working in metal there. (Apollon. Rhod. l. 1129; Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 57.) Their number appears to have originally been three: Celmis (the smelter), Damnnmeneus (the hammer), and Alcippe (Apollod. iii. 15. § 9), or Iphinoe, his mother is stated to be Bocchus, and Cyllenus as the principal Dactyls, and a local tradition of Elis mentions, besides Herais, Pacoonius, Epimedes, Justus, and Idas or Accisas as Dactyls; but these seem to have been beings altogether different from the Idaean Dactyls, for to judge from their names, they must have been healing divinities. (Paus. v. 7. § 4, 14. § 5, 8. § 1, vi. 21. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 355.) Their number is also stated to have been five, ten (five male and five female ones), fifty-two, or even one hundred. The tradition which assigns to them the Cretan Ida as their habitation, describes them as the earliest inhabitants of Crete, and as having gone thither with Mygdon (or Minos) from Phrygia, and as having discovered the iron in mount Berecynthia. (Diod. v. 64; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 16.) With regard to the real nature of the Dactyls, they seem to be no more than the mythical representatives of the discoverers of iron and of the art of smelting metals with the aid of fire, for the importance of this art is sufficiently great for the ancients to ascribe its invention to supernatural beings. The original notion of the Dactyls was afterwards extended, and they are said to have discovered various other things which are useful or pleasing to man; thus they are reported to have introduced music from Phrygia into Greece, to have invented rhythm, especially the dactylic rhythm. (Plut. de Mus. 5; Dion. Hal. p. 474, ed. Putch; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 360.) They were in general looked upon as mysterious sorcerers, and are therefore also described as the inventors of the Ephesian incantation formulae; and persons when suddenly frightened used to pronounce the names of the Dactyls as words of magic power. (Plut. de Mus. 5; Dion. Hal. p. 474, ed. Putch; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 360.)

DAEDALUS (Δαίδαλος). 1. A mythical personage, under whose name the Greek writers personified the earliest development of the arts of sculpture and architecture, especially among the Athenians and Cretans. Though he is represented as living in the early heroic period, the age of Minos and of Theseus, he is not mentioned by Homer, except in one doubtful passage. (See below.)

The ancient writers generally represent Daedalus as an Athenian, of the royal race of the Erechtheidae (Paus. vii. 4. § 5; Plut. These. 18.) Others called him a Crete, on account of the long period he lived in Crete. (Auston. Idyl. 12; Euatith. ad Hom. ii. xviii. 592; Paus. viii. 53. § 3.) According to Diodorus, who gives the fullest account of him (iv. 76—79), he was the son of Meiones, the son of Eupolus, the son of Erechtheus. (Comp. Plato, Ion. p. 553; Paus. vii. 4. § 5.) Others make him the son of Eupolus, or of Palamas. (Paus. ix. 3. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 39, corrected by 274; Suid. s. v. Ψηφάδως λέσχη; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 14.) His mother is called Alcipe (Apollod. iii. 15. § 9), or Iphinoi, (Pherecyd. op. Schol. Soph. Oed. Col. 463), or Phrasimedes. (Schol. ad Plat. Rep. p. 529.) He devoted himself to sculpture, and made great improvements in the art. He instructed his sister's son, Calos, Talus, or Polidus, who soon came to surpass him in skill and ingenuity, and Daedalus killed him through envy. (Paus. ii. 23. § 4.) Other things which are attributed to him were condemned to death by the Areopagus for this murder, he went to Crete, where the fame of his skill obtained for him the friendship of Minos. He made the well-known wooden cow for Pasiphae; and when Pasiphae gave birth to the Minotaur, Daedalus constructed the labyrinth, at Cnossus, in which the monster was kept. (Apollod. l. c.; Ovid. Met. vii. 1: the labyrinth is a fiction, based upon the Egyptian labyrinth, from which Diodorus says that that of Daedalus was copied (1.97); there is no proof that such a building ever existed in Crete. (Hösch, Creta, i. p. 56.) For this part in his affair, Daedalus was imprisoned by Minos; but Pasiphae released him, and, as Minos had seized all the ships on the coast of Crete. Daedalus procured wings for himself and his son Icarus (or made them of wood), and fastened them on with wax. Daedalus himself flew safe over the Aegean, but, as Icarus flew too near the sun, the wax by which his wings were fastened on was melted, and he dropped down and was drowned in the Sea of Icarus which was called after him the Icarian sea. According to a more prosaic version of the story, Pasiphaë furnished Daedalus with a ship, in which he fled to an island of the Aegean, where Icarus was drowned in a hasty attempt to land. According to both accounts, Daedalus fled to Sicily, where he was protected by Cocalus, the king of the Sicani, and where he executed many great works of art. When Minos heard where Daedalus had taken refuge, he sailed with a great fleet to Sicily, where he was treacherously murdered by Cocalus or his daughters. (Hygin. Fab. 40. 44.)

Daedalus afterwards left Sicily, to join Iolalus, son of Iphicles, in his newly founded colony in Sardinia, and there also executed many works, which were still called Daedalicae in the time of Diodorus (iv. 30), who do not refer to the Nereids, which were also attributed to Iolalus. (Pseud.-Aristot. de Mirab. Auseult. 100.) Another account was, that he fled from Sicily, in consequence of the pursuit of Minos, and went with Aristaeus to Sardinia. (Paus. x. 17. § 3.) Of the stories which connect him with Egypt, the most important are the statements of Diodorus (i. 91), that he executed works there, that he copied his labyrinth from that in Egypt, that the most important are the statements of the ancient writers respecting the works of Daedalus which remained at his time, for that which there was a curious legend (Paus. ix. 11. §§ 2, 3; Apollod. ii. 6. § 3), and a Trophium at Lebadea: in Crete, an Artemis Britomartis at Olus, and an Athena at Cnossus (the χρυσός of Ariadne is spoken of below): at Delos, a small terminal wooden statue of Aphrodite, which was said to have been made by Daedalus for Ariadne, who carried it to Delos when she fled with Theseus. Pausanias adds, that these were all the wooden statues which he believed to be the genuine works of Daedalus (ix. 40. § 2), namely, two in Bocotia, a Hercules at Thebes, respecting which there was a curious legend (Paus. ix. 11. §§ 2, 3; Apollod. ii. 6. § 3), and another on the confines of Messenia and Arcadia (viii. 35. § 2). If these fables are to be explained at all, the only rational interpretation is, that they were poetical inventions, setting forth the great improvement which took place, in the mechanical as well as in the fine arts, at the age of which Daedalus is a personification, and also the supposed geographical course by which the fine arts were first introduced into Greece.

When, therefore, we are told of works of art which were referred to Daedalus, the meaning is, that such works were executed at the period when art began to be developed. The exact character of the Daedalian epoch of art will be best understood from the statements of the ancient writers respecting his works. The following is a list of the works of sculpture and architecture which were ascribed to him: In Crete, the cow of Pasiphaë and the labyrinth. In Sicily, near Megaritis, the Colymbethara, or reservoir, from which a great river, named Alabol, flowed into the sea; near Agrigentum, an impregnable city upon a rock, in which was the royal palace and treasury of Cocalus; in the territory of Selinus a cave, in which the vapour arising from a subterranean fire was received in such a manner, as to form a pleasant vapour bath. He also enlarged the summit of mount Eryx by a wall, so as to make a firm foundation for the temple of Aphrodite. For this same temple he made a honeycomb of gold which could scarcely be distinguished from a real honeycomb. According to some, that he was rewarded by the erection of many works of art in Sicily, which had perished through the lapse of time. (Diod. L. c.)

Several other works of art were attributed to Daedalus, in Greece, Italy, Libya, and the islands of the Mediterranean. Temples of Apollo at Capua and Cumae were ascribed to him. (Sil. Ital. xii. 102; Virg. Aen. vi. 14.) In the islands called Electridae, in the Adriatic, there were said to be two statues, the one of tin and the other of brass, which Daedalus made to commemorate his arrival at those islands during his flight from Minos. They were the images of himself and of his son Icarus. (Pseud.-Aristot. de Mirab. Auseult. 81; Stephan. Byz. s. v. Ειλερειοτασ.) At Monogissa Cocalus, the father of Daedalus, built a statue of Artemis ascribed to him. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) In Egypt he was said to be the architect of a most beautiful propylæum to the temple of Hecateus at Memphis, for which he was rewarded by the erection of a statue of himself and made by himself, in that temple. (Diod. i. 97.) Scylax mentions an altar on the coast of Libya, which was sculptured with lions and dolphins by Daedalus. (Peripl., p. 53, ed. Hudson.) The temple of Artemis Britomartis, in Crete, was ascribed to Daedalus. (Solinus, 11.) There is a passage in which Pausanias mentions all the wooden statues which he believed to be the genuine works of Daedalus (ix. 40. § 2), namely, two in Bocotia, a Hercules at Thebes, respecting which there was a curious legend (Paus. ix. 11. §§ 2, 3; Apollod. ii. 6. § 3), and a Trojanus at Lebadea: in Crete, an Artemis Britomartis at Olus, and an Athena at Cnossus (the χρυσός of Ariadne is spoken of below): at Delos, a small terminal wooden statue of Aphrodite, which was said to have been made by Daedalus for Ariadne, who carried it to Delos when she fled with Theseus. Pausanias adds, that these were all the works of Daedalus which remained at his time, for that the statue set up by the Argives in the Heraeum and that which Antiphemus had removed from the Sicanian city, Ophaece, to Gelos, had perished through time. (Comp. viii. 46. § 2.) Elsewhere Pausanias mentions, as works ascribed to Daedalus, a folding seat (Σφυραγος δαδαλικας) in the temple of Athena Polias at Athens (i. 27. § 1), a wooden statue of Hercules at Corinth (ii. 5 § 5), and another on the confines of Messenia and Arcadia (viii. 35. § 2).

The inventions and improvements attributed to Daedalus are both artistic and mechanical. He was the reputed inventor of carpentry and its chief tools, the saw, the axe, the plumb line, the auger or gimlet, and glue. (Hesych. s. v. Ειλερειοτασ; Plin. H. N. vii. 56; Varro, op. Chor. p. 106, ed. Putsch.) He was said to have been taught the art of carpentry by Minerva. (Hygin. Fab. 39.) Others attribute the invention of the saw to Perdix or Talus, the nephew of Daedalus. (P e r d i x.) In naval architecture, the invention of the mast and yards is ascribed to Daedalus, that of the sails to Icarus. (Plin. L. c.) In statue-making, the improvements attributed to Daedalus were the opening of the eyes and of the feet, which had been formerly closed (σάρκα, κέλλη συμβεβηκτά), the figures of Daedalus were called δαεδήθητα, and the extending of the bands, which had been formerly placed down close to the sides (κατά τοὺς πλευράς κεκαλλισμένοι, Diocl. l. c.; Suid. s. v. Δάεδάλος ρυθμησα). In consequence of these improvements, the ancient writers speak of the statues of Daedalus as being distinguished by an expression of life and even of divine inspiration. (Paus. ii. 4. § 5; Plato, passim, and particularly Men. p. 97, ed. Steph.; Aristot. Politi. i. 4: the last two passages seem to refer to automata, which we know to have been called Daedalium imagines: Aristotle mentions a wooden figure of Aphrodite, which was moved by quicksilver within it, as a work ascribed to Daedalus, de Anim. i. 3. § 9: see further, Janius, Catal. Art. p. 64.) The difficult passage in Plato (Hipp. Mag. iii. 281, d.) is rightly explained by Thiersch, as being only comparative, and as meant not in disapparendge of Daedalus, but in praise of the artistry of Plato's time. The material in which the statues of Daedalus were made, was wood. The only exception worth noticing is in the passage of Pausanias (ix. 40. § 2), πάρτα τούτα δέ [Κωνσταντίνιον καὶ τῆς Ἀρείπης χώρας, οὐ καὶ ὁμαρία ἐν Ἀλκάδι μεγάλης ἐπιστήμης, σπείραμας εἰσὶν ἐπὶ λευκοῦ ἀθνίον. (Comp. vii. 4. § 3). The passage of Homer is in the description of the shield of Achilles (Il. 590—593):

Ἐν δὲ χρώμα πολλάκις περικλεῖται Ἀμφιέρονσι, ἦ τε θεόν οὗ δεν οἴεθος τιν' ἐκ Κωνικοῦ εὐθὺπον Δαεδάλος θήρασεν καλλικλαμάξις Ἀριαδνή.

Now the mention of a group of dancers as a work of Daedalus,—the material, white stone,—the circumstance of the poet's representing Hephaestus as copying the work of a mortal artist,—and the absence of any other mention of Daedalus in Homer,—all this, is at the least, very suspicious. It cannot be explained by taking χρώμα to mean a sort of dance which Daedalus invented (σενταρχή), for we never hear of Daedalus in connexion with dancing (Böttiger, Anecd. Athen. 46), and a sufficient number of examples can be produced from Homer of ἄνθρωποι meaning to make or manufacture. Unless the passage be an interpolation, the best explanation is, that χρώμα means simply a place for dancing; and, further, it is not improbable that Δαεδάλος may be nothing more than an epithet of Hephaestus, who is the great artist in Homer, and that the whole mythological fable in which Daedalus had his origin, is the result of the misunderstanding of this very passage. At all events, the group seen by Pausanias at Cnossus, if it really was a group of sculpture, must have been the work of an artist later than the Daedalian period, or at the very end of it.

From these statements of the ancient writers it is not difficult to form some idea of the period in the history of art which the name of Daedalus represents. The name itself, like the others which are associated with it, such as Eratimus, implies skill.

The earliest works of art, which were attributed to the gods, were called δαεδάλος. Passing from mythology to history, we find sculpture taking its rise in idolatry; but the earliest idols were nothing more than blocks of wood or stone, which were worshipped under the name of some gods. (Paus. vii. 29. § 3.) The next effort was to express the attributes of each particular divinity, which was at first done only by forming an image of the head, probably in order to denote purely intellectual attributes: hence the origin of terminal busts, and the reason for their remaining in use long after the art of sculpturing the whole figure had attained to the highest perfection. But there were some deities for the expression of whose attributes the bust was not sufficient, but the whole human figure was required. In the earliest attempts to execute such figures, wood would naturally be selected as the material, on account of the ease of working it. They were ornamented with real drapery and bright colours. It was to such works especially, that the name δαεδάλος was applied, as we are informed by Pausanias (ix. 3. § 2), who adds, that they were so called before Daedalus was born at Athens. The necromancy and the expression of such images was restricted not only by the limited skill of the artist, but also, as we see so strikingly in Egyptian sculpture, by the religious laws which bound him to certain forms. The period represented by the name of Daedalus was that in which such forms were first broken through, and the attempt was made to give a natural and lifelike expression to statues, accompanied, as such a development of any branch of art always is, by a great improvement in the mechanics of art. The period when this development of art took place, and the degree of foreign influence implied in the fables about Daedalus, are very difficult questions, and cannot be discussed within the limits of this article. The ancient traditions certainly point to Egypt as the source of Grecian art. (See especially Diod. i. 97.) But, without hazarding an opinion on this point, we may refer to the Egyptian and Etruscan and earliest Greek antiquities, as giving some vague idea of what is meant by the Daedalian style of sculpture. The remains called Cyclopean give a similar notion of the Daedalian architecture. The Daedalian style of art continued to prevail and improve down to the beginning of the fifth century B.C., and the artists of that long period were called Daedalids, and claimed an actual descent from Daedalus, according to the well-known custom by which art was hereditary in certain families. This genealogy was carried down as late as the time of Socrates, who claimed to be a Daedalid. The most important of the Daedalids, besides his son Icarus, and his nephew Talus or Perdix, were Scyllis and Dipos, whom some make the sons of Daedalus (Paus. i. 13. § 1), Endoeus of Athens (Paus. l. c.), Leontes of Rhegium (Paus. iii. 17. § 6), and Onatas of Aegina. (Paus. v. 25. § 7.) All these, however, lived long after the period in which Daedalus is placed. Besides Icarus, Daedalus was said to have had a son, Japys, who founded Iapygia. (Strab. vi. p. 279; Eustath. ad Dion. Perip. 379.)

A δήμος of the Athenian φυλή Κεφαρος bore the name of δαεδάλας. (Meurs. de All. Pop. s. v.) Feasts called δαεδάλεα were kept in different parts of Greece.

2. Of Sicyon, a statuary in bronze, the son and disciple of Polycles, who is mentioned by Pliny among the artists of the 95th Olympiad. Daedalus erected a trophy for the Eleians in the Altis after a victory over the Lacedaemonomians in the war which lasted u. c. 401—399. Besides this trophy, Daedalus made several statues of Athlides, and some other works. (Paus. vi. 2. § 4; 3. §§ 2, 3; 6. § 1, x. § 9; Plin. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 15.)

3. A statuary, born in Bithynia, whose statue of Zeus Stratus at Nicomedia was greatly admired. (Arr. op. Eustath. ad Dionys. Paring. 786.)

DAIPHANTUS (Δαιφάντως), a Theban, who was slain at the battle of Mantinea, b. c. 362. It is said that Epaminondas, after he had received his mortal wound, asked successively for Daiphanthus and Ioalides, and, when he heard of their death, advised his countrymen to make peace. (Plut. Apollod. Epamin. 24; Ael. V. H. xii. 3.)

DAIPHANTUS or DAIMACIUS (Δαιφάντως or Δαιμακιος), a statuary who made statues of athletes (Paus. vi. 12. § 8, 16. § 4), and a statue which Pliny (xxxiv. 5. s. 19. § 28) calls Perikyomenon, for which Brother would read παρακημένην. He is mentioned in two other passages of Pliny (l. c. 19, 19. § 7), where all the MSS. give Laippus, through a confusion between Δ and A. From these two passages it appears that he was a son of Lysippus, and that he flourished in the 120th Olympiad. (b. c. 300, and onwards.)

DA'LION, a writer on geography and botany, who is quoted by Pliny. (H. N. vi. 35, xx. 73.)

DAMACETUS (Δαμακέτος). 1. King of Ialysus in Rhodes (contemporary with Ardis, king of Lydia, and Phracrates, king of Media), married, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, the daughter of Aristotle. Mesene, and from this marriage sprung the family of the Daingoridae, who were celebrated for their victories at Olympia. [ARISTOGENES.] The following is their genealogy.

In this pedigree the name of the first Diogenes is inserted by Chavier and Clinton, to supply one generation, which seems to be wanting in Pausanias.

2. Of the second Damagetus nothing is known but his name.

3. The third Damagetus was victor in the pentathlon on the same day on which his brother Acmilinae was victor in boxing. [DIORAGOS.]

DAMACETUS (Δαμακέτος), the author of thirteen epigrams in the Greek Anthology, from the contents of some of which his time is fixed at the end of the third century n. c. He was included in the Garland of Melanger. It is not known whether he is the same person as the Demagetus who is cited by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. 'Aev't). The name is also given by the Scholast to Apollonius Rhodius (ii. 224) in the form Demagetus. (Bruneck, And. ii. 36, ili. 331.) for it. Mithridates attacked him with twenty-five ships. After an engagement with the king's fleet, the Rhodians missed one trireme, and not knowing whether it had been taken by the enemy, they sent out Mithridates a vessel with six quick-sailing vessels to search for it. Mithridates attacked him with twenty-five ships, and Damagoras retreated, till about noon the king's fleet withdrew. Damagoras then sailed forth again, sunk two of the king's ships, and drove two others upon the coast of Lycia, and in the night returned to Rhodes. (Appian, Mithridat.

DAMALIS (Δαμαλίς), the wife of the Athenian general, Charis. She accompanied her husband, and while he was stationed with his fleet near Byzantium, she died. She is said to have been buried in a neighbouring place, of the name of Damalis, and to have been honoured with a monument of the shape of a cow. According to a mythical tradition, Io on her wandering landed at near Byzantium, she died. She is said to have acquired the surname of Chrysorrhoas, "a Rhodian adan accurate exposition of the orthodox faith. 4. Πρὸς τὸν διαλόγους τῆς ἁγίων εἰδών, a treatise against those who opposed the use of images in churches. 5. Αἰσθήσεως περὶ δρώον προ-φανομένου, that is, a confession of faith. 6. Αἰματοποιημα, a work against the Jacobites and Monopliysitcs or Eutychians. 7. Κατὰ Μαυραγαμοῦ διαλογοῦ, a discourse against the Manichæans. 8. Διάλογος Χριστιανοῦ καὶ Χριστιανοῦ, a dialogue between a Saracen and a Christian. 9. Περὶ Δραματικῆς, a fragment on dragons. 10. Περὶ ἁγίων πρόφανος,

on the holy trinity. 11. Περὶ τοῦ προσωποῦ ἐνίκου, on the hymn entitled Trisagium. 12. Περὶ τῶν ἁγίων πνευμάτων, on fasts. 13. Περὶ τῶν ἅγιων τῆς πνευμάτων, on the eight spirits of wickedness. 14. Ἐδοξονωμός στοιχείας, elementary instruction in the Christian dogmas.
15. Περὶ ἐνενόθου φόνος, a treatise directed against the Aethiopians. 16. Περὶ τοῦ τῆς Χριστοῦ ὑπολογίας καὶ ἐνεργείας καὶ λοιπῶν φυσικῶν ιδεῶν, on the twofold will and action of Christ, and on the other physical properties.
17. Ἐνσοφήτον κατὰ Θεσσαλωνίκης αἳματος τῶν Νεστοριανών, against the heresies of the Nestorianos. 18. A number of fragments on various subjects. 19. Περὶ Πραγμάτων, or a pastoral canon. 20. A fragment of a letter on the nature of man. 21. A treatise on those who had died in the faith of Christ, and on the manner in which their souls may be benefited by masses and alms. 22. A letter on confession. 23. Δόγμα ἁπάντοκτον περὶ τῶν ἁγίων καὶ σεβαστῶν εἰδών, an omission on the veneration due to sacred images. 24. An epistle on the same subject, addressed to Theophilus.
25. Περὶ τῶν ἁγίων, on the feast of unleavened bread. 26. An epistle addressed to Zacharias, bishop of the Dioc. 27. An exposition of the Christian faith: it is only in Latin, and a translation from an Arabic MS. 28. Some poems in Latin on sacred subjects. 29. An abridgment of the interpretation of the letters of St. Paul by Joannes Chrysostomus. 30. Ἐρωταπολιθ., sacred parallels, consisting of passages of Scripture compared with the doctrines of the early fathers.

DAMASCENUS, NICOLAUS (Νικόλαος Δαmasceνοῦς), a famous Greek polyhist, who lived, in the time of Herod the Great and the emperor Augustus, with both of whom he was connected by intimate friendship. He was, as his name indicates, a native of Damascusa, and the son of Antipater and Stratonice. His parents were distinguished no less for their personal character than for their wealth, and his father, who was a highly esteemed orator, was not only invested with the highest magistracies in his native place, but was employed on various embassies. Nicolau and his brother Polemeus were instructed from their childhood in everything that was good and useful.
Nicolau in particular shewed great talents, and even before he attained the age of puberty, he obtained the reputation of being the most accomplished among the youths of his age; and at that early age he composed tragedies and comedies, which met with general applause. But he soon abandoned these poetical pursuits, and devoted himself to rhetoric, music, mathematics, and the philosophical studies in common with Nicolaus, and the amicable relation between the two men was strengthened by these common pursuits. In n. c. 14, he prevailed upon Herod to interfere with Agrippa on behalf of the citizens of Ilium, who were to be severely punished for having been apparently wanting in attention to Agrippa's wife, Julia, the daughter of Augustus. It was about the same time that he used his influence with Herod to prevail upon Agrippa to put an end to the annoyances to which the Jews in Ionia were constantly exposed. In a conversation with Herod, Nicolaus once directed his attention to the advantages which a prince might derive from history; and the king, who was struck by the truth of the observation, entreated Nicolaus to write a history. Nicolaus complied with the request, and compiled a most voluminous work on universal history, the accomplishment of which, in his opinion, surpassed even the hardest among the labours of Heracles. In b. c. 13, when Herod went to Rome to pay Augustus a visit, he took Nicolaus with him, and both travelled in the same vessel. On that occasion, Nicolaus made Augustus a present of the finest fruit of the palm-tree, which Augustus henceforth called Nicola, a name by which that fruit was known down to the middle ages. Some writers speak of cakes (πλάκαρτες) which Nicolaus presented to Augustus, but this is evidently a mistake. (Suid. s. ν. Νουκελάος; Athen. xiv. p. 652; Plot. Symp. viii. 4; Leidor. Orig. xvii. 7; Plin. H. N. xiii. 4.) When Herod, by his success against some Arab chiefs, had drawn upon himself the enmity of Augustus, and the latter declined to receive any ambassadors, Herod, who knew the influence which Nicolaus possessed with the emperor, sent him to negotiate. Nicolaus, by very skilful management, succeeded in turning the anger of Augustus against the Arabs, and in restoring the friendship between Augustus and Herod. When Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Herod, were suspected of plotting against their father, Nicolaus endeavoured to induce the king not to proceed to extremities against his sons, but in vain; the two sons were put to death, and Nicolaus afterwards degraded himself by defending and justifying this cruel act of his royal friend. On the death of Herod, Archelaus succeeded to the throne, chiefly through the exertions of Nicolaus. We have no account of what became of Nicolaus after this event, and how long he survived it.

Phutarch (2. c.) describes Nicolaus as possessing a tall and slender figure, with a red face. In private life, as well as in intercourse with others, he was a man of the most amiable disposition: he was modest, just, and liberal in a high degree; and although he disgraced himself by his flattery and partiality towards Herod, he neglected the great and powerful at Rome so much, that he is censured for having preferred the society of plebeians to that of the nobles. The information which we have here given is derived partly from a life of Nicolaus, written by himself, of which a considerable portion is still extant, from Suidas, and from Josephus. (Antiq. Jud. xvi. 15, 16, 17, xvii. 7, 11.) The writings of Nicolaus were partly poetical, partly historical, and partly philosophical. With regard to his tragedies, we know only the title of one, called Ἀργορᾶς or Χαορέας (Eustath. ad Nic. p. 976), but the fragments are extant. A considerable fragment of one of his comedies, which consists of 44 lines, and gives us a favourable opinion of his poetical talent, is preserved in Stobæus. The most important, however, among his works were those of an historical nature. 1. The first is his autobiography, which we have already mentioned. 2. A universal history, which consisted of 144 books. (Athen. p. 249.) Suidas states, that it contained only 80 books, but the 124th is quoted by Josephus. (Antiq. Jud. xii. 3.) The title Ἰστορία οἰκεία ἀκαθάρλιη, under which this work is mentioned by Suidas, does not occur elsewhere. As far as we can judge from the fragments still extant, it treated chiefly of the history of the Asiatic nations; but we are not certain, whether Photius (Bibl. Cod. 189) speaks the same as the universal history, or only a portion of it, or whether it was a separate work, cannot be determined with any certainty. The universal history was composed at the request of Herod, and seems to have been a hurried compilation, in which Nicolaus, without exercising any criticism, incorporated whatever he found related by earlier historians. 3. A life of Augustus. This work is lost, like the rest, with the exception of excerpts which were made from it by the command of Constantinus Porphyrogentius. These excerpts show that the author was not much concerned about accuracy, and that the biography was more of a eulogy than of a history. Some writers have been of opinion, that this biography formed a part of the universal history; but there seems to be no ground for this hypothesis. 4. A life of Herod. There is no express testimony for a separate work of this name, but the way in which Josephus speaks of the manner in which Nicolaus treated Herod, and defended his cruelties, or passed them over in silence, if he could not defend them, scarcely admits of a doubt as to the existence of a separate work on the life of Herod. 5. Ἡθος παραδόξων συμμετριᾶς, that is, a collection of singular customs among the various nations of the earth. It was dedicated to Herod (Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 189), and Stobæus has preserved many passages from it. Valerius and others think that these passages did not originally belong to a separate work, but were extracted from the universal history. Of his philosophical works, which consisted partly of independent treatises and partly of paraphrases of Aristotle's works, no fragments are extant, except a few statements in Simplicius' commentaries on Aristotle. The extant fragments of Nicolaus were first edited in a Latin version by N. Cragius, Geneva, 1593, 4to. The Greek originals with a Latin translation were first edited by II. Valesius in his "Excerpta Polybiī, Didōrī," &c., Paris, 1634, 4to. The best and most complete edition, with Latin translations by Valesius and H. Grotius, is that of J. C. Orelli, Leipzig, 1810, 8vo. This also contains a good dissertation on the life and writings of Nicolaus by the Abbé Sevin, which originally appeared in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptr. vi. p. 486, &c. In 1811, Orelli published a supplement to his edition, which is 3o2 contains notes and emendations by A. Coray, Creuzer, Schweigger, and others. [W. A. G.]

DAMASCUSUS (Δαμασιίππος), the Syrian (δ Ἀρμῖνος) of whose treatises on Aristotle's works, the last of the renowned teachers of the Neo-Platonic philosophy at Athens, was born towards the end of the fifth century of the Christian era. His national Syrian name is unknown. He repaired at an early period to Alexandria, where he first studied rhetoric under the rhetorician Theon, and mathematics and philosophy under Ammonius, the son of Hermas (see p. 146, a.), and Isidorus. From Alexandria Damascus went to Athens, where Neo-Platonicism existed in its setting glory under Marinus andZenodotus, the successors of the celebrated Proclus. He became a disciple of both, and afterwards their successor (whence his surname of δ Ἀκαδημιακος), and he was the last who taught in the cathedral of Platonic philosophy at Athens; for in the year 529 the emperor Justinian closed the heathen schools of philosophy at Athens, and most of the philosophers, and among them Damascius, emigrated to king Chosroes of Persia. At a later time (533), however, Damascius appears to have returned to the West, since Chosroes had stipulated in a treaty of peace that the religion and philosophy of the heathen vortaries of the Platonic philosophy should be tolerated by the Byzantine emperor. (Brucker, Hist. Philosoph. ii. p. 345; Agathias, Scholast. ii. p. 49, &c., p. 67, &c.) We have no further particulars of the life of Damascius; we only know that he did not, after his return, found any school either at Athens or at any other place, and that thus the heathen philosophy ended with its extinction. (See below.) There is also an epigram in the Greek Anthology (iii. 179, ed. Jacobs, comp. Jacobs, Comment. in Anthol. xiii. p. 890) likewise ascribed to him. For further particulars, see Kopp's Preface to his edition of Damascius, τοι τῶν δραχμῶν, and Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. iii. pp. 70, 88, 230.

Among the disciples of Damascius the most important are Simplicius, the celebrated commentator on Aristotle, and Eulamius. [A. S.]

DAMASCIUS (Δαμασκός), the author of a short Greek commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, first published by F. K. Dietz in his Scholia in Hippocr. et Galen. Regni, Prussia, 1834, 8vo. This Damascius is perhaps the same as the celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher mentioned above; but the matter is quite uncertain. [W. A. G.]

DAMASIPPUS (Δαμασιόππος), a Macedonian, who after having assassinated the members of the syndecum of Plancus, a Macedonian town, fled with his wife and children from his country. When Tolemy Phyeson came to Greece and raised an army of mercenaries, Damasippus also engaged in his service, and accompanied him to Crete and Libya. (Polyb. xxxi. 25.)

DAMASIPPUS, L. LICINIUS. 1. LICINIUS DAMASIPPUS, a Roman senator of the party of Pompey, who was with king Juba in B. C. 49. During Caesar's African war, in B. C. 47, we again meet him among the enemies of Caesar. Damasippus and some others of his party emigrated with a few ships to reach the coast of Spain, but they were thrown back by a storm to Hippo, where the fleet of P. Sittus was stationed. The is extant in the treatise περὶ τῶν γενεσίων, published by Iriaric (Catal. MSS. Bibl. Madrid, i. 130) under the name of Damascius. Such a commentary of Damascius as extant in manuscript (περὶ εὐσεβείας, in Aristot. Bibl. l. 1, de Coelo) is also mentioned by Labbeus (Bibl. Nov. MSS. pp. 112, 169). The writings of Damascius περὶ κανώνων, περὶ τῶν κτυπῶν, and περὶ χρόνων, cited by Simplicius in his commentary on Aristotle's Physica (vol. 189, b., 153, a., 183, b.), are perhaps only parts of his commentaries on the Aristotelian writings. Fabrici (Bibl. Gracc. vol. ii. p. 294) attributes to him the composition of an epitome of the first four and the eighth book of Aristotle's Physica. 4. But of much greater importance is Damascius's biography of his preceptor Isidorus (Ἰσιδώρου Πελαγία, perhaps a part of the παράκεισθαι λεγόμενα attributed to Damascius by Suidas, l. p. 506), of which Photius (Cod. 214, comp. 191) has preserved a considerable fragment, and gives at the same time some important information respecting the life and studies of Damascius. This biography appears to have been reckoned by the ancients the most important of the works of Damascius. 5. Αὐτογάμος Παράδεσθαι, in 4 books, of which Photius (Cod. 130) also gives an account and specifies the respective titles of the books. (Comp. Westermann, Rerum Menaclid. Scriptores, Proleg. p. xxix.) Photius praises the succinct, clear, and pleasing style of this work; though, as a Christian, he in other respects vehemently attacks the heathen philosopher and the tendency of his writings. 6. Besides all these writings, there is lastly a fragment of a commentary on Hippocrates's "Aphorisms" in a manuscript of Munich, which is ascribed to this philosopher. (See below.) There is also an epitome in the Greek Anthology (iii. 179, ed. Jacobs, comp. Jacobs, Comment. in Anthol. xiii. p. 890) likewise ascribed to him. For further particulars, see Kopp's Preface to his edition of Damascius, χεὶς τῶν δραχμῶν, and Fabric. Bibl. Gracc. vol. iii. pp. 70, 88, 230.

The extant works of Damasus are:

I. Seven epistles written between the years 373—384, addressed to the bishops of Ilyrina, to Paulinus, to Acholius and other bishops of Macedonia, and to St. Jerome, together with an Epistle Syrus, and an Epistle to St. Paulinas, to Acholius and other bishops of Macedonia. These refer, for the most part, to the controversies then agitating the religious world, and are not without value as materials for ecclesiastical history. The second, to Paulinus, consists of two parts, which in some editions are arranged separately, so as to make the whole number amount to eight. In addition to the above, which are entire, we have several fragments of letters, and it is known that many have perished. See the "Epistolae Pontificum Romanorum," by Constant, Paris, 1721.

II. Upwards of forty short poems in various measures and styles, religious, descriptive, lyrical, and panegyrical, including several epitaphs. None of these, notwithstanding the testimony of St. Jerome, are remarkable for any felicity either in thought or in expression. The rules of classical prosody are ruinously disregarded; we observe a propensity to indulge in jingling cadences, thus leading the way to the rhyming versification of the monks, and here and there some specimens of acrostic dexterity. These pieces were published separately in several of the early editions of the Christian poets; by A. M. Merenda, Rom. fol. 1754; and a selection comprising his "Sanctorum Elogia" is included in the "Opera Veterrm Pootarum Latinorum" by Maittaire, 2 vols. fol. Lond. 1713.

Among the lost works of this author are to be reckoned several epistles; a tract de Virginitate, in which prose and poetry were combined; summaries in hexameter verse of certain books of the Old and New Testament (Hieron. Epist. ad Eustoch. de Oustoch. Virgini.), and Acta Martyrum Romanorum Petri Eusebii et Marcellini (Eginhart, op. Suriun, de probatis sanct. Histor. vol. iii. p. 561).

Several Decretals; a book entitled Liber de Vitis Pontificum Romanorum; and all the epistles not named above are deemed spurious.

The earliest edition of the collected works is that prepared by Sarrasanius and published by Ubaldinus under the patronage of Cardinal Francesco Barberini, Rom. 4to. 1638. They are contained also in the Bibliotheca Max. Patrum. vol. iv. p. 543, and vol. xxvii. p. 81, and appear in their most correct form in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. vi. p. 32. (For the life and character of Damasus, see the testimonies and biographies collected in the edition of Sarrasanius; Hieron. de Viris Ill. c. 103, Chronic. p. 186, ad Nepot.; Ambros. adv. Suyccum. ii.; Augustin. Serm. 49; Suidas, s. v. Δαμασος; Amm. Marc. xxvii. 3, a very remarkable passage. The petition of two presbyters opposed to Damasus is presented by their mother's was Theodora, and both are said to have been Christians. After receiving an excellent education, they chose the medical profession, as being that in which they thought they could most benefit their fellow men; and accordingly they constantly practised it gratuitously, thus earning for themselves the title of Ἀγάπους, by which they are constantly distinguished. They were at last put to death with the most cruel tortures, in company with several other Christians, during the persecution by Diocletian, A. d. 303—311. Justinian, in the sixth century, built a church in their honour at Constantinople, and another in Pamphylia, in consequence of his having been (as he supposed) cured of a dangerous illness through their intercession. [Cosmas.] [W. A. G.]

DA'MIA. [Auxesia.]

DA'MIANUS (Δαμιανός), of Ephesus, a celebrated rhetorician and contemporary of Philostorus, who visited him at Ephesus, and who has preserved a few particulars respecting his life. In his youth Damianus was a pupil of Adriannus and Aelius Aristides, whom he afterwards followed as a rhetorician. He appears to have taught rhetoric in his native place, and his reputation as a rhetorician and sophist was so great, that even when he had arrived at an advanced age and had given up rhetoric, many persons flocked to Ephesus to have an opportunity of conversing with him. He belonged to a very illustrious family, and was possessed of great wealth, of which he made generous use, for he not only instructed gratis such young men as were unable to remunerate him, but he erected or restored at his own expense several useful and public institutions and buildings. He died at the age of seventy, and was buried in one of the suburbs of Ephesus. It is not known whether he ever published any scientific treatise on rhetoric or any orations or declamations. (Philot. Vit. Soph. ii. 23; Suid. s. v. Δαμιανός; Eutocius, p. 130.) [L. S.]

DA'MIANUS (Δαμιανός), a celebrated saint and martyr, who was a physician by profession and lived in the third and fourth centuries after Christ. He is said to have been the brother of St. Cosmos, with whose name and life his own is commonly associated, and whose joint history appears to have been as follows. They were born in Arabia: their father's name is not known, their mother's was Theodora, and both are said to have been Christians. After receiving an excellent education, they chose the medical profession, as being that in which they thought they could most benefit their fellow men; and accordingly they constantly practised it gratuitously, thus earning for themselves the title of Ἀγάπους, by which they are constantly distinguished. They were at last put to death with the most cruel tortures, in company with several other Christians, during the persecution by Diocletian, A. d. 303—311. Justinian, in the sixth century, built a church in their honour at Constantinople, and another in Pamphylia, in consequence of his having been (as he supposed) cured of a dangerous illness through their intercession. [Cosmas.] [W. A. G.]

DA'MIO. [Heliodorus.]

DA'MIO, a freedman and servant of P. Claudius, who in A. d. 58 prevented Pompey from leaving his house and from assisting Cicero. (Ascon. ad Att. iv. p. 47, ed. Orelli.) It is uncertain whether he is the same as Vitrus Damio, into whose house Cicero fled from the persecutions of the Clodian party. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 3.) [L. S.]
posed by her after the manner of the Aeolians and Pamphylians. (Philost. Vit. Apollon. i. 30.) [P. S.] DAMO'PHILUS or DEM'OPHILUS, a painter and medallier (plaistos) who, with Gorgasus, embellished the temple of Ceres by the Circus Maximus at Rome with works of art in both departments, to which was affixed an inscription in verse, in an epigram of the epigram, on which the epigram was inscribed, does not appear. Reiske supposed that he might be the same person as Demonstratus, a Roman senator, who wrote a poem on fishing (daieoynw), which is often quoted by the ancient writers, and who lived in the first century after Christ. (Jachna, Anth. Graec. xiii. 381; Fabre, Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 471, ed. Harle, xiii. p. 138, old. edit.; Demonstratus.) [P. S.] DAMO'TELES (Δαμοτέλης). 1. A Spartan, through whose treachery, according to one account, Cleomenes was defeated by Antigonus at the battle of Sellasia, b. c. 222. (Phylarch. op. cit. Demos, ii. 33, &c.) Demonstratus is said in Plutarch to have had the office of commander of the Crypteia (see Dist. of Ant. a. v.), which would qualify him for the service of reconnoitring assigned to him by Cleomenes before the engagement.

2. An Aetolian, was one of the ambassadors whose countrymen, by the advice of the Athenians, sent to Rome in b. c. 190 to negotiate with the senate for peace. He returned in the ensuing year without having accomplished his object. M. Fulvius, the consul, having crossed over from Italy against them, the Aetolians once more despatched Damoteles to Rome; but, having ascertained on his arrival at Leucas that Fulvius was on his way through Epirus to besiege Ambracia, he thought the time too late to return to Aetolia. (Dion. Hal. v. 21, 22.) We hear of him again among those who came to Fulvius at Ambria to sue for peace, which was granted by the consul and afterwards ratified by the senate. (Dio, Hist. 69. No. 2.) [Polyb. xxxi. 22, xxxii. 8, 9, 12, 13; Liv. xxxviii. 3.) [E. B.]

DAMOXENUS (Δαμοξένος) was an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, and perhaps partly of the middle. Two of his plays, entitled ξύπτρος and Εισύνη: הים, are mentioned by Atheneus, who quotes a long passage from the former, and a few lines from the latter. Elsewhere he calls him, less correctly, Damoxen. The longer fragment was first published, with a Latin version, by Hugo Grotius, in his Excerpta et Fragmenta Comediarum Graecarum, Par. 1626, 4to. (Ath. i. p. 15, b., iii. p. 101, f., xi. p. 469, a.; Suid. s. v.; Endoe. p. 131; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. ii. p. 484, &c., iv. p. 529, &c., p. 843, &c.) [P. S.]

DANAIDES (Δαναίδες). 1. The fifty daughters of Danaus, whose names are given by Apollodorus (ii. 1. § 5) and Hyginus (Fab. 170), though they are not the same in both lists. They were betrothed to the fifty sons of Aegyptus, but were compelled by their father to promise him to kill their husbands in the first night, with the swords which he gave them. They fulfilled their promise, and cut off the heads of their husbands with the exception of Hypermenestra alone, who was married to Lynceus, and who spared his life. (Pind. Nem. x. 7.) According to some accounts, Amyone and Bibece also did not kill their husbands. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. ix. 200; Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 905.) Hypermenestra was punished by her father with imprisonment, but was afterwards restored to her husband Lynceus. The Danaides buried the corpses of their victims, and were purified from their crime by Hermes and Athena at the command of Zeus. Danaüs afterwards found it difficult to obtain husbands for his daughters, and he invited men to public contests, in which his daughters were given as prizes to the victors. (Pind. Pyth. ix. 117.)
Athena Lindia. According to the story in Hesiod he embark with his daughters. On his flight he first fled to Horn. He was advised to fly by an oracle (Kustath. xii. 2), while Aegyptus had obtained Danaus Libya, and this may be the reason four of the latter were worshipped at Argos as divinities; and this may possibly be the foundation of the story about the punishment of the Danaides.

Ovid calls them by the name of the Beldinius, from their grandfather, Belus; and Herodotus (ii. 171), following the tales of the Egyptians, says, that they brought the mysteries of Demeter Thesmophoros from Egypt to Peloponnesus, and that the Pelasgian women there learned the mysteries from them.

DANAUS (Δαναΐς), a son of Belus and Anchinoe, and a grandson of Poseidon and Libya. He was brother of Aegyptus, and father of fifty daughters, and the mythical ancestor of the Danais.

According to the common story he was a native of Chios, in the Chianoe, and a grandson of Poseidon and Libya, which was Tinros, a grammarian and epigrammatist of Tessinous, of whom Suidas says, that he wrote against Homer, accusing him of falsehood in saying that the Athenians went to the Trojan war. He was a reviler of all men, and did not spare even the gods. He put a trick upon the Delphian oracle, as he thought, by inquiring whether he should find his horse. The answer was, that he should find it soon. Upon this, he declared that he had never had a horse, much less lost one. But the oracle proved to be true, for on his return home he was seized by Attalus, the king of Pergamus, and thrown headlong from a rock, the name of which was Tereus, horse. (Suid. s. v. Δαναύς; comp. Cic. de Fat. 3; Val. Max. i. 8, ext. § 3.)

Strabo, in speaking of Magnesia, mentions a mountain over against it, named Thymus, on which it was said that Daphnis was crucified for reviling the kings in two verses, which he preserves. He also mentions the oracle, but, of course, as playing upon the word ἄρραξ instead of ἄρρας (xiv. p. 647). The distich preserved by Strabo is also included in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. iii. p. 330; Jacobs, i. p. 39.)

DAPHNAEA and DAPHNAEUS (Δαφναία and Δαφναίος), surnames of Artemis and Apollo respectively, derived from Δάφνη, a laurel, which was sacred to Apollo. In the case of Artemis it is uncertain why she bore that surname, and it was perhaps merely an allusion to her statue being made of laurel-wood (Paus. iii. 24. § 6; Strab. vi. p. 795; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. i. 16; Justin. xvi. 4.)

DAPHNAEUS (Δαφναίος), a Syracusan, one of the leaders of the popular party in that city after the death of Diocles. He was appointed to command the troops sent by the Syracusans, together with their Sillian and Italian allies, to the relief of Agrigentum, when it was besieged by the Carthaginians, c. 406. He at first defeated the force despatched by Himilco to oppose his advance, but was unable to avert the fall of Agrigentum, and consequently shared in the unpopular cause by that event, and was deposed, together with the other generals, on the motion of Dionysius. As soon as the latter had established himself in the supreme command, he summoned an assembly of the people, and procured the election of Daphnæus together with his late colleague, Demarchus.
According to Aristotle, the great wealth of Daphnis had made him an object of jealousy with the lower populace. (Diod. xiii. 86, 87, 92, 96; Arist. Pol. v. 5.)

DAPNIS (Δάφνης), a fair maiden who is mixed up with various traditions about Apollo. According to Pausanias (x. § 8) she was an Ores and an ancient priestess of the Delphic oracle to which she had been appointed by Ge. Diodorus (iv. 68) describes her as the daughter of Tereus, who is better known by the name of Manto. She was made prisoner in the war of the Epigoni and given as a present to Apollo. A third Daphnis is called a daughter of the river-god Ladon in Arcadia by Ge (Paus. viii. 20. § 1; Taetz. ed Lycoph. 6; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. i. 16), or of the river-god Peneus in Thessaly (Ov. Met. i. 452; Hygin. Fab. 203), or lastly of Amyclas. (Parthen. Erot. 15.) She was extremely beautiful and was loved and pursued by Apollo. When on the point of being overtaken by him, she prayed to her mother, Ge, who opened the earth and received her, and in order to console Apollo she prayed to her mother, Ge, who opened the earth and received her, and in order to console Apollo she created the ever-green laurel-tree (Δάφνης), of the boughs of which Apollo made himself a wreath. Another story relates that Leucippus, the son of Oenomaeus, king of Pisæ, in love with Daphnis and approached her in the disguise of a maiden and thus hunted with her. But Apollo’s jealousy caused his discovery during the bath, and he was killed by the nymphs. (Paus. vii. 20. § 2; Parthen. l. c.) According to Ovid (Met. i. 452, &c.) Daphnis in her flight from Apollo was metamorphosed herself into a laurel tree. (L. S.)

DAPHNIS (Δάφνης), a Sicilian hero, to whom the invention of bucolic poetry is ascribed. He is called a son of Hermes by a nymph (Diod. iv. 84), or merely the beloved of Hermes. (Aelian. V. H. x. 18.) Ovid (Met. iv. 275) calls him an Idaean shepherd; but it does not follow from this, that Ovid connected him with either the Phrygian or the Cretan Ida, since Ida signifies any woody mountain. (Etym. Magn. s. v.) His story runs as follows: The nymph, his mother, exposed him when an infant in a charming valley in a laurel grove, from which he received his name of Daphnis, and for which he is also called the favourite of Apollo. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. x. 26.) He was brought up by nymphs or shepherds, and he himself became a shepherd, avoiding the bustling crowds of men, and tending the sheep and goats of the god. He is represented as a shepherd and flute-player, and thus hunted with the god accordingly kissed him up to heaven, and caused a well to gush forth on the spot where this happened. The well bore the name of Daphnis, and at it the Sicilians offered an annual sacrifice. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. v. 20.) Physylagyrus, on the same passage, states, that Daphnis tried to console himself in his blindness by songs and playing on the flute, but that he did not live long after; and the Scholiast on Theocritus (viii. 93) relates, that Daphnis, while wandering about in his blindness, fell from a steep rock. (E. H. B.)

DAPHNIS, a Greek orator, of whom a fragment in a Latin version is preserved in Rustici Lupus (de Fig. Sent. 13), and whose name Pithoeus wrongly altered into Daphniodus. No particulars are known about him. (Ruhnken, ad Rutil. Leg. p. 52, and Hist. Crit. Orat. Groce. p. 93.) (L. S.)

DAPHNIS, an architect of Miletus, who, in conjunction with Paeonius, built a temple to Apollo at Miletus, of the Ionic order. (Vitr. v. 20; Paus. viii. 20. § 2.)

DAPHNOPATES, THEODORUS (Θεόθοδος Δαφνοπάτης), an ecclesiastical writer, who lived about the middle of the tenth century after Christ. He is called a patrician and sometimes magister, and was invested with the office of præses a secresis at the court of Constantinople. He seems to have written an H. (Bong. of Symmachian.) (Jean. Scylitzes, Proef.; Cedren. Hist. p. 2), but no distinct traces of it are left. Of his many theological writings two only are printed, viz. 1. An oration upon the transfer of the hand of John the Baptist from Antioch to Constantinople, which took place in A. p. 556. The year after, when the anniversary of this event was celebrated, Theodorus delivered his oration upon it. A Latin translation of it is printed in the Acta Sanctorum under the 29th of August. The Greek original, of which MSS. are extant in several libraries, has not yet been published. 2. Apaistismata, that is, extracts from various works of St. Chrysostom, in thirty-three chapters. They are printed in the editions of the works of St. Chrysostom, vol. vii. p. 660, ed. Savilius, and vol. vi. p. 65, ed. Ducaeus. (Doxography. Bibl. Græca. x. p. 356, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii. p. 316, ed. London, 1698.)

DAPHNIS (Δάφνης), a physician of Ephesus, who is introduced by Athenaeus in his Deipnosophistae (i. p. 1) as a contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ. (W. A. G.)

DAPYX (Δαπύξ), the chief of a tribe of the Getae. When Crassus was in Thrace, c. 29, Roles, another chief of the Getae, was at war with Dapyx, and called in the assistance of Crassus. Dapyx was defeated, and obliged to take refuge in a stronghold, where he was besieged. A Greek, who was in the place, betrayed it to Crassus, and as soon as the Getae perceived the treachery, they killed one another, that they might not fall into the hands of the Romans. Dapyx too ended his life by his own hand. (Dion. Cass. li. 26.) (L. S.)

vi. 15, 167, 170, vii. 207, 210.) There are four other mythical personages of the name of Dardanus. When Cyrus undertook his expedition against the Massagetae, Darius, who was then about twenty years old, was left in Persia, of which country his father Hystaspes was satrap. The night after the passage of the Araxes, Cyrus dreamed that he saw Darius with wings on his shoulders, the one of which overshadowed Asia and the other Europe.

DARDANUS or DARIUS (Δαρδανός, Δαρειός), the fourth in descent from Assaeliphas, the son of Sostratus I., and the father of Crisamis I., who lived probably in the eleventh century B. C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii. Hist. 165, in Fabric. Bibl. Græce, vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

Dardanus is Arcadia, Crete, Troas, or Italy. (Serv. ad Virg. Aen. iii. 167.) Dardanus is the mythical ancestor of the Trojans, and through them of the Romans. It is necessary to distinguish between the earlier Greek legends and the later ones which we meet with in the poetry of Italy. According to the former, he was married to Chryse, the daughter of Palus, in Arcadia, who bore him two sons, Idaeus and Deimas. These sons ruled for a time over the kingdom of Atlas in Arcadia, but then they separated on account of a great flood, and the calamities resulting from it. Deimas remained in Arcadia, while Idaeus emigrated with his father, Dardanus. They first arrived in Samothrace, which was henceforth called Dardania, and after having established a colony there, they went to Phrygia. Here Dardanus received a tract of land from king Teucerus, on which he built the town of Dardanus. At his marriage with Chryse, she had brought him as a dowry the palladium and sacra of the great gods, whose worship she had learned, and which worship Dardanus introduced into Samothrace, though without making the people acquainted with the names of the gods. Servius (ad Aen. viii. 283) states, that he also instituted the Suli in Samothrace. When he went to Phrygia he took the images of the gods with him; and when, after forming the plan of founding a town, he consulted the oracle, he was told, among other things, that the town should remain invincible as long as the sacred dowry of his wife should be preserved in the country under the protection of Athena. After the death of Dardanus those palladium (others mention only one palladium) were carried to Troy by his descendants. When Chryse died, Dardanus married Bateia, the daughter of Teucerus, or Arise of Crete, by whom he became the father of Erichthonius and Idaca. (Horn. Hist. vol. ii. Append, ii.)

The matter is fully discussed in Grotefend's Beiträge zu Heren's Ideen (Asiatic Researches, vol. ii. Append. ii.)

1. Darius I., the eldest son of Hystaspes (Gustasp), was one of the seven Persian chiefs who destroyed the usurper Sardes, after whose death Darius obtained the throne. He was a member of the royal family of the Achaemenidae (Herod. i. 209), in a branch collateral to that of Cyrus.

The meaning of the genealogy given by Xerxes (Herod. vii. 11) seems to be this:

Achaemenes.

Teisspès.

Cambyses.

Ariamnæus.

Cyrus.

Araxes.

Hystaspes.

Cambyses.

Smerdis.

Atossa — Darius.

Xerxes.

When Cyrus undertook his expedition against the Massagetae, Darius, who was then about twenty years old, was left in Persia, of which country his father Hystaspes was satrap. The night after the passage of the Araxes, Cyrus dreamed that he saw Darius with wings on his shoulders, the one of which overshadowed Asia and the other Europe.
Infering that Dareius had formed a conspiracy against him, Cyrus sent back Hystaspes into Persia to watch his son. (Herod. i. 260, 210.) Dareius attended Cambyses to Egypt as one of his body-guard. (Herod. iii. 139; Sylv. On.) After the detection of the imposture of the Magian, Dareius went to Susa just at the time when the conspiracy against the usurper was formed, and he was associated with the six other conspirators, who, by his advice, resolved to act without delay. [Smerdis.]

The discussions among the Persian chiefs, which ensued upon the death of the Magian, ended in favour of the monarchical form of government, which was advocated by Dareius. His elevation to the kingdom by a sign, which had been agreed on by the conspirators, and which Dareius, with the aid of his groom Oebares, contrived to obtain for himself, n. c. 521. This account, instead of being a fiction, is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Persian religion. (Heeren's Asiatic Researches, ii. p. 350; comp. Tac. Germ. 10.)

The usurpation of Smerdis seems to have been an attempt on the part of the Medes to regain their supremacy. The conspirators against him were noble Persians, and in all probability the chiefs of Persian tribes. Their discussion about the form of government to be adopted is evidently related by Herodotus according to Greek rather than Oriental notions. The proposition to share the supreme power among themselves seems to be what Herodotus means by an aristocracy, and this scheme may be traced in the privileges for which the conspirators afterwards stipulated with Dareius, but it is very difficult to conceive in what sense a democracy could have been proposed. At all events, the accession of Dareius confirmed both the supremacy of the Persians, and the monarchical form of government. The other conspirators stipulated for free admission to the king at all times, with one exception, and for the selection of his wives from their families. A dispute soon arose respecting the exercise of the former privilege between the royal servants and Intaphernes, one of the seven; and Dareius, thinking, from the conduct of Intaphernes, that a conspiracy had been formed against himself, put him to death with all his male relations except two. (Herod. iii. 118, 119.) He henceforth enjoyed undisputed possession of his throne; but we find the seven employed in distant governments and expeditions. It was in the reign of Dareius that the consolidation of the Persian empire was effected, so far at least as it ever was; for in truth it never possessed a sure principle of cohesion. Cyrus and Cambyses had been engaged in continual wars, and their conquests had added to the Persian empire the whole of Asia (up to India and Scythia), except Ambia. (Herod. iii. 86.) After strengthening himself by alliances with the royal house, from which he took three wives, namely, the two daughters of Cyrus, Atossa and Artystone, and Parany, the daughter of Cyrus's son Smerdis, and with the chief of the seven, Otanes, whose daughter Phaenime he married, and after erecting a monument to celebrate his acquisition of the kingdom, he began to set in order the affairs of his vast empire, which he divided into twenty satrapies, assigning to each its amount of tribute. Persia proper was exempted from all taxes, except those which it had formerly been used to pay. From the attention which he paid to his revenues, and from his love of money, Dareius was called by the Persians kaptys. (iii. 89, 117.) A detailed account of his satrapies and revenues is given by Herodotus. (iii. 90, &c.) His ordinary residence was at Susa, which he greatly improved. (Aslian, N. A. ii. 59; Plin. H. N. vi. 27, s. 31.)

The seven months of the reign of Smerdis had produced much confusion throughout the whole empire. His remission of all taxes for three years, if it be true, must have caused Dareius some trouble in reimposing them. It cannot be doubted that the governors of the provinces would seize the opportunity to assume as much of independence. We have an example in the conduct of Oroetes, the governor of Sardis, who, in addition to his cruel and treacherous murder of Polycrates and other acts of tyranny, put to death a noble Persian, Mitrotales, the governor of Dascylium in Bithynia, with his son, and killed a royal messenger whom Dareius sent to rebuke him. Dareius was prevented from marching against Oroetes in person, on account of his recent accession to the throne and the power of the offender; but one of his couriers, named Bagaeus, effected the death of Oroetes by gaining over his body-guard of 1000 Persians. In consequence of this event the Greek physician Democtes fell into the hands of Dareius, and cured him of a sprained ankle, and was established at his court—a most important event in the history of the world, for Democtes used his influence with Atossa to persuade Dareius to attack Greece. [Democtes.] Dareius sent him, with fifteen noble Persians, to examine the coasts of Greece, of which they made a sort of map. Democtes escaped from his companions, who, after a great variety of adventures, got back safe to Dareius. (Herod. iii. 135—138.)

The great struggle between the despotism of Asia and the freedom of Europe was now beginning. The successful rulers of Western Asia had long desired to extend their dominion across the Aegean into Greece; but both Croesus and Cyrus had been prevented from making the attempt, the former by the growth of the Persian power, the latter by his wars in Central Asia. Dareius, who already, as seen in the dreem of Cyrus, overshadowed Asia with one wing, now began to spread the other over Europe. He attacked Samos under the pretext of restoring Sylv. On., but his further designs in that quarter were interrupted by the revolt of the Babylonians, who had profited by the period of confusion which followed the death of Cambyses to make every preparation for rebellion. After a siege of twenty months, Babylon was taken by a stratagem of Zopyrzes, and was severely punished for its revolt, probably about B. c. 516.

The reduction of Babylon was soon followed by Dareius's invasion of Scythia (about B. c. 513, or 508 according to Wesseling and Clinton). The cause of this expedition is very obscure. Herodotus (iv. 1. 83) attributes it to the desire of Dareius to take vengeance on the Scythians for their invasion of Media in the time of Cyaxares—for too remote a cause, though very probably used as a pretext. Cic. says, that on the occasion of a predatory incursion into Scythia by the satrap of Cappadocia, the Scythian king had sent a letter of defiance to Dareius, and that this provoked him to the war. The only rational motives which can now be assigned are the desire of curbing tribes which had been, and might be again, dangerous to the empire, especially during the projected invasion of Greece; and perhaps too of laying open the way to Greece by the conquest of Thrace. The details of the expedition also are difficult to trace. Dareius crossed the Thracian Bosporus by a bridge of the expedition also are difficult to trace. Daretii by the conquest of Thrace. The details of Greece; and perhaps too of laying open the way which had been, and might be again, dangerous to now he assigned are the desire of curbing tribes

Dareius. The king was now in full retreat, his army, which marched to the invasion of Scythia. These operations were succeeded by a period of profound peace (about B.C. 505—501). The events which interrupted it, though insignificant in themselves, brought on the struggle in which the Athenians first, and then the other Greeks, repulsed the whole power of Persia. These events belong to the history of Greece, and to the biographies of other men. [Aristagoras; Histiaeus; Hippias; Mardonius; Miltiades; Artaphernes, &c.; Thirwall's Hist. of Greece, ii. c. 14.] It is a debated question whether Dareius was accidentally involved in his war with Greece by the course of events, or whether he simply took advantage of the opportunity to carry out a long cherished design. Herodotus took the latter view, which seems to be borne out fully by the invasion of Scythia, the reduction of Thrace, and some minor circumstances. The period of peace which preceded the war was, no doubt, simply a matter of necessity, after the wars of the early part of the reign, and especially after the Scythian disaster. Even Thirwall, who takes the other view (p. 191), attributes elsewhere an aggressive policy to Dareius (p. 199). So great, however, was the triumph of the Persians, that the free states of Greece, that the force sent to subdue them was quite inconsiderable when compared with the army which marched to the invasion of Scythia. The battle of Marathon convinced him of his error, but still left him the idea that Greece must be easily crushed by a greater armament. He therefore called out the whole force of his empire; but, after three years of preparation, his attention was called off by the rebellion of Egypt, and the dispute between his sons for the succession [Ariaramnes; Xerxes]; and the decision of this dispute was very soon followed by his death, n. c. 485, after a reign of 36 years, according to Herodotus (comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 319), or 31, according to Justin, v. 3.6.

There are two other events in the reign of Dareius which deserve notice: namely, the expedition against Libya, at the time of the Scythian expedition (Herod. iv. 145—205), and the voyage of Scylax of Caryanda down the Indus, which led to the discovery and subjugation of certain Indian tribes, whose position is uncertain (iv. 41). Diodorus (i. 53, 58, 55) mentions some particulars of his relations to Egypt, from which it appears that he devoted much attention to public works and legislative reforms in that as well as in the other parts of his empire.

The children of Dareius were, by the daughter of Gobryas, whom he had married before he came to the throne, Artabazanes and two others; by Atossa, Xerxes, Hystaspes, Achmenes, and Matises; by Artystone, Araxes and Gobryas; by Parmys, Arrianodras; and by Phrintagma, the daughter of his brother Artanes, Abrocome and Hyperanthe. Diodorus mentions a daughter, Mandane. The inscriptions at Persepolis in which his name appears are fully described by Grotefend (Bilhier) and Höch. (Vet. Med. et Pers. Monum.) Höch shews that the sepulchre which Dareius caused to be constructed for himself is one of those in the hill called Rechamed. (Herod. iii. 70—160, iv. —vi., vil. 1—4; Ctes. Pers. 14—10, ed. Lio. —Diod. ii. 5, x. 17, xi. 2, 57, 74; Justin. i. 10, ii. 3, 5, 9, 10, viii. 3. For his relations to the Jews, see Ezra. iv. 5, v. 1; Hagg. i. 1; ii. 9; Zeux. 1, 14, and the xii. 1.)

2. Darius II., was named Ochus (Aches) before his accession, and was then surnamed Notius (Nidos), from his being one of the seventeen bastard sons of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, who made him satrap of Hyrcania, and gave him in marriage his sister Parysatis, the daughter of Xerxes I. When Sogdianus, another bastard son of Artaxerxes, had murdered the king, Xerxes II., he called Ochus to his court. Ochus promised to go, but delayed till he had collected a large army, and then he declared war against Sogdianus. Arbus, the commander of the royal cavalry, Araxes, the satrap of Egypt, and Artaxerxes, the satrap of Armenia, deserted to him, and placed the diadem upon his head, according to Ctesias, against his will, n. c. 424—423. Sogdianus gave himself up to Ochus, and was put to death. Ochus now assumed the name of Dareius. He was completely under the power of three eunuchs, Artaxeres, Artaxares, and Athoüs, and of his wife, Pary-satis, by whom, before his accession, he had two children, a daughter Amistris, and a son Arsaces, who succeeded him by the name of Artaxeres (II.
Mnemon). After his accession, Parysatis bore him a son, Cyrus (Cyrus the Younger), and a doughter, Artixta. He had other children, all of whom died early, except his fourth son, Oxendras.
(See, 48, ed. Lion.) Plistarch, quoting Ctesias for his authority, calls the four sons of Dareius and Parysatis, Arsila (afterwards Artaxeres), Cyrous, Ostanes, and Oxendres. (Artuc. 1.)

The weakness of Dareius's government was soon shown by repeated insurrections. First his brother Arses revolted, with Artaphus, the son of Megabyzus. Their Greek mercenaries, in whom their strength consisted, were bought off by the royal general Artasyras, and they themselves were taken prisoners by treachery, and, at the instigation of Parysatis, they were put to death by fire.

The rebellion of Pisuthnes had precisely a similar result. (n. c. 414.) [Tissaphernes.] A plot of Artaxeres, the chief eunuch, was crushed in the bud; but a more formidable and lasting danger soon showed itself in the rebellion of Egypt under Amyrtaeus, who, in n. c. 414 expelled the Persians from Egypt, and reigned there six years, and at whose death (n. c. 408) Dareius was obliged to recognise his son Pausing as his successor; for at the same time the Medes revolted: they were, however, soon subdued. Dareius died in the year 406—404 n. c., and was succeeded by his eldest son Artaxeres II. The length of his reign is differently stated: it was really 19 years. Respecting his relations to Greece, see Cyrus, Ly-
ander, Tissaphernes. (Ctes. Pers. 44—56; Lidy.
xii. 71, xiii. 36 , 70, 108; Xen. Hell. i. 2.
§ 19, il. 1 § 8, anab. i. 1 § 11; Nehem. xii. 22.)

3. Dareius III., named Codomannus before his accession, was the son of Arsatnes, the son of Ostanes, a brother of Artaxeres II. His mother Sisygambis was the daughter of Artaxeres.
In a war against the Cnudius he killed a powerful warrior in single combat, and was rewarded by the king, Artaxeres Ochus, with the satrapy of Armenia. He was raised to the throne by Bagors, after the murder of Arses (n. c. 336), in which same accused him of a share; but this acccussion is inconsistent with the universal testimony borne to the mildness and excellence of his character, by which he was as much distinguished as by his personal beauty. He rid himself of Bagors, whom he punished for all his crimes by compelling him to drink poison. Codomannus had not, however, the qualities nor the power to oppose the impetusous career of the Macedonian king. [Alexander 111.] The Persian empire ended with his death, in n. c. 330. (Diod. xvii. 5, &c.; Justin, x. 3, and the writers of the history of Alexander.) [P. S.]

Dareius (Axeos), the eldest son of Xerxes I., was put to death by his brother Artaxeres, to whom Artabanzus and Spaminaxes accused him of the murder of Xerxes, which they had themselves committed. (n. c. 465.) The story is told, with some important variations, by the following writers. (Ctes. Pers. 29, ed. Lion; Diod. xi. 69; Justin, iii. 1.) [P. S.]

Dareius (Axeos), the eldest son of Artax-eres II. Mnemon, was designated as succes—towards the close of his life, in order to settle a dispute respecting the succession which had arisen between Dareius and his younger brother Ochus. Dareius was then fifty years old. It was customary on such occasions for the king to make his successor-elect a present of anything he chose to ask. Dareius asked for Aspasia, a favorite comrade of his father's.

Artaxeres left the matter to the lady's choice, and she preferred Dareius, at which the king was so enraged, that he broke the solemn promise, and devoted Aspasia to the service of Artemis. The resentment of Dareius against his father, and his jealousy of his brother were inflamed by Tiribasis, who had received a somewhat similar injury from Artaxeres; and the prince formed a conspiracy, with several of his bastard brothers, against his father's life, which was detected, and Dareius was put to death. (Plut. Artax. 26—29; Justin, x.
1, 2.) [P. S.]
the differences and discrepancies in the statements of the two works are so great, that they alone are sufficient to overthrow the hypothesis. Dederich, the last editor, is inclined to think that the author of our work was a real Roman of the 5th, 6th, or 7th century. The work itself is evidently the production of a person of little education and of bad taste: it seems to consist of a number of extracts made from several writers, and put together without any judgment; there is scarcely anything in the work that is striking or novel. But notwithstanding all this, the work was very popular in the 15th and 16th centuries, like everything else referring to the war of Troy. Hence several editions and translations were made of it. It was then and is still usually printed together with the work of Dictys Cretensis. The first edition appeared at Cologne, in 1470; the first in which care was bestowed upon the text, is that of J. Mercerus, (Paris, 1618, and Amsterdam, 1631, 12mo.) The subsequent editions give the text of Mercerus, such as those of Anne Dncicr (Paris, 1680, and Amsterdam, 1702, 4to.), U. Oehrcbt (Strassb. 1691, 8vo.), and others. The best and most recent edition is that of A. Dederich (Bonn, 1837, 8vo.), who has appended it to his edition of Dictys, and promised an interesting dissertation upon Dares and the work bearing his name. [L.S.]

DA'SIUS. 1. Of Brundusium, was commander of the garrison at Clastidium in a. c. 218, and being bribed by Hannibal, he surrendered the place to him, whereby the Carthaginians, who were encamped on the Trubia, obtained plentiful stores of provisions. (Liv. xxx. 43.)

2. Of Salapia. He and Blattius were the leading men at Salapia, and he favoured Hannibal, while Blattius advocated the interests of Rome, at least as much as he could do in secret. But as Blattius could effect nothing without Dasius, he at length endeavoured to persuade him to espouse the part of the Romans. But Dasius, unwilling to support his rival, informed Hannibal of the schemes of Blattius. Both were then summoned by Hannibal. Blattius, when he appeared before the Carthaginian general, accused Dasius of treachery; and Hannibal, who had not much confidence in either of them, dismissed them both.

However, Blattius carried out his design, and Salapia with its Punic garrison was surrendered to the Romans. Dasius was killed in the massacre which ensued. This happened in a. c. 210. (Liv. xxxvi. 38; Appian, Annib. 45, &c.) [L. S.]

DA'SIUS, ALTIMNIUS, of Arpi. When P. Sempronius and Q. Fabius, in a. c. 213, had taken up their positions in Lucania and Apulia against Hannibal, Dasius went at night time into the camp of Fabius, and offered to deliver up Arpi into his hands, if the consul would give him an appropriate reward. Fabius consulted with his other officers, and, as Dasius had on a former occasion betrayed the Romans, as he now proposed to betray Hannibal, it was resolved that for the present he should be kept in custody till the end of the war. In the meantime, his absence had created considerable uneasiness at Arpi, and a report of his treachery reached Hannibal, who is said to have availed himself of the opportunity to confiscate the property of the traitor, and also to order his mother and her children to be buried alive. (Liv. xxiv. 45.) [L. S.]

DATAMES (Dartames), a Carian by birth, the son of Cumissares by a Scythian mother. His father being satrap of Cilicia under Artaxerxes II. (Mmnon), and high in the favour of that monarch, Datames became one of the king's bodyguard; and having in this capacity distinguished himself in the war against the Cadusi, was appointed to succeed his father (who had fallen in that war) in the government of his province. Here he distinguished himself both by his military abilities and his zeal in the service of the king; and reduced to subjection two satraps who had revolted from Artaxerxes, Thyus, governor of Paphalagonia, and Aspis of Catasauria. He was in consequence entrusted by the Persian king with the chief command of a large force for the recovery of Egypt; but the machinations of his enemies at the Persian court, and the risks to which he was in consequence exposed, induced him to change his plan, and throw off his allegiance to the king. He withdrew with the troops under his command into Cappadocia, and made common cause with the other satraps who had revolted from Persia. Artabazus, one of the generals that remained faithful to the king, advanced against him from Pidissia, but was entirely defeated. The great reputation that Datames had acquired induced Artaxerxes to direct his utmost exertions to effect his subjection, but Autophradates, who was sent against him with a large army, was obliged to retreat with heavy loss. Datames, however, though constantly victorious against open force, ultimately fell a victim to treachery, and, after evading numerous plots that had been formed against his life, was assassinated at a conference by Mithridates, the son of Ariobarzanes, who had gained his confidence by assuming the appearance of hostility to the king. (Corn. Nep. Datames; Diod. xv. 91; Polyben. vii. 21, 29, § 1.)

Datames appears to have obtained the highest reputation in his day for courage and ability in war, which caused his fame to extend even among the Greeks, though he did not come into personal collision with them. Cornelius Nepos (to whose biographical sketch we owe the only connected narrative of his life) calls him the bravest and most able of all barbarian generals, except Hamilcar and Hannibal; but there is much confusion in the accounts transmitted to us, and it is difficult to assign the anecdotes of him recorded by Polyænus to their proper place in his history. The chronology of the events related by Nepos is also very obscure; but according to that author and Diodorus it would appear that Datames must have died before Artaxerxes, probably a. c. 362. Clinton is, however, of opinion that a much longer interval elapsed between his revolt and his death (Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 423, not.) [E. H. B.]

DATAPHERNES (Dataphernes), a Persian in the confidence of Darius, and one of those who betrayed him to Alexander, a. c. 329. He joined Spitamenes, satrap of Sogdiana, in his revolt, and, when their cause became desperate, took refuge among the Dukhe, who, on learning the death of Spitamenes, delivered him up in chains to Alcæus, Alexander's general. (Arr. Anab. iii. 29, 30, iv. 1, &c.; Diod. xvii. 83; Curt. vii. 5, 6, &c., viii. 3; Freinsch. ad loc.) [E. E.]

DATIS (Datis), a Mede, who, together with Artaphernes, had the command of the forces which were sent by Dareius Hystaspis against Erebria and Athens, and which were finally defeated at DAURISES.

Marathon in n. c. 490. (Herod. vi. 94, &c.) [Artaphernes, No. 2.] When the armament was on its way to Greece through the Aegan sea, the Delians fled in alarm from their island to Tenes; but Datis re-assured them, professing that his own feelings, as well as the commands of the king, would lead him to spare and respect the birthplace of "the two gods." The obvious explanation of this conduct, as arising from a notion of the correspondence of Apollo and Artemis with the sun and moon, is rejected by Muller in favour of a far less probable hypothesis. (Herod. vi. 97; Muller, Dox. ii. 3. § 6, § 10; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. ii. p. 231; Spanheim, ad Callim. Irm. in Del. 255.) The religious reverence of Datis is further illustrated by the anecdote of his restoring the statue of Apollo which some Phocelicians in his army had stolen from Delium in Boeotia. (Herod. vi. 118; Paus. x. 28; Suid. s. v. Δάστης.) His two sons, Armanithres and Tithaes, commanded the cavalry of Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. (Herod. vii. 88. He admired the Greek language, and tried hard to speak it; failing in which, he thereby at any rate unwittingly enriched it with a new word—Δαστύριος. (Suid. l. c.; Arist. Pol. 289; Schol. ad loc.) [E. E.]

DATIS (Δάτης) is mentioned by the Ravenna Scholast on Aristophanes (Iun. 80) as one of the four sons of Carcinus the elder [see p. 612], though other authorities speak only of three. That there were four is also distinctly stated by the so-called Pherecrates. (Ap. Schol. ad Arist. Vesp. 1502.) By the Scholast on the Peace (289), Datis is again mentioned as a triarch poet, and the Scholast on the Wasp (1502) tells us that only one, viz. Xenocles, was a poet, while the other three were chorals dancers. From these considerations, Meineke has conjectured with much probability that Datis was only a nickname for Xenocles, expressive of imputed barbarism of style, Δαστύριος. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Cons. Graec. p. 513, &c., where in p. 515, Phileocles occurs twice erroneously for Xenocles.) [E. E.]

DAUNUS (Δαύνος or Δαύνος). 1. A son of Lycaon in Arcadia, and brother of Iapyx and Peucetius. These three brothers, in conjunction with Illyrians and Messapians, landed on the eastern coast of Italy, expelled the Latines d'Arid. Paris, 1819, pp. 196, 197.)

[DECABALUS or DECABALUS. 915]

DECEBALUS (Δέκαβαλος), was probably a title of honour among the Decians equivalent to chief or king, since we find that it was borne by more than one of their rulers (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrr. c. 10), and that the individual best known to history as the Decabalus of Dion Cassius is named Diurausenus by Orosius, and Dorphanes by Jornandes. [A. S.]

This personage was for a long series of years, under Domitian and Trajan, one of the most enterprising and formidable among the enemies of Rome. Having displayed great courage in the field and extraordinary ability in every department of the military art, he was raised to the throne by the reigning sovereign, during of a far less probable hypothesis. (Herod. vi. 97; Muller, Dox. ii. 3. § 6, § 10; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. ii. p. 231; Spanheim, ad Callim. Irm. in Del. 255.) the troops he could collect to Illyria, and, rejecting the pacific though insulting overtures of Decebalus, committed the chief command to Cornelius Fuscus at that time prefect of the praetorian, an officer whose knowledge of war was derived from studies prosecuted within the halls of a marble palace amid the luxuries of a licentious court. The imperial general having passed the frontier on a bridge of boats at the head of a numerous army, perished after a most disastrous campaign, and the legions were compelled to retreat with the loss of many prisoners, an eagle, and the whole of their baggage and artillery. This failure again called forth Domitian from the city, but although he repaired to Moscela for the ostensible purpose of assuming the direction of affairs, he carefully abstained from exposing his person to the dangers of a military life, and moving from town to town, abandoned himself to his foul appetites, while his officers sustained fresh dishonour and defeat. Occasional glimpses of success, however, appear from time to time to have checked the victorious career of the barbarians, and especial mention is made of the exploits of a certain Julianus, who, in an engagement near Tapae, destroyed great numbers of the foe, and threatened even the royal residence, while Vexins, who held the second place in the Dacian kingdom, escaped with difficulty by casting himself among the slain, and feigning death until the danger was past. At length Domitian, harassed by an unprofitable and protracted struggle, and alarmed by the losses sustained in his contest with the Quadi and Marcomanni, was constrained to solicit a peace which he had more than once refused to grant. Decebalus despatched his brother, Dicgis or Dcgis by comanni, was constrained to solicit a peace which Jiulinnus, who, in an engagement near Tapae, defeated Dacians, whom he defeated near Tapae, the scene of their former misfortune, after an obstinate struggle, in which both parties sustained severe losses, which had been ingeniously concealed beneath the bed of the river Sargetin, (now the Istrig, a tributary of the Marochs,) which flowed beneath the walls of his mansion, were discovered and added to the spoil.

MAGR. DECENTIUS, the brother or cousin of Magnentius, by whom, after the death of Constans, he was created Caesar, A.D. 351, and raised to the consulsiphip the following year. During the war in Gaul against the Alemanni, Decentius was defeated by Chnodomarius, the leader of the barbarians, and upon this, or some previous occasion, the Treviri, rising in rebellion, closed their gates and refused to admit him into their city. Upon receiving intelligence of the death of Magnentius, to whose aid he was hastening, and finding that foes surrounded him on every side so as to leave him no hope of escape, he strangled himself at Sens on the 18th of August, A.D. 355. The medals which assign to this prince the title of Augustus are deemed spurious by the best authorities. His name appears upon genuine coins under the form MAG. OR MAG. DECENTIUS, leaving it doubtful whether we ought to interpret the contraction by Magnus or Magnentius.

Decentius is called the brother of Magnentius by Victor, de Civis. 42, by Eutropius, x. 7, and by Zonaras, xiii. 8, 9; the kinsman (consanguinem, — γένεα καυσανγινήν) by Victor, Epit. 42, and by Zosimus, ii. 45, 54. See also Amm. Marc. xxv. 6, § 4, xvi. 12; § 5; Fast. Idat. [W. R.] that occur in this gens are Mitr and Subulo: for those who are mentioned without a surname see Decius.

DECIUS, APPULEIUS. 1. C. APPULEIUS DECIMUS was tribune of the people in B.C. 90. In that year he brought a charge against L. Valerius Flaccus, the nature of which is unknown. He also brought an accusation against L. Furius, one of the tribunes of the year previous, who opposed the recall of Metellus Numidicus. It seems one of the tribunes of the year previous, who was tribune of the people in B.C. 90.

2. C. APPULEIUS DECIMUS, a son of No. 1, lived as negotiator in Asia Minor, at Pergama, and at Apollonia. He was repeatedly charged with having committed acts of injustice and violence towards the inhabitants of Apollonia, for he appears to have been a person of a very avaricious and insolent character, and in the end he was condemned by the praetor Flaccus, the son of the L. Valerius Flaccus, who had been accused by Decianus, the father. In B.C. 59, Decianus took vengeance upon Flaccus by supporting the charge against L. Aemilius Paullus, for having committed acts of injustice and violence towards the inhabitants of Apollonia, for he appears to have been a person of a very avaricious and insolent character, and in the end he was condemned by the praetor Flaccus, the son of the L. 3. M. DECIMUS, was sent with Tib. Claudius Nero as ambassador to Crete and Rhodes in B.C. 172, just before the outbreak of the war with Perseus, for the purpose of discovering whether they had been remonstrated by Perseus, and of trying to renew their friendship with Rome. (Liv. xiii. 19.)

4. L. DECIMUS, was sent in B.C. 171 as ambassador to the Illyrian king Genthius, to try to win him over to the side of the Romans during the war against Perseus. But he returned to Rome without having effected anything, and was suspected of having accepted bribes from the king. (Liv. xlii. 37, 45.)

5. C. DECIMUS, a person who had held the office of quaestor (quaestorius), and belonged to the party of Pompey. In B.C. 47 he was in the island of Cernea to take care of the provisions for the Pompeians, but on the arrival of Sallust, the historian, who was then a general of Caesar, Decimus immediately quitted the island, and fled in a small vessel. (Caes. Bell. Afr. 34.) He seems to be the same as the C. Decimus who was a friend of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16.) (L. S.)

DECIIUS. 1. M. DECIUS, one of the deputies sent to the senate by the plebeians during their secession to the sacred mount in B.C. 495. (Dionys. vi. 88.)

2. M. DECIUS, tribune of the people in B.C. 311, when he carried a plebiscitum, that the people should appoint duumviri novales to restore and equip the Roman fleet. (Liv. ix. 30.)

3. P. DECIUS, one of the legates who in B.C. 168 brought to Rome the news of the defeat of the Illyrians, and of the capture of their king Genthius. (Liv. xiv. 29.)

4. P. DECIUS, according to Cicero (de Orat. ii. 31) and Aurelius Victor (de Flor. Ill. 72), whereas Livy (Epit. 61) calls him Q. Decius, was tribune of the people in B.C. 150. L. Opimius, who had been consul the year before, was brought to trial by the tribune Decius for having caused the murder of C. Gracchus, and for having thrown citizens 3 p 2

DECIMUS, both by his noble descent and his wealth. In B.C. 217 he joined the Roman army against Hannibal with 8000 foot and 500 horse, at the command of the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus. With these forces Decimus appeared in the rear of Hannibal, and thus decided a battle which was taking a very unfavourable turn for Mnmicius, the magister equitum. Two castella were taken on that day, and 6000 Carthaginians were slain, but the Romans too lost 5000 men. (Liv. xxii. 24.)

2. C. DECIMUS, was sent in B.C. 171 as ambassador to Crete to request the Cretans to send auxiliaries for the war against Perseus of Macedonia. In 169 he was praetor peregrinus, and in the year following he was sent with two others as ambassador to Antiochus and Ptolemy, to bring about a reconciliation between the two kings, and to declare that, whichever of them should continue hostilities, should cease to be treated as the friend and ally of Rome. On that occasion Decimus and his colleagues visited the island of Rhodes at the request of the Rhodians themselves, and on his return to Rome his report was in favour of the Rhodians, in as much as he endeavoured to throw the guilt of their hostility towards Rome upon some individuals only, while he tried to exculpate the body of the people. (Liv. xiii. 35, xilii. 11, 15, xiv. 19, xiv. 16.)

3. M. DECIMUS, was sent with Tib. Claudius Nero as ambassador to Crete and Rhodes in B.C. 172, just before the outbreak of the war with Perseus, for the purpose of discovering whether they had been remonstrated by Perseus, and of trying to renew their friendship with Rome. (Liv. xiii. 19.)

into prison without a judicial verdict. The enemies of Decius asserted that he had been induced by bribes to bring forward this accusation. Four years later, B. C. 115, Decius was praetor urbanus, and in that year he gave great offence to M. Aemilius Scaurus, who was then consul, by keeping his seat when the consul passed by him. The haughty Scaurus turned round and ordered him to rise, but when Decius refused, Scaurus tore his gown and broke the chair of Decius to pieces; at the same time he commanded that no one should receive justice at the hands of the refractory praetor. It is not improbable that the hostile feeling between the two men may have arisen from the fact that Scaurus had induced Optimus to take up arms against G. Gracchus, to whose party Decius evidently belonged. Cicero speaks of Decius as an orator who emulated M. Fulvius Flaccus, the friend of G. Gracchus, and remarks that he was as turbulent in his speeches as he was in life. It is probably this Decius who is alluded to in a fragment of the poet Lucullus, which is preserved by Cicero. (De Orat. ii. 62, comp. ii. 30, 31, Brut. 28, Patr. orat. 30.)

5. P. DECIUS, a colleague of M. Antony in the septemvirates. Cicero says of him, with a fine irony, that he endeavoured to follow the example of his great ancestors (the Decii), by sacrificing himself to his debts, that is, by joining Antony, through whose influence he hoped to get rid of his debts. He accompanied Antony in the war of Mutina, but was taken prisoner there. Afterwards, however, when Octavian wished for a reconciliation with Antony, he allowed Decius to return to his friend. (Cic. Phil. xi. 6, xiii. 13; Appian, B. C. iii. 80.)

6. DECIUS, is mentioned by Appian (B. C. iv. 27) among those who were proscribed after the formation of the triumvirate of Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus. Decius and Cilo, on hearing that their names were on the list, took to flight, but as they were hurrying out of one of the gates of Rome, they were recognized by the centurions and put to death. [L. S.]

DECIUS JUBELLIIUS, a Campanian, and commander of the Campanian legion which the Romans stationed at Rhegium in B. C. 281 for the protection of the place. Decius and his troops, envious of the happiness which the inhabitants of Rhegium enjoyed, and remembering the impunity with which the Mamertines had carried out their disgraceful scheme, formed a most dibinical plot. During the celebration of a festival, while all the citizens were feasting in public, Decius and his soldiers attacked them; the men were massacred and driven into exile, while the soldiers took the women to themselves. Decius put himself at the head of the city, acted as tyrannus perfectly independent of Rome, and formed connexions with the Mamertines in Sicily. He at first had endeavoured to palliate his crime by asserting that the Rhégincs were of natic of Rhegium, a fact which few persons knew, and he now took the opportunity to avenge on Decius the wrongs he had inflicted upon Rhegium. He gave him something which he was to apply to his eyes, and which, however painful it might be, he was to continue till the physician should return from Messana. The order was obeyed, but the pain became at last quite unendurable, and Decius in the end found that he was quite blind. After the death of Pyrrhus, in B. C. 271, Fabricius was sent out against Rhegium; he besieged the place, and took it. All the survivors of the Campanian legion that fell into his hands, upwards of three hundred men, were sent to Rome, where they were scourged and beheaded in the forum. The citizens of Rhegium who were yet alive were despatched to their native place and put an end to himself in his prison at Rome. (Appian, Samn. Excerpt. ix. 1—3; Dio. Rom. iv. 36; Liv. Epit. 12, 15; Polyb. i. 7; Val. Max. vii. 7 § 15.)

DECIUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 249—251, whose full name was C. MESSIUS QUINTUS TRAJANUS DECIUS, was born about the close of the second century at Babala, a village in Lower Pannonia, being the first of a long series of monarchs who traced their origin to an Illyrian stock. We are altogether unacquainted with his early career, but he appears to have been entrusted with an important military command by Cicero. in the army of Moesia, which had been disorganised by the revolt of Marinus. [PHILIPPOS; MARINUS.] Decius accepted this appointment with great reluctance, and many misgivings as to the result. On his appearance, the troops deplying their guilt beyond forgiveness, offered the envoy the choice of death or of the throne. With the sword pointed to his heart he accepted the latter alternative, was proclaimed Augustus, and forced by the rebels to march upon Italy, having previously, according to Zonaras, written to assure his sovereign that his faith was still unbroken, and that he would resign the purple, as soon as he could escape from the thrall of the legions. Philippos, not trusting these professions, hastened to meet his rival in the field, encountered him in the vicinity of Verona, was defeated, and slain. This event took place towards the end of A. D. 249.

The short reign of the new prince, extending to about thirty months, was chiefly occupied in warring against the Goths, who now, for the first time, appeared as a formidable foe on the northeastern frontier, and having crossed the Danube, under Constantine their chief, were ravaging the Thracian provinces. The details of their invasion are to be found in Jornandes, Zosimus, and the fragments of Dexippus, but these accounts appear so contradictory, that it is impossible, in the absence of an impartial historian, to explain or reconcile their statements. It would seem that the barbarians, in the first instance, repulsed Decius near Philippopolis, and were thus enabled to take that important city, but having lost their best troops during these operations, and finding themselves surrounded by the Romans who were now advancing from different points, they offered to purchase an un molested retreat by the surrender of their prisoners and plunder. These overtures being rejected, the Goths turned to bay, and gave battles near Abregium late in the year a.d. 251.

After a deadly struggle, their desperate valour, aided by the resolute confidence of the Romans, prevailed. The son of the emperor was slain by an arrow, while Decius himself, with his best troops, became entangled in a marsh, and were
.cut to pieces or engulfed.

Some proceedings in the civil administration of this epoch, which at first sight would be considered as wholly without connexion with each other, but which were in reality intended to promote the accomplishment of the same object, deserve special attention. The increasing weakness of the state was every day becoming more painfully apparent, and the universal corruption of public morality was justly regarded as a deep-seated canker which must be eradicated, before any powerful effort could be made for restoring healthful vigour to the body politic. Two remedies suggested themselves, and were immediately called into action. It was determined to revive the censorship and to persecute the Christians. It was hoped that, by the first, order and decency might be revived in the habits of social life; it was imagined that, by the second, the national religion might be restored to its ancient purity, and that Rome might regain the favour of her gods.

The death of Decius prevented the new censor, Valerian, the same who afterwards became emperor, from exerting an authority which could scarcely have produced any beneficial change; but the eager hate of Pagan zealots was more prompt in taking advantage of the imperial edict, and made much havoc in the church. Rome, Antioch, and Jerusalem, lamented the martyrdom of their persecutors, and after the danger was past, was restored to liberty by the aid of twenty-four elephants. (Spartian, Had. 19, 19, 20; Jornandes, R. G. c. 16, &c. For the family of Decius, see HENRICI ETRUSCULI, HENRICI ETRUSCI, HOSTELLANDI.] [W. R.]

DECIUS, a Roman statuary, by whom there was an admired colossal head in the Capitol. He perhaps lived in the first century B.C. but his date is very doubtful. [CHARES.] [P. S.]

DECRIANUS, a sibyl of Patrae, who is mentioned with great praise by Lucian. (Asin. 2.)

Nothing more is known of him. [P. S.]

DECRIANUS, an architect and mechanician in the time of Hadrian, who employed him to move the colossal of Nero, which stood in front of the golden house. The work was effected by the aid of twenty-four elephants. (Spartian, Iul. 19, where different critics read Decranius, Detranius, Dentriunufts, Dextriinus, and Demetrius.) [P. S.]

DECRIUS, commanded a stronghold in Africa
during the insurrection of Tacfarinas in a. p. 20.
He was a brave and skilful soldier, and led his men out to an open battle, as he did not like the incivility of a besieged. He had only a few soldiers, and they were not of the best kind; but although he was seriously wounded, he continued to fight like a lion, until he fell. (Tac. Ann. ii. 20.) [L. S.]

DECIADES (Δεκαίδες), is mentioned by Per-thenius (Iuv. 13) as an author from whom he relates the story about Harpyllus. We may thus infer that he wrote on mythical subjects. [L. S.]

DECTION (Δεκτίων), a Greek grammarian, who wrote a commentary on Lycephon's Cassandra, which is referred to in the Etymologicon Magna (c. v. ημαια; comp. Valen. loc. Eupr.
Hippolyt. p. 291.) [L. S.]

DECUOA, D. TULLIUS, was consul in b. c.
81, with Cornelius Dolabella, during the dictatorship of Sulla; but the consuls of that year were only nominal, as Sulla had all the power in his hands. (Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 14; Gallius, xv. 28; Appian, B. G. c. 1. 100.) [L. S.]

DEIANEIRA (Διανεία), 1. A daughter of Althaia by Oenous, Dionysus, or Dian'manus.
(Apollod. i. 8. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 31, 33), and a sister of Meleager. When Meleager died, his sisters lamented his death at his grave; Artemis in her anger touched them with her staff, and changed them into birds, with the exception of Deianeira and Gorge, who were allowed, by the solicitation of Dian'manus, to retain their human forms. (Athenion, Lib. 2.) Subsequently Achelous and Hercules, who both loved Deianeira, fought for the possession of her. She became the wife of Hercules, and afterwards unwittingly caused his death, whereupon she hung herself. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 5, 6, § 7; Diod. iv. 34, &c.; comp. ACHELOUS; HERACLES; DIA'NAMANUS.)

2. One of the daughters of Nereus and Doris.
(Apollod. i. 2. § 7.) [L. S.]

DEICON (Δεικῶν), 1. A son of Hercules by Megara, was killed by his own father during his ravings. (Apollod. i. 7. § 6; Schol. ad Hom.
Od. ix. 268.)
DEIMACHUS (Δειμαχος). 1. The last and at the same time the least important among the ten Attic orators, was born at Corinth about B.C. 361. (Dionys. Deinarch. 4.) His father's name was Sostratus, or, according to Suidas (s. v. Δειμαχος), Socrates. Though a native of Corinth, he lived at Athens from his early youth. Public oratory there reached its height about this time, and Deinarchus devoted himself to the study of it with great zeal under the guidance of Theophratus, though he also profited much by his intercourse with Demetrius Phalerus. (Dionys. l. c. 2; Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 850; Phot. Bibl. p. 496, ed. Bekker; Suidas, l. c.) As he was a foreigner, and did not possess the Athenian franchise, he was not allowed to come forward himself as an orator on the great questions which then divided public opinion at Athens, and he was therefore obliged to content himself with writing orations for others. He appears to have commenced this career in his twenty-sixth year, about B.C. 336, and as about that time the great Attic orators died one after another, Deinarchus soon acquired considerable reputation and great wealth. He belonged to the friends of Phocion and the Macedonian party, and took a very active part in the disputes as to whether Harpalus, who had openly deserted the cause of Alexander the Great, should be tolerated at Athens or not. The time of his greatest activity is from B.C. 317 to B.C. 307; during which time Demetrius Phalerus conducted the administration of Athens. But when in B.C. 307 Demetrius Phalerus advanced against Athens, and Demetrius Phalerus was obliged to take to flight, Deinarchus, who was suspected on account of his equivocal political conduct, and who was anxious to save his riches, fled to Chalcis in Euboea. It was not till fifteen years after, B.C. 292, that, owing to the exertions of his friend Theophratus, he obtained permission to return to Athens, where he spent the last years of his life, and died at an advanced age. The last event of his life of which we have any record, is a law-suit which he instituted against his faithless friend, Proxenus, who had robbed him of his property. But in what manner the suit ended, is unknown. The principal source of information respecting the life of Deinarchus is the treatise of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, from which is derived the part of what is preserved in Plutarch (Vit. X Orat. p. 850), Photius (Bibl. p. 496, ed. Bekker), Suidas (l. c.), and others.

The number of orations which Deinarchus wrote is uncertain, for Demetrius of Magnesia (ap. Dionys. l. c. 1; comp. Suidas and Eudoc, p. 130) ascribed to him one hundred and sixty, while Plutarch and Photus speak only of sixty-four genuine orations; and Dionysius is of opinion, that among the eighty-seven which were ascribed to him in his time, only sixty were genuine productions of Deinarchus. Of all these orations three only have come down to us entire, and all three refer to the question about Harpalus. One is directed against Phileas, the father of Harpalus; a second against Athis, the third against Aristogeiton. It is, however, not improbable that the speech against Theoricas, which is usually printed among those of Demosthenes, is likewise a work of Deinarchus. (See pp. 1333 and 1336 of that oration; Dionys. Hal. l. c. 10; Liban. Argum.; Harpocrat. s. v. Ὁροστασίος, and Θεοκριτος; Apostol. Procr. xix. 49.) titles and fragments of the orations which are lost, are collected as far as can be by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ii. p. 864, &c.), and more complete by Westermann. (Gesch. der griech. Beredtsamk. p. 311, &c.) The ancients, such as Dionysius who gives an accurate account of the oratory of Deinarchus, especially Herogenes (de Form. Orat. ii. 11), speak in terms of high praise of his orations; but there were others also who thought less favourably of him; some grammarians would not even allow him a place in the canon of the ten Attic orators (Bibl. Celcin, p. 597), and Dionysius mentions that he was unable to come up to his great model in any point, and was therefore nicknamed Ἀνακριτής or Ἀγαθοκλῆς. Even Herogenes, his greatest admirer, does not deny that his style had a certain roughness, whence his orations were thought to resemble those of Aristogeiton. Although it cannot be denied that Deinarchus is the best among the many imitators of Demosthenes, he is far inferior to him in power and energy, in the choice of his expressions, in invention, clearness, and the arrangement of his subjects.

The orations of Deinarchus are contained in the various collections of the Attic orators by Aldus (1513), Stephanus (1575), Gruter (1619), Reiske, Ducis, Bekker, and Baiter and Sauppe. The best separate edition is that of C. E. A. Schmidt (Leipzig, 1826, 8vo.), with a selection of the notes of his predecessors, and some of his own. There is also a useful commentary on Deinarchus by C. Wurm, "Commentarius in Dinarchi Orationes tres," Norimberga, 1823, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. ii. p. 862, &c.; Westermann, Gesch. der griech. Beredtsamk. § 73.)

2. Of Corinth, a contemporary of the orator, with whom he has frequently been confounded. He was likewise a friend of Phocius, and when the latter was dragged to Athens for execution, Deinarchus too was put to death by the command of Polyporochlon. (Plut. Phoc. 33.) As this person is not mentioned elsewhere, the name Deinarchus in Plutarch may be a mistake.

3. There were three authors of the name of Deinarchus, concerning whom we know little beyond what is stated by Demetrius of Magnesia (Dionys. Deinarch. 1), viz. that one was a poet of Deles, who lived previous to the time of the orator, and wrote poems on Bacchic subjects (comp. Eusob. Chron. cccxx.; Cyril. c. Julia. x. p. 341); the second, a Cretan, made a collection of Cretan legends; and the third a work on Homer. Whether any of these is the same as the one who, according to Nemesius (de Natur. Hom. 4), taught, with Aristoxenus, that the human soul was nothing but a harmony, is uncertain. [L. S.] statesman were, according to Polibius, of the most superficial character. In political foresight, for instance, he was utterly deficient. (Polyb. xxiv. 5, 12; Liv. xix. 49; Plut. Thesp. 16—20; Hom. 20.)

DEINO'CRATES (Δεινόκρατης), a most distinguished Macedonian architect in the time of Alexander the Great. He was the architect of the new temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which was built after the destruction of the former temple by Herostratus. [CHRYSIPHON.] He was employed by Alexander, whom he accompanied into Egypt, in the building of Alexandria. Deincrates laid out the ground and erected several of the principal buildings. Besides the works which he actually erected, he formed a design for cutting mount Athos into a statue of Alexander, to whom he presented his plan upon his accession to the throne; but the king forbade the execution of the project. The right hand of the figure was to have held a city, and in the left there would have been a basin, in which the water of all the mountain streams was to pour, and thence into the sea. Another curious work which he did not live to finish, is mentioned under ARSINOE [pp. 366, 367]: this fixes the time of the architect's death. The so-called monument of Hophoneas by Deincrates was only a funeral pile (ἐπαρ, Diod, xvii. 116), though a very magnificent one. It formed a pyramid, rising in successive terraces, all adorned with great magnificence. (Plin. v. 10, s. 11, vii. 37, s. 38, xiv. 14, s. 42; Vitruv. i. 1, § 4, ii. pren.; Strab. xiv. pp. 640, 641; Val. Max. i. 4, ext. 1; Amm. Marcell. xii. 16; Solin. 35, 43; Plut. Alex. 72, de Alex. Florid. ii. § 2; Lucian, pro Ino; I. de cons. sacr. II. 13; Tzet. Hist. vii. 160, xii. 367.) There is immense confusion among these writers about the architect's name. Pliny calls him Dinochares, or, according to some of the MSS., Tymochares or Timocretes; Strabo has Ἀξιοπόρος; Plutarch, Στράτοπος; and, among other variations, Eustathius (ad Hom. II. § 229) calls him Diocles of Rhigium. [P. S.]

DEINO'LOCHUS (Δεινόλοχος), a comic poet of Syracuse or Agrigentum, was, according to some, the son, according to others, the disciple, of Ephichmus. He lived about B. C. 480, and wrote fourteen plays in the Doric dialect, about which we only know, from a few titles, that some of them were upon mythological subjects. (Suid. s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Græcia ii. p. 436; Ovian, de Durania, Can. i. p. 81.)

DEINO'MACHA (Δεινόμαχη), daughter of Megacles, the head of the Alemaconidae, grand-daughter of Cleisthenes, and mother of Alcibiades. (Plut. Alc. 1; Athen. v. p. 219, c; Adv. V. H. ii. 1; see also Alcibiades, p. 99, a, and the passages there referred to.) [E. E.]

DEINO'MACHUS (Δεινόμαχος), a philosopher, who agreed with Calliphan in considering the chief good to consist in the union of virtue with bodily pleasure, which Cicero calls a joining of the man with the beast. The doctrine is thus further explained by Clement of Alexandria.—Pleasure and virtue are both of them ends to man; but pleasure is so from the first, while virtue only becomes so after experience. (Cic. de Fin. vi. 8, de Off. iii. 33, Tusc. Quaest. v. 30; Clem. Alex. Strom. ii. 21.) The Deincrates, whom Lucian introduced in the Philostrades, is of course a different person, and possibly a fictitious character. [E. E.]

DEINO'MENES (Δεινόμην), 1. Father of Gelon, Hiero, and Thrasylalus, successively tyrants of Syracuse. (Herod. vii. 145; Pind. Thes. i. 194, 294.)

2. One of the guards of Hieronymus, king of Syracuse, in the plot against whose life he joined. When Hieronymus had marched into Leontini, and had arrived opposite the house where the murderers were posted, Deinomenes, who was close behind him, stopped under pretence of extracting his foot from a knot which confined it, and thus checked the advance of the multitude, and separated the king from his guards. The assassins then rushed on Hieronymus and slew him. (n. c. 215.) His attendants turned their weapons against Deinomenes, but he escaped with a few wounds, and was soon after elected by the Syracusans one of their generals. (Liv. xxiv. 7, 25.) [E. B.]

DEINO'MENES (Δεινόμην), a statesman, whose statues of Io, the daughter of Inachus, and Callisto, the daughter of Lycoos, are said in the Acropolis of Athens in the time of Pausanias. (Paus. i. 25, § 1.) Pliny (xxxv. 8, s. 19) mentions them among the artists who flourished in the 26th Olympiad, n. c. 400, and adds, that he made statues of Protesilaus and Pythodorus the wrestler. [Tht. § 15.] Tatian mentions a statue by him of Besantius, queen of the Paeonians. (Orat. ad Graec. 53, p. 116, ed. Worth.) His name appears on a base, the statue belonging to which is lost. (Böckh, Corp. Inscript. i. No. 470.)

DEION (Δείων), one of the chief men of Rhodes, who, when the war broke out between Perseus and the Romans (n. c. 171), vainly endeavoured to induce his countrymen to pay no regard to the letter which C. Lucretius had sent to ask for ships, and which Deion pretended was a forgery of their enemy Eumenes, king of Pergamus, designed to involve them in a ruinous war. But, though he failed on this occasion, he still kept up a strong opposition to the Roman party. In n. c. 167, after the defeat of Perseus, the Rhodians delivered him up to the Romans by way of propitiating them. Polibius calls him a bold and covetous adventurer, and censures him for what he considers an unmanly clinging to life after the ruin of his fortunes. (Polyb. xxvii. 6, 11, xxviii. 2, xxix. 5, xxx. 6, 40; Liv. xxxiv. 33, 28, xiv. 22.) [E. E.]

DEION (Δείων) was a statesman, who flourished in the time of Alexander's expedition. He wrote a history of Persia, to which C. Nepos (Con. 5) refers as the most trustworthy authority on the subject. He had, however, a large fund of credibility, if we may trust Pliny. (H. N. x. 43.) He is quoted also in the following passages:—Plut. Alex. 36, Artax. 1, 6, 9, 10, 13, 19, 22, Them. 27; Athen. ii. 67, b, i. 146, c, xi. p. 503, f., xiii. pp. 536, b, 560, f., 609, a, xiv. pp. 633, d., 652, b; Cic. de Div. i. 23; Adv. H. A. xvi. 10, V. H. iii. 7; Diog. Laërt. i. 6, ix. 50, in which two passages we also find the erroneous reading Διών. [E. E.]

DEIONO'STRATUS (Δειονόστρατος), a geometer. He is stated by Proclus to have been the brother of Menaechmus, and a contemporary and follower of Plato. (Comm. in Eucl. c. iv.) The two brothers, according to Proclus, made the whole of geometry more perfect (τελεσθέρων) than before. Pappus (lib. iv. prop. 25) has handed down the curve which is called the quadratrix of Deinostratus for squaring the circle, which Nicomedes and DEIOCES.

DEIOCES (Δειόκης), the founder of the Median empire, according to Herodotus, who states that, after the Assyrians had held the empire of Upper Asia 520 years, various nations revolted from them, and first of all the Medes. Soon after this, Deioces, the son of Phraortes, a wise man among the Medes, desiring the tyranny, became an arbitrator for his own village; and the fame of his justice attracted to him suitors from all quarters, till at last the Medes chose him for their king. He immediately assumed great royal state, and made the Medes provide him with a bodyguard and build him a fortress. He then built the city of Agbatam (Ecbatana), in the centre of which he resided, hidden from the public view and transacting all business through messengers, in order, says Herodotus, to prevent the plots which his former equals might have been drawn into by jealousy. The few who were admitted to his presence were required to observe the strictest decorum. His administration of justice was very severe, and he kept a body of spies and informers throughout the whole country. After a reign of thirty-five years, during which he ruled the six tribes of the Medes without attempting any foreign conquest, Deioces died, and was succeeded by his son, Phraortes. (Herod. i. 95—102.)

There are considerable difficulties in settling the chronology of the Median empire. Herodotus gives the reigns as follows:

Now, since the accession of Cyrus was in b.c. 560—559, the accession of Deioces would fall in b.c. 710—709, which is confirmed by Diodorus (ii. 32), who says that, "according to Herodotus, Cyaxares [meaning Deioces] was chosen king in the second year of the 17th Olympiad." (Herod. 711—710.) It also agrees with what may be inferred from Scripture, and is expressly stated by Josephus (Ant. x. 2), that the Medes revolted after the destruction of the army of Sennacherib, and the death of that king. (Herod. 711.) Moreover, the Lydian dynasty of the Mermnadae is computed by Herodotus to have lasted 170 years, down to the taking of Sardis in b.c. 546. It therefore began in b.c. 716. Now, it may be inferred, with great probability, from the statements of Herodotus, that the Hermcleidae, who preceded the Mermnadae in Lydia, were Assyrian governors. If so, here is another reason for believing that the great Assyrian empire was broken up in consequence of the destruction of its army under Sennacherib. The small difference by which the last date (b.c. 716) exceeds what it ought to be according to this view, might be expected from the difficulty of fixing these dates within two or three years; and, moreover, the date of the capture of Sardis is disputed, some bringing it as low as b.c. 542.

A difficulty still remains. Herodotus mentions an interregnum; and it seems from his language to have been not a short one, between the revolt of the Medes and the accession of Deioces; and he is supposed to give the sum total of the Median rule as 156 years. With reference to the former point, it may be supposed that the 53 years assigned to Deioces include the interregnum, a supposition extremely probable from the length of the period, especially as the character which Deioces had gained before his accession makes it most unlikely that he was a very young man; and, on the other hand, the Scriptural chronology forbids our carrying up the revolt of the Medes higher than b.c. 712 at the very utmost. As to the supposed period of 156 years, the truth is, that Herodotus says nothing about such a period. He says (i. 130), that the Medes had ruled over Asia above the river Halya 128 years, τῶρθε τὸν ὄγκον τῆς Ἀσίας ἰσημερίαν, which does not mean, that the 28 years of the Median rule are to be added to the 128 years, but that they are to be deducted from it. The question then arises, from what period are the 128 years to be dated? The most probable solution seems to be that of Kalinsky and Clinton, who supposed that the date to which the 128 years would lead us back, namely (559+128=) 687 b.c., was that of the accession of Deioces, and that the 22 years which remain out of the 53 ascribed to him by Herodotus (b.c. 744—687) formed the period of the interregnum.

The account of Ctesias, which is preserved by Diodorus, is altogether different from that of Herodotus. After relating the revolt of Arbaces [Ar-} idea in his tables, when he reckons a long period without kings between Arbaces and Deiotarus. (Compare Sardanapalus, and Clinton, F. H. ii. App. c. 3.)

DEIOCHUS (Διοχός), of Proconnesus, is mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (Ant. de Theogr. 2, 5) as one of the earliest Greek historians, who lived previous to the time of Herodotus. He is probably the same person as the Deiotarus whom Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Διοχός) calls a native of Cyzicus, and who wrote a work on Cyzicus (Ἱστορία Κυζικοῦ), which is frequently referred to by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, who, however, calls him by his proper name only once (on i. 139), and in all the other passages refers to him under the name of Διοχός, or Διοχα. (Schol. ad Apollon. i. 961, 966, 976, 987, 989, 1037, 1062, 1063, 1065, ii. 85, 106.) [L. S.]

DEION (Διών), 1. A son of Aeolus and Enarete, was king in Phocis and husband of Dido, by whom he became the father of Asterope, Actetes, Actor, Phylaceus, and Cephalus. (Apollon. i. 7. § 3, 9. § 4.) After the death of his brother, Salmoneus, he took his daughter Tyro into his house, and gave her in marriage to Crotaeus. His name occurs also in the form Deionus. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1393.)

2. A son of Heracles and Megara, and brother of Deiocon. (Apollon. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

DEIO'NE (Διόνε), that is, the daughter of Deo or Demeter, is used as a name for Persephone. (Callimach. Fragm. 48.) It occurs also as a proper name of the mother of Miletus. (Ov. Met. ix. 442.) [L. S.]

DEIONEUS (Διόνεος), 1. Father of Dion. When he violently extorted from his son-in-law the bridal gifts, Dion invited him to his house, and caused him to be thrown into a pit filled with fire, in which he perished. (Pind. Pyth. ii. 30.)

2. A son of Eurytas of Oechalia, whom Theseus married, and married to Periogaine, the daughter of Sinna. (Plut. These. 8.) [L. S.]

DEIO'PE (Διόπη), a daughter of Triptolemus and mother of Eamopus, or, according to others, of Triptolemus. (Paus. i. 14. § 2; Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1108; Aristot. Mitrab. 143, 291.) [L. S.]

DEIOPEA, a fair Lydian nymph, who belonged to the suite of Hera, and whom she promised as a reward to Aeolus if he would assist her in destroying the fleet of Aeaeus. (Virg. Aen. i. 78.) [L. S.]

DEIOPITHE (Διοπίθη), a son of Priam, who was slain by Odysseus. (Hom. Ill. xi. 429; Apollod. iii. 12. § 8.) [L. S.]

DEIOTARUS (Διοτάρος), 1. Tetrarch of Galatia. He is said to have joined Plutarch to sue to a very old man in b. c. 54, when Crassus, passing through Galatia on his Parthian expedition, mistook him for a new city at his time of life. He must therefore have attained to mature manhood in b. c. 95, the year of the birth of Cato of Utica, whose father's friend he was, and who, we know, was left an orphan at a very early age. (Plut. Crass. 17, Cat. Min. 12, 15; Pseudo-Appian, Parth. p. 136; comp. Cat., p. 647, a.)

Deiotarus adhered firmly to the Romans in their wars in Asia, and in b. c. 74 defeated in Phrygia the general of Mithridates. For his services he was honoured by the senate with the title of king, and, probably in b. c. 55, the year of the death of Mithridates, had Gideonitis and Armenia Minor added to his dominions. Appian, apparently by an oversight, says that Pompey made him tetrarch of Galatia. He succeeded, indeed, doubtless by Roman favour, in encroaching on the rights of the other tetrarchies of that district, and obtaining nearly the whole of it for himself. (Strab. xii. pp. 547, 567; Cassiod. ad loc.; Plut. Pomp. 38; Appian, Bell. Mithr. 114; Cic. pro Deiot. 13, Phil. xi. 12, de Har. Resp. 19; Hist. Alex. 87.) In b. c. 51, when Cicero was encamped at Cyzistra on the borders of Cappadocia and Cilicia against the Parthians, Deiotarus offered to join him with all his forces, and was indeed on his way to do so, when Cicero sent to inform him that events had rendered his assistance unnecessary. (Cic. Phil. xi. 13, ad Fam. viii. 10, xv. 1, 2, 4.) In the civil war, Deiotarus attached himself to the cause of Pompey, together with whom he effected his escape in a ship after the battle of Pharsalia in b. c. 48. (Plut. Pomp. 75; Appian, Bell. Civ. ii. 71; Caes. Bell. Civ. iii. 4; Cic. de Div. ii. 57, pro Deiot. 5, 4; Lucum. Phars. v. 55, viii. 203.) In b. c. 47 he applied to Dominicus Calvisius, Caesar's legal guardian in Asia, for aid against Pharnaces, who had assumed possession of Armenia Minor, and who in the campaign which followed defeated the Roman and Galatian forces near Nicopolis. (Hirt. Bell. Alex. 34—41, 65—77; Appian, Bell. Civ. ii. 91; Plut. Cæs. 50; Dion Cass. xlii. 45—48; Sueton. Jul. 85; Cic. ad Fam. xvi. 15, pro Deiot. 5.) When Cesar, in the same year, came into Asia from Egypt, Deiotarus received him with submission, and endeavoured to excuse the aid he had given to Pompey. According to Hierius (Bell. Alex. 67, 78), Cesar left him his title of king, but gave his tetrarchy to Mithridates of Pergamus. Cicero tells us (de DIE. i. 15, comp. Phil. ii. 37), that he was deprived both of his tetrarchy and kingdom, not however of his regal title (pro Deiot. 19), and fined. Dion Cassius says (xii. 63), that Caesar did indeed bestow on Arinbarzanes, king of Cappadocia, a portion of the kingdom of Deiotarus, but that he gave the latter a part of what he took away from Pharnaces, and so in fact enlarged his territory; but this seems inconsistent with the whole tenour of what we find in Cicero.

In the autumn of the same year, the cause of Deiotarus was unsuccessfully pleaded by Brutus before Caesar at Nicaea in Bithynia. (Cic. Brut. 5, ad Att. xiv. 1.) In b. c. 45, he was defended by Cicero before Caesar, in the house of the latter at Rome, in the speech (pro Rege Deiotaró) still extant. From this it appears that his grandson, Castor, had accused him of a design against Cæsar's person, and that Cicero had appeared on his behalf with the intention of sending troops to the aid of Cæcilius Bassus. [See p. 472.] Strabo, however, speaks of Castor as the son-in-law of Deiotarus, and says that the old king put him to death together with his wife, Deiotarus's own daughter; and Suidas tells us that he did so because Castor had accused him to Cæsar. Vossius conjectures that the Castor mentioned by Cicero was son to the one whom Strabo and Suidas speak of, and that Deiotarus put the latter to death because he had instigated the younger Castor to accuse him. (Strab. xii. p. 568; Suid. s. d. Κατσαρος; Caes. Bell. Civ. iii. 4; Cic. ad Fam. xi. 12; Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 203, ed. Westermann; comp. the language of Cicero, pro Deiot. 10, 11.) At this time Biscainius and Ilianus, emissaries of Deiotarus, were at Rome to look after his interests (Cic. pro Deiot. 14, 15); and they were still there in the following year, n. c. 44, when Hiernus, after the murder of Caesar, appears to have obtained from Antony, through Fulvia, the restitution of his master's dominions for 10,000 sesterces (88, 541 L. 12s. 4d.). Deiotarus, however, had seized by force on the territory in question as (88, 541 L.). Deiotarus, however, before his father's death, he had received some grant of territory was apparently attached. When hereupon Idomeneus challenged him, he slew Ascalaphus, and while he was tearing the flesh from his enemy's head, he was wounded by Menelaus, who grudged him the possession of their father's family. Deiphontes, on the other hand, is also slain by Menelaus. (Strab. xii. 61, 63; Clinton. p. 562; Strab. xii. 567; Cic. Phil. xii. 13.)

DEIPHOBUS (Διήφωβος), a son of Antimachus, and husband of Hyrnost, the daughter of Temenus the Heracleide, by whom he became the father of Antimenes, Xanthippus, Areus, and Orosia. When Temenus, in the division of Peloponnesus, had obtained Argos as his share, he bestowed all his affections upon Hyrnost and her husband, for which he was murdered by his sons, who thought themselves neglected. But after the death of Temenus, the army declared Deiphontes and Hyrnost his rightful successors. (Apollod. ii. 19. § 5.) According to Pausanias (ii. 19. § 1), the sons of Temenus formed indeed a conspiracy against their father and Deiphontes; but after Temenus's death it was not Deiphontes that succeeded him, but Ceisus. (Strab. xii. 562; Clinton. p. 562; Diod. iv. 31.)

2. Son and successor of the above. Already, however, before his father's death, he had received from the Roman senate the title of king, to which some grant of territory was apparently attached. With this Deiotarus, Cicero tells us that his son and his nephew remained, while himself and his brother Quintus were occupied with their campaign in Cilicia, n. c. 51. (Cic. ad Att. v. 17, 13, Phil. xii. 12.) In the war between Antony and Octavius he took part with the former, but went over from him to the enemy in the battle of Actium, n. c. 31. He was succeeded in his kingdom by Amynatas, No. 6. Cicero speaks of him, as well as of his father, in very high terms. (Phil. Ant. 61, 63; comp. Dion Cass. l. 19, ii. 2; Strab. xii. p. 567; Cic. Phil. xii. 13.)

3. Son of the younger Castor, and great-grandson of Deiotarus I. He was the last king of Paphlagonia, and was succeeded by Atreus. (Strab. xii. p. 562; Clinton. F. H. ii. iii. pp. 545, 546.)

DEI'PYLE (Διηπυλη), a daughter of Adrastus and Amphithea. She was the wife of Tydeus, by whom she became the mother of Dionoeas. (Apollo-ed. i. 8, § 5, 9, § 13.) Servius (ad Aen. i. 101)
and Hyginus (Fab. 69) call her Delphine. [L. S.]

DEITYLYUS (Δειτύλος), three mythical beings concerning whom nothing of interest is related.
(Hom. II. v. 325; Hygin. Fab. 15, 109.) [L. S.]

DELIUS and DELIA (Δελία or Δελία or Δελφίς), surnames of Apollo and Artemis respectively, which are derived from the island of Delos, the birthplace of those two divinities. (Virg. Aen.
v. 12, Eclog. vii. 29; Val. Flacc. i. 446; Ophr.
Hyumn. 33. 8.) They are likewise applied, especially in the plural, to other divinities that were worshipped in Delos, viz. Demeter, Aphrodite, and the nympha. (Arystoph. Thesm. 333; Callim.
Hyumn. in Dion. 169, Hyumn. in Del. 323; Hom.
Hyumn. in Apoll. Del. 157.) [L. S.]

Q. DELIUS, a Roman eques, who seems to have lived as a negotiator in Asia, where in u. c. 44 he joined Dolabella. Afterwards he went over to Cassius and then joined M. Antony, who sent him, in n. c. 41, to Egypt to summon Cleopat, to appear before him at Tarsus in Cilicia.
 Cleopat, trusting to the power of her personal charms, obeyed the command and went to Antony.
In n. c. 38, Dellius was engaged on some business in Judaea, and on that occasion he is said to have advised Alexander, the duque of Hycranus and widow of Alexander, to send the portraits of her beautiful children to Antony in order to win the favour of the triumvirs. In the same year he accompanied Antony on his expedition against the Parthians. In n. c. 34, when Antony marched into Armenia, Dellius was sent before him to Artavasdes, to lull him into security by treacherous promises. When the war of Actium broke out, both of Delius and Amyntas were sent by Antony from Galatia to Macedonia to collect auxiliaries;
but before the fatal battle was fought, Delius deserted to Octavian. This step was nothing extraordinary in a man of his kind, who had successively belonged to all the parties of the time;
but he is said to have been led to this last desertion by his fear of Cleopatra, whom he had offended by ridiculing the meanness she displayed at her entertainments. After this we hear no more of him. Delius appears to have been a man of some talent; he did at least some service to the task of investigating the charge brought by the dignities of Rome. Delmatius was entrusted with the town of Delphi was believed to have derived and now appears for the last time among the dignities of Rome. Delmatius was entrusted with the task of investigating the charge brought by the Arians against Athanasius of having murdered Arsenius, bishop of Hyspitis [ATHANASIUS, p.
394], and appears to have died before the year
A. D. 335. (Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. p. 288.) He was the father of

2. FLAVIUS JULIUS DELMATIUS, who was educated at Nahrnun under the care of the rhetorician Exsuperius; distinguished himself by suppressing the rebellion of Calocerus in Cyprus; was appointed consul A. D. 333; two years afterwards was created Caesar by his uncle, whom he is said to have resembled strongly in disposition; upon the division of the empire received Thrace, Macedonia, together with Achaia, as his portion; and was put to death by the soldiers in A. D. 337, sharing the fate of the brothers, nephews, and chief ministers of Constantine.

It must be observed that there is frequently great difficulty in distinguishing Delmatius the father from Delmatius the son. Many historians believe the former to have been the consul of A. D.
333, and the conqueror of Calocerus, the date of whose revolt is very uncertain. A few coins of the younger in gold, silver, and small brass, are to be found in all large collections, and on those his name is conjoined with the title of Caesar and Priscus Augustus, the orthography being for the most part Delmatius, although Delmatius also occasionally appears. (Ausan. Prof. 17; Victor, Epit. 41, de Cons. 41, Excerpt. Valer. § 35; Theophr. Chronograph. p. 282; Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. iv. pp. 251, 259, 361, 313, and his note, p. 664, in which he discusses at length the dates connected with the history of Delmatius and Hannibalians. [W. R.]

DELF'HNIA (Δελφήνια), a surname of Artemis at Athens. (Pollux, x. 119.) The masculine form Delphius is used as a surname of Apollo, and is derived either from his slaying the dragon Delphine or Delphye (usually called Python) who guarded the oracle at Pytho, or from his having shewn the Cretan colonists the way to Delphi, while riding on a dolphin or metamorphosing himself into a dolphin. (Tzetzes ad Lyogph. 208.)
Under this name Apollo had temples at Athens, Croassus in Crete, Didyma, and Massalia. (Paus.
i. 19. § 1; Plut. Theo. 14; Strab. iv. p. 179; Muler, Aegipt. p. 154.)

DELF'HUS (Δελφός). 1. A son of Poseidon and Melanthe, a daughter of Deucalion, from whom the town of Delphi was believed to have derived its name. (Tzetzes ad Lyogph. 208; comp. Ov.
Met. vi. 120.)

2. A son of Apollo by Celaeno, the daughter of Hyamus, and, according to others, by Thyia, the daughter of Castalus, or by Melantra, the daughter of Cephissus. Tradition pointed to him also as DEMADES. (Δαμαδής), an Athenian statesman and orator, a contemporary of Philip, Alexander the Great, and Antipater. He is said to have been a person of very low origin, and to have at one time even served as a rover. (Quintil. ii. 17, § 12; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. ii. 16; Suidas, s. v. Δαμαδής.) But by his extraordinary talents, his demagogic artifices, and treachery, he rose to a very prominent position at Athens; he used his influence, however, in such a manner, that Plutarch (Proc. 1) justly terms him the παρατηρητής, that is, the shipwreck or ruin of his country. He belonged to the Macedonian party, and entertained a deadly hatred of Demosthenes, against whom he came forward as early as the time of the war against Olynthus, B. c. 349 (Suidas, l. c.), and to whom he continued hostile to the last; for when, on the approach of Antipater and Craterus, Demosthenes and his friends quitted the city, Demades induced the people to pronounce sentence of death upon them. (Plut. Demosth. 28; Phot. Bibl. p. 69, ed. Bekker.) In the battle of Chaeronea he fell into the hands of the Macedonians; and when Philip, during the revelries with which he celebrated his victory, reviewed the prisoners, Demades frankly but politely blamed him for his conduct, and Philip was so well pleased with the flattery implied in the censure, that he not only restored Demades to his liberty, but set free all the Athenian prisoners without ransom, and concluded a treaty of friendship with Athens. (Diod. xvi. 67; Gall. xi. 10; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 13.) The manner in which he was treated by the king on that occasion, and the rich presents he received from him—it is said that he once received the large sum of ten talents—made him an active champion in the cause of Macedonia, to whose interests he literally sold himself. He pursued the same course towards Alexander, the son and successor of Philip; and his flattery towards the young king went so far, that the Athenians, unable to bear it, inflicted a heavy fine upon him. (Aelian, F. H. v. 12; Athen. vi. p. 251.) But when Heracles came to Athens, Demades did not scruple to accept his bribes also. (Deinarch. ii. 12; Plut. Demosth. § 99, ed. Aristog. § 15.) When Alexander subsequently demanded the surrender of the Athenian orators who had instigated the people against him, Demades was bribed by the friends of Demosthenes with five talents to use his influence to save him and the other patriots. He accordingly framed a cunning decree, in which the people excused the orators, but promised to surrender them, if they should be found guilty. The decree was passed, and Demades with a few others was sent as ambassador to Alexander, and prevailed upon the king to pardon the Athenians and their orators. (Diod. xvii. 15; Plut. Demosth. 23.) In B. c. 331 Demades had the administration of a part of the public money at Athens, which Böck (Pogg. Z. v. Athen. p. 169, &c., 2nd edit.) has shewn to have been the treasure; and when the people demanded of him a sura of money to support those who had revolted against Alexander, Demades persuaded them to give up that plan by appealing to their love of pleasure. (Plut. Proc. ed. Priscauris, rug. II. 45.) By thus supporting the Macedonian cause, and yet receiving large bribes from the opposite party when opportunities offered, he acquired considerable property, which however was squandered by his extravagant and dissolute mode of living. His conduct was so bad, and he so recklessly violated the laws of his country, that he was frequently punished with heavy fines, and once even with atima. But in B. c. 322, when Antipater marched with his army against Athens, the people, who were alarmed in the highest degree, and had no one to mediate between them and Antipater, recalled their sentence of atima, and sent Demades, with Phocion and some others, as ambassadors to Antipater, who however refused, perhaps on the instigation of Demades, to grant peace on any other terms than complete submission. (Diod. xvii. 18; Paus. vii. 10, § 1.) In B. c. 318, when Antipater was ill in Macedonia, the Athenians, unable to bear the pressure of the Macedonian garrison in Munychia, sent Demades as ambassador to him with a petition to remove the garrison. Antipater was at first inclined to listen to the request; but while Demades was staying with him, Antipater discovered among the papers left by Perdiccas some letters addressed to him by Demades, in which he urged Perdiccas to come to Europe and attack Antipater. The latter at first kept his discovery secret; but when Demades pressed him for an answer respecting the removal of the garrison from Munychia, Antipater, without giving any answer, gave Demades and his son, Deineas, who had accompanied his father on this embassy, to the executioners, who forthwith put them to death. (Diod. xviii. 48; Arrian, Apophth. p. 70; Athen. xiii. p. 591.) Plutarch (Proc. 30) attributes the execution of Demades to Cassander.

Demades was a man without character or principle, and was accessible to bribes from whatever quarter they came, ever ready to betray his country and his own party. Even the good he did sprang from the basest motives. The ancients have preserved many features which illustrate his matchless wit, and his scurvily morality. (Plut. Phil. I. 20, 30, 39, Proc. Res. Phil. Publ. 25; Aelian, F. H. x. 44; Aelian, F. H. xii. 13.) He owed his influence in the public affairs of Athens to his natural skill and his brilliant oratorical powers, which were the pure gift of nature, and which he never cultivated according to the rules of art. He always spoke extempor, and with such irresistible force and abundance of wit, that he was a perfect match for Demosthenes himself, and Quintilian does not hesitate to place him by the side of Pericles. (Cic. Orat. 20, Brut. 9; Plut. Demosth. 8, 10, 11, Apophth. p. 101; Quintil. ii. 17, § 12, xii. 10, § 49.) Both Cicero and Quintilian expressly state, that Demades left no written orations (Deiphr. 2. 3, 4, 5, &c.; Brut. 9, 22, § 4). But from a passage of Lucretius (de deis et 26), it is clear that the rhetorician, from whom he copied, possessed orations which were attributed to Demades. There is extant a large fragment of an oration bearing the name of Demades (πεπληρωτική), which must have been delivered in B. c. 326, and in which he defends his conduct during the period of Alexander's reign. It was found by I. Bekker in no less than six MSS., and is printed in the collections of the Attic orators, but its genuineness is still doubtful. Suidas attributes to Demades also a history of Deos and of the birth of Leto's children, but this work can scarcely have been the production of our Demades, and we know of no other person of this name to whom it can be ascribed. (Ruhrken, Hist. Crit. Orat. Gr. p. 71, &c.; J. G. Hauptmann, Disputatio qua De- nad. et illi tributam. Fragm. orat. consideratur, Gera, 1768, 4to., reprinted in Reiske's Oratores, iv. p. 248, &c.; H. Lhрудy, Dissertation de Demade Oratione Atheniens, Berlin, 1834, 4vo.; Wester- mann, Gesch. d. griech. Beredtsamk. § 54, notes 11 & 12.)

* The name is a contraction of Δαμαδής. (Etym. M. p. 210 13, 265, 12, ed. Syllburg; Priscauris, i. 7.)

DEMAGNE'TUS (Δημαγνήτως), a surname of Asclepius, derived from the name of a temple of his on the Alpheius. (Paus. vi. 21. § 4.) [L. S.]

DEMA'GORAS (Δημαγόρας), of Samos, is mentioned by Dionysius of Halicarnassus (J. R. i. 72), together with Agathyllus, as a writer who agreed with Cephalon respecting the date of the foundation of Rome. But whether Demagoras was a poet like Agathyllus or not is uncertain. He is often mentioned by the grammarians. (Bekker, Anecd. p. 377; Bachmann, Anecd. i. p. 68; Eustath. ad Il. ix. 558; Endec. p. 55; Apostol. Prom. ii. 51; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 7.) [L. S.]

DEMARA'TA, daughter of Hiero, king of Syracuse, was married to Andromedus, the guardian of Hieronymus. After the assassination of the latter, she persuaded her husband to seize on the throne. (Ibid. vi. 64—66.)

The birth of Demaratus had been as follows:—King Ariston had twice married without issue. While his second wife was still alive, either in anxiety for an heir or out of mere passion, he sought and by a curious artifice obtained as his third the wife of his friend Agetus, a woman of remarkable beauty. He enticed the husband into an agreement, that each should give the other whatever he asked; and when Agetus had chosen his gift, Ariston demanded in return that he should give him his wife. A son was born. Ariston was then thrown into the temple with the effect that tidings were brought, and counting the months on his fingers, said in their presence, "It cannot be mine." His doubts, however, appeared no further: he owned the child, and gave it, in allusion to the public prayer that had been made by the Spartans for an heir to his house, the name of Demaratus. (Ibid. vi. 61—64.)

Dimaratus, some time after, was sitting as magistrate at the Gymnopaedia games. Leotychides sent his attendant to ask the insulting question, how it felt to be magistrate after being king. Dimaratus, stung by the taunt, made a hasty and menacing reply; covered up his face, and withdrew home; sacrificed there, and taking the sacred entrails, sought his mother and conjured her to let him know the truth. She replied by an account which assuredly leaves the modern reader as doubtful as before, but gave him perhaps the conviction which she wished, that his father was either Ariston or the hero Astraeus: and, in any case, he seems to have made up his mind to renounce the corrupt interference of Cleomenes, decided for the accuser, who was in consequence raised to the throne. (Ibid. vi. 64—66.)

At the court of Persia he was favourably re- ceived, and is said, by stating the Spartan usage, to have forwarded the claim of Xerxes to the throne to the exclusion of his brothers born before their father's accession: and on the resolution being taken of invading Greece, to have sent, with what intent or feeling Herodotus would not venture to determine, a message, curiously concealed [Cleo- menev], to his countrymen at Sparta, conveying the intelligence. (Ibid. vi. 73.)

Henceforward Demaratus performs in the story of Herodotus with high dramatic effect the part of the unheeded counsellor, who, accompanying the invasion and listened to by Xerxes, saw the weakness of those countless myriads, and ventured to combat the extravagant unthinking confidence of their leader. Thus at Doriscus, after the num- bered of the army; thus at Thermopylae, when he explained that it was for battle the Spartans were trimming their hair; thus, after the pass was worn, when Xexues owned his wisdom, and he is told to have given the sacrificial counsel of occupying Cytherea. And thus finally he, says the story, was with Dicaeus in the plain of Thrin, when they heard the mystic Eleusinian cry, and sang the cloud and sacred must pass, as escorting the assistant deities, to the Grecian fleet. (Ibid. vili.
101—105, 209, 234, 235, viii. 65.)

Leaving the imagination of Heraclotus and his informants responsible for much of this, we may safely believe that Demaratus, like Hippas before, accompanied the expedition in the hope of ven-guage and restoration, and, probably enough, with the mixed feelings ascribed to him. Pausanias (iii. 7. § 7) states, that his family continued when they heard the mystic Eleusinian cry, and story, was with Dicaeus in the plain of Thria, mentions Eurythynes and Procles, his descendants, as lords of Pergamus, Teuthrania, and Halisarnas, the district given to their ancestor by the king as the reward of his service in the expedition. The Cyrenian army from the Temple (v. 113). "To this family also," says Müller (Dor. bk. i. § 8), "belongs Procles, who married the daughter of Aristotle, when the latter was at Atenarces, and had by her two sons, Procles and Demaratus. (Sext. Empir. adv. Mathem.

p. 518, ed. Col.) (See below.) Plutarch's anecdote (Them. c. 29), that he once excited the king's anger by asking leave to ride through Sardis with the royal tiara, and was restored to favour by Themistocles, can only be said not to be in contradiction to the chronology. (Clinton, F. H. ii.
p. 208.)

[A. H. C.]

DEMARATUS (Δημαράτος), a merchant-noble of Corinth, and one of the Bacchiadae. When the power of his clan had been overthrown by Cypselius, about n. c. 657, he fled from Corinth, and settled at Tarquinia in Etruria, where he had mercantile connexions. According to Strabo, he brought with him a large body of retainers and much treasure, and thereby gained such influence, that he was made ruler of Tarquinii. He is said to have also been accompanied by the painter Cleophasius of Corinth, and by Eucheir and Eumammus, masters of the plastic arts, and together with these refinements, to have even introduced the knowledge of alphabetical writing into Etruria.
He married an Etrurian wife, by whom he had two sons, Aruns and Lucumo, afterwards L. Tarquininus Priscus. (Liv. i. 34; Dionys. iii. 46;
Polyb. vi. 2; Strab. v. 218, viii. p. 370; Cic.
Tusc. Quest. v. 37; Tac. Ann. xi. 14; Plin. H. N.
xxv. 3, 12; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. ii. pp. 351, 366; Schol. in the Greek notices pervading the story of the Tarquinii, see Macray's 'Lay of Ancient Rome,' p. 80. [E. E.]

DEMARATUS (Δημαράτος), a Corinthian, connected by hospitality with the family of Philip of Macedon. It was through the mediation of Demaratus that Alexander returned home from Illyria, where he had taken up his abode in consequence of the quarrel between himself and his father at the marriage of the latter with Cleopatra,
c. 337. (Plut. Alex. 9.)

DEMARATUS (Δημαράτος). 1. A son of Pythias, who was Aristotle's daughter by his wife of the same name. He and his brother, Procles, were pupils of Theophrastus. (Diss. Laert. v. 53; Fabric. Bibli. Græcæ ii. pp. 485, 504.) He appears to have been named after Demaratus, king of Sparta, from whom his father, Procles, was de-sended.

2. A Corinthian author of uncertain date, who is quoted by Plutarch. (Alex. 15.) He is perhaps the same whose work called 'γεγογγομένα, ς, on the subjects of Greek tragedy, is referred to by Clement of Alexandria, Stobæus, and the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius. Plutarch also quotes works of Demaratus on rivers, on

3. A Spartan, who is said to have retorted upon the epigram on the subjugation of Greece usually ascribed to Hadrian (Antol. ii. p. 286) by writing under it a line from a speech of Achilles to Patroclus. (H. xvi. 70.) When inquiry was made as to who had "eaped" the imperial epigram, he replied by a parody on Archilochus (Errygam.
ii.):

Ευλ. μὲν εὐθέλους Ἐναυλου πολεμιστής, π. τ. λ. The story seems to rest on the authority of a note in the Vatican MS. This does not, however, give the name of Demaratus, which occurs in the version of the anecdote in the Anthology of Pinnudes.
(See Jacobs, in Antol. i. c.)

DEMARCHUS (Δημαρχός), son of Pidocus, a Syracusan. He was one of the generals sent out to replace Hermocrates and his colleagues in the command of the Syracusan auxiliaries in Greece, when those generals were banished. (Thuc. viii.
85; Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 30.) After his return he appears to have taken a leading part in public affairs, and became one of the most powerful opponents of the rising power of Dionysius. He was in consequence put to death at the instigation of the latter, at the same time with Daphneaus, shortly after Dionysius had been appointed general
autocrat. (Diod. xii. 96.)

DEmaretr (Δημαρέτης), daughter of Tharon, tyrant of Agrigentum, was wife of Gelon, tyrant of Syracuse. She is said by Diodorus to have exerted her influence with Gelon to grant the Carthaginians peace on moderate terms after their great defeat at Himera, b. c. 480. In return for this service they sent her a crown of gold of the value of a hundred talents, with the produce of which, or more probably in commemoration of the event, she caused to be struck for the first time the large silver coins, weighing 10 Attic drachmas or 50 Sicilian litrae, to which the name of Damathus was given in her honour. (Diod. xi. 26;
Schol. in Pind. Ol. ii. 1; Hesych. s. v. Δημαρέτων; Pollux, ix. 80; Annales dell'ist. di Corriep. Achelous.
vol. ii. p. 81.) After the death of Gelon
she married his brother and successor Polyvzelaus.

DEMÉAS (Δημάς), one of the great divinities of the Greeks. The name Demeter is supposed by some to be the same as Ζην γυνή, that is, mother earth, while others consider Deo, which is synonymous with Demeter, as connected with Δαις and Δαινος, and as derived from the Creton word Δαι, barley, so that Demeter would be the mother or giver of barley or of food generally.
(Hom. H. v. 500.) These two etymologies, however, do not suggest any difference in the character of the goddess, but leave it essentially the same. Demeter was the daughter of Cronus and Rhea, and sister of Hestia, Hera, Aides, Poseidon, and Zeus. Like the other children of Cronus she was devoured by her father, but he gave her forth again after taking the emetic which Metis had given him. (Hesiod. Thaug. 452, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 1.) By her brother Zeus, Demeter became the mother of Persephone (Proserpina) and Dionysus (Hesiod. Thaug. 912; Diod. iii. 62), and by Poseidon of Despoina and the horse Arion. (Apollod. iii. 6. § 6; Paus. vii. 57. § 6.) The most prominent part played by Demeter is the love of her rape, and Demeter, and this story not only suggests the main idea embodied in Demeter, but also directs our attention to the principal seats of her worship. Zeus, without the knowledge of Demeter, had promised Persephone to Pluto, and while the unsuspecting maiden was gathering flowers which Zeus had caused to grow in order to tempt her and to favour Pluto's scheme, the earth suddenly opened and she was carried off by Aidos (Pluto). Her cries of anguish were heard only by Hecate and Helios. Her mother, who heard only the echo of her voice, immediately set out in search of her daughter. The spot where Persephone was believed to have been carried into the lower world is different in the different traditions; the common story places it in Sicily, in the neighbourhood of Emn, on mount Aetna, or between the wells Cyanes and Arethusas. (Hygin. Fab. 146, 274; Ov. Met. v. 385, Fast. iv. 422; Diod. v. 3; Cie in Varr. iv. 48.) This legend, which points to Sicily, though undoubtedly very ancient (Pind. Nem. i. 17), is certainly not the original tradition, since the worship of Demeter was introduced into Sicily by colonists from Megara and Corinth. Other traditions place the rape of Persephone at Erimenus on the Cephalis, in the neighbourhood of Elnais (Orph. Hymn. 17. 15), at Colonus in Attica (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1590), in an island of the Adriatic, named Echna (Hymn. in Ech. 1190), at Hermione in Peloponnesus (Orph. Argon. 1190), at Hermione in Pelopolaeus (Apollod. i. 5. § 1; Strab. viii. p. 372), in Crete (Schol. ad Hesiod. Thaug. 914), or in the neighbourhood of Pisa. (Paus. vi. 21. § 1.) Others again place the event at Pheneus in Arcadia (Conon, Narr. 15), or at Cyzicus (Propert. iii. 21. 4), while the Homeric hymn on Demeter places it in the plain of Nysa in Asia. In the Iliad and Odyssey the rape of Persephone is not expressly mentioned. Demeter wandered about in search of her daughter for nine days, without taking any nectar or ambrosia, and without bathing. On the tenth she met Hecate, who told her that she had heard the cries of Persephone, but did not know who had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios, who revealed to them that Pluto had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios, who revealed to them that Pluto had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios, who revealed to them that Pluto had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios, who revealed to them that Pluto had carried her off. Both then hastened to Helios, who revealed to them that Pluto had carried her off. But in vain. At length Zeus sent out all the gods of Olympus to conciliate her by entreaties and presents; but she vowed not to return to Olympus, nor to restore the fertility of the earth, till she had seen her daughter again. Zeus accordingly sent Hermes into Erebus to fetch back Persephone. Aidos consented, indeed, to Persephone returning, but gave her a part of a pomegranate to eat, in order that she might not always remain with Demeter. Hermes then took her in Pluto's charriot to Elenais to her mother, to whom, after a hearty welcome, she revealed her fate. At Eleusis both were joined by Hecate, who henceforth remained the attendant and companion of Persephone. Zeus now sent Rhea to persuade Demeter to return to Olympus, and also granted that Persephone should spend only a part of the year (i.e. the winter) in subterraneous darkness, and that during the rest of the year she should remain with her mother. (Comp. Ov. Met. v. 585, Fast. iv. 614; Hygin. Fab. 146.) Rhea accordingly descended to the Rharian plain near Eleusis, and conciliated Demeter, who now again allowed the fruits of the fields to grow. But before she parted from Eleusis, she instructed Triptolcmus, Diocles, Eumolpus, and Celeus in the mode of her worship and in the mysteries.

These are the main features of the mythus about Demeter, as it is contained in the Homeric hymn; in later traditions it is variously modified. Respecting her connexions with Jasion or Jasius, Tantalus, Molissus, Cythereus, Eryssichon, Pandareus, and others, see the different articles. Demeter was the goddess of the earth (Eurip. Bacch. 276), and more especially of the earth as producing fruit, and consequently of agriculture, whence human food or bread is called by Homer (II. xiii. 252) the gift of Demeter. The notion of her being the author of the earth's fertility was extended to that of fertility in general, and she accordingly was looked upon also as the goddess of marriage (Serv. ad Juv. iv. 58), and was worshipped especially by women. Her priestess also initiated young married people into the duties of their new situation. (Plut. de Off, conf. 1.) As the goddess of the earth she was like the other θεότητες, a subterraneous divinity, who worked in the regions inaccessible to the rays of Helios. As agriculture is the basis of a well-regulated social condition, Demeter is represented also as the friend of peace and as a law-giving goddess, (Σερβοπόδης, Callim. Hymn. in Ceres 138; Orph. Hymn. 39. 4; Virg. Aen. iv. 58; Hor. H. v. 500; Ov. Met. v. 341; Paus. viii. 15. § 1.) The mythus of Demeter and her daughter embodies the idea, that the productive powers of the earth or nature rest or are concealed during the winter season; the goddess (Demeter and Persephone, also called Corn, here identified) then rules in the depth of the earth mournful, but striving upwards to the all-animating light. Perspephone, who has eaten of the pomegranate, is the fruitified flower that returns in spring, dwells in the region of light during a portion of the year, and nourishes men and animals with her fruits. Later philosophical writers, and perhaps the mysteries also, referred the disappearance and return of Persephone to the burial of the body of man and the immortality of his soul. Demeter was worshipped in Crete, Delos, Argolis, Attica, the western coast of Asia, Sicily, and Italy, and her worship consisted in a great measure in magic mysteries. Among the many festivals celebrated in her honour, the Thesmophoria and Eleusinia were the principal ones. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Chloria, Haloa, Thesmophoria, Eleusinia, Megalartia Chthonia.) The sacrifices offered to her consisted of pigs, the symbol of fertility, bulls, cows, honey-cakes, and fruits. (Macrobi. Sat. i. 12, iii. 11; Dion. v. 4; Paus. iii. 35, § 4, vii. 42, in fin.; Voss. Pr. iv. 545.) Her temples were called Megara, and were often built in groves in the neighbourhood of towns. (Paus. iii. 39, § 4, 40, § 8, vii. 26, § 4, viii. 34, § 5, ix. 23, § 8; Strab. viii. p. 344, ix. p. 435.) Many of her surnames, which are treated of in separate articles, are descriptive of the character of the goddess. She was often represented in works of art, though scarcely one entire statue of her is preserved. Her representations appear to have been brought to ideal perfection by Praxiteles. (Paus. i. 2, § 4.) Her image resembled that of Hera, in its maternal character, but had a softer expression, and her eyes were less widely opened. She was represented sometimes in a sitting attitude, sometimes walking, and sometimes riding in a chariot drawn by horses or dragons, but always in full attire. Around her head she wore a garland of corn-cobs or a simple riband, and in her hand she held a sceptre, corn-cobs or a poppy, sometimes also a torch and the mystic basket. (Paus. iii. 19, § 4, viii. 31, § 1, 42, § 4; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, s. 19.) She appears most frequently on gems and vases.

The Romans received the worship of Demeter, to whom they applied the name of Ceres, from Sicily. (Val. Max. i. 1, § 1.) The first temple of Ceres at Rome was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius Albinus, in B. C. 496, for the purpose of averting a famine with which Rome was threatened during a war with the Latins. (Dionys. vi. 17, comp. i. 33; Tacit. Ann. ii. 49.) In introducing this foreign divinity, the Romans acted in their usual manner; they instituted a festival with games in honour of her (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ceresalia), and gave the management of the sacred rites and ceremonies to a Greek priestess, who was usually taken from Naples or Velia, and received the Roman franchise, in order that the sacrifices on behalf of the Romans might be offered not by a Roman citizen. (Cic. pro Balb. 24; Festus, s. v. Ceres voca.) In all other respects Ceres was looked upon very much in the same light as Tellus, whose nature closely resembled that of Ceres. Pigs were sacrificed to both divinities, in the seasons of sowing and in harvest time, and also at the burial of the dead. It is strange to find that the Romans, in adopting the worship of Demeter from the Greeks, did not at the same time adopt the Greek name Demeter. The name Ceres can scarcely be explained from the Latin language. Servius informs us (ad Aen. ii. 525), that Ceres, Pales, and Fortuna were the surnames of the Etruscans, and it may be that the Romans applied to Demeter the name of Ceres, for this was the name of a divinity of similar nature, whose worship subsequently became extinct, and left no trace except the name Ceres. We remarked above that Demeter and Persophone or Core were identified in the mythus, and it may be that Ceres is only a different form for Core or Core. But however this may be, the worship of Ceres soon acquired considerable political importance at Rome. The property of traitors against the republic was often made over to her temple. (Dionys. vi. 89, viii. 79; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 4, s. 9; Liv. iv. 41.) The decrees of the senate were deposited in her temple for the inspection of the tribunes of the people. (Liv. iii. 55, xxxii. 25.)

If we further consider that the sedes had the special superintendence of this temple, it is very probable that Ceres, whose worship was like the plebeians, introduced at Rome from without, had some peculiar relation to the plebian order. Untersuch., Hamburg, 1837, 8vo; Welcker, Zeitschrift für die alte Kunst, i. 1, p. 96, &c.; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, i. p. 621; Hartung, Die Relig. der Römer, ii. p. 135, &c.) [L. S.]

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος), 1. Son of Althamænes, commander of one of the squadrons of Macedonian cavalry under Alexander. (Arrian, Anat. ii. 11, iv. 27, v. 21.)

2. Son of Pythonax, surnamed Phileon, one of the select band of cavalry, called eratops, in the service of Alexander. (Arrian, Anat. ii. 11, iv. 27.)

3. One of the body-guards of Alexander, was suspected of being engaged in the conspiracy of Philotas, and displaced in consequence. (Arrian, Anat. iii. 27.)

4. A son of Ariarathes V., king of Cappadocia, commanded the forces sent by his father in 154 B.C. to support Attalus in his war against Prusias. (Polyb. xxxiii. 10.)

5. A native of Gndara in Syria, and a freedman of Pompey, who shewed him the greatest favour, and allowed him to accumulate immense riches. After the conquest of Syria, Pompey rebuilt and restored at his request his native town of Gndara, which had been destroyed by the Jews. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 4, § 4, de Bell. Jud. i. 7, § 7.) An anecdote related by Plutarch shews the excessive adulation paid him in the East, on account of his well-known influence with Pompey, Polyb. Post. 40, Cat. Min. 13.) [E. H. B.]

DEMETRIUS (Δημήτριος), king of BACTRIA, son of Euthydemus. Polybius mentions (xi. 34), that when Antiochus the Great invaded the territories of Euthydemus, the latter sent his son Demetrius, then quite a youth, to negotiate with the Syrian king; and that Antiochus was so much pleased with the young man's appearance and manners, that he confirmed Euthydemus in his sovereignty, and promised one of his own daughters in marriage to Demetrius. The other notices we possess of this prince are scanty and confused; but it seems certain (notwithstanding the opinion to the contrary advanced by Bayer, Edit. Regni Graecorum Bactrianæ, p. 99), that Demetrius succeeded his father in the sovereignty of Bactria, where he reigned at least ten years. Strabo particularly mentions him as among those Bactrian kings who made extensive conquests in northern India (Strab. xii. 11, § 1), though the limit of his acquisitions cannot be ascertained. Justin, on the contrary, calls him "rex Indorum" (xii. 6), and speaks of him as making war on and besieging Eucrinitides, 3q king of Bactria. Mionnet (Saggio, vol. viii. p. 478) has suggested that there were two Demetrius, one the son of Euthydemus, the other a king of northern India; but it does not seem necessary to have recourse to this hypothesis. The most probable view of the matter is, that Eucratides revolted from Demetrius, while the latter was engaged in his wars in India, and established his power in Bactria proper, or the provinces north of the Hindoo Kooch, while Demetrius retained the countries south of that barrier. Both princes may thus have ruled contemporaneously for a considerable space of time. (Comp. Wilson's Demetrius, p. 318; Lassen, Gesch. der Bactr. Königre, p. 230; Roual Rochette, Jour. des Savans, for 1835, p. 521.) It is probably to this Demetrius that we are to ascribe the foundation of the city of Demetrias in Amchosia, mentioned by Isidore of Charax (p. 8, ed. Hudson; see Lassen, p. 239). The chronology of his reign, like that of all the Bactrian kings, is extremely uncertain; his ascension is placed by M. R. Rochette in B. C. 190 (Jour. des Savans, Oct. 1835, p. 594), by Lassen in 185 (Gesch. der Bactr. Königre, p. 262), and it seems probable that he reigned about 20 or 25 years. (Wilson's Ariana, p. 231.) [E. H. B.]

DEMETRIUS (Ἀναγκύρατος). L. king of Macedonia, son of Antigonus, or the Besieger, was the son of Antigonus, king of Asia, and Statonice, the daughter of Corbanus. He was distinguished when a young man for his affectionate attachment to his parents, and he and Antigonus continued, throughout the life of the latter, to present a rare example of unanimity. While yet very young, he was married to Phila, the daughter of Antipater and widow of Craterus, a woman of the noblest character, but considerably older than himself, in consequence of which it was not without difficulty that he was persuaded by Antigonus to consent to the match. (Plut. Demetrius, 14.) He accompanied his father in his campaigns against Renneses, and commanded the select body of cavalry called evaxae at the battle in Gobcinus (b. c. 171), at which time he was about twenty years old. (Diod. xi. 29.) The following year he commanded the whole right wing of the army of Antigonus in the second battle of Gabien (Id. xii. 40); and it must be mentioned to his credit, that after the capture of Renneses, he interceded earnestly with his father to spare his life. (Plut. Eun. 18.) Two years afterwards, he was left by Antigonus in the chief command of Syria, while the latter proceeded to carry on the war in Asia Minor. In the spring of B. C. 312, Ptolemy invaded Syria with a large army; and Demetrius, contrary to the advice of the more experienced generals, advanced to meet him at Gaza. But, when he had reoccupied the army to endeavor to wrest Greece from the lately occupied by Seleucus. This he accomplished with little difficulty, but did not complete his work, and without waiting to reduce one of the forts or citadels of Babylon itself, he left a force to continue the siege, and returned to join Antigonus, who almost immediately afterwards concluded peace with the confederates, a. c. 311. (Diod. xix. 96–98, 100; Plut. Demetrius, 7.) This did not last long, and Ptolemy quickly renewed the war, which was however almost confined to maritime operations on the coasts of Cicilia and Cyprus, in which Demetrius, who commanded the fleet of Antigonus, obtained many successes. In B. C. 310, when he was despatched by his father with a powerful fleet and army to endeavor to wrest Greece from the hands of Cassander and Ptolemy, who held all the principal towns in it, notwithstanding that the freedom of the Greek cities had been expressly guaranteed by the treaty of 311. He first directed his course to Athens, where he was received with enthusiasm by the people as their liberator. Demetrius the Phalen, who had in fact governed the city for Cassander during the last ten years, was expelled, and the fort at Mynychia taken. Megara was also reduced, and its liberty proclaimed; after which Demetrius took up his abode for the winter at Athens, where he was received with the most extravagant flatteries: divine honours being paid him under the title of "the Preserver" (σωστήρ), and his name being ranked with those of Dionysius and Demeter among the tutelary deities of Athens. (Plut. Demetrius, 8–13; Diod. xxv. 45, 46.) It was at this time also that he married Eurydice, the widow of Ophellus of Cyrene, but an Athenian by birth, and a descendant of the great Miltiades. (Plut. Demetrius, 14.)

From Athens Demetrius was recalled by his father to take the command of the war in Cyprus against Ptolemy. He invaded that island with a powerful fleet and army, defeated Ptolemy's brother, Menelaus, who held possession of the island, and shut him up in Salamis, which he besieged closely both by sea and land. Ptolemy himself advanced with a numerous fleet to the relief of his brother; but Demetrius was prepared for his approach, and a great sea-fight ensued, in which, after an obstinate contest, Demetrius was entirely victorious: Ptolemy lost 120 ships of war, besides transports; and his naval power, which had hitherto been regarded as invincible, was utterly annihilated. (b. c. 306.) Menelaus immediately afterwards surrendered his army and the whole of Cyprus into the hands of Demetrius. It was after this victory that Antigonus for the first time assumed the title of king, which he bestowed also at the same time upon his son,—an example quickly followed by their rival monarchs. (Diod. xxv. 47–53; Plut. Demetrius, 15–18; Polyen. iv. 7. § 7; Justin, xvi. 2.)

Demetrius now for a time gave himself up to luxury and revelry in Cyprus. Among other prisoners that had fallen into his hands in the late victory was the noted courtesan, Lamia, who, though no longer in the prime of her youth, soon obtained the greatest influence over the young king. (Plut. Demetrius, 16, 19, 27; Athen. iv. p. 128, xiii. p. 577.) From these enjoyments he was, however, soon compelled to rouse himself, in order to take part with Antigonus in his expedition against Egypt; but the fleet which he commanded suffered severely from storms, and, after meeting
DEMETRIUS.

We know nothing of the negotiations which led to the conclusion of a treaty between Demetrius and Ptolemy almost immediately after the alliance between the former and Seleucus, but the effect of these several treaties was the maintenance of peace for a space of near four years. During this interval Cassander was continually gaining ground in Greece, where Demetrius had lost all his possessions; but in b. c. 297 he determined to reassert his supremacy there, and appeared with a fleet on the coast of Attica. His efforts were at first unsuccessful; his fleet was wrecked, and he himself badly wounded in an attempt upon Messene. But the death of Cassander gave a new turn to affairs. Demetrius made himself master of Aegina, Salamis, and other points around Athens, and finally of that city itself, after a long blockade which had reduced the inhabitants to the last extremities of famine. (b. c. 295. Concerning the chronology of these events compare Clinton, P. H. L. ii. p. 179, with Droysen, Gesch. d. Nachfolger, ii. p. 565—569; and Thirlwall's Greece, vii. p. 353.)

The next year (b. c. 292) he was opposed to Cassander in Thessaly, but, though greatly superior in force, effected little beyond the reduction of Phene. This inactivity came at a critical time: Cassander had already concluded a league with Lysimachus, who invaded Asia, while Seleucus advanced from the East to co-operate with him. Antigonus was obliged to summon Demetrius to his support, who concluded a hasty treaty with Cassander, and crossed over into Asia. The following year their combined forces were totally defeated by those of Lysimachus and Seleucus in the great battle of Ipsus, and Antigonus himself slain, b. c. 301. (Plut. Demet. 106—113; Plat. Demet. 28, 29.) Demetrius, to whose impetuousness the loss of the battle would seem to be in great measure owing, fled to Ephesus, and from thence set sail for Athens: but the Athenians, on whose devotion he had confidently reckoned, declined to receive him into their city, though they gave him up his fleet, with which he withdrew to the Isthmus. His fortunes were still by no means hopeless; he was at the head of a powerful fleet, and still master of Cyprus, as well as of Tyre and Sidon; but the jealousies of his enemies soon changed the face of his affairs; and Ptolemy having entered into a closer union with Lysimachus, Seleucus was induced to ask the hand of Statira, daughter of Demetrius by his first wife, Phila. By this alliance Demetrius obtained the possession of Cilicia, which he was allowed to wrest from the hands of Pleistarchus, brother of Cassander; but his refusal to cede the important towns of Tyre and Sidon, disturbed the harmony between him and Seleucus, though it did not at the time lead to an open breach. (Plut. Demet. 30—33.)

been lately reinstated in his kingdom of Epeirus. Pyrrhus was the nearest at hand, and had already defeated Antipater and established Alexander on the throne of Macedonia, when Demetrius, unwilling to lose such an opportunity of aggrandizement, arrived with his army. He was received with apparent friendliness, but mutual jealousies quickly arose. Demetrius was informed that the young king had formed designs against his life, which he anticipated by causing him to be assassinated at a banquet. He was immediately afterwards acknowledged as king by the Macedonian army, and proceeded at their head to take possession of Epeirus, which he had lately reinstated in his kingdom of Epeirus. (Plut. Demetr. 35–37, Pyrh. 6, 7; Justin. xvi. 1; Paus. i. 10, § 1, ix. 7, § 3; Euseb. Arm. p. 155.)

While Demetrius had by this singular revolution possessed himself of a kingdom in Europe, he had lost all his former possessions in Asia: Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy having taken advantage of his absence in Greece to reduce Cilicia, Cyprus, and the cities which he had held on the coasts of Phoenicia and Asia Minor. He, however, concluded a peace with Lysimachus, by which the latter yielded to him the remaining portion of Macedonia, and turned his whole attention to the affairs of Greece. In the Boeotian war he had taken up arms, supported by the Spartans under Cleonymus, but were soon defeated, and Thebes taken after a short siege, but treated with mildness by Demetrius. After his return to Macedonia he took advantage of the absence of Lysimachus and his captivity among the Getae to invade Thrace; but though he met with little opposition there, he was recalled by the news of a fresh insurrection in Boeotia. To this he speedily put an end, repulsed Pyrrhus, who had attempted by invading Thessaly to effect a diversion in favour of the Boeotians, and again took Thebes after a siege protracted for nearly a year. (b c. 290.) He had again the humanity to spare the city, and put to death only thirteen (others say only ten) of the leaders of the revolt. (Plut. Demetr. 99, 49; Diod. xxi. Exc. 10, Exc. Vales. p. 560.) Pyrrhus was now one of the most formidable enemies of Demetrius, and it was against that prince and his allies the Aetolians that he next directed his arms. But while he himself invaded and ravaged Epeirus almost without opposition, Pyrrhus gained a great victory over his lieutenant Pantauchus in Aetolia; and the next year, Demetrius being confined by a severe illness at Pella, Pyrrhus took advantage of the opportunity to over-run a great part of Macedonia, which he, however, lost again as quickly, the moment Demetrius was recovered. (Plut. Demetr. 41, 43, Pyrrh. 7, 10.)

It was about this time that Demetrius concluded an alliance with Agathocles, king of Syracuse, whose daughter Lamassa, the wife of Pyrrhus, had previously surrendered to him the important island of Corcyra. (Plut. Pyrrh. 11; Diod. xxi. Exc. 11.) But it was towards the East that the views of Demetrius were mainly directed: he aimed at nothing less than recovering the whole of his father's dominions in Asia, and now hastened to conclude a peace with Pyrrhus, that he might continue his preparations uninterrupted. These were on a most gigantic scale: if we may believe Pausanias, he had assembled not less than 98,000 foot and near 12,000 horse, as well as a fleet of 500 ships, among which were some of 15 and 16 banks of oars. (Plut. Demetr. 43.) But before he was ready to take the field, his adversaries, alarmed at his preparations, determined to forestall him. In the spring of b.c. 287, Ptolemy sent a powerful fleet against Greece, while Pyrrhus (notwithstanding his recent treaty) on the one side and Lysimachus on the other simultaneously invaded Macedonia. But Demetrius's greatest danger was from the disaffection of his own subjects, whom he had completely alienated by his proud and haughty bearing, and his lavish expenditure on his own luxuries. He first marched against Lysimachus, but alarmed at the growing discontent among his subjects, he suddenly decided to face Pyrrhus, who had advanced as far as Berea. This was a most unfortunate step: Pyrrhus was at this time the hero of the Macedonians, who no sooner met him than they all declared in his favour, and Demetrius was obliged to fly from his camp in disguise, and with difficulty made his escape to Cassandra. (Plut. Demetr. 44, Pyrrh. 11, Justin. xvi. 2.) His affairs now appeared to be hopeless, and even his wife Phila, who had frequently supported and assisted him in his adversities, now poisoned herself in despair. But Demetrius himself was far from desponding; he was still master of Thessaly and some other parts of Greece, though Athens had again shaken off his yoke: he was able to raise a small fleet and army, with which, leaving his son Antigonus to command in Greece, he crossed over to Miletus. Here he was received by Eurydice, wife of Ptolemy, whose daughter Ptolemais had been promised him in marriage as early as b. c. 301, and their long delayed nuptials were now solemnized. Demetrius at first obtained many successes; but the advance of Agathocles with a powerful army compelled him to retire. He now threw himself boldly into the interior of Asia, having conceived the daring project of establishing himself in the eastern provinces of Seleucus. But his troops refused to follow him. He then passed over into Cilicia, and after various negotiations with Seleucus, and having suffered the greatest losses and privations from famine and disease, he found himself abandoned by his troops and even by his most faithful friends, and had no choice but to surrender himself a prisoner to Seleucus. (b c. 286.) That king appears to have been at first disposed to treat him with honour, but took alarm at his popularity with the army, and sent him as a prisoner to the Syrian Chersonesus. Here he was confined at one of the royal residences, where he had the liberty of hunting in the adjoining park, and does not seem to have been harshly treated. Seleucus even professed an intention of restoring him to liberty, and indignantly rejected the proposal of Lysimachus to put him to death; but the restless spirit of Demetrius could ill brook confinement, and he gave himself up without restraint to the pleasures of the table, which brought on an illness that proved fatal. His death took place in the third year of his imprisonment and the fifty-fifth of his age, b. c. 283. (Plut. Demetr. 45–52; Polyael. iv. 9; Diod. xxi. Exc. Vales. p. 562.) His remains were sent by Seleucus with all due honours to his son Antigonus, who interred them at Demetrius in Thessaly, a city which he had himself founded. (Plut. Demetr. 53.)

There can be no doubt that Demetrius was one of the most remarkable characters of his age: in restless activity of mind, fertility of resource, and
DEMETRIUS.

During promptitude in the execution of his schemes, he has perhaps never been surpassed; but prosperity always proved fatal to him, and he constantly lost by his luxury and voluptuousness the advantages that he had gained by the vigour and activity which adversity never failed to call forth. His life was in consequence a continued succession of rapid and striking vicissitudes of fortune. It has been seen that he was guilty of some great crimes, thought on the whole he can be charged perhaps with fewer than any one of his contemporaries; and he showed in several instances a degree of humanity and generosity very rarely displayed at that period. His besetting sin was his unbounded licentiousness, a vice in which, says Plutarch, he surpassed all his contemporary monarchs. Besides Lania and his other mistresses, he was regularly married to four wives, Phila, Eurydice, Deidamia, and Ptolemais, by whom he left four sons. The eldest of these, Antigonus Gonatas, eventually succeeded him on the throne of Macedonia.

According to Plutarch, Demetrius was remarkable for his beauty and dignity of countenance, a remark fully borne out by his portrait as it appears upon his coins, one of which is annexed. On this his head is represented wearing a crown, in imitation of Dionysus, the deity whom he particularly sought to emulate. (Plut. Demetr. 2; Eckhel, ii. p. 192.)

Of his children two bore the same name:—

1. Demetrius, surnamed the Handsome (Δεμητριος), whom he had by Ptolemais, daughter of Ptolemy Soter, and who was consequently brother of Antigonus Gonatas. He was first married to Olympias of Larissa, by whom he had a son Antigonus, surnamed Dosen, who afterwards succeeded to the throne of Macedonia. (Euseb. Arm. p. 161, fol. ed.) After the death of Magas, king of Cyrene, his widow, Asinoë, wishing to obtain the hand of her daughter Berenice, who readily embraced the offer, repaired immediately to Cyrene, and established his power there without opposition. How long he continued to hold it we know not; but he is said to have given general offence by his haughty and unpopular manners, and carried on a criminal intercourse with his mother-in-law, Asinoë. This was deeply resented by the young queen, Berenice, who caused him to be assassinated in her mother's arms. (Justin, xxvi. 3; Euseb. Arm. i. pp. 157, 158; Niebuhr's Kleine Schriften, p. 239; Droysen, Hellenismus. ii. p. 292, &c.) According to a probable conjecture of Droysen's (ii. p. 215), it must have been this Demetrius, and not, as stated by Justin (xxvi. 2), the son of Antigonus Gonatas, who defeated Alexander of Epirus when he invaded Macedonia.

2. Demetrius, surnamed the Thin (Δεμητριος), whom he had by an Illyrian woman, and of whom nothing is known but his name mentioned by Plutarch. (Plut. Demetr. 53.)

DEMETRIUS (Διονυσιας) II., king of MACEDONIA, was the son of Antigonus Gonatas, and succeeded his father in B.C. 239. According to Justin (xxvi. 2), he had distinguished himself as early as B.C. 266 or 265, by the defeat of Alexander of Epirus, who had invaded the territories of his father: but this statement is justly rejected by Droysen (Hellenismus, ii. p. 214) and Niebuhr (Kleine Schriften. p. 228) on account of his extreme youth, as he could not at this time have been above twelve years old. (See, however, Euseb. Arm. i. p. 160; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. viii. p. 89.) Of the events of his reign, which lasted ten years, B.C. 239-229 (Polyb. ii. 44; Droysen, ii. p. 400, not.), our knowledge is so imperfect, that very opposite opinions have been formed concerning his character and abilities. He followed up the policy of his father Antigonus, by cultivating friendly relations with the tyrants of the different cities in the Peloponnesse, in opposition to the Achaean league (Polyb. ii. 44), at the same time that he engaged in war with the Aetolians, which had the effect of throwing them into alliance with the Achaeanas. We know nothing of the details of this war, which seems to have arisen for the possession of Acarnania; but though Demetrius appears to have obtained some successes, the Aetolians on the whole gained ground during his reign. He was assisted in it by the Boeotians, and at one time also by Agron, king of Illyria. (Polyb. ii. 46, 55; Schorn, Gescli. Griechenlands, p. 88; Droysen, ii. p. 440; Thirlwall's Greece, viii. pp. 118-125.) We learn also that he suffered a great defeat from the Dardanians, a barbarian tribe on the north-western frontier of Macedonia, but it is quite uncertain to what period of his reign we are to refer this event. (ProL Trogi Pompei, lib. xxviii.; Liv. xxxi. 28.) It was probably towards the commencement of it that Olympias, the widow of Alexander of Epirus, in order to secure his support, gave him in marriage her daughter Pthina (Justin, xxviii. 1), notwithstanding which he appears to have taken no steps either to prevent or avenge the death of Olympias and her two sons. Demetrius had previously been married to Stratonice, daughter of Antiochus Soter, who quitted the service of the Illyrians at the time that war first broke out between them and Rome, and held Corcyra for the Illyrian queen Teuta; but treacherously surrendered it to the Roman fleet, and retired to Syrin. (Justin, l. c.; Euseb. Arm. i. p. 164; Joseph. c. A Anton. i. 22; Niebuhr's Kleine Schriften, p. 255.)

Of his marriage with Olympias, Ptolemy Soter, Alexander's successor, was so jealous, that he sent an embassy to Rome to demand an explanation of the marriage of his adopted son Demetrius with Olympias. This occasioned a difficult negotiation, which was concluded by a treaty stipulating that Demetrius should marry his niece, Antisthenia, daughter of Ptolemy Philadelphus; and this arrangement was carried into effect. (Polyb. ii. 45.)

DEMETRIUS (Anthyros), a Greek of the island of Phaëros in the Adriatic. He was in the service of the Illyrians at the time that war first broke out between them and Rome, and held Corcyra for the Illyrian queen Teuta; but treacherously surrendered it to the Roman fleet, and became a guide and active ally to the consul in all their subsequent operations. (Polyb. ii. 11.)

His services were rewarded, after the defeat and submission of Tarentum, with a great part of her dominions, though the Romans seem never to have thoroughly trusted him. (Polyb. l. c.; Appian, Ilioc. c. 6.) He afterwards entered into alliance with Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, and assisted him in the war against Cleomenes. (Polyb. iii. 65, iii. 16.) Thinking that he had the powerful support of Macedonia, and that the Romans were too much occupied with the Gallic wars, and the danger impending from Hannibal, to punish his breach of faith, he ventured on many acts of piratical hostility. The Romans, however, immediately sent the consul L. Aemilius Paullus over to Illyria (n. c. 219), who quickly reduced all his strongholds, took Pharsos itself, and obliged Demetrius to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. (Polyb. iii. 16, 18, 19; Appian, Ilioc. 8; Zonar. viii. 20.) At the court of this prince he spent the remainder of his life, and became his chief adviser. The Romans in vain sent an embassy to the Macedonian king to demand his surrender (Liv. xxii. 33); and it was at this instigation that Philip determined, after the battle of Thrasyene, to conclude an alliance with Hannibal, and make war upon the Romans. (Polyb. v. 101, 105, 108; Justin, xxxix. 2.)

Demetrius was a man of a daring character, but presumptuous and detestable in judgment; and while supporting the cause of Philip in Greece, he was led to engage in a rash attempt to take the fortress of Isthme by a sudden assault, in which he himself perished. (Polyb. iii. 19.) Polybius ascribes most of the violent and unjust proceedings of Philip in Greece to the advice and influence of Demetrius, who appears to have been a man of much ability, but wholly regardless of faith and justice. (Polyb. vii. 13, 14.)

DEMETRIUS (Ἀναγράφεται), younger son of Philip V., king of Macedonia, but his only son by his legitimate wife, the elder brother Perseus being the son of a concubine. (Liv. xxxix. 53.) After the battle of Cynoscephalae, Philip was obliged to give up Demetrius, then very young, to Flamininus as a hostage, and he was subsequently sent to Rome in the same capacity, n. c. 198. (Liv. xxxiii. 13, 30, xxxiv. 52; Polyb. xviii. 22.) Five years afterwards he was honourably restored to his father, Philip having at this time obtained the favour of Rome by his services in the war against Antiochus. (Liv. xxxvi. 35; Polyb. xx. 13; Zonar. ix. 10.) But this did not last long, and Philip finding himself without and on all sides by the machinations of Rome, and her intrigues among his neighbours, determined to try and avert, or at least delay, the impending storm, by sending Demetrius, who during his residence at Rome had obtained the highest favour, as his ambassador to the senate. The young prince was most favourably received, and returned with the answer, that the Romans were willing to excuse all the past, out of good-will toDemetrius, and from their confidence in his friendly dispositions towards them. (Liv. xxxix. 94, 47; Polyb. xxiii. 14, xxiv. 1—5; Justin, xxxii. 2.) But the favour thus shewn to Demetrius had the effect (as was doubtless the design of the senate) of exciting against him the jealousy of Philip, and in a still higher degree that of Perseus, who suspected his brother, perhaps not without cause, of intending to supplant him on the throne after his father's death, by the assistance of the Romans. Perseus therefore endeavoured to effect his ruin by his intrigues; and having failed in accomplishing this by accusing him falsely of an attempt upon his life, he subdued Didas, one of Philip's generals, to accuse Demetrius of holding treasonable correspondence with the Romans, and of intending to escape to them. A forged letter, pretending to be from Flamininus, appeared to confirm the charge; and Philip was induced to consign him to the custody of Didas, by whom he was secretly put to death, as it was supposed, by his father's order. (Liv. xxxix. 53, xl. 4—15, 20—24; Polyb. xxiv. 7, 8; Justin, xxxii. 2; Zonar. ix. 22.)

Demetrius was in his 26th year at the time of his death; he is represented by Livy as a very amiable and accomplished young man; but it may well be doubted whether he was altogether so innocent as he appears in that author's eloquent narrative. (See Niebuhr's Lect. on Roman History, vol. i. p. 372, ed. by Dr. Schmitz. [E. H. B.])

DEMETRIUS POLIORCETES. [DEMI- TRIUS L., KING OF MACEDONIA.]

DEMETRIUS (Ἀναγράφεται), king of Syria, surnamed Soter (Σωτήρ), was the son of Seleucus IV. (Philopator) and grandson of Antiochus the Great. While yet a child, he had been sent to Rome by his father as a hostage, and remained there during the whole of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. He there formed an intimacy with the historian Polybius. After the death of Antiochus, being now 23 years old, he demanded of the senate to be set at liberty and allowed to occupy the throne of Syria in preference to his cousin, Antiochus Eupator. His request however having been repeatedly refused by the senate, he fled secretly from Rome, by the advice and with the connivance of Polybius, and landed with a few followers at Troas in Phoenicia. The Syrians immediately declared in his favour; and the boy Antiochus with his tutor Lysias were seized by their own guards and put to death. (Polyb. xxxi. 12, 19—23; Appian, Syr. 46, 47; Justin, xxxiv. 3; Liv. Epit. xlii.; Euseb. Arm. p. 166, fol. edit.; 1 Macc. vii.; Zonar. ix. 25.) As soon as he had established himself in the kingdom, Demetrius immediately sought to conciliate the favour of the Romans by sending them an embassy with valuable presents, and surrendering to them Loptrines, who in the preceding reign had assassinated the Roman envoy, Cn. Octavius. Having thus succeeded in procuring his recognition as king, he appears to have thought that he might regulate at his pleasure the affairs of the East, and expelled Heracleides from Babylon, where as satrap he had made himself highly unpopular; for which service Demetrius first obtained from the Babylonians the title of Soter (Polyb. xxxii. 4, 6; Diod. Exc. Leg. xxxi.; Appian, Syr. 47.) His measures against the Jews quickly drove them to take up arms again under Judas Maccabeus, who defeated Nicanor, the general of Demetrius, and concluded an alliance with the Romans, by which they declared the independence of Judea, and forbade Demetrius to oppress them. (Joseph. Antii. xii. 19; 1 Macc. vii. 8.) He further incurred the enmity of the Romans by expelling Ariamnes from Cappadocia, and investing the capital of his own; the Roman senate round about the temple of Ariamnes, and immediately restored him. (Polyb. xxxii. 20; Appian, Syr. 47; Liv. Epit. xliii.; Justin, xxxiv. 1.)

While Demetrius was thus surrounded on all the sides by enemies, his own subjects at Antioch were completely alienated from him by his luxury and intemperance. In this state of things, Hemidaes, whom he had expelled from Babylon, set up against him an impostor of the name of Balas, who took the title of Alexander, and pretended to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. This competitor appears to have been at first unsuccessful; but, having obtained the powerful protection of Rome, he was supported also with large forces by Attalus, king of Pergamus, Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, and Ptolemy Philometor, as well as by the Jews under Jonathan Maccabaeus. Demetrius met him in a pitched battle, in which, he is said to have displayed the utmost personal valour, but was ultimately defeated and slain. (Polyb. xxxii. 14, 16; Appian, Syr. 67; Dioder. Exc. Vales. xxxiii.; Justin, xxxv. 1; Joseph, Ant. xiii. 2; 1 Macc. x.; Euseb. Arm. p. 166.) Demetrius died in the year B.C. 150, having reigned between eleven and twelve years. (Clinton, F. II. 150, having reigned b. C. 138. Euseb. Arm. p. 168.)

According to Appian and Justin it would appear that the revolt of Tryphon did not take place till after the captivity of Demetrius, but the true sequence of events is undoubtedly that given in the book of the Maccabees. He was, however, kindly treated by the Parthian king Mithridates (Arsaces VI.), though he sent him into Hyrcania, allowed him to live there in regal splendour, and even gave him daughter Rhodogune in marriage. After the death of Mithridates he made various attempts to escape, but notwithstanding these was still liberally treated by Phraates, the successor of Mithridates. Meanwhile his brother, Antiochus Sidetes, having overthrown the usurper Tryphon and firmly established himself on the throne, engaged in war with Parthia, in consequence of which Phraates brought forward Demetrius, and sent him into Syria to operate a diversion against his brother. This succeeded better than the Parthian king had anticipated, and Antiochus having fallen in battle, Demetrius was able to re-establish himself on the throne of Syria, after a captivity of ten years, and to maintain himself there in spite of Phraates, n. c. 128. (Justin, xxxviii. 9, 10; Euseb. Arm. p. 167; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 8. § 4.) He even deemed himself strong enough to engage in an expedition against Egypt, but was compelled to abandon it by the general dissatisfaction both of his soldiers and subjects. Ptolemy Physcon took advantage of this to set up against him the pretender Alexander Zebina, by whom he was defeated and compelled to fly. His wife Cleopatra, who could not forgive him his marriage with Rhodogune in Parthia, refused to afford him refuge at Ptolemais, and he fled to Tyre, where he was assassinated while endeavouring to make his escape by sea, b. c. 125. (Justin, xxxix. 9. § 3, Euseb. Arm. p. 168; Clinton, F. H. iii. pp. 333-5.)

According to Appian and Livy (Epit. ix.), he was put to death by his wife Cleopatra. He left two sons, Seleucus, who was assassinated by order of Cleopatra, and Antiochus, named

COIN OF DEMETRIUS I.

DEMETRIUS (Δημετριός) II., king of Syria, surnamed Nicator (Νικατόρ), was the son of Demetrius Soter. He had been sent by his father for safety to Cnidus, when Alexander Balas invaded Syria, and thus escaped falling into the hands of that usurper. After the death of his father he continued in exile for some years; but the vicious and feeble character of Balas having rendered him generally odious to his subjects, Demetrius determined to attempt the recovery of his kingdom, and assembled a body of mercenaries from Crete, with which he landed in Cilicia, b. c. 148 or 147. Ptolemy Philometor, who was at the time in the southern provinces of Syria with an army, immediately declared in his favour, and agreed to give him his daughter Cleopatra, who had been previously married to the usurper Balas, for his wife. With their combined forces they took possession of Antioch, and Alexander, who had retired to Cilicia, having returned to attack them, was totally defeated at the river Oenoparas. Ptolemy died of the injuries received in the battle, and Balas, having fled for refuge to Aboe in Arabia, was murdered by his followers. (Justin, xxxv. 2; Liv. Epit. iii.; Diod. Exc. Photii, xxxiii.; Appian, Syr. 67; Joseph. Ant. xiii. 4; 1 Macc. x. xi.) For this victory Demetrius obtained the title of Nicator; and now deeming himself secure both from Egypt and the usurper, he abandoned himself to the grossest vices, and by his excessive cruelties alienated the minds of his subjects, at the same time that he estranged the soldiery by dismissing all his troops except a body of Cretan mercenaries. This con-

Grypus. Demetrius II. bears on his coins, in addition to the title of Nicator, those of Theos Philadelphus. From the dates on them it appears that some must have been struck during his captivity, as well as both before and after. This accords also with the difference in the style of the portrait; those struck previous to his captivity having a youthful and beardless head, while the coins subsequent to that event present his portrait with a long beard, after the Ptohan fashion. (Eckhel, iii. pp. 220–31.) [E. H. B.]

DEMETRIUS (Αύγαρπος) III. king of Syria, surnamed Eucarēus, was the fourth son of Antiochus Grypus, and grandson of Demetrius II. During the civil wars that followed the death of Antiochus Grypus, Demetrius was set up as king of Damascus or Coele Syria, by the aid of Ptolemy Lathurus, king of Cyprus; and after the death of Antiochus Eusebes, he and his brother Philip for a time held the whole of Syria. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 13. § 4.) His assistance was invoked by the Jews against the tyranny of Alexander Jannaeus; but though he defeated the enemy in a pitched battle, he did not follow up his victory, but withdrew to Beroea. War immediately broke out between him and his brother Philip, and Straton, the governor of Beroea, who supported Philip, having obtained assistance from the Arabs and Parthians, blockaded Demetrius in his camp, until he was compelled by famine to surrender at discretion. He was sent as a prisoner to Mithridates, king of Parthia (Arsaces IX.), who detained him in an honourable captivity till his death. (Joseph. Ant. xiii. 14.) The coins of this prince are important as fixing the chronology of his reign; they bear dates from the year 218 to 224 of the era of the Seleucidae, B. c. 95. (Suidas.) 4. Of Euphranor, a disciple of Theombrotus. (Diog. Laert. v. 95.)

The surname Eucaerus is not found on these coins, some of which bear the titles Theos Philopator and some of which bear the title of Nicator, those of Theos Philopator and those of Theos Polyarchus. (Volum. Heredidan. i. p. 106, &c.)

Demetrius II. bears on his coins, in addition to the title of Nicator, those of Theos Philadelphus. From the dates on them it appears that some must have been struck during his captivity, as well as both before and after. This accords also with the difference in the style of the portrait; those struck previous to his captivity having a youthful and beardless head, while the coins subsequent to that event present his portrait with a long beard, after the Ptohan fashion. DEMETRIUS III. (Αύγαρπος), literary. The number of ancient authors of this name, as enumerated by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 415, &c.), amounts to nearly one hundred, twenty of whom are recounted by Diogenes Laërtius. We subjoin a list of those who are mentioned by ancient authors, and exclude those who are unknown except from unpublished MSS. scattered about in various libraries of Europe.

1. Of Abraumiau, surnamed Ixion, which surname is traced to various causes, among which we may mention, that he was said to have committed a robbery in the temple of Hera at Alexandria. (Suidas, a. n. Αύγαρπος; Diog. Laërt. v. 84.) He was a Greek grammarian of the time of Augustus, and lived partly at Pergamus and partly at Alexandria, where he belonged to the critical school of Aristarchus. He is mentioned as the author of the following works: 1. Εὐξεινος ο Οἰσιανής, which is often referred to. (Suid. L.c.; Erod. p. 370; Schul. Venet. ad H. l. i. 424, iii. 18, vi. 437; Villoison, Proleg. ad Abydon. Lex. p. 27.) 2. Εὐξεινος εἰς Ηεδων. (Suidas.) 3. Εὐξεινος ο Οἰσιανής or Εὐξεινος ο Οἰσιανής. (Athen. ii. p. 50, iii. p. 64.) 4. Περὶ τῆς Αλεξανδρέως διάλεκτος. (Athen. ix. p. 883.) 5. Αρτακά θιασίρως, of which a few fragments are still extant. (Schol. ad Aristip. A. vi. 1506, Rom. 70, 186, 310, 1601, 1021, 1227.) 6. On the Greek verbs tense and mood.

2. On Menexenus, a Cyric philosopher, and a disciple of Theomphros. (Diog. Laërt. v. 65.)

3. Of Alexandria, a Peripatetic philosopher. (Diog. Laërt. v. 84.) There is a work entitled Περὶ ἔφραμίου, which has come down to us under the name of Demetrius Phalereus, which however, for various reasons, cannot be his production: writers of a later age (see e.g. §§ 76, 251, 246, 308) are referred to it, and there are also words and expressions which prove it to be a later work. Most critics are therefore inclined to ascribe it to our Demetrius of Alexandria. It is written with considerable taste, and with reference to the best authors, and is a rich source of information on the main points of Oratory. If the work is the production of Demetrius who is known to have written on oratory (τριχύρ ψαροα), Diog. Laërt. L.c.), it must have been written in the time of the Antonines. It was first printed in Aldus’s Rhetor Graeci, i. p. 573, &c. Separate modern editions were made by J. G. Schneider, Altenburg, 1779, 8vo., and Fr. Gührer, Lips. 1837, 8vo. The best critical text is that in Walz’s Rhetor. Graeci, vol. ix. init., which has prefixed valuable prolegomena.

4. Of Aspendus, a Peripatetic philosopher, and a disciple of Apollonius of Soli. (Diog. Laërt. v. 83.)

5. Of Bithynia. See below.

6. Of Byzantium, a Greek historian, was the author of two works (Diog. Laërt. v. 83), the one containing an account of the migration of the Gauls from Europe to Asia, in thirteen books, and the other a history of Ptolemy Philadelphus and Antiochus Soter, and of their administration of Libya. From the contents of these works we may infer, with some probability, that Demetrius lived either shortly after or during the reign of those kings, under whom the migration of the Gauls took place, in B. c. 279. (Schmidt, de Fontilms Veterum in armata. Exsped. Gallorum, p. 14, &c.)

7. Of Byzantium, a Peripatetic philosopher (Diog. Laërt. v. 83), who is probably the same as the Demetrius (Id. ii. 20) beloved and instructed by Crito, and wrote a work which is sometimes called περὶ ποιμείνας, and sometimes περὶ ποιμείνας (unless they were different works), the fourth book of which is quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 422, comp. xii. p. 548, xiv. p. 638). This is the only work mentioned by ancient writers, but besides some fragments of this, there have been discovered at Herculaneum fragments of two other works, viz. περὶ τῶν συγγενέων διανώμης, and περὶ τᾶς Πολεοδομίας. (Volum. Heredidan. i. p. 104, &c., ed. Oxford.) It is further not impossible that this philosopher may be the same as the one who tried to dissuade Cato at Utica from committing suicide. (Plut. Cat. Min. 65.)

8. Surnamed Calliatianus. [Calliatianus.]

9. Chromatianus. [Chromatianus.]

10. Chrysoloras. [Chrysoloras.]

11. Surnamed Chryssos, a Cyric philosopher at Alexandria, in the reign of Constantius, who, suspecting him guilty of forbidden practices, ordered him to be tortured. The Cynic bore the pain inflicted on him as a true philosopher, and was afterwards set free again. (Ammian. Marc. xix. 12.) He is probably the same as the person mentioned by the emperor Julian (Orat. vii.) by the name of Chytron. (Vales. ad Ammian. Marc. l.c.)

12. Of Unides, apparently a mythographer, is referred to by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1165).

13. COMIC POET. See below.

14. Surnamed Cydonius, which surname was probably derived from his living at Cydone (Ko¬

15. A second work of his, which is often referred to as the most important among the works which have appeared in print: 1. Teo Epitaph addressed to Nicephorus Gregoms and Philotheus. They are prefixed to J. Boivin's edition of Nicephorus Gregoms, Paris, 1702, fol. 2.

16. Of Magnesia, a Greek grammarian, who obtained the civic franchise in Thessalonica. (Diog. Laërt. v. 84.)

17. Metropolitans of Cyzicus, and surnamed Syncellus. He is mentioned by Johnas Syli¬

18. An Epic poet, of whom, in the time of Dio¬

19. An Epicurean philosopher, and a disciple of Pyrrho, who is the author of the first-mentioned works, from which we may infer, that he lived about the middle of the eleventh cen¬ tury after Christ. He wrote an exposition of the heresy of the Jacobites and Chatizarians, which is printed with a Latin translation in Combesius. (Auctarium Nov. ii. p. 261.) Another work on prohibited marriages is printed in Leundavicius. (See Graeco-Rom. iv. p. 392.) Some works of his are still extant in MS. in the libraries of Paris, Rome, and Milan. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 414.)

20. Of Erythraër, a Greek poet, whose Dio¬

21. Of Erythraër, a Greek grammarian, who obtained the civic franchise in Thessalonica. (Diog. Laërt. v. 84.)

22. Surnamed Ποσιδώνιος, is mentioned among the grammarians who wrote on the Homeric poems. (Schol. Pind. ad Hom. II. vii. 233, xiii. 157.)

23. Of Lium, wrote a history of Troy, which is referred to by Eustathius (ad Hom. Od. xi. p. 452) and Budeocia (p. 129).

24. The author of a work on the kings of the Jews, from which a statement respecting the capti¬ ty of the Jews is quoted. (Hieronym. Catal. Ill. Script. 38; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 146.)

25. Of Magnesia, a Greek grammarian, a con¬ temporary of Cicero and Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. viii. 11, iv. 11.) He had, in Cicero's recollec¬ tion, sent Atticus a work of his on concord, ἐπιστευμελεία, which Cicero also was anxious to read. A second work of his, which is often referred to, was of an historical and philological nature, and treated of poets and other authors who bore the same name. (Diog. Laërt. i. 38, 79, 112, ii. 52, 56, v. 3, 75, 89, vi. 79, 34, 88, viii. 169, 185, vii. 84, ix. 15, 27, 35, x. 13; Plut. Vit. X Oral. pp. 844, b., 847, a., Demosth. 15, 27, 29, 30; Harpocr. s. v. ἠθική, and many other passages; Athen. xii. p. 611; Dionys. Deimarch. 1.) This important work, to judge from what is quoted from it, contained the lives of the persons treated of, and a critical examination of their merits.

26. Surnamed Moschus, a Greek grammarian, who is the author of the argumentum to the Aesop, which bear the name of Orpheus. It is said, that there are also glosses by him upon the same poem in MS. at Paris. He lived in the 15th century of our era. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 418.)

27. Of Odessa, is mentioned as the author of a work on his native city. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ὀδησσα.)

28. Phalereus, the most distinguished among all the literary persons of this name. He was at once an orator, a statesman, a philoso¬

29. His surname Phalereus is given to their works, from which we may infer, that he lived about the middle of the eleventh cen¬ tury after Christ. He wrote an exposition of the heresy of the Jacobites and Chatizarians, which is printed with a Latin translation in Combesius. (Auctarium Nov. ii. p. 261.) Another work on prohibited marriages is printed in Leundavicius. (See Graeco-Rom. iv. p. 392.) Some works of his are still extant in MS. in the libraries of Paris, Rome, and Milan. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 414.)

30. Of Erythraër, a Greek poet, whose Dio¬
genes Laërtius (v. 85) calls a σουηγόραγος ἀπό¬

32. Of Unides, apparently a mythographer, as referred to the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius (i. 1165).
DEMETRIUS.

man without rank or property (Diog. Laërt. v. 75; Aelian, V. H. xii. 43); but notwithstanding this, he rose to the highest honours at Athens through his great literary powers and his perseverance. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, his great natural powers and his perseverance. He was educated, together with the poet Menander, Aelian, and Diogenes Laërtius (v. 80, &c.) shows that he was a man of the most extensive acquirements. These works, which were partly historical, partly political, partly philosophical, and partly poetical, have all perished. The work on elocution (περὶ διάλεκτου) which has come down under his name, is probably the work of an Alexandrian sophist of the name of Demetrio. (See above, No. 3.) It is said that A. Milu has discovered in a Vatican palimpsest some genuine fragments of Demetrio Phalerus. For a list of his works see Diogenes Laërtius, who has devoted a chapter to him. (v. 5.) His literary merits are not confined to what he wrote, for he was a man of a practical turn of mind, and not a mere scholar of the closet; whatever he learned or knew was applied to the practical business of life, of which the following facts are illustrations. The performance of tragedy had greatly fallen into disuse at that time at Athens, on account of the great expense involved in it; and in order to afford the people less costly and yet intellectual amusement, he caused the Homeric and other poems to be recited on the stage by rhapsodists. (Athen. xiv. p. 620; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1473.) It is also believed that it was owing to his influence with Ptolemy Lagi that books were collected at Alexandria, and that he thus laid the foundation of the library which was formed under Ptolemy Philadelphus.

There is, however, no reason whatever for calling him the first in the series of librarians at Alexandria, any more than there is for the belief that he took part in the Greek translation of the Septuagint. A life of Demetrio Phalerus was written by Asclepias (Athen. xii. p. 567), but it is lost. Among the modern works upon him and his merits, see Bonamy, in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscription. vol. viii. p. 157, &c.; H. Dohrn, De Vita et Rebus Demetrio Phaleri, Kiel, 1823, 4to.; Parthey, Das Alexandr. Museum, pp. 35, &c., 38, &c., 71; Ritshel, Die Alexandr. Biblioth. p. 15.

29. A PLATONIC philosopher who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Dionysus, about B. C. 85. (Lucian, de Calumna. 16.) He was opposed to the extravagant luxuries of the court of Ptolemy, and was charged with drinking water and not appearing in woman's dress at the Dionysia. He was punished by being compelled publicly to drink a quantity of water and to appear in women's clothing. He is proba­bly the same as the Demetrio mentioned by M. Aurelius Antoninus (viii. 25), whom Gataker confounds with Demetrio Phalerus.

30. Sumamed PUGH, a Greek grammarian, is mentioned as the author of a work περὶ διάλεκτου (Etymon Magn. s. v. μαθηματικα), and seems also to have written on Homer. (Apollon. Soph. s. v. στοιχεία.)

31. Of SAGALASSUS, the author of a work entitled Παραθεωρητικα. (Lucian, de Hist. Conscrib. 30.)

32. Of SALLAMIS, a work on the island of Cyprus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Καπραδία.)

33. Of SCALES, a Greek grammarian of the time of Aristarchus and Crates. (Strab. xiii. p. 908.) He was the author of a very extensive and acute philosophical work. (Diog. Laërt. v. 84.) He was the author of a very extensive work which is very often referred to, and bore the title Τοιούτου διάλεκτος. It consisted of at least twenty-six books. (Strab. xiii. p. 609 and passim; Athen. iii. pp. 80, 91; Steph. Byz. s. v. Σεληνιώτων.) This work was an historical and geographical commu-
DEMETRIUS.

37. A Syr|ian', a Grec|k rhetor|ician, who lectu|red on rhetoric at Ath|ens. Cicero, during his stay |there in the c. 79, was a very diligent pupil of his. (Cic. de Tract. ii. 2, p. 367; Caelius Aurelianus, who is frequently quoted by Caelius Aurelianus, whom he calls ‘Aptopay’niji, and the Etymologicon Magnum (s. v. ‘Eperipovs). Other quotations, without the mention of the play from which they are taken, are made by Athenaeus (ii. p. 56, a.) and Stobaeus (Florileg. ii. 1). The only fragment of the younger Demetrius is that mentioned above, from the ‘Apopo|yntians (Ath. ix. p. 405, e.), which fixes his date, after 249 n. c. (Clinton, P. H. ii. sub ann.; Meineke, Prod. Com. Grac. i., pp. 264–266, ii. pp. 676–678, iv. pp. 539, 540.) [P. S.]

Besides these, there are some writers of the name of Demetrius who cannot be identified with any of those here mentioned, as neither their native places nor any surnames are mentioned by which they might be recognized. For example, Demetrius the author of “Pampyludia.” (Tzet. ad Lyoph. 440), Demetrius, the author of “Argo|lica” (Chel. Alex. Prorept. p. 14), and Demetrius the author of a work entitled περὶ τῶν αὐτῶν Ἀγνυτον. (Athen. xvi. p. 688.). In Suidas (s. e. διάλεξε), where we read of an historian Demetrius, we have probably to read Demetrius. [L. S.]

DEMETRIUS (Δαμήτριος), of Bithyni|a, an epigrammatic poet, the author of two diastichs on the cow of Myron, in the Greek Anthology. (Bruck, Aul. ii. 65; Jacobs, ii. 64.) It is not known whether he was the same person as the philosopher Demetrius of Bithynia, son of Diph|lus, whom Diogenes Laërtius mentions (v. 84). Diogenes (v. 85) also mentions an epic poet named Demetrius, three of whose verses he preserves; and also a Demetrius of Tarsus, a satyric poet [see above, No. 36], and another Demetrius, an iambic poet, whom he calls παῦκη ἄρβη. The epigrams of Demetrius are very indifferent. [P. S.]

DEMETRIUS (Δαμήτριος), an Athenian comic poet of the old comedy. (Diog. Laërt. v. 85.) The fragments which are ascribed to him contain allusions to events which took place about the 92nd and 94th Olympiads (n. c. 412, 404); but there is another in which mention is made of Seleucus and Agathocles. This would bring the life of the author below the 118th Olympiad, that is, upwards of 100 years later than the periods suggested by the other fragments. The only explanation is that of Clinton and Meineke, who suppose two Demetrii, the one a poet of the old comedy, the other of the new. That the later fragment belongs to the new comedy is evident from its subject as well as from its date. To the elder Demetrius must be assigned the ‘Telesichnai, which is quoted by Athenaeus (iii. p. 108, f.), Aelian (N. A. xii. 10), Hesychius (s. v. ‘Επιτηρησα) and the Etymologicon Magnum (s. v. ‘Επιτηρησα). Other quotations, without the mention of the play from which they are taken, are made by Athenaeus (ii. p. 56, a.) and Stobaeus (Florileg. ii. 1). The only fragment of the younger Demetrius is that mentioned above, from the ‘Apopo|yntians (Ath. ix. p. 405, e.), which fixes his date, after 249 n. c. (Clinton, P. H. ii. sub ann.; Meineke, Prod. Com. Grac. i., pp. 264–266, ii. pp. 676–678, iv. pp. 539, 540.) [P. S.]

DEMETRIUS (Δαμήτριος), the name of several ancient physicians, who are often confounded together, and whom it is not always easy to distinguish with certainty. 1. A native of Apamea in Bithynia, who was a follower of Herophilus, and therefore lived probably in the third or second century B. C. He is frequently quoted by Caelius Aurelianus, who has preserved the titles of some of his works, and some extracts from them. In some places he is called “Altaeus” (De Morb. Aen. iii. 18, p. 249; De Morb. Chron. ii. 2, p. 367), but this is only a mistake for “Apeames,” as is proved by the same passage being quoted in one place (p. 249) from Demetrius Alateus, and in another from Demetrius
DEMETRIUS, Artists.

1. An architect, who, in conjunction with Paonius, finished the great temple of Artemis at Ephesus, which Ctesiphon had begun about 290 years before. He probably lived about B.C. 340, but his date cannot be fixed with certainty. Vitruvius calls him servus Diacum, that is, a servus Diacumus. (Vitrav. vii. Proef. § 16; Ctesiphon.)

2. A statue of some distinction. Pliny mentions his statue of Lysymachus, who was a priestess of the Persians as spies, which afforded the physician patience and reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of the queen Atossa. (Ibid. xiii. 882.)

3. A painter, whose time is unknown. (Diog. liii. 257; Jacobs, iv. 224, No. 37; in the Greek Anthology. (Bunck, Gesch. d. bild. Kunst. p. 191.)

4. A painter, whose time is unknown. (Diog. Laert. v. 63.) Perhaps he is the same who is mentioned by Diodorus (Ecc. Var. xxxi. 9) as Demetrius the son of Hystaspes. Here he acquired great riches, and he was paid one hundred minae, t. c. rather more than 496; and the year following he removed to the island of Samos in the Aegean sea, and received from Polykrates, the tyrant, the increased salary of two talents, t. c. (if the Attic standard be meant) 467. 10s. (Herod. iii. 131.) He accompanied Polykrates when he was seized and put to death by Oroetes, the Persian governor of Sardis (a. c. 525), by whom he was himself seized and carried prisoner to Susa to the court of Dareius, the son of Hystaspes. Here he acquired great riches and reputation by curing the king's foot, and the breast of the queen Atossa. (Ibid. c. 133.) It is added by Dion Chrysostom (Disser. i. De Invid. p. 652, sq.), that Dareius ordered the physicians who had been unable to cure him to be put to death, and that they were saved at the intercession of Democedes. Notwithstanding his honours at the Persian court, he was always desirous of returning to his native country. In order to effect this, he pretended to enter into the views and interests of the Persians, and procured by means of Atossa that he should be sent with some nobles to explore the coast of Greece, and ascertain in what parts it might be most successfully attacked. When they arrived at Tarentum, the king, Aristophilides, out of kindness to Democedes, seized the Persians as spies, which afforded the physician
DEMOCOPUS MYRILLA

Democrates developed his talents and principles in all probability under the direction of Demosthenes, and he came forward as a public orator as early as b.c. 322, when Antipater demanded of the Athenians to deliver up to him the leaders of the popular party. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 847.) Some time after the restoration of the democracy he supported Sophocles, who proposed a decree that no philosopher should establish a school without the sanction of the senate and people, and that any one acting contrary to this law should be punished with death. (Dilog. Laer. v. 38; Athen. v. p. 137, 215, xi. p. 508, xiii. p. 610; Pollux, iv. 42; Euseb. Prs. Eusap. xv. 2; Comp. Sophocles.) Democrates left behind him not only several orations (a fragment of one of them is preserved in Rutilius Lupus [p. 7, &c.]), but also an extensive historical work, in which he related the history of his own time, but which, as Cicero says, was written in an oratorical rather than an historical style. (Cic. Brut. 53, de Orat. ii. 23.)

The twenty-first book of it is quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 252, &c. Comp. Plut. Demost. 30; Lucan, Mar. vii. 737; and, besides these, a few fragments, his orations as well as his history are lost. (Droysen, Gesch. der Nachfolger Alexander p. 497, &c., and more especially his essay in the Zeitschrift für die Alterthums-wwissenschaft für 1836, Nos. 20 and 21; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredts. § 53, notes 12 and 13, § 72, note 1.)

3. Of Leuconoe in Attica, was married to the mother of Demochares, who mentions him in his orations against Aphobus (pp. 818, 836). Ruhnken (ad Rutil. Lapid. p. 7, &c.) confounds him with the nephew of Demochares.

4. Of Soil, a Greek poet, of whom Plutarch (Demetr. 27) has preserved a sarcasm upon Democritus Poliorcetes.

DEMOCHITUS. [CLEOGENUS.] DEMOCLES (Δηµοκλῆς). 1. Of Phigaleia, one of the ancient Greek historians. (Dionys. de Thucyd. jud. 5; Strab. i. p. 58.)

2. An Attic orator, and a contemporary of Democles, among whose opponents he is mentioned. (Timaeus, ap. Harpocrat. s. v. η θεοφραστής.) He was a disciple of Theophrastus, and is chiefly known as the defender of the children of Lycurgus against the calumnies of Meereocles and Menezechus. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 842, D.) It seems that in the time of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, some orations of Democles were still extant, since that critic (Deisarch. 11) attributes to him an oration, which went by the name of Deinarchus. It must be observed that Dionysius and Symmachus call this orator by the patronymic form of his name, Democleides, and that Ruhnken (Hist. crit. Orat. Graec. p. 92) is inclined to consider him as the same person with Democleides who was archon in n. c. 316. (Diod. xix. 17.)

3. Surnamed the Beautiful, an Athenian youth, who was beloved by Demetrius Poliorcetes, and on one occasion being surprised by his lover in the bath, escaped from his voluptuous embraces by leaping into a caldron filled with boiling water. (Plut. Demetr. 24.)

DEMOCOON (Δηµοκόων), a natural son of Priam, who came from Abydos to assist his father against the Achaeans, and was slain by Odisseus. (Hom. Ili. iv. 690; Apollod. iii. 12, § 5.) [L. S.]

DEMOCOPUS MYRILLA, was the architect of DEMO'CRITES. (Δημοκρίτης.) 1. Of Aphidna, an Attic orator of the time of Democles, who belonged to the anti-Macedonian party. He was a son of Sephus, and was sent with other ambassadors to Persia to receive the treaty with Athens. He was also one of the ambassadors who accompanied Democles to the Thebans, to conclude a treaty with them against Philip. As an orator he seems to have been a man of second rate. (Demosth. de Coron. pp. 235, 291.) A fragment of one of his orations is preserved in Aristotle. (Rhet. iii. § 3.)

2. A Pythagorean philosopher, concerning whom absolutely nothing is known. A collection of moral maxims, called the golden sentences (γυάματα χρυσά) has come down to us under his name, and are distinguished for their soundness and simplicity. They are written in the Ionic dialect, from which some writers have inferred, that they were written at a very early period, whereas others think it more probable that they are the production of the age of J. Caesar. But nothing can be said with certainty, for want of both external and internal evidence. Some of these sentences are quoted by Stubbes, and are found in some MSS. under the name of Democritus, which however seems to be a mere mistake, arising from the resemblance of the two names. They are collected and printed in the several editions of the sentences of Democritus. [DEMO'CRITUS.]

3. An Epicurean philosopher, who according to Plutarch (c. Epiphr. p. 1100) was charged by Epicurus with having copied from his works. He may possibly be the same as the Democrats who according to the same Plutarch (Poll. Procop. p. 808) lived at Athens about b. c. 340.

4. Of Tenedos, a distinguished wrestler, of whom there was a statue at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 17. § 1.) He is probably the same as the one of whom an anecdote is related by Aelian. (V. H. iv. 15.)

DEMO'CRINES (Δημοκρίνης), a Greek grammarian, who is referred to in the Venetian Scholia on Homer (II. ii. 744. Comp. Villoison, Proleg. p. xxx.)

DEMOCRITUS. (Δημοκρίτος.)

DEMOCRITUS (Δημοκρίτος), was a native of Abdern in Thrace, an Ionian colony of Tosa. (Aristot. de Cael. iii. 4, Meteor. ii. 7, with Ideler's note.) Some called him a Miletian, and the name of his father too is stated differently. (Diog. Laertr. i. 34, &c.) His birth year was fixed by Apollodorus in Ol. 30. 1, or b. c. 460, while Thraulusyllus had referred it to Ol. 77. 3. (Diog. Laertr. l. c. § 41, with Menage's note; Gallius, xvi. 21; Clinton, F. H. ad ann. 460.) Democritus had called himself forty years younger than Anaxagoras. His father, HEGESISTRATUS, or as others called him DAMASIPPUS or ATHENOCRITUS, was possessed of so large a property, that he was able to receive and treat XERXES on his march through Abdern. Democritus spent the inheritance, which his father left him, on travels into distant countries, which he undertook to satisfy his extraordinary thirst for knowledge. He travelled over a great part of Asia, and, as some state, he even reached India and Aethiopia. (Cic. de Fec. v. 19; Strabo, xvi. p. 703; A. H. C. Geffers, Quaestiones Democrit. p. 15.)

We know that he wrote on Babylon and Meroe; he must also have visited Egypt, and Diodorus Siculus (i. 98) even states, that he lived there for a period of five years. He himself declared (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 304.), that among his contemporaries none had made greater journeys, seen more countries, and made the acquaintance of more men than Democritus. He seemed to enjoy himself more than himself. Among the last he be mentions in particular the Egyptian mathematicians (Δαυτοδαναρια; comp. Sturt, de Dioklet. Maced. p. 98), whose knowledge he praises, without, however, regarding himself inferior to them. Theophrastus, too, spoke of him as a man who had seen many countries. (Aelian, V. H. iv. 20; Diog. Laertr. ix. 35.) It was his desire to acquire an extensive knowledge of nature that led him into distant countries at a time when travelling was the principal means of acquiring an intellectual and scientific culture; and after returning to his native land he occupied himself only with philosophical investigations, especially such as related to natural history. In Greece itself, too, he endeavoured by means of travelling and residing in the principal cities to acquire a knowledge of Hellenic culture and civilization. He mentioned many Greek philosophers in his writings, and his wealth enabled him to purchase the works they had written. He thus succeeded in excelling, in the extent of his knowledge, all the earlier Greek philosophers, among whom Leucippus, the founder of the atomistic theory, is said to have exercised the greatest influence upon his philosophical studies. The opinion that he was a disciple of Anaxagoras or of the Pythagoreans (Diog. Laertr. ix. 35), perhaps arose merely from the fact, that he mentioned them in his writings.

The account of his hostility towards Anaxagoras, is contradicted by several passages in which he speaks of him in terms of high praise. (Diog. Laertr. ii. 14; Sext. Empir. ad. x. Math. vii. 140.) It is further said, that he was on terms of friendship with Hippocrates, and some writers even speak of a correspondence between Democritus and Hippocrates; but this statement does not seem to be deserving of credit. (Diog. Laertr. ix. § 42; Brandis, Handbucb der g. Röm. Philos. p. 300.) As he was a contemporary of Plato, it may be that he was acquainted with Socrates, perhaps even with Plato, who, however, does not mention Democritus anywhere. (Hermann, System der Platon. Philos. l. c. 284.) Aristotle describes him and his views as belonging to the ante-Socratic period (Arist. Meteor. iii. 4; Phys. ii. 2, de Partib. Anim. i. 1); but modern scholars, such as the learned Dutchman Groen van Princster (Prosopograph. Platon. p. 41, &c., comp. Brandis, l. c. p. 292, &c.), assert, that there are symptoms in Plato which show a connexion with Democritus, and the same scholar pretends to discover in Plato's language and style an imitation of Democritus. (Persop. Platon. p. 42.) The many anecdotes about Democritus which are preserved, especially in Diogenes Laëritis, shew that he was a man of a most sterling and honourable character. His diligence was incredible; he lived exclusively for his studies, and his disinterestedness, modesty, and simplicity are attested by many features which are related of him. Notwithstanding his great precocity, he seems to have died in youth, though highly esteemed by his fellow-citizens, not so much on account of his philosophy, as "because," as Diogenes says, "he had foretold them some things which the event proved to be true." This had probably reference to his knowledge of natural phænomena. His fellow-citizens honoured him with presents in money and bronze statues. Even the scoffer Timon, who in his silliness spared no one, speaks of Democritus only in terms of praise. He died at an advanced age (some say that he was 109 years old), and even the manner in which he died is characteristic of his medical knowledge, which, combined as it was with his knowledge of nature, caused a report, which was believed by some persons, that he was a sorcerer and a magician. (Plin. H. N. xxiv. 17, xxx. 1.) His death is placed in Ol. 105. 4, or B. c. 357, in which year Hippocrates also is said to have died. (Clinton, F. H. ad ann. 357.) We cannot leave unnoticed the tradition that Democritus deprived himself of his sight, in order to be less disturbed in his pursuits. (Cic. de Fug. v. 29; Gallius, x. 17; Diog. Laërt. ix. 36; Cic. Tusc. v. 39; Menage, ad Diog. Laërt. ix. 43.) But this tradition is one of the inventions of a later age, which was fond of piquant anecdotes. It is more probable that he may have lost his sight by too severe application to study. (Brandis, l. c. p. 298.) This loss, however, did not disturb the cheerful disposition of his mind and his views of human life, which prompted him everywhere to look at the cheerful and comical side of things, which later writers took to mean, that he always laughed at the follies of men. (Seneac. de Ira, ii. 10; Aelian, V. H. iv. 20.)

Of the extent of his knowledge, which embraced not only natural sciences, mathematics, mechanics (Brandis, in the Rhein. Mus. iii. p. 134, &c.), grammar, music, and philosophy, but various other useful arts, we may form some notion from the list of his numerous works which is given by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 46—49), and which, as Diogenes expressly states, contains only his genuine works. The grammarian Thrasyllus, a contemporary of Philo, assures us that Democritus composed a vast number of works. (Diog. Laërt. v. 26.) His works were composed in the Ionic dialect, though not without some admixture of the local peculiarities of Abdera. (Philopon. in Aristot. de gener. et corrupt. fol. 7, a; Simplic. ad Aristot. de Coelo, fol. 150, a; Suid. s. v. porφύρα.) They are nevertheless much praised by Cicero on account of the poetical beauties and the liveliness of their style, and are in this respect compared even with the works of Plato. (Graec. van Prinsterer, l. c.; Cic. de Div. ii. 64, de Orat. i. 11, Orat. 20; Dionys. de Compos. verb. 24; Plut. Sympos. v. 7, p. 683.) Pyrrhon is said to have imitated his style (Euseb. Praep. Donig. iv. 16), and even Timon praises it, and calls it παράφωνα καλ δύονος μορφῆς. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 40.) Unfortunately, not one of his works has come down to us, and the treatise which we possess under his name is considered spurious. Callimachus wrote glosses upon his works and made a list of them (Suid. s. v.; but they must have been lost at an early time, since even Simplicius does not appear to have read them (Pappocord. de Atomiconorum doctrina, p. 22), and since comparatively few fragments have come down to us, and these fragments refer more to ethics than to physical matters. There is a very good collection of these fragments by F. G. A. Mullach, "Democriti Abdueritae operum fragmenta," Berlin, 1843, 8vo. Besides this work, which contains also elaborate dissertations on the life and writings of Democritus, the student may consult—1. The philosophy of Democritus has, in modern times been the subject of much investigation. Hegel (Vorlesung, ii. Gesch. d. Philos. i. p. 370, &c.) treats it very briefly, and does not attach much importance to it. The most minute investigations concerning it are those of Ritter (Gesch. d. Philos. i. p. 559), Brandis (Rhein. Mus. iii. p. 133, &c., and Gesch. der Griech. u. Röm. Philos. i. p. 294, &c.), Petersen (Histor. Philol. Studien. i. p. 22, &c.), Pappocord. (Atomiconorum doctrina), and Mullach (l. c. pp. 374—419).

It was Democritus who, in his numerous writings, carried out Leucippus's theory of atoms, and especially in his observations on nature. These atomists undertook the task of proving that the quantitative relations of matter were its original characteristics, and that their qualitative relations were something secondary and derivative, and of thus doing away with the distinction between matter and mind or power. (Brandis, l. c. p. 294.) In order to avoid the difficulties connected with the supposition of primitive matter with definite qualities, without admitting the coming into existence and annihilation as realities, and without giving up, as the Eleatic philosophers did, the reality of variety and its changes, the atomists derived all definiteness of phænomena, both physical and mental, from elementary particles, the infinite number of which were homogeneous in quality, but heterogeneous in form. This made it necessary for them to establish the reality of a vacuum or space, and of motion. (Brandis, l. c. p. 303, &c.) Motion, they said, is the eternal and necessary consequence of the original variety of atoms in the vacuum or space. All phænomena arise from the infinite variety of the form, order, and position of the atoms in forming combinations. It is impossible, they add, to derive this supposition from any higher principle, for a beginning of the infinite variety of the form and order, and position of the atoms was only originated by an original variety of the form, order, and position of the atoms in forming combinations. This creates a swinging, world-producing, and whirling motion. (This reminds us of the joke in the Clouds of Aristophanes about the god Δίος!) Now as similars attract one another, there arise in that motion real things and beings, that is, combinations of distinct atoms, which still continue to be separated from one another by the vacuum. The first cause of all existence is necessary, that is, the necessary predestination and necessary succession of cause and effect. This they called chance, in opposition to the suzis of Anaxagoras. But it does the highest honour to the mind of Democritus, that he made the discovery of cause the highest object of scientific investigations. He once said, that he preferred the discovery of a true cause to the possession of the kingdom of Persis. (Dionys. Alex. ap. Ennich. Proop. Evang. xiv. 27.) We must not, therefore, take the word chance (ρωγνή) in its vulgar acceptance. (Brandis, i. c. p. 319.) Aristotle understood by chance (φαινημα) what happens by accident (Phyl. i. ii. 4, p. 196. 11; Simplic. fol. 74.), as he generally valued him highly, and often says of him, that he had thought on all subjects, searched after the first causes of phaenomena, and endeavored to find definitions. (De Genet. et Corrupt. i. 2, 3, Metaph. M. 4, Phys. ii. 2, p. 194, 20, de Part. Anim. i. p. 642, 26.) The only thing for which he censures him, is a disregard for teleological relations, and the want of a comprehensive system of induction. (De Resp. 4, de Gener. Anim. v. 8.) Democritus himself called the common notion of chance a cover of human ignorance (πρεθαν αθινας ανωνυμα), and an invention of those who were too idle to think. (Dionys. ap. Ennich. Proop. Evang. xiv. 27; Stob. Eclog. 233, p. 444.)

Besides the infinite number of atoms existing in infinite space, Democritus also supposed the existence of an infinite number of worlds, some of which resembled one another, while others differed from one another, and each of these worlds was kept together as one thing by a sort of shell or skin. He derived the four elements from the form of the atoms predominating in each, from their quality, and their relations of magnitude. In deriving individual things from atoms, he mainly considered the qualities of warm and cold. The warm or fire-like he took to be a combination of fine, spherical, and very movable atoms, as opposed to the cold and moist. His mode of proceeding, however, was, first carefully to observe and describe the phaenomena themselves, and then to attempt his atomicistic explanation, whereby he essentially advanced the knowledge of nature. (Papencordt, l. c. p. 45, &c.; Brandis, l. c. p. 327.) He derived the soul, the origin of life, consciousness, and thought, from the finest fire-atoms (Aristot. de Anim. i. 2, ed. Trendelenburg); and in connexion with this theory he made very profound physiological investigations. It was for this reason that, according to him, the soul while in the body acquires perceptions and knowledge by corporeal contact, and that it is affected by heat and cold. The sensual perceptions themselves were to him affections of the organ or of the subject perceiving, dependent on the changes of bodily condition, on the difference of the organs and their quality, on air and light. Hence the differences, &c. of taste, colour, and temperature, are only conventional. (Sext. Empir. adv. Math. vii. 135.), the real cause of these differences being in the atoms.

It was very natural, therefore, that Democritus described even the knowledge obtained by sensual perception as obscure (σκοτηρια υπαρχειν). A clear and pure knowledge is only that which has reference to the true principles or the true nature of things, that is, to the atoms and space. But knowledge derived from reason was, in his opinion, not specifically different from that acquired through the senses; for conception and reflection were to him only effects of impressions made upon the senses. And Aristotle, therefore, expressly states, that Democritus did not consider mind as something peculiar, or as a power distinct from the soul or sensual perception, but that he considered knowledge derived from reason to be sensual perceptions. (De Anim. i. 2. p. 404, 27.) A purer and higher knowledge which he opposed to the obscure knowledge obtained through the medium of the senses, must therefore have been to him a kind of sensation, that is, a direct perception of the purest joy and the truest happiness are only the fruit of the higher mental activity exercised in the endeavour to understand the nature of things, of the peace of mind arising from good actions, and of a clear conscience. (Brandis, l. c. p. 337.)

The titles of the works which the ancients ascribed to Democritus may be found in Diogenes Laëritius. We find among them: 1. Works of ethics and practical philosophy. 2. On natural science. 3. On mathematics and astronomy. 4. On music and poetry, on rhythm and poetical beauty (Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst. i. p. 24, &c.), and on Homer. 5. Works of a linguistic and grammatical nature; for Democritus is one of the earliest Greek philosophers that made language the subject of his investigations. (Lersch, Sprachphilosophie der Alten, i. p. 18, &c.) 6. Works on medicine, 7. On agriculture, 8. On painting, 9. On mythology, history, &c. He had even acquired himself with success, with mechanics, and Vitruvius (Proef. iv. vii., comp. Sene. Epist. 90) ascribes to him certain inventions, for example, DEMOCRITUS (Δημοκρίτης). 1. Of Ephesus, wrote works on the Ephesian temple and the town of Samothrace. (Diog. Laert. ix. 49.) A fragment of his is preserved in Athenaeus. (xii. p. 523.)

3. Of Sicyon, is recommended by Cicero to the proconsul A. Aellinus (ad Fam. xiii. 78), as a highly educated man.

DEMODAMAS (Δημοδάμας), of Miletus or Halicarnassus, is called Sauencia et Antochii dps by Pliny. (H. N. vi. 16.) He appears to have written a geographical work on Asia, from which Pliny derived great assistance. He is mentioned also by Stephanius Byzantius (s. v. Aρταστός), and is probably the same as the Demodamas who according to Athenaeus (xv. p. 682) wrote a work on Halicarnassus. (περὶ Ἀλικαρνασσοῦ). [L. S.]

DEMODOCUS (Δημοδόκος), 1. The famous bard of the Odyssey, according to the fashion of the heroic ages delighted the guests of king Alcinous during their repast by singing about the feats of the Greeks at Troy, of the love of Ares and Aphrodite, and of the wooden horse. (Od. viii. 62, &c., xii. 27.) He is also mentioned as the bard who advised Agamemnon to guard Clytemnestra, and to expose Aegisthus in a desert island. (Od. vii. 267; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1466.) Eustathius describes him as a Laconian, and as a pupil of Autocides and Perimedes of Argos. He adds that he won the prize at the Pythian games and then followed Agamemnon to Mycenae. One story makes Odysseus recite Demodocus’s song about the destruction of Troy during a contest in Tyrrhenia. (Ptolem. Heph. 7.) On the throne of Apollo at Amycla, Demodocus was represented playing to the dance of the Paeonians. (Paus. iii. 18, § 7.) Later writers, who look upon this mythical minstrel as an historical person, describe him as a native of Corycyn, and as an aged and blind singer (Od. vi. 272), who composed a poem on the destruction of Troy (Τῶν πετρουμάτων), and on the marriage of Hephæastes and Aphrodite. (Plut. de Mus. 3; Eudoc. p. 407; Phot. Bibli. p. 152, ed. Bekker.) Plutarch (de Pl reconstruction of his name is mentioned by Philochorus. (xv. 55.) [L. S.]

DEMODOCUS (Δημοδόκος) of Leros, the author of four epigrams in the Greek Anthology, containing bitter attacks upon the Chians, Cappadocians, and Cilicians. (Brunck, Anal. ii. 56; Jacobs, ii. 56, xiii. 698.) He is mentioned by Aristotle. (Ethic. Nicom. vii. 9.) [P. S.]

DEMODOCUS (Δημοδόκος), a physician of Crotona. [DEMOCrites.]

DEMOLEON (Δημόλεων). There are four mythical beings of this name, a centaur (Ov. Met. xii. 555, &c.), a son of Phrixus and Chalciope (Hygin. Fab. 14), a son of Antenor and Theano, who was slain by Achilles (Hom. H. xx. 394), and a son of Hippasus, who was slain by Paris. (Quint. Smyrn. i. 110, &c.) [L. S.]

DEMOLEUS, a Greek, who had been slain by Aeacides, and whose coat of mail was offered by him as a prize in the games which he celebrated in Sicily. (Virg. Aen. v. 238, &c.) [L. S.]

DEMON (Δήμος). 1. The author of an Attis (Ἀττίς), or a history of Attica, against which Philochorus wrote his Attica, from which we may infer that Demon lived either shortly before or at the time of Philochorus. (Plut. Thes. 19, 23; Athen. iii. p. 90; Suid. s. v. παροικότροπος.) He is probably the same as the author of a work on περὶ παραμυθῶν, of which some fragments are still extant, (Steph. s. v. Σαλωδόν; Harpocrat. s. v. Μοῦσα λέον; Hesych. s. v. Οἶλος; Plutarch. passion; Suidas, s. v. Δημοδόκος; Schol. ad Hom. Od. xi. 203, &c.) He is mentioned by Schol. ad Hom. Od. xx. 301, H. xvi. 283; ed. Pind. Nom. vii. 155, ed. Eurip. Rhes. 424; Zenod. Proceb. v. 52; Apostol. vii. 44, xiii. 36, xvii. 28, xx. 27; Ariston. Vid. pp. 186, 468; and of a work on sacrifices (περὶ Σωφρονίτου; Harpocrat. s. v. πόρφυρα.) The fragments of the works of Demon are collected in Siebel’s Phainomeneum (Demonis, Citoyens et Livres Ἀττίδων et relig. Fragm. Leipzig, 1812. (See especially p. vii. &c., and p. 17, &c., and in C. and Th. Muller, Fragm. Hist. Græc. p. 376, &c. Comp. p. lxvii. &c.)

2. Of the demos of Paestum in Attica, was a son of Demosthenes’s sister, and distinguished himself as an orator; he belonged, like his great kinsman, to the anti-Macedonian party. When, after the death of Alexander, Demosthenes was still in exile and tried to reunite the Greeks to a vigorous resistance against the Macedonians, Demon proposed a decree to recall him. It was joyfully passed by the Athenians, and Demosthenes returned in triumph. (Plut. Demosth. 27; Athen., viii. p. 341, xiii. p. 539, where a son of his, Phrynion, is mentioned.) [L. S.]

DEMONASSA (Δημονάσσα). 1. The wife of Irus, and mother of Eurydamas and Bryunt. (Hygin. Fug. 14; Apollon. Rhod. 1. 74.)

2. A daughter of Amphirhaus and Eriphyle, was the wife of Thersander, by whom she became the mother of Tisamenus. (Paus. iii. 15, § 6, ix. 8, § 6.) [L. S.]

3. The mother of Aegeus by Adrastus. (Hygin. Fug. 71.)

DEMONAX (Δημόναξ), the most distinguished of those who attempted to revive the cynical doctrines in the second century of the Christian era.
DEMOPHANES.

DEMOPHILUS. [DEMOPHILUS.]

DEMOPHILUS (Δαμοφίλιος). 1. The son of Epictetus, was an historian in the time of Alexander the Great. He continued his father's history by adding to it the history of the Sacred War from the taking of Delphi and the plunder of its temple by Phoenicians; Phoenician, c. 357. Diod. xvi. 14; Suid. s. a. "Epiftos, where Epifos should be read for Epiftos; Athen. vi. p. 232, d.; Schol. Hom. H. xlii. 301; Vasius, de Hist. Graec. p. 88, ed. Westermann.

2. A Greek comic poet of the new comedy. The only mention of him is in the Prologue to the Aistaria of Phatus, who says, that his play is taken from the Oyayos of Demophilus, vv. 10–13, "Huic nomen Graece est Onagos Fabulius. Demophilus scriptum, Mecus vorit barbarae. Asinariae ludusque ornatus etiropiae, si per vos licet. Inest lepos ludusque in sacra Comedia." Meineke observes, that, judging from the "lepos ludusque" of the Aistaria, we have no need to regret the loss of the Oyayos. (Meineke, Frug. Com. Graec. i. p. 491.)

3. A Pythagorean philosopher, of whose personal history nothing is known. He wrote a work entitled Bliv Sceptera, treating of practical ethics, parts of which are still extant, in the form of a selection, entitled γραματεια δεμοφιλιου, from which we may infer that the whole work must have been of the highest order of excellence. The extant portion of it was first printed by Lucas Holstenius in his collection of the ancient writers on practical morals, Rome, 1658, 8vo., Legd. Bat. 1660, 12mo.; then by Gale, in his Opus. Mythol. Cant. 1670, 8vo., Amst. 1668, 8vo., also with the Oxford edition of Maximiuns Tyrannus, 1677, 12mo., and with Wetstein's Epictetus, Amst. 1750, 12mo.; in a separate form by J. Swedberg, Stockholm, 1682, 8vo., and more correctly by I. A. Schier, Lips. 1754, 8vo., and lastly by J. C. Orrelli, in his Opusc. Graec. Vet. Sentent. Lips. 1791, 8vo. [P. S.]

DEMOPHILUS, artists. 1. Of Himera, a painter, who flourished about a. c. 424, was said by some to have been the teacher of Zeuxis. (Plin. xxxv. 9. s. 36. § 2; Zeuxis.)

2. An architect of little note, wrote Pracepsita Symmetriae. [Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 14.] See also DEMOPHIDUS. [P. S.]

DEMOPHON or DEMOPHOON (Δαμοφόνος or Δαμοφόνος). 1. The youngest son of Coleon and Metaneire, who was entrusted to the care of Demeter. He grew up under her without any human food, being fed by the goddess with her own milk, and ambrosia. During the night she used to place him in fire to secure to him eternal youth; but once she was observed by Metaneira, who disturbed the goddess by her cries, and the child Demophon was consumed by the flames. (Apollod. i. 5. § 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 512, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 147; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 294.)

2. A son of Theseus and Phaedra, and brother of Acamas. (Diod. iv. 22; Hygin. Fab. 48.) According to Pindar (ap. Pind. Thea. 20), he was the son of Theseus by Antiope. He accompanied the Greeks against Troy (Hierer, however, does

DEMOPHON or DEMOPHOON (Δαμοφόνος or Δαμοφόνος). 1. The youngest son of Coleon and Metaneire, who was entrusted to the care of Demeter. He grew up under her without any human food, being fed by the goddess with her own milk, and ambrosia. During the night she used to place him in fire to secure to him eternal youth; but once she was observed by Metaneira, who disturbed the goddess by her cries, and the child Demophon was consumed by the flames. (Apollod. i. 5. § 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 512, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 147; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 294.)

DEMON ECUS (Δεμών Εκτός), a daughter of Agenor, the father of Theseus, and the mother of Agamemnon. (Horn. Hymn, in Cer.)

DEMON ECUS (Δεμών Εκτός). She was the mother of Theseus, the most celebrated of the Greek heroes, and the founder of the Athenian race. She was the daughter of Agenor, the king of Crete, and the sister of Agamemnon. (Horn. Hymn, in Cer.)

DEMON ECUS (Δεμών Εκτός). She was the mother of Theseus, the most celebrated of the Greek heroes, and the founder of the Athenian race. She was the daughter of Agenor, the king of Crete, and the sister of Agamemnon. (Horn. Hymn, in Cer.)

DEMONIUS (Δημονίους), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, of whom one fragment is preserved by Athenaeus (ix. p. 410, d.), who gives ΑΧΛΕΝΙΟΣ as the title of the play; but perhaps it should rather be ΑΧΛΕΝΙΟΣ. (Meineke, Frug. Com. Graec. i. p. 492, iv. p. 570.) [P. S.]

DEMOPIION or DEMOPHIONS (Δαμοφίων or Δαμοφίων). 1. The youngest son of Coleon and Metaneire, who was entrusted to the care of Demeter. He grew up under her without any human food, being fed by the goddess with her own milk, and ambrosia. During the night she used to place him in fire to secure to him eternal youth; but once she was observed by Metaneira, who disturbed the goddess by her cries, and the child Demophon was consumed by the flames. (Apollod. i. 5. § 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 512, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 147; Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 294.)

2. The son of Theseus and Phaedra, and brother of Acamas. (Diod. iv. 22; Hygin. Fab. 48.) According to Pindar (ap. Pind. Thea. 20), he was the son of Theseus by Antiope. He accompanied the Greeks against Troy (Hierer, however, does not mention him), and there effected the liberation of his grandmother Aethra, who was with Helen as a slave. (Paus. x. 25. § 2.) According to Plutarch he was beloved by Laodice, who became by him the mother of Mnycnus or Munytus whom Aethra brought up in secret at Ilium. On Demophon's return from Troy, Phyllis, the daughter of the Thracian king Siston, fell in love with him, and he consented to marry her. But, before the nuptials were celebrated, he went to Attica to settle his affairs at home, and as he tarryed longer than Phyllis had expected, she began to think that she was forgotten, and put an end to her life. She was, however, metamorphosed into a tree, and Demophon, when he at last returned and saw what had happened, exclaimed against Eurythems, who had been upon his bosom, whose buds and leaves immediately came forth. (Ov. Am. iii. 38; Herod. ii.; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. v. 10; comp. Hygin. Fab. 59.) Afterwards, when Diomedes on his return from Troy was thrown on the coast of Attica, and without knowing the country began to ravage it, Demophon marched out against the invaders: he took the Palladium from them, but had the misfortune to kill an Athenian in the struggle. For this murder he was summoned by the people of Athens before the court &\(\theta\)\(\pi\)\(\alpha\)\(\lambda\)\(\delta\)\(\iota\)--the first time that a man was tried by that court. (Paus. i. 28. § 3.) According to Antoninus Liberalis (33) Demophon assisted the Hellenidae against Eurystheus, who fell in battle, and the Hellenidae received from Demophon settlements in Attica, which were called the tetrapolis. Orestes too came to Athens to seek the protection of Demophon. He arrived during the celebration of the Anthestheria, and was kindly received; but the precautions which were taken that he might not pollute the sacred rights gave rise to the second day of the festival, which was called \(\chi\)\(\epsilon\)\(\tau\)\(\sigma\). (Athen. x. p. 437; Plat. Symp. ii.) Demophon was painted in the Leche at Delphi together with Helena and Aethra, meditating how he might liberate Aethra. (Paus. i. 28. § 3.)

3. A companion of Aeneas, who was killed by Camilla. (Vir. Aen. xi. 675.)

DEMOSTHENES (\(\Delta\)\(m\)\(o\)\(s\)\(t\)\(h\)\(e\)\(n\)\(e\)\(s\), son of Alcmaeon, Athenian general, is one of the prominent characters of the Peloponnesian war. He was appointed in the sixth year, n. c. 426, to the command with Procles of a squadron of thirty ships sent on the annual cruise around Peloponnesus. Their first important efforts were directed against Levy; and with the aid of a large force of Acarnanians, Zacynthians, Cephalenians, and Corcyreans, it seemed highly probable that this important ally of Sparta might be reduced. And the Acarnanians were urgent for a blockade. Demosthenes, however, had conceived, from the information of the Messenians, hopes of a loftier kind; and, at the risk of offending the Acarnanians, who threatened to come to terms, sailed with views to Naupactus. The Corcyreans had also left him, but he still persevered in his project, which was the reduction of the Aetolians—an operation which, once effected, would open the way to the Phocians, a people ever well disposed to Athens, and so into Boeotia. It was not too much to hope that northern Greece might thus be wholly detached from the Spartan alliance, and the war be made strictly Peloponnesian. The success of the first move in this plan depended much on the aid of certain allies among the Ozolian Locrians, who were used to the peculiar warfare of the enemy. These, however, were remiss. Demosthenes, fearing that to make of his purpose would rouse the whole Aetolian nation, advanced without them. His fear had been already realized, and as soon as the resources of his archery were exhausted, he was obliged to retreat, and this retreat the loss of his guide rendered even more disastrous than might have been expected for a force of heavy-armed men amidst the perpetual assaults of numerous light armed enemies. "There was every kind of flight and destruction," says Thucydides, "and of 300 Athenians there fell 120, a loss rendered heavy beyond proportion, through the peculiar excellence of this particular detachment." (Thuc. iii. 91, 94, 98; Diod. xii. 60.)

This, however, seemed to be hardly the worst consequence. The Aetolians sent ambassadors to Sparta, to ask aid to reduce Naupactus, and as they received under the command of Eurylochus 3000 men-at-arms. The Ozolian Locrians were overawed into decided alliance. But Naupactus Demosthenes was enabled to save by reinforcements obtained on urgent entreaty from the offended Aetolians; and Eurylochus led off his forces for the present to Calydon, Pleuron, and Proschium. Yet this was but the preliminary of a more important movement. The Ambrazists, on a secret understanding with him, advanced with a large force into the country of their ancient enemy, the Amphictionian Argos; they posted themselves not far from the town, at Olpa. Eurylochus now broke up, and, by a judicious route, passing between the town itself and Crenae, where the Aetolians had assembléd to intercept him, effected a junction with these allies. Presently, on the other hand, Demosthenes arrived with twenty ships, and under his conduct the final engagement took place at Olpa, and was decided, by an ambuscade which he planted, in favour of the Athenians and Aetolians. An almost greater advantage was gained by the compact entered into with Menedaeans, the surviving Spartan officer, for the underhand withdrawal of the Peloponnesians. And, finally, having heard that the whole remaining force of Ambracia was advancing in support, he succeeded further in waylaying and almost exterminating it in the battle of Ildome. The Athenians received a third part of the spoils, and the amount may be estimated from the fact, that the share of Demosthenes, the only portion that reached Athens in safety, was no less than 800 panoplies. (Thuc. iii. 102, 105—114; Diod. xii. 66.)

Demosthenes might now safely venture home: and in the next year he was allowed, at his own request, though not in office, to accompany Eurymedon and Sophocles, the commanders of a squadron destined for Sicily, and empowered to use their services for any object he chose on the Peloponnesian coast. They, however, would not hear of any delay, and it was only by the chance of stress of weather, which detained the fleet at Phyle, his choice for his new design, that he was enabled to effect his purpose. The men themselves while waiting, took the fancy to build him his fort; and in it he was left with five ships. Here he was assaulted by the Lacedaemonians, whom the news had recalled out of Attica, and from Coreyn, and here with great spirit and success he defeated their attempt to carry the place on the sea side. The arrival of forty Athenian ships, for which he had sent, and their success in making their way into the harbour, reversed his position. The Lacedaemonians, who in their siege of the place had occupied the neighbouring island, were now cut off and blockaded, and Sparta now humbled herself to ask for peace. (Thuc. iv. 66—74, 76, 77, 89, 101; Diod. xii. 66—69.)

He does not reappear in history, except among the signatures to the treaties of the tenth year, b. c. 422 (Thuc. v. 19, 24), till the nineteenth, b. c. 413. On the arrest of Nicias giving an account of the relief of Syracuse by Gylippus, he was appointed with Eurymedon to the command of the reinforcements, and, while the latter went at once to Sicily, he remained at home making the needful preparations. Early in the spring he set sail with sixty-five ships; and after some delays, far more unfortunate we cannot say, at Aegina and Coreyn, on the coasts of Peloponnesus and of Italy, reached Syracuse a little too late to prevent the first naval victory of the besieged. (Thuc. vii. 16, 17, 20, 26, 31, 33, 35, 42.)

The details of this concluding portion of the Syracusan expedition cannot be given in a life of Demosthenes. His advice, on his arrival, was to make at once the utmost use of their own present strength and their enemies' consternation, and then at once, if they failed, to return. No immediate conclusion of the siege could be expected without the recovery of the high ground commanding the city, Epione. After some unsuccessful attempts by day, Demosthenes devised and put into effect a plan for an attack, with the whole forces, by night. It was at first signal success, but the tide was turned by the resistance of a body of Boeotians, and the victory changed to a disastrous defeat. Demosthenes now counselled an immediate departure, either to Athens, or, if Nicias, whose professions of greater acquaintance with the internal state of the besieged greatly influenced his brother generals, really had grounds for hope, at any rate from their present unhealthy position to the safe and wholesome situation of Thapus. Demosthenes reasoned in vain: then ensued the fatal delay, the return of Gylippus with fresh reinforcements, the late consent of Nicias to depart, and the intimated recital of it on the eclipse of the moon, the first defeat and the second of the all-important ships. In the latter engagement Demosthenes had the chief command, and retained even in the hour of disaster sufficient coolness to see that the only course remaining was at once to make a fresh attempt to break through the blockading ships and force the way to sea. And he had now the voice of Nicias with him: the army itself in desperation refused. In the subsequent retreat by the land, Demosthenes for some time is described simply as co-operating with Nicias, though with the separate command of the second and rearmost division. This, on the sixth day, through its greater exposure to the enemy, was unable to keep up with the other; and Demosthenes, as in his position was natural, looked more to defence against the enemy, while Nicias thought only of speedy retreat. The consequence was that, having fallen about five miles and a half behind, he was surrounded and driven into a plot of ground planted. with olives, fenced nearly round with a wall, where he was exposed to the missiles of the enemy. Here he surrendered, towards evening, on condition of the lives of his soldiers being spared.

His own was not. In confinement at Syracuse Nicia and he were once more united, and were together relieved by a speedy death. Such was the condition of the lives of his soldiers being spared. My. Here he surrendered, towards evening, on the wish of Gylippus, who coveted the glory of the unworthy decree of the Syracusan assembly, against the voice, say Diodorus and Plutarch, of his contemporaries, and, contrary, says Thucydides, to the wish of Glyppus, who coveted the glory of conveying the two great Athenian commanders to Sparta. (Thuc. vii. 42-97; Diod. xiii. 10-33; Plut. Nicia, 20-28.) Timæus, adds Phirtarch, related that Hermeocrates contrived to apprise them of the decree, and that they fell by their own hands.

Demosthenes may be characterized as an unfortunate general. Had his fortune but equaled his ability, he had achieved perhaps a name greater than any of the generals of his time. In the largeness and boldness of his designs, the quickness and decision of his execution, the courage and constancy of his conduct of his own relatives and guardians unequivocal in attending to the details of execution than he was farsighted and fertile in devising the outline. Yet this must be doubtful: what we learn from history is, that to Demosthenes his country owed her superiority at the peace of Nicias, and to him rather than to her her defeat at Syracuse. Of his position at home among the various parties of the state we know little or nothing: he appears to have been of high rank: in Aristophanes he is described as leading the charge of the Hippisc upon Cleon (Epitcles, 242), and his place in the play throughout seems to imply it. [A. H. C.]

DEMOSTHENES (Δημοσθένης), the greatest of the Greek orators, was the son of one Demosthenes, and born in the Attic demos of Paeania. Respecting the year of his birth, the statements of the ancients differ as much as the opinions of modern critics. Some of the earlier scholars reckoned in the express testimony of Dinomachus of Halicarnassus (Ep. ad Amm. i. 4), who says that Demosthenes was born in the year preceding the hundredth Olympiad, that is, Ol. 99, 4, or c. 391. Gellius (xv. 23) states that Demosthenes was in his twenty-seventh year at the time when he composed his orations against Androtion and Timocrates, which belong to c. 355, so that the birth of Demosthenes would fall in c. 355 or 356, the latter of which is adopted by Clement. (F. H. ii. 30, 12.)

According to the account in the lives of the Ten Orators (p. 845. D.) Demosthenes was born in the archbishopric of Delticium, that is, c. 355, and this statement has been adopted by most modern critics, such as Becker, Böckh, Westermann, Thirlwall, and others; whereas some have endeavoured to prove that he was born in c. 394. The opinion now most commonly received is, that Demosthenes was born in c. 395. For detailed discussions on this question the reader is referred to the works mentioned at the end of this article.

When Demosthenes, the father, died, he left behind him a widow, the daughter of Gylon, and two children, Demosthenes, then a boy of seven, and a daughter who was only five years old. (Plut. Dem. 4; Dem. c. Apol. ii. p. 336; Asch. c. Ctesiph. § 171; Boeckh, Corp. Inscription. i. p. 494.)

During the last moments of his life, the father had entrusted the protection of his wife and children and the care of his property, partly capital and partly a large sword manufactury, to three guards, Aphiobus, a son of his sister Demophon, a son of his brother, and an old friend Theriplides, on condition that the third should marry the widow and receive with her a dowry of eighty minae; the second was to marry the daughter on her attaining the age of maturity, and was to receive at once two talents, and the third was to have the interest of seventy minae, till Demosthenes, the son, should come of age. (Dem. c. Apol. i. pp. 814, 816, ii. 840.) But the first two of the guardians did not comply with the stipulations made in the will, and all three, in spite of all the remonstrances of the family, united in squandering and appropriating to themselves a great portion of the handsome property, which is estimated at upwards of fourteen talents, and might easily have been doubled during the minority of Demosthenes by a prudent administration. But, as it was, the property gradually was so reduced, that when Demosthenes became of age, his guardians had no more than seventy minae, that is, only one twelfth of the property which the father had left. (Dem. c. Apol. i. pp. 812, 823, 815, c. Ouat. p. 865.) This shameful conduct of his own relatives and guardians unquestionably exercised a great influence on the mind and character of Demosthenes, for it was probably during that early period that, suffering as he was through the injustices of those from whom he had a right to expect protection, his strong feeling of right and wrong was planted and developed in him, a feeling which characterizes his whole subsequent life. He was thus thrown upon his own resources, and the result was great self-reliance, independence of judgment, and his oratory, which was the only art by which he could hope to get justice done to himself.

Although Demosthenes passed his youth amid such troubles and vexations, there is no reason for believing with Plutarch (Dem. 4), that he grew up neglected and without any education at all. The very fact that his guardians are accused of having refused to pay his teachers (c. Aphiob. i. p. 829) shows that he received some kind of education, which is further confirmed by Demosthenes's own statement (da Coron. pp. 812, 813), though it cannot be supposed that his education comprised much more than an elementary course. The many illustrious personages that are mentioned as his teachers, must be conceived to have been connected with him after he had attained the age of manhood. He is said to have been instructed in philosophy by Plato. (Plut. Dem. 5, Vit. X Ouat.)
According to some accounts he received his instruction, and to make him, as some critics have done, a perfect Platonist, is certainly going too far. According to some accounts he was instructed in oratory by Isocrates (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 844; Phot. Bibli. p. 492), but this was a disputed point with the ancients themselves, some of whom stated, that he was not personally instructed by Isocrates, but only that he studied the orations which Isocrates had written. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 837, Dem. 5.) The tradition of Demosthenes having been a pupil of Isocrates is, moreover, not supported by any evidence derived from the orations of Demosthenes himself, who speaks with contempt of the rhetorical school of Isocrates (c. Lucrin. pp. 928, 937), and an unbiased reader of the works of the two orators cannot discover any direct influence of the elder upon the younger one, for certain words and phrases cannot assuredly be taken as proofs to the contrary. The account that Demosthenes was instructed in oratory by Isocrates is further supported by the evidence of a fact, that the earliest orations of Demosthenes, viz., those against Aphiobus and Onetor, bear so strong a resemblance to those of Isaeus, that the ancients themselves believed them to have been composed by Isaeus for Demosthenes, or that the latter had written them under the guidance of the former. (Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 839; Liban. Vit. Dem. p. 3, Argum. ad Orat. c. Orest. p. 873.) We may suppose without much hesitation, that during the latter years of his minority Demosthenes privately prepared himself for the career of an orator, to which he was urged on by his peculiar circumstances no less than by the admiration he felt for the orators of his time, and that during the first years after his attaining the age of manhood he availed himself of the instruction of Isaeus. Immediately after becoming of age in b.c. 366, Demosthenes called upon his guardians to render him an account of their administration of his property; but by intrigues they contrived to defer the business for two years, which was perhaps less disagreeable to him, as he had to prepare himself and to acquire a certain legal knowledge and oratorical power before he could venture to come forward in his own cause with any hope of success. In the course of these two years, however, the matter was twice investigated by the diacetae, and was decided each time in favour of Demosthenes. (Dem. c. Aphob. i. p. 828; c. Aphob. iii. p. 861.) At length, in the third year after his coming of age, in the archonship of Timocrates, a. c. 364 (Dem. c. Oret. p. 868), Demosthenes brought his accusation against Aphiobus before the archon, reserving to himself the right to bring similar charges against Demophon and Theripides, which, however, he does not appear to have done (c. Aphob. i. p. 817; Plut. Vit. X Orat. p. 844; Zeotim. Vit. Dem. p. 147). Aphiobus was condemned to pay a fine of ten talents. This verdict was obtained by Demosthenes in the face of all the intrigues to which Aphiobus had resorted for the purpose of thwarting him and involving him in a series of other law suits (c. Aphob. p. 862). The extant orations of Demosthenes against Aphiobus, who endeavoured to prevent his taking possession of his property, refer to these transactions. Demosthenes had thus gained a signal victory over his enemies, notwithstanding all the extraordinary disadvantages under which he laboured, for his physical constitution was weak, and his organ of speech deficient—whence, probably, he derived the nickname of Batarus, the delicate youth, or the stammerer—and it was only owing to the most unwearied and persevering exertions that he succeeded in overcoming and removing the obstacles which nature had placed in his way. These exertions were probably made by him after he had arrived at the age of manhood. In this manner, and by speaking in various civil cases, he prepared himself for the career of a political orator and statesman. It is very doubtful whether Demosthenes, like some of his predecessors, engaged also in teaching rhetoric, as some of his Greek biographers assert. The suit against Aphiobus had made Meidias a formidable and implacable enemy of Demosthenes (Dem. c. Aphob. ii. p. 846, c. Med. p. 539, &c.), and the danger to which he thus became exposed was the more fearful, since except his personal powers and virtues he had nothing to oppose to Meidias, who was the most active member of a coterie, which, although yet without any definite political tendency, was preparing the ruin of the republic by violating its laws and sacrificing its resources to personal and selfish interests. The first acts of open hostility were committed in b.c. 361, when Meidias forced his way into the house of Demosthenes and insulted the members of his family. This led Demosthenes to bring against him the action of nauropia, and when Meidias after his condemnation did not fulfill his obligations, Demosthenes brought against him a Bien epiwous (Dem. c. Med. p. 540, &c.) Meidias found no means to prevent any decision being given for a period of eight years, and at length, in b.c. 354, he had an opportunity to take revenge upon Demosthenes, who had in that year voluntarily undertaken the choregia. Meidias not only endeavoured in all possible ways to prevent Demosthenes from discharging his office in its proper form, but attacked him with open violence during the celebration of the great Dionysia. (Dem. c. Med. p. 518.) Such an act committed before the eyes of the people demanded reparation, and Demosthenes brought an action against him. Public opinion condemned Meidias, and it was in vain that he made all possible efforts to intimidate Demosthenes, who remained firm in spite of all his enemy's machinations, until at length, when an amicable arrangement was proposed, Demosthenes accepted it, and withdrew his accusation. It is said that he received from Meidias the sum of thirty minae. (Plut. Dem. 12; Aeschin. c. Cleisth. § 52.) The reason why Demosthenes withdrew his accusation was in all probability his fear of the powerful party of which Meidias was the leader; he accepting the sum of thirty minae, which, however, can scarcely be treated as an authentic fact (Ist. Epist. iv. 205), has been looked upon as an illegal act, and has been brought forward as a proof that Demosthenes was accessible to bribes. But the law which forbade the dropping of a public accusation (Dem. c. Med. p. 529)
DEMOSTHENES.

DEMOSTHENES. 283

does not appear to have been always strictly observed, as it was merely intended to prevent frivolous and unfounded accusations. If, on the other hand, Demosthenes did receive the thirty minae, it does not follow that it was a bribe, for that sum may have been required of him as a fine for dropping his accusation against Meidias, or Demosthenes may have regarded that sum as a satisfactory acknowlledgement of the guilt of his enemy. This affair belongs to the year B. c. 355, in which also the extant oration against Meidias was written, but as Demosthenes did not follow up the suit, the oration was left in its unfinished state.

Demosthenes had some years before this event
come forward as a speaker in the public assembly, for in B. c. 355 he had delivered the orations against Leptines and Androtion (Dionys. Ep. ad Ann. i. 4), and in B. c. 353 the oration against Timocrates. The general esteem which Demosthenes enjoyed as early as that time is sufficiently attested by the fact, that in B. c.
354, in spite of all the intrigues of Meidias, he was confirmed in the dignity of archithoros, to which he had been elected by lot (Dem. c. Meid.
p. 551), and that in the year following he conducted, in the capacity of archithoros, the usual
session of the towns of Amphipolis, Pydna, Potidae, and Methone. During those proceedings he had contrived to keep the Athenians at a distance.

The next event in which Demosthenes took an.
active part was the beginning of the career of Demosthenes as one of the leading statesmen of Athens, and henceforth the history of his life is closely mixed up with that of his country; for there is no question affecting the public good in which he did not take the most active part, and support with all the power of his oratory what he considered right and beneficial to the state. King Philip of Macedonia had commenced in B. c. 355
his encroachments upon the possessions of Athens in the north of the Aegean, and he had taken possession of the towns of Amphipolis, Pydna, Potidae, and Methone. During those proceedings he had contrived to keep the Athenians at a distance, to deceive them and keep them in good humour by delusions and apparently favourable promises.
Demosthenes was not, indeed, the only man who saw that these proceedings were merely a prelude to greater things, and that unless the king was checked, he would attempt the subjugation, not only of Athens but of all Greece; but Demosthenes was the only person who had the honesty and the courage openly to express his opinions, and to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength against the common foe. His patriotic feelings and convictions against Macedonian aggrandizement are the groundwork of his Philippics, a series of the most splendid and spirited orations. They did not, it is true, produce the desired results, but the fault was not his, and the cause of their failure must be sought in the state of general dissolution in the Greek republics at the time; for while Philip occupied his threatening position, the Phoicians were engaged in a war for life and death with the Thebans; the states of Peloponnesus looked upon one another with mistrust and hatred, and it was only with great difficulty that Athens
could maintain a shadow of its former supremacy.
The Athenians themselves, as Demosthenes says, were indolent, even when they knew what ought to be done; they could not rouse themselves to an energetic opposition; their measures were in most cases only half measures; they never acted at the right time, and indulged in spending the treasures of the republic upon costly pompous and festivities, instead of employing them as means to ward off the danger that was gathering like a storm at a distance. This disposition was, moreover, fostered by the ruling party at Athens. It was further an unfortunate circumstance for Athens that, although she had some able generals, yet she had no military genius of the first order to lead her forces against the Macedonian, and make head against him. It was only on one occasion, in B. c. 355, that the Athenians gained decided advantages by a participation of their fleet, which prevented Philip passing Thermopylae during the war between the Phocians and the Thebans. But a report of Philip's illness and death soon made room for the old apathy, and the good-will of those who would have acted with spirit was paralyzed by the entire absence of any definite plan in the war against Macedonia, although the necessity of such a plan had been pointed out, and proposals had been made for it by Demosthenes in his first Philippic, which was spoken in B. c. 352. Philip's attack upon Olynthus in B. c. 349, which terminated in the year following with the conquest of the place, deprived the Athenians of their last stronghold in the north.
At the request of several embassies from the Olynthians, and on the impressive exhortation of Demosthenes in his three Olynthiac orations, the Athenians had indeed made considerable efforts to save Olynthus (Dem. de Pala. Leg. p. 426; Dionys.
Ep. ad Ann. i. 9), but their operations were thwarted in the end by a treacherous plot which was formed at Olynthus itself, and the town fell into the hands of Philip.

The next event in which Demosthenes took an active part is the peace with Philip, which from its originator is called the peace of Philocrates, and is one of the most obscure points in the history of Demosthenes and of Athens, since none of the historians or other works are extant entering into the details of the subject. Our only sources of inforinformation are the orations of Demosthenes and Aeschines on the embassy (παραπαραπεσδαζ), which contain statements so much at variance and so contradictory, that it is next to impossible to come to any certain conclusions, although, if we consider the characters of the two orators, the authority of Demosthenes is entitled to higher credit than that of Aeschines. The former may, to some extent, have been labouring under a delusion, but Aeschines had the intention to deceive. The following particulars, however, may be looked upon as well established. During the Olynthian war, Philip had expressed his willingness to conclude a peace and alliance with Athens, and the Athenians, who were tired of the war and unable to form a coalition against the king, had accepted the proposal. Philocrates accordingly advised the Athenians to commence negotiations and to send an embassy to Philip. Demosthenes supported the plan, and Philocrates, Aeschines, and Demosthenes were among the ambassadors who went to the king. The transactions with Philip are not quite clear, though they must have referred to the Phocians and Thespians also, for the Phocians were allied with Athens, and the Athenian ambassadors probably demanded that the Phocians should be included in the treaty of peace and alliance between Macedon and Athens. But this was made objectionable to Philip, who was inclined to agree to, since he had already resolved upon the destruction of the Phocians. It is, therefore, very probable that he may have quieted the ambassadors by vague promises, and have declined to comply with their demand under the pretex that he could not make a public declaration in favour of the Phocians on account of his relation to the Thessalians and Thespians. After the return of the ambassadors to Athens, the peace was discussed in two successive assemblies of the people, and it was at length sanctioned and sworn to by an oath to the king's ambassadors. Aeschines censures Demosthenes for having hurried the conclusion of this peace so much, that the Athenians did not even wait for the arrival of the deputies of their allies, who had been invited, and the contradictory manner in which Demosthenes himself (de Polis. Leg. p. 314, p. 322) speaks of the matter seems indeed to cast some suspicion upon him; but the cause of Demosthenes's acting as he did may have been the vague manner in which Philip had expressed himself in regard to the Phocians. At any rate, however, quick decision was absolutely necessary, since Philip was in the meantime making war upon Cersobleptes, a king of Thrace, and since, in spite of his promises to spare the possessions of Athens in the Chersonesus, he might easily have been tempted to stretch out his hands after them; in order to prevent this, it was necessary that Philip, as soon as possible, should take his oath to the treaty of peace and alliance, which was Athens. It was on this occasion that the treacherous designs of Aeschines and his party became manifest, for notwithstanding the urgent admonitions of Demosthenes not to lose any time, the embassy to receive the king's oath (ἐκ τοῦ ὑπὲρτος), of which both Aeschines and Demosthenes were again members (the statement in the article Aeschines, p. 37, that Demosthenes was not one of the ambassadors, must be corrected: see Newman in the Classical Museum, vol. 1, p. 145), set out with a slowness as if there had been no danger whatever, and instead of taking the shortest road to Macedonia by sea, the ambassadors travelled by land. On their arrival in Macedonia they quietly waited till Philip returned from Thrace. Nearly three months passed away in this manner, and when at length Philip arrived, he deferred taking his oath until he had completed his preparations against the Phocians. Accompanied by the Athenian ambassadors, he then marched into Thrasylus, and it was not till his arrival at Phreme that he took his oath to the treaty, from which he now excluded the Phocians. When the ambassadors arrived at Athens, Demosthenes immediately and boldly denounced the treachery of his colleagues in the embassy; but in vain. Aeschines succeeded in allaying the fears of the people, and persuaded them quietly to wait for the issue of the events. Philip in the meantime passed Thermopylae, and the fate of Phocis was decided without a blow. The king was now admitted as a member of the Amphictyonic league, and the Athenians, who had allowed themselves to act the part of mere spectators during those proceedings, were now unable to do anything, but still they ventured to express their indignation at the king's conduct by refusing their sanction to his becoming a member of the Amphictyonic league. The mischief, however, was done, and in order to prevent still more serious consequences, Demosthenes in n. c. 346, delivered his imperious "call to peace" (καλλίστερα), and the people gave way.

From this time forward the two political parties are fully developed, and openly act against each other; the party or rather the faction to which Aeschines belonged, was bribed by Philip to oppose the true patriots, who were headed by Demosthenes. He was assisted in his great work by such able men as Lycurgus, Hyperides, Polyaeustus, Hegesippus, and others, and being supported by his confidence in the good cause, he soon reached the highest point in his career as a statesman and orator. The basis of his power and influence was the people's confidence in his incorruptible love of justice and of his pure and enthusiastic love of his country. This conviction manifested itself clearly in the vengeance which the people took upon the treacherous Philocrates. (Aesch. c. Cleop. § 79.) But this admiration and reverence for real and virtuous greatness soon cooled, and it was in vain that Demosthenes endeavoured to place the other men who had betrayed their country to Philip in their embassy to him, in the same light as Philemotes (Dem. de Polis. Leg. p. 376), for tho people were unwilling to sacrifice more than the one man, whom the Macedonian party itself had given up in order to save the rest. It was undoubtedly owing to the influence of this party that Aeschines, when after a long delay he consented to render an account of his conduct during the embassy, n. c. 343, escaped punishment, notwithstanding the vehement attacks of Demosthenes in the written oration ἡ ρήματα τῶν ἐν θηρασίαις. [Aeschines, p. 38.]

In the mean time Philip followed up his plans for the reduction of Greece. With a view of drawing the Peloponnesians into his interests, he tried to win the confidence of the Argives and Messenians, who were then pariliated by Sparta; he even sent them subsidies and threatened Sparta with an attack. (Dem. Phil. ii. p. 69.) Sparta did not venture to offer any resistance, and the Athenians, who were allied with Sparta, felt unable to do anything more than send ambassadors to Peloponnesus, among whom was Demosthenes, to draw the Peloponnesians away from the Macedonians, and to caution them against his intrigues. (Dem. Phil. ii. p. 70, &c.) In consequence of these proceedings, ambassadors from Philip and the Peloponnesians met at Athens to complain of the Athenians favouring the ambitious schemes of Sparta, which aimed at suppressing the freedom of the peninsula, and to demand an explanation of their conduct. The Macedonian party at Athens, of course, supported these complaints; their endeavours to disgrace Philip's real intentions and to represent them to the people in a favourable light, afforded an opportunity for Demosthenes, when the answer to Philip had for some time been engaged in the formation of a navy, and the apprehensions which the Athenians entertained on that score were but too soon justified. For when his preparations were but too soon completed, than he took possession of the island of Haliacmon, which belonged to Athens. The Athenians sent an embassy to claim the island back; but Philip, who had found it in the hands of pirates, denied that the Athenians had any right to claim it, but at the same time he offered to make them a present of the island, if they would receive it as such. On the return of the ambassadors to Athens in B.C. 343, the oration on Haliacmon (ṣepl λαοῦρω) was delivered. It is usually printed among the orations of Demosthenes, but belongs in all probability to Hegesippus. This and other similar acts of aggression, which at length opened the eyes of the Athenians, roused them once more to vigorous and energetic measures, in spite of the efforts of the Macedonian party to keep the people quiet. Embassies were sent to Acarnania and Peloponnesus to counteract Philip's schemes in those quarters (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 129), and his expedition into Thrace, by which the Chersonesus was threatened, culled forth an example of the Athenians under Diopeithes. The complaints which Philip then made roused Demosthenes, in B.C. 342, to his most powerful oration (σφ ἤν ὑπὸ Χερσονῆς), and to his third Philipic, in which he describes the king's faithlessness in the most glaring colours, and exhorts his countrymen to unite and resist the treacherous aggressor. Soon after this, the tyrants whom Philip had established in Euboea were expelled by the influence and assistance of Demosthenes (Dem. de Corona. p. 254), but it was not till B.C. 340, when Philip laid siege to Perinthus and attacked Byzantium, that the long-expected indignation of the Athenians burst forth. The peace with Philip was now declared violated (B.C. 340); a fleet was sent to relieve Byzantium (Plut. Phil. 14), and Philip was compelled to withdraw without having accomplished anything. Demosthenes was the soul of all these energetic measures. He had proposed, as early as the Olynthian war, to apply the theoricon to defray the expenses of the military undertakings of Athens (Dem. Olynth. iii. p. 31); but it was not till Philip's attack upon Byzantium that he succeeded in carrying a decree to this effect. (Dionys. Ep. ad Amn. 11.) By his law concerning the trierarchy (ἐπὶ τῶν πλοίων) he further regulated the symmoriae on a new and more equitable footing. (Dem. de Corona. p. 260, &c.) He thus at once gave a fresh impulse to the maritime power and enterprise of Athens, B.C. 340.

Philip now assumed the appearance of giving himself no further concern about the affairs of Greece. He carried on war with his northern neighbours, and left it to his hirelings to prepare the last stroke at the independence of Greece. He calculated well; for when in the spring of B.C. 340 the Amphictyons assembled at Delphi, Aeschines, who was present as pylonar, effected a decree against the Locrians of Amphissa for having unlawfully occupied a district of sacred land. The Amphissaens rose against this decree, and the Amphictyons summoned an extraordinary meeting to deliberate on the punishment to be inflicted upon Amphissa. Demosthenes foresaw and foretold the unfortunate consequences of a war of the Amphictyons, and he succeeded at least in persuading the Athenians not to send any deputies to that extraordinary meeting. (Dem. de Coron. p. 275; Aeschin. c. Cleop. § 124, &c.) The Amphictyons, however, decreed war against Amphissa, and the command of the Amphictyonic army was given to Cypselus, an Arcadian; but the expedition failed from want of spirit and energy among those who took part in it. (Dem. de Coron. p. 277.) The consequence was, that in B.C. 339, at the next ordinary meeting of the Amphictyons, king Philip was appointed chief commander of the Amphictyonic army. This was the very thing which he had been looking for. With the appearance of justice on his side, he now had an opportunity of establishing himself with an armed force in the very heart of Greece without debate, and when the Athenians received the news of his landing they surrendered possession of Elatea, they were thrown into the deepest consternation. Demosthenes alone did not give up all hopes, and he once more roused his countrymen by bringing about an alliance between Athens and Thebes. The Thebans had formerly been favoured by Philip, but his subsequent neglect of them had effaced the recollection of it; and they now clearly saw that the fall of Athens would inevitably be followed by their own ruin. They had before opposed the war of the Amphictyons, and when Philip now called upon them to allow his army to march through their territory or to join him in his expedition against Athens, they indignantly rejected all his handsome proposals, and threw themselves into the open arms of the Athenians. (Dem. de Coron. p. 289, &c.) This was the last grand effort against the growing power of Macedonia; but the battle of Chaeronea, the 7th of Mæneteion, B.C. 338, put an end to the independence of Greece. Thebes paid dearly for its resistance, and Athens, which expected a similar fate, resolved at least to perish in a glorious struggle. The most prodigious efforts were made to meet the enemy; but Philip unexpectedly offered to conclude peace on tolerable terms, which it would have been madness to reject, for Athens thus had an opportunity of at least securing its existence and a shadow of its former independence.

The period which now followed could not be otherwise than painful and gloomy to Demosthenes, for the evil might have been averted had his advice been followed in time. The catastrophe of Chaeronea might indeed to some extent be regarded as his work; but the people were too generous and too well convinced of the purity of his intentions, as well as of the necessity of acting as he had acted, to make him responsible for the unfortunate consequences of the war with Philip. It was, on the contrary, one of the most glorious acknowledgments of his merits that he could have received, that he was requested to deliver the funeral oration upon those who had fallen at Chaerneia, and that the funeral feast was celebrated in his house. (Dem. de Cor. p. 320, &c.) But the fury of the Macedonian party and of his personal enemies gave full vent to itself; they made all possible efforts to humble or annihilate the man who had brought about the alliance with Thebes, and Athens to the verge of destruction. Accusations were brought against him day after day, and at first the most notorious cyropoths, such as Sosicles, Diondas, Melanthus, Aristogiton, and others, were employed by his enemies to crush him (Dem. de Cor. p. 310) but the more notorious they were, the easier was it for Demosthenes to show that it was not only made in an illegal form, but that the conduct of Demosthenes did not give him any claim to the public gratitude and such a distinction. This attack, however, was not aimed at Ctesiphon, who was too insignificant a person, but at Demosthenes, and the most implacable opponent of Demosthenes, came forward against him. An opportunity offered soon after the battle of Chaeroneia, when Ctesiphon proposed to reward Demosthenes with a golden crown for the conduct he had shown during his public career, and more especially for the patriotic disinterestedness with which he had acted during the preparations which the Athenians made after the battle of Chaeroneia, when Philip was expected at the gates. (Dem. de Cor. p. 266.) Aeschines attacked Ctesiphon for the proposal, and tried to show that it was not only made in an illegal form, but that the conduct of Demosthenes did not give him any claim to the public gratitude and such a distinction. This attack, however, was not aimed at Ctesiphon, who was too insignificant a person, but at Demosthenes, and the latter took up the gauntlet with the greater readiness, as he now had an opportunity of justifying his whole political conduct before his countrymen. Reasons which are unknown to us delayed the decision of the question for a number of years, and it was not till B.c. 350 (Plut. Dem. 24) that the trial was proceeded with. Demosthenes on that occasion delivered his oration on the crown (περὶ αἰφιάλου). Aeschines did not obtain the fifth part of the votes, and was obliged to quit Athens and spend the remainder of his life abroad. All Greece had been looking forward with the most intense interest to the issue of this contest, though few can have entertained any doubt as to which would carry the victory. The oration on the crown was, in all probability, like that of Aeschines against Ctesiphon, revised and altered at a later period.

Greece had in the mean time been shaken by new storms. The death of Philip, in B.C. 336, had revived among the Greeks the hope of shaking off the Macedonian yoke. All Greece rose, and especially Athens, where Demosthenes, although weighed down by domestic grief, was the first to proclaim the tidings of the king's death, and to call upon the Greeks to unite their strength and arms. (Diod. xvii. 8.) The second sudden blow fell, for a number of years, and it was not till B.C. 335, put an end to all further attempts of the Greeks. Athens submitted to necessity, and sent Demades to the king as mediator. Alexander demanded that the leaders of the popular party, and among them Demosthenes, should be delivered up to him; but he yielded to the intrigues of the Athenians, and did not persist in his demand.

Alexander's departure for Asia is the beginning of a period of gloomy tranquillity for Greece; but party hatred continued in secret, and it required only some spark from without to make it blaze forth again in undiminished fury. This spark came from Harpalus, who had been left by Alexander at Babylon, while the king proceeded to India. When Alexander had reached the easternmost point of his expedition, Harpalus with the treasures entrusted to his care, and with 6000 mercenaries, fled from Babylon and came to Greece. In B.C. 325 he arrived at Athens, and purchased the protection of the city by distributing his gold among the most influential demagogues. The reception of such an open rebel could not be viewed by the Macedonian party otherwise than as an act of hostility towards Macedonia itself; and it was probably at the instigation of that party, that Antipater, the regent of Macedonia, and Olympias called upon the Athenians to deliver up the rebel and the money they had received of him, and to put to trial those who had accepted his bribes. Harpalus was allowed to escape, but the investigation concerning those who had been bribed by him was instituted, and Demosthenes was among the persons suspected of the crime. The accounts of his conduct during the presence of Harpalus at Athens are so confused, that it is almost impossible to arrive at a certain conclusion. Theopompos (ap. Plut. Dem. 25, comp. Vit. X Oral. p. 846) and Deinarchus in his oration against Demosthenes state, that Demosthenes did accept the bribes of Harpalus; but Pausanias (iii. 33. § 4) expressly acquits him of the crime. The authority of his accusers, however, is very questionable, for in the first place they do not agree in the detail of their statements, and, secondly, if we consider the conduct of Demosthenes throughout the disputes about Harpalus, if we remember that he opposed the reception of the rebel, and that he voluntarily offered himself to be tried, we must own that it is at least highly improbable that he should have been guilty of common bribery, and that it was not his guilt which caused his condemnation, but the implacable hatred of the Macedonian party, which eagerly seized this favourable opportunity to rid itself of its most formidable opponent, who was at that time abandoned by his own friends from sheer timidity. Demosthenes defended himself in an oration which Athenaeus (xiii. p. 592) calls περὶ τοῦ χρυσοῦ, and which is probably the same. as the one referred to by others under the title of ep. ad A mm. Dem. 57, Ep. ad Amm. i. 12.) But Demosthenes was declared guilty, and thrown into prison, from which however he escaped, apparently with the consent of the Athenian magistrates. (Plut.
Dem. 26, Vit. X Oral. p. 846; Anonym. Vit. Deomisth. p. 150.) Demosthenes quitted his country, and resided partly at Troczena and partly in Aegina, looking daily, it is said, across the sea towards his beloved native land.

But his exile did not last long, for in b. c. 323 Alexander died, and the news of his death was the watchword for a fresh rise of the Greeks, which was organized by the Athenians, and under the vigorous management of Leosthenes it soon assumed a dangerous aspect for Macedonia. (Diod. xviii. 10.) Demosthenes, although still living in exile, joined of his own accord the embassies which were sent by the Athenians to the other Greek states, and he roused them to a fresh struggle for liberty by the fire of his oratory. Such a devotedness to the interests of his ungrateful country disarmed the hatred of his enemies. A decree of the people was passed on the proposal of Demon, a relative of Demosthenes, by which he was solemnly recalled from his exile. A truce was sent to Aegina to fetch him, and his progress from Peiraeus to the city was a glorious triumph: it was the happiest day of his life. (Plut. Dem. 27, Vit. X Oral. p. 816; Justin, xii. 5.) The military operations of the Greeks and their success at this time, seemed to justify the most sanguine expecations, for the army of the united Greeks had advanced as far as Tissaay, and besieged Antipater at Lamia. But this was the turning point; for although, even after the fall of Leosthenes, the Greeks succeeded in destroying the army of L*on-draco, and offered peace, though he was cunning enough that, notwithstanding his domestic calumny (his dughter had died seven days before) he rejected
at Philip's death, which shows only the predominance of his patriotic feelings over his personal and sellish ones (Plut. Dem. 22; Aeschin. c. Cleisp.
§ 77); and lastly, that he shed tears on going into exile—a fact for which he deserves to be loved and honoured rather than blamed. (Plut. Dem. 26.)
The charge of forgiverness which is repeatedly charged against him by Aeschines, has never been substantiated by the least evidence. (Aeschin.
c. Cleisp. § 175, 244, 288) that, notwithstanding his domestic calumny (his dughter had died seven days before) he rejected
at Philip's death, which shows only the predominance of his patriotic feelings over his personal and sellish ones (Plut. Dem. 22; Aeschin. c. Cleisp.
§ 77); and lastly, that he shed tears on going into exile—a fact for which he deserves to be loved and honoured rather than blamed. (Plut. Dem. 26.)
The charge of forgiverness which is repeatedly
charged against him by Aeschines, has never been substantiated by the least evidence. (Aeschin.
c. Cleisp. § 175, 244, 288)

Another charge which is repeatedly charged against him by Aeschines, has never been substantiated by the least evidence. (Aeschin.
c. Cleisp. § 175, 244, 288)

His career as a statesman received its greatest lustre from his powers as an orator, in which he has not been equalled by any man of any country.
Our own judgment on this point would necessarily be one-sided, as we can only read his orations;
but among the contemporaries of Demosthenes there was scarcely one who could possibly find any definite fault in his oratory. By far the majority looked up to him as the greatest orator of the time, and it was only men of such over-refined and hyper-critical tastes as Demetrius Phalereus who thought him either too plain and simple or too harsh and strong (Plut. Dem. 9, 11); though some found these features more striking in reading his orations, while others were more impressed with them in hearing him speak. (Comp. Dionys. de Admirt. vi
dic. Demost. 22; Cte. de Orat. iii. 56, Brut. 38; Quintil. xi. 3. § 6.) These peculiarities, however, are far from being faults; they are, on the contrary, proofs of his genius, if we consider the tem-pitations which natural deficiencies hold out to an incipient orator to pursue the opposite course. The obstacles which his physical constitution threw in his way when he commenced his career, were so great, that a less courageous and persevering man than Demosthenes would at once have been intimidated and entirely shrunk from the arduous career of a public orator. (Plut. Dem. 6, &c.) Those early difficulties with which he had to contend, led him to bestow more care upon the composition of his orations than he would otherwise have done, and produced in the end, if not the impossibility of speaking extempore, at least the habit of never venturing upon it; for he never spoke without preparation, and he sometimes even declined speaking when called upon in the assembly to do so, merely because he was not prepared for it. (Plut. Dem. 6, Vit. X Orat. p. 848.) There is, however, no reason for believing that all the extant orations were delivered in that perfect form in which they have come down to us, for most of them were probably subjected to a careful revision before publication; and it is only the oration against Meidias, which, having been written for the purpose of being delivered, and being afterwards given up and left incomplete, may be regarded with certainty as a specimen of an oration in its original form. This oration alone sufficiently shows how little Demosthenes trusted to the impression of the moment. It would lead us too far in this article to examine the manner in which Demosthenes composed his orations, and we must refer the reader to the various modern works cited below. We shall only add a few remarks upon the causes of the mighty impression which his speeches made upon the minds of his hearers. The first cause was their pure and ethical character; for every sentence exhibits Demosthenes as the friend of his country, of virtue, truth, and public decency (Plut. Dem. 13); and as the struggles in which he was engaged were fair and just, he could without scruple unmask his opponents, and wound them where they were vulnerable, though he never resorted to sycophantic artifices. The second cause was his intellectual superiority. By a wise arrangement of his subjects, and by the application of the strongest arguments in their proper places, he brought the subjects before his hearers in the clearest possible form; any doubts that might be raised were met by him beforehand, and thus he proceeded calmly but irresistibly towards his end. The third and last cause was the magic force of his language, which being majestic and yet simple, rich yet not bombastic, strange and yet familiar, solemn without being orated, grave and yet pleasing, concise and yet fluent, sweet and yet impressive, carried away the minds of his hearers. That such orations should notwithstanding some defects, please, carry away, please, carry away, impart the desired effect, was owing only to the spirit of the times. Most of the critical works that were written upon Demosthenes by the ancients are lost, and, independent of many scattered remarks, the only important critical work that has come down to us is that of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, entitled περὶ τὴν Δημοσθένους εὐκτικώτητα. The acknowledged excellence of Demosthenes's orations made them the principal subjects of study and speculation with the rhetoricians, and called forth numerous imitators and commentators. It is probably owing to these rhetorical speculations which began as early as the second century B.C., that a number of orations which are decidedly spurious and unworthy of Demosthenes, such as the ἄλοις εὐστάτους and the κατάφθοροι, were incorporated in the collections of those of Demosthenes. Others, such as the speech on Haloneus, the first against Aristocles, those against Theocrines and Necan, which are undoubtedly the productions of contemporary orators, may have been introduced among those of Demosthenes by mistake. It would be of great assistance to us to have the commentaries which were written upon Demosthenes by such men as Didymus, Longinus, Herogenes, Salustius, Apollonides, Theon, Gymnasius, and others; but unfortunately most of what they wrote is lost, and scarcely anything of importance is extant, except the miserable collection of scholia which have come down to us under the name of Ulpian, and the Greek argumenta to the orations by Libanius and other rhetoricians.

The orations of Demosthenes are contained in the various collections of the Attic orators by Aldus, H. Stephens, Taylor, Reiske, Dukas, Bekker, Dobson, and Baiter and Snyppe. Separate editions of the orations of Demosthenes alone were published by Aldus, Venice, 1504; at Basel in 1532; by Feliciana, Venice, 1543; by Morellus and Laminbus, Paris, 1570; by H. Wolf, 1572 (often reprinted); by Auger, Paris, 1790; and by Schaefer, Leipzig and London, 1822, in 9 vols. 8vo. The first two contain the text, the third the Latin translation, and the others the critical apparatus, the indices, &c. A good edition of the text is that by W. Dindorf, Leipzig, 1835, 5 vols. 8vo. We subjoin a classified list of the orations of Demosthenes, to which are added the editions of each separate oration, when there are any, and the literature upon it.

I. POLITICAL ORATIONS.

A. Orations against Philip.

Editions of the Philippics were published by J. Bekker (Berlin, 1816, 1825 and 1835), C. A. Rüdiger (Leipzig, 1818, 1829 and 1833), and J. T. Vömel (Frankfurt, 1829).

1. The first Philippic was delivered in B.C. 352, and is believed by some to be made up of two distinct orations, the second of which is supposed to commence at p. 48 with the words ἄνω καὶ ὅσιόν ἐστιν. (Dionys. Ep. ad Amin. i. 10.) But critics down to the present time are divided in their opinions upon this point. The common opinion is that the oration is one whole, is supported by the MSS., and is defended by Kiel, in the Philol. Beiträge aus der Schweiz, vol. i. p. 21, &c. The opposite opinion is very ably maintained by J. Held, Prolegomena ad Dem. Orat. quae vulgo pròna Phil. dict. Vratslavie, 1831, and especially by Seebeck in the Zeitschrift für d. Alterthumswiss. for 1838, No. 91, &c.

2–4. The first, second, and third Olynthian orations belong to the year B.C. 349. Dionysius and the third the second in the series; and this, Frankf. 1828, whose opinion parct ex dispositions translation of the Philippics, i. p. 103, &c" and by other order is defended by Becker, in his German printed in vol. i. of Schaefer's Apparatus. The de (Ep. ad Amm. i. 4) makes the second the first, in Demosth. Orat. de Coron, 1832, which is reprinted in vol. i. of Schaefer's Apparatus. The other order is defended by Becker, in his German translation of the Philippics, i. p. 103, &c., and by Westermann, Stive, Ziemann, Petrenz, and Brückner, in separate dissertations. There is a good edition of the Olynthiaca orations, with notes, by C. H. Frotacher and C. H. Funkhanel, Leipzig, 1834, 8vo.

5. The oration on the Peace, delivered in b. c. 346. Respecting the question as to whether this oration was actually delivered or not, see Becker, Philippis, Reden, i. p. 222, &c., and Vömel, Proleyom. ad Orat. de Pace, p. 249, &c.

7. On Halonensis, b. c. 343, was suspected by the ancient themselves, and ascribed to Hegesippus. (Lilian, Argum. p. 75; Harpocrat. and Etym. M. s. e.; Phot. Bibli. p. 491.) Weiske endeavoured to vindicate the oration for Demosthenes in Dissertation super Orat. de Halo, Lubben, 1808, but he is opposed by Becker in Sechode's Archiv, for 1825, i. p. 54, &c., Philippis, Reden, ii. p. 301, &c., and by Vömel in Ostendilur Hegesippi esse orationem de Halon, Frankf. 1830, who published a separate edition of this oration under the name of Hegesippus in 1835.

8. The oration on the Crown, was delivered in b. c. 342. See Amm. Philippis, Philip. III. habitum esse Cratemassiacum, Frankf. 1837; L. Spengel, Ueber die dritte Philipp. Rede des Dem. München, 1839.

10. The fifth Philippic, is suspected by many critics to be spurious. Becker, Philipp. Reden, ii. p. 516, &c.

II. Other Political Orations.

15. Peri της Ρεβίδης Αλεξειας, b. c. 351.

16. Peri των προ Αλέξανδρων συμβολή, reflects to b. c. 352, and was recognized by the ancients themselves. (Diogys. de Adimir. et die. Dem. 57; Lilian, Argum. p. 211.)

II. JUDICIAL OR PRIVATE ORATIONS.

17. Peri Στηθάνων, or on the Crown, was delivered in b. c. 330. There are numerous separate editions of this famous oration; the best are by I. Bekker with scholia, Halle, 1813, and Berlin, 1823, by Bremi (Gotth. 1834), and by Dissen (Göttingen, 1837). Comp. F. Winewski, Comment. Historiae et Chronolog. in Demosth. Orat. de Coron, Monasterii, 1829. The genuineness of the documents quoted in this oration has of late been the subject of much discussion, and the most important among the treatises on this question are those of Bremi (Ueber die Aechtsch. der Urkund. in Demosth. Rede vom Kranz, in the Zeitschrift für die Alterthurne, for 1839, and reprinted separately at Berlin, 1839), and F. W. Newman (Classical Museum, vol. i. pp. 141-169), both of whom deny the genuineness, while Vömel in a series of prolegomena (commenced in 1841) endeavours to prove their authenticity. Comp. A. F. Wolper, de Forma moderna Orat. Demosth. de Coron. Leipzig, 1825; L. C. A. Bredie, Comment. de Demosth. Orat. pro Cestip. præepta, Isenac. 1832.

19. Peri τῆς Ἀρκτοφιδίας, delivered in b. c. 342.

20. Peri τῆς Ἀκροτύπος, was spoken in b. c. 355, and it has been edited separately by F. A. Wolf, Halle, 1789, which edition was reprinted at Zürich, 1831.

21. K. M. w About τοῦ κοσμίου, was composed in b. c. 355. There are separate editions by Buttmann (Berlin, 1823 and 1833), Blume (Sund. 1828), and Meier (Halle, 1832). Compare Böckh, Ueber die Zeiehverhältnisse der Mithianda in the Abhandl. der Berlin. Akadem. for 1820, p. 60, &c.

22. K. K. w About τοῦ κοσμίου, was composed in b. c. 355. There are separate editions by Buttmann (Berlin, 1823 and 1833), Blume (Sund. 1828), and Meier (Halle, 1832). Compare Böckh, Ueber die Zeitverhältnisse der Mithianda in the Abhandl. der Berlin. Akadem. for 1820, p. 60, &c.

24 and 25. The two orations against Aristogeiton belong to the time after n. c. 338. The genuineness of these two orations, especially of the first, was strongly doubted by the ancients themselves (Diogys. de Adimir. et die. Dem. 57; Harpocrat. s. e. θεών and νεκράς; Phot. s. e. 155), though some believed them to be the productions of Demosthenes. (Lilian, Argum. p. 769; Phot. Bibli. p. 491.) Modern critics think the first spurious, others the second, and others again both. See Schum, in the Excursus to his edition of Deltarchus, p. 106, &c.; Westermann, Quaest. Demosth. iii. p. 96, &c.

26 and 27. The two orations against Aphobus were delivered in b. c. 364.

29 and 30. The two orations against Onetor. See Schmi, de Re Telaeti Or. Athen., &c., Freiburg, 1829. The genuineness of these orations is suspected by Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, Index, s. e. Demosthenes.

31. Peri Ἀστατονοῦ παραγραφή, falls after the year, b. c. 355.

32. Peri Ἀστατονοῦ παραγραφή, is of uncertain date.

59. The speech refers to b.c. 338, but is unquestionably spurious. (Dionys. de Admir. vi dic. Dem. 23, 44; Lahan. p. 6; Harpocrat. s. v. Αλεγδους και Κασπορις; Phot. Bibl. p. 491; Suid. s. v. Αμογεθεβους; Bekker, Anecd. p. 354; Westermann, Quaest. Dem. ii. p. 49, &c.) Its genuineness is defended by Becker (Demosth. als Staatm. ii. Red. ii. p. 466, &c.) and Krüger (in Seebode’s Archiv i. 2, p. 277). It is considered spurious both by ancient and modern historians. (Dionys. de Admir. vi dic. Dem. 23, 44; Lahan. p. 6; Pollux, vii. 144; Phot. Bibl. l. c.; Westermann, Quaest. Dem. ii. p. 70, &c.) Among the lost orations of Demosthenes the following are mentioned. — διαλέγεται αυτοίς ουδεπρ διαλέγεται. (Dionys. Deinarch. 11.) 2. Κατά Μέδοντοσ. (Pollux, viii. 53; Harpocr. s. v. Δέκατευχ.) 3. Πρὸς Πολυπετονταν παραγραφή. (Bekker, Anecd. p. 90.) 4. Περὶ χρηστος (Athen. xiii. p. 392) is perhaps the same as the διαλέγεται τῶν διώνων. (Dionys. Βιοι ad Anm. i. 12, who, however, in Demosth. 57, declares it a spurious oration.) 5. Περὶ τῶν μὲν λεγόμενον Αρίσταλον, a speech spurious according to Dionysius. (Demosth. 57.) 6. Κατά Δημώδους. (Bekker, Anecd. p. 335.) A fragment of it is probably extant in Alexander. de Figur. p. 478, ed. Walz. 7. Πρὸς Κρίταν περὶ τοῦ εὐπαθημάτου. (Harpocrat. s. v. Εὐπαθήμανα, where Dionysius doubts its genuineness.) 8. Τρέπτα πράξεως, probably not a work of Demosthenes. (Suid. s. v. Αμογ.) 9. Τρέπτα Αναποίητα περὶ έπικρατήματος. (Harpocrat. s. v. Επικρατήμανα, where Dionysius doubts its genuineness.)

Besides the ancient and modern historians of the time of Philip and Alexander, the following works will be found useful to the student of Demosthenes: Schott, Vite Parallapae Aristot. et Demosth. Antwerp, 1603; Becker, Demosthenes als Staatsmann und Redner, Halle, 1816, 2 vols. 8vo; Westermann, Quaestiones Demosthenicae, in four parts, Leipzig, 1800—1827, Geschicht der Griech. Denk cultivation, §§ 56, 57, and Beidouy, vii. p. 297, &c.; Bohncke, Studien auf dem Gebiete der Attischen Redner, Berlin, 1843. [L. S.]

DEMOStHENES (Αμογεθεβους). 1. The father of the orator. See above.

2. A Bithynian, wrote a history of his native country, of which the tenth book is quoted by Stephanoedes of Byzantium. (s. v. Κοστος, Μαυσολος; comp. s. v. Τάρας, Ταρέθω, Ταυροσπόρος, Αλεξανδρεια, Αρισται; Etym. Mag. 8. v. Περας.) He further wrote an account of the foundations of towns (στηριγμος), which is likewise several times quoted by Stephanoedes. Ephorion wrote a poem against this historian under the title of Αμογεθεθεθεν, of which a fragment is still extant. (Bekker, Anec dol. p. 1383; comp. Meinecke, de Ephorionio, p. 31.)

3. A Thracian, a Greek grammarian, who wrote according to Snidus (s. v.) a work on the dithyrambic poets (περὶ διδωμομοίων), a paraphrase of Homer’s Iliad and of Hesiod’s Theogony, and an epitome of the work of Damages of Heraclea. (Westermann, Quaest. Dem. iv. pp. 39, 88.)

4. Surmamed the Little (σμωρας), a Greek rhetorician, who is otherwise unknown; but some fragments of his speeches are extant in Bekker’s Anecdota (pp. 135, 140, 168, 170, 179). [L. S.]
DEMOSTHENES MASSALIOTES, or MASSILIENSIS (ὁ Μασσιλίης), a native of Marseilles, and the author of several medical formulae preserved by Galen, must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Aelius Placidus Pharmacien. (Gal. De Comp. Medicam. sec. Gen. v. 15. vol. xxiii. p. 358.) For some purposes he is supposed to have been the same as Demosthenes Philalethes, which seems to be quite possible. He is sometimes called simply Masseiotes or Massiliensis. (Gal. l. c. p. 352; Aétius, iv. 2, 58, p. 726.) See C. G. Kühn, Additam, ad Elench. Medicor. Vetror. a J. A. Fabritio, δεκα, exhibition, where he has collected all the fragments of Demosthenes that remain. [W. A. G.]

DEMOSTHENES PHILALETES (Ἀμφαλαλητής ὁ Фιλαλητής), a physician, who was one of the pupils of Alexander Philalethes, and belonged to the school of medicine founded by Hero philus. (Gal. De Differ. Puls. iv. 4. vol. viii. p. 727.) He probably lived about the beginning of the Christian era, and was especially celebrated for his knowledge of the Pulse, which is quoted by Galen (l. c.), and also one on Diseases of the Eyes, which appears to have been extant in the middle ages, but of which nothing now remains but some extracts preserved by Aétius, Paulus Aegineta, and other later writers. [W. A. G.]

DEMOSTRATUS (Δημοστράτωρ). 1. An Athenian orator and demagogue, at whose proposition Aleibides, Nicias, and Lamachus were appointed to command the Athenian expedition against Sicily. He was brought on the stage by Eu polis in his comedy entitled Βοῦβρις. (Plut. Alloc. 18. Nic. 12; Ruhnken, Hist. Crit. Or. Graec. p. xiv.)

2. The son of Aristophon, an ambassador from Athens to Sparta, is supposed by Ruhnken (l. c.) to have been the grandson of the orator. (Xen. Hell. vi. 3. § 2.)

3. A person in whose name Eupolis exhibited his comedy Αὐτδικαίος. (Ath. v. p. 216, d.) He is ranked among the poets of the new comedy on the authority of Suidas (σ. χρόνος, Δημοστράτωρ Δημοστράτωρ): but here we ought probably to read Τιμοθάτωρ, who is known as a poet of the new comedy. (Timostratus.) (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. i. p. 110, 500.)

4. A Roman senator, who wrote a work on fishing (ἀλευρια) in twenty-six books, one on aquatic divination (περὶ τῆς ἐκφύσεως ραπήδησι) and other miscellaneous works connected with history. (Suid. s. v. Δημοστράτωρ; Aelian, N. A. xii. 21, xiv 4. 19. 19.) He is probably the same person from whose history, meaning perhaps a natural history, Pliny quotes (H. N. xxxvi. 6), and the same also as Demostratus of Apameia, the second book of whose work "On Rivers" (περὶ ποταμῶν) Plutarch quotes. (De Flux. 13; comp. Eudoc. p. 128; Phot. Bibliol. Cod. exli. Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 427, 428, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

DEMOTHELES (Δημοθήλης), one of the twelve authors, who according to Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 12) had written on the pyramids, but is otherwise unknown. [L. S.]

DEMOTIMUS (Δημότιμος), an Athenian and intimate friend of Theophrastus, with whom he devoted himself to the study of philosophy. Theophrastus in his will bequeathed to him a house, and appointed him one of his executors; but further particulars are not known. (Diog. Laërt. v. 53, 55, 56.) [L. S.]

DEMÖXENUS. [DAMOXENUS.]

DEMUS (Δήμος). If the reading in Athenaeus (xiv. p. 690) is correct, Demus was the author of an Atticis, of which the first book is there quoted. But as Demus is not mentioned anywhere else, Casaubon proposed to change the name into Κλεόδημος, who is well known to have written an Attis. If the name Demus is wrong, it would be safer to substitute Δήμος than Κλεόδημος, as Demus wrote an Attis, which consisted of at least four books. [L. S.]

DENTRITES (Δεντρίτης), the god of the tree, a surname of Dionysus, which has the same import as Dasyllius, the giver of foliage. (Plut. Sympos. 5; Paus. i. 43. § 5.) [L. S.]

DENDRITIS (Δεντρίτης), the godess of the tree, occurs as a surname of Helen at Rhodes, and the following story is related to account for it. After the death of Menelaus, Helen was driven from home by two natural sons of Iphithine. She fled to Rhodes, and sought the protection of her friend Polyxoe, the widow of Tepolemus. But Polyxoe bore Helen a grudge, since her own husband Tepolemus had fallen a victim in the Trojan war. Accordingly, once while Helen was bathing, Polyxoe sent out her servants in the disguise of the Erinnyes, with the command to hang Helen on a tree. For this reason the Rhodians afterwards built a sanctuary to Helena Dendritis. (Paus. iii. 19. § 10.) [L. S.]

DENSUS, JULIUS, a man of equestrian rank of the time of Nero. In A. D. 56, he was accused of being too favourably disposed towards Britannicus, but his accusers were not listened to. (Tact. Ann. xxxii. 10.) [L. S.]

DENSUS, SEMPRONIUS, a most distinguished and noble-minded man of the time of the emperor Galba. He was centurion of a praetorian cohort, and was commissioned by Galba to protect his adopted son Piso Licinius, at the time when the insurrection against Galba broke out, A. D. 70. When the rebels approached to seek and murder Piso, Den us rushed out against them with his sword drawn, and thus turned the attention of the persecutors towards himself, so that Piso had an opportunity of escaping, though he was afterwards caught and put to death. (Thiel. Hist. i. 43.) According to Dion Cassius (liv. 6) and Plutarch (Galb. 26) it was not Piso, but Galba himself who was thus defended and protected by Densus, who fell during the struggle. [L. S.]

DEMENTIAS, M. CURTIUS (so some writers call him M. Cur ius Dentatus), the most celebrated among the Curii, is said to have derived his cognomen Dentatus from the circumstance of having been born with teeth in his mouth. (Plin. H. N. vii. 15.) Cicero (pro Murenon. 8) calls him a homo nomen, and it appears that he was of Sabine descent. (Cic. pro Silla, 7; Schol. Br. p. 364 ed. Orelli.) The first office which Curius Dentatus is known to have held was that of tribune of the people, in which he distinguished himself by his opposition to Appius Claudius the Blind, who while presiding as interrex at the election of the consuls, refused, in defiance of the law, to accept any votes for plebeian candidates. Curius Dentatus was one of the few to make a decree by which any legal election was sanctioned beforehand. (Cic. Brut. 14; Aurel.) DENTATUS.

Vict. de Vir. Illust. 33.) The year of his tribuneship is uncertain. According to an inscription (Ov. Met. 11. 209) Appius the Blind was appointed interrex three times, and from Livy (x. 11) we know, that one of his inter-regna belongs to b. c. 299, but in that year Appius did not hold the elections, so that this cannot be the year of the tribuneship of Dentatus. In b. c. 290 he was consul with P. Cornelius Rufinus, and both fought against the Samnites and gained such decisive victories over them, that the war which had lasted for 49 years, was brought to a close, and the Samnites sued for peace which was granted to them. The consuls then triumphed over the Samnites. After the end of this campaign Curius Dentatus marched against the Sabines, who had revolted from Rome and had probably supported the Samnites. In this undertaking he was again so successful, that in one campaign the whole country of the Sabines was reduced, and he celebrated his second triumph in his first consulship. The Sabines then received the Roman civitas without the sufragium. (Vell. Pat. i. 14), but a portion of their territory was distributed among theplebeians. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. p. 426.)

In b. c. 293, Dentatus was appointed praeator in the place of L. Cæcius, who was slain in an engagement against the Senones, and he forthwith sent ambassadors to the enemy to negotiate the ransom of the Roman prisoners; but his ambassadors were murdered by the Senones. Aurelius Victor mentions an ecatio of Curius over the Lucanians, which according to Niebuhr (iii. p. 497) belonged either to b. c. 293 or the year preceding. In b. c. 292 Curius Dentatus was consul a second time. Pyrrhus was then returning from Sicily, and in the levy which Dentatus made to complete the army, he set an example of the strictest severity, for the property of the first person that refused to serve was confiscated and sold, and when the man remonstrated he himself too is said to have been sold. When the army was ready, Dentatus marched into Samnium and defeated Pyrrhus near Beneventum and in the Arusinian plain so completely, that the king was obliged to quit Italy. The triumph which Dentatus celebrated in that year over the Samnites and Pyrrhus was one of the most magnificent that had ever been witnessed: it was adorned by four elephants, the first that were ever seen at Rome. His disinterestedness and frugality on that occasion were truly worthy of a great Roman. All the booty that had been taken in the campaign against Pyrrhus was given up to the republic, but when he was nevertheless charged with having appropriated to himself a portion of it, he asserted on his oath that he had taken nothing except a wooden vessel which he used in sacrificing to the gods. In the year following, b. c. 274, he was elected consul a third time, and carried on the war against the Lucanians, Samnites, and Bruttians, who still continued in arms after the defeat of Pyrrhus. When this war was brought to a close Curius Dentatus retired to his farm in the country of the Sabines, where he spent the remainder of his life and devoted himself to agriculture. He was still ready to serve his country when needed, for in b. c. 272 he was invested with the censorship. Once the Samnites sent an embassy to him with costly presents. He rejected their presents with the words, that he preferred ruling over those who possessed gold, to possessing it himself. He was celebrated as one of the noblest specimens of ancient Roman simplicity and frugality. When after the conquest of the Sabines lands were distributed among the people, he refused to take more than any other soldier, and it was probably on that occasion that the republic rewarded him with a house and 500 jugers of land. He is said never to have been accompanied by more than two grooms, when he went out as the commander of Roman armies, and to have died so poor, that the republic found it necessary to provide a dowry for his daughter. But such reports, especially the latter, are exaggerations or misrepresentations, for the property which enabled a man to live comfortably in the time of Curius, appeared to the Romans of a later age hardly sufficient to live at all; and if the state gave a dowry to his daughter, it does not follow that he was too poor to provide her with it, for the republic may have given it to her as an acknowledgment of her father's merits. Dentatus lived in intimate friendship with the greatest men of his time, and he has acquired no less fame from the useful works he constructed than from his victories over Pyrrhus and the Samnites, and from his habits of the good old times of Rome. In b. c. 272, during his censorship, he built an aqueduct (Aniensia Vetus), which carried the water from the river Anio into the city. The expenses were covered by the booty which he had made in the war with Pyrrhus. Two years later he was appointed annunicus to supersede the censor Quintus Metellus, who was a second after the appointment he died, and was thus prevented from completing his work. (Frontin. de Aequaeduct. i. 6; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 33.) He was further the benefactor of the town of Rente in the country of the Sabines, for he dug a canal (or canals) from lake Velinus through the rocks, and thus carried its water to a spot where it falls from a height of 140 feet into the river Nar (Nera). This fall is the still celebrated fall of Terni, or the cascade delle Marmore. The Romans by that means gained a considerable district of excellent arable land, which was called Rosen. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, pro Saeur. 2; Serv. ad Aen. vii. 712.) A controversy has recently been raised by Zumpt (Abhandl. der Berlin. Akadem. der Wissensch. 1836, p. 155, &c.) respecting the M. Curius, who led the water of lake Velinus into the Nar. In the time of Cicero we find the town of Rente engaged in a law-suit with Interamna, whose territory was suffering on account of that canal, while the territory of Rente was benefited by it. Zumpt naturally asks "how did it happen that Interamna did not bring forward its complaints till two centuries and a half after the construction of the canal?" and from the apparent impossibility of finding a proper answer, he ventures upon the supposition, that the canal from lake Velinus was a private undertaking of the age of Cicero, and that M. Curius who was quaestor in b. c. 60, was the author of the undertaking. But our ignorance of many quarrels between Interamna and Rente, at the time of Cicero, does not prove that there were no such quarrels previously, though a long period might elapse before, perhaps owing to some unfavourable season, the grievance was felt by Interamna. Thus we find that throughout the middle ages and even down to the middle of last century, the inhabitants of Rente (Rieti) and Inte-der ages and even down to the middle of last cen¬

DERGYLLIDAS (Δεργηλλίδας). 1. A Spartan, was sent to the Hellespont in the spring of

b. c. 411 to excite the cities there to revolt from Athens, and succeeded in bringing over Alydus and Lampsacus, the latter of which, however, was almost immediately recovered by the Athenians under Strombichides. (Thuc. viii. 61, 62.) In

b. c. 399 he was sent to supersede Thibron in the command of the army which was employed in the protection of the Asiatic Greeks against Persia.

On his arrival, he took advantage of the jealousy between Pharnobazus and Tissaphernes to divide their forces, and having made an attack on the latter, proceeded against the midland Aeolis, the satrapy of Pharnobazus, towards whom he entertained a personal dislike, as having been once subjected through his means to a military punishment when he was harmst at Alydus under Lysander. In Aeolis he gained possession of nine cities in eight days, together with the treasures of Mania, the late satraps of the province. [Mania;

Mriesias.] As he did not wish to burden his allies by wintering in their country, he conclud¬ ed a truce with Pharnobazus, and marched into

Bithynia, where he maintained his army by plunder.

In the spring of 393 he left Bithynia, and was met at Lampsacus by Spartan commissioners, who announced to him the continued command of his commissioners for another year, and the satisfaction of the home government with the discipline of his troops contраст ed with their condition under Thibron.

Having heard from these commissioners that the Greeks of the Thracian Chersonesus had sent an embassy to Sparta to ask for aid against the neighbouring barbarians, he said nothing of his intention, but concluded a further truce with Pharnobazus, and, crossing over to Europe, built a wall for the protection of the peninsula. Then returning, he besought Atenaeus, of which some Chian exiles had taken possession, and reduced it after a truce with Pharnobazus, and marched into Bithynia, where he maintained his army by plunder.

2. A Spartan, who was sent as ambassador to Pyrrhus when he invaded Sparta in B.C. 272 for the purpose of placing Cleonymus on the throne. [Chelidonis; Cleonymus.] Plutarch records an apophthegm of Dercyllidas on this occasion with respect to the invader: "If he is a god, we fear him not, for we are guilty of no wrong; if a man, we are as good as he." (Plut. Apoth. Loc. vol. ii. p. 128, ed. Tauchn.; Plut. Pyrrh. 26, where the saying is ascribed to one Maunderides.) [E.L.]

DERCYLLIDAS (Δερκυλλίδας), the author of a voluminous work on Plato's philosophy, and of a commentary also on the Timaeus, neither of which has come down to us. (Fabric. de Graec. ii. 95, 152, 170, ed. Harler, and the authorities there referred to.) [E.E.]

DERCYLUS or DERCYLLUS (Δερκυλός, Δέρκυλλος), an Athenian, was one of that embassy of ten, in which Aeschines and Demosthenes were included, and which was sent to Philip to treat on the subject of peace in B.C. 347. In B.C. 346, the same ambassadors appear to have been again deputed to ratify the treaty. (See the Argument prefixed to Dem. de Fals. Leg. p. 336; Aesch. de Fals. Leg. p. 41; Thirwall's Greece, vol. v. p. 336; comp. the decree ap. Dem. de Cor. p. 239; Classical Museum, vol. i. p. 145.) Dercyllus was also one of the "men of affairs" in the third embassy (τα χρόνια αυτοί, which was appointed to convey to Philip, then marching upon Phocis, the complimentary and cordial decree of Philoctetes, and to attend the Amphiphtists council that was about to be convened on the affairs of Phocis. When, however, the ambassadors had reached Chalcis in Euboea, they heard of the destruction of the Phocian towns by Philip, and of his having taken part entirely with the Thebans, and Dercyllus returned to Athens with the alarming news; but the embassy was still desired to proceed. (Aesch. de Fals. Leg. pp. 40, 46b, c. Ctes. p. 65; Dem. de Cor. p. 257, de Fals. Leg. pp. 360, 378.) It is perhaps the same Dercyllus whom Plutarch mentions as a general of the country (ῥου τοῦ δῆμου τῆς χώρας στρατηγός, in n. c. 318). When Nicanor, having been called on to withdraw the Macedonian garrison from Munychia, consented to attend a meeting of the council in the Peiraecus, Dercyllus formed a design to seize him, but he became aware of it in time to escape. Dercyllus is also said to have warned Phocion in vain of Nicanor's intentions. (Plut. Phoc. 32; Nep. Phoc. 2; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alex. p. 223.)

DERCYLUS or DERCYLLUS (Δερκυλός, Δέρκυλλος), a very ancient Greek writer, mentioned several "times and general of the country" (τοὺς εὐρίχων εχθροὺς, in n. c. 318). When Nicanor, having been called on to withdraw the Macedonian garrison from Munychia, consented to attend a meeting of the council in the Peiraecus, Dercyllus formed a design to seize him, but he became aware of it in time to escape. Dercyllus is also said to have warned Phocion in vain of Nicanor's intentions. (Plut. Phoc. 32; Nep. Phoc. 2; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alex. p. 223.)

DERDAS (Δέρδας), a Macedonian chieftain, who joined with Philip, brother of Perdiccas II., in rebellion against him. Athens entered into alliance with them, a step, it would seem, of doubtful policy, leading to the hostility of Perdiccas, and the revolt, under his advice, of Potidaea, and the foundation of Olynthus. The Athenian generals who arrived soon after those events acted for a while against Perdiccas with them. (Thuc. i. 57—59.) Derdas himself probably died about this time, as we hear of his brothers in his place (c. 59), one of whom Paumnias probably was, (c. 61.) [A.H.C.]

DERDAS (Δέρδας), a prince of Elymas, Illyria, and probably of the same family as the cousin of Perdiccas II. mentioned above. As he had reason, from the example of Amyntas II. (see p. 154, b.), to fear the growing power of Olynthus, he zealously and effectually aided the Spartans in their war with that state, from B.C. 382 to 379. (Xen. Hell. v. 2, 3; Diod. xv. 19—23.) We learn from Theopompus (ap. Athen. x. p. 436, d.), that he was taken prisoner by the Olynthians, but it does not appear on what occasion; nor is it certain whether he is the same Derdas to whom Aristotle alludes. (Poll. v. 10, ed. Bekk.) Derdas, whose sister Phila was one of the wives of Philip, was probably a different person, though of the same family. (Ath. xiii. p. 557, c.)

DERRHIAITHOS (Δέρχιαθος), a surname of Artemis, which she derived from the town of Der- rhion on the road from Sparta to Arcadia. (Paus. iii. 20, § 7.)

[LS.]

DESIDEIUS, brother of Magonius, by whom he was created Caesar and soon after put to death, when the tyrant, finding that his position was hopeless, in a transport of rage, massacred all his relations and friends, and then, to avoid falling into the power of his rival, perished by his own hands. According to Zonaras, however, Desideius was not actually killed, but only grievously wounded, and upon his recovery surrendered to Conon, who secured him, and it is probable that this prince are extant. (Zonar. xiii. 9; Julian, Orat. frag.; Chron. Alexand. p. 680, ed. 1613; Echekd, vol. viii. p. 124.)

DESILAUS (Δεσιλαος), a statuary, whose Doryphorus and wounded Amazon are mentioned by Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 15). There is no reason to believe, with Meyer and Müller, that the name is a corruption of Ctesilas; but, on the contrary, the wounded Amazon in the Vatican, which they take for a copy of the work of Ctesilas, is probably copied from the Amazon of Desilaus. (Ross, Kunstblatt, for 1840, No. 12.) [C.ESI.] That the name of the statue, which the mistress, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Aphrodite (Theocrit. xxv. 100), Demeter (Aristoph. Thesm. 286), and Persephone. (Paus. viii. 37, § 6; comp. Perssephone.) [LS.]

DEUCA'LION (Δευκαλιως), 1. A son of Protheus and Clymene. He was king in Phthia, and married to Pyrrha. When Zeus, after the treatment he had received from Lycaon, had resolved to destroy the degenerate race of men who inhabited the earth, Deucalion, on the advice of his father, built a ship, and carried into it stores of provisions; and when Zeus sent a flood all over Helen, which destroyed all its inhabitants, Deucalion and Pyrrha alone were saved. After their ship had been floating about for nine days, it landed, according to the common tradition, on mount Parnassus; others made it land on mount Othrys in Thessaly, on mount Athos, or even on Aetna in Sicily. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 64; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vi. 41; Hygin. Fab. 163.) These differences in the story are probably nothing but local traditions; in the same manner it was believed in several places that Deucalion and Pyrrha were not the only persons that were saved. Thus Megarus, a son of Zeus, escaped by following the screams of cranes, which led him to the summit of mount Gerania (Paus. i. 40, § 1); and the inhabitants of Lebade, according to Thessalian tradition, were said to have been saved by following the howling of wolves, which led them to the summit of Parnassus, where they found Lycoreia. (Paus. x. 6, § 2.) When the waters had subsided, Deucalion offered up a sacrifice to Zeus Phyxius, that is, the helper of fidgetives, and thereupon the god sent Hermes to him to promise that he would grant any wish which Deucalion might entertain. Deucalion prayed that Zeus might restore mankind. According to the more common tradition, Deucalion and Pyrrha went to the sanctuary of Themis, and prayed for the same thing. The goddess bade them cover their heads and threw the bones of their mother behind them in walking from the temple. After some doubts and scruples respecting the meaning of this command, they agreed in interpreting the bones of their mother to mean the stones of the earth; and they accordingly threw stones behind them, and from those thrown by Deucalion there sprung up men, and from those of Pyrrha women. Deucalion then descended from Parnassus, and built his first abode at Opus (Pind. Ol. ix. 46), or at Cynus (Strab. ix. p. 425; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 64), where in later times the tomb of Pyrrha was shewn. Concerning the whole story, see Apollod. i. 7, § 2; Ov. Met. i. 290, &c. There was also a tradition that Deucalion had lived at Athens, and the sanctuary of the Olympian Zeus there was regarded as his work, and his tomb also was shewn there in the neighbourhood of the sanctuary. (Paus. i. 18, § 8.) Deucalion was by Pyrrha the father of Hellem, Amphictyon, Protogonia, and others. Strabo (ix. p. 435) states, that near the coast of Phthiotis there were two small islands of the name of Deucalion and Pyrrha.

A son of Minos and Pasiphae or Crete, was an Argonaut and one of the Calydonian hunters. He was the father of Idomeneus and Molus. (Hom. II. xv. 451; Apollod. iii. 1, § 2, 3; i. 31; Diod. iv. 60; Hygin. Fab. 173; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 172.)

A son of Hyperesius and Hype, and brother of Amphion. (Val. Plac. i. 366; comp. Apollon. Rhod. i. 176.)

A son of Hercules by a daughter of Thespis. (Hygin. Fab. 162.)

A Trojan, who was slain by Achilles. (Hom. II. xx. 477.)

DEVERRA, one of the three symbolic beings—their names are Pilumnus, Intercedon, and Devera—whose influence was sought by the Romans, at the birth of a child, as a protection for the mother against the vexations of Sylvanus. The night before the birth of a child, three men walked around the house; the first struck the threshold with an axe, the second knocked upon it with a pestle, and the third swept it with a broom. These symbolic actions were believed to prevent Sylvanus from entering the house, and were looked upon as symbolic representations of civilized or agricultural life, since without an axe no tree can be felled, a pestle is necessary to pound the grain, and corn is swept together with a broom. (Augustin, de Civ. Dei, vi. 9; Haring, Die Relig. der Römer, ii. p. 175.) [L. S.]

DEXAMENUS (Δέξαμενος), a centaur who lived in Bura in Achaia, which town derived its name from his large stable for oxen. (Schol. ad Callim. Hymn. in Del. 102; Etymol. M. s. v.) According to others, he was a King of Olenus, and the father of Deianeira, who was murdered by her husband during his stay with Deyxmenus, who had hospitably received him. Hercules on parting promised to return and marry her. But in his absence the centaur Enurytion sued for Deianeira's hand, and her father out of fear promised her to him. On the wedding day Hercules returned and slew Enurytion. (Hygin. Fab. 88.) Deianeira is usually called a daughter of Oeneus, but Apollodoros (ii. 5, § 5) calls the daughter of Deyxmenus, Mnéssimauche, and Diodorus (iv. 33) Hippolyte. [L. S.]

Dexterates (δεκτέρητης), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy, whose drama entitled Των του Πάμφιλων is quoted by Ilygin. (ii. p. 124, b.) Suidas (s. v.) also refers to the passage in Ilyginus. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græc. i. p. 492, iv. p. 571.) [P. S.]

Dexippus (Δέξιππος), a Lacedaemonian, was residing at Gela when Sicily was invaded for the second time by the Carthaginians under Hannibal, the grandson of Hamilcar, in B. C. 406. At the request of the Agrigentines, on whom the storm first fell, he came to their aid with a body of mercenaries which he had collected for the purpose; but he did not escape the charge of corruption and treachery which proved fatal to four of the Agrigentine generals. When the defence of Agrigentum became hopeless, Dexippus returned to Gela, the protection of that place having been assigned him by the Syracusans, who formed the main stay of the Grecian interest in the island. Not long after, he was dismissed from Sicily by Dionysius, whose objects in Gela he had refused to aid. (Diod. xii. 85, 87, 88, 89, 96.) [E. B.]

Dexippus (Δέξιππος), a comic poet of Athens, respecting whom no particulars are known. Suidas (s. v. Κωρικεών) mentions one of his plays entitled Ομόθροις, and Euthokia (p. 182) has preserved the titles of four others, viz. τον Πορφυροκονοούς, Φάλαγγας, Τοσσορογράφος, and Δαίμονις. Meineke in his Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. has overlooked this poet.

Dexippus (Δέξιππος), a commentator on Plato and Aristotle, was a disciple of the Neo-Platonic philosopher Iamblichus, and lived in the middle of the fourth century of the Christian era. We still possess a commentary of Dexippus on the Categories of Aristotle, in the form of a dialogue, which, however, is printed only in a Latin translation. It appeared at Paris, 1549, 8vo., under the title of "Questionum in Catcgorias libri tres, in- terpretation. same time to refute the objections of Plutinus. (Ploin. Ennecod. vi. 1, 2, 3; comp. Simplic. ad Arist. Catag. fol. 1, n.; Tzetzes, Chial. ix. Hist. 274.)

Specimens of the Greek text are to be found in Iriarte, Clut. Bibli. Medic. Catalog. pp. 135, 274, &c., and from these we learn that there are other dialogues of Dexippus on similar subjects still extant in manuscripts. (Paliac. Bibli. Gr. ii. pp. 201, 406, 697, 740.)

DEXIPPUS (Δεξιππος), called also Diexippus, a physician of Cos, who was one of the pupils of the celebrated Hippocrates, and lived in the fourth century B.C. (Suid. s. v. Δεξιππος) Hecatomnus, prince of Caria (385-377), sent for him to cure his sons, Mausolus and Pixodarus, of a dangerous illness, which he undertook to do upon condition that Hecatomnus should cease from waging war against his country. (Suid. ibid.) He wrote some medical works, of which nothing but the titles remain. He was blamed by Erasistratus for his excessive severity in restricting the quantity of drink allowed to his patients. (Galen, De Seda, c. 24, vol. i. p. 21.) He was regarded by his contemporaries and later writers as a man of most extensive learning; and we learn from the inscription which was maintained among some of the ancient physicians as to whether the drink passed down the windpipe or the gullet. [W. A. G.]

DEXIPPUS, PUBLIUS HERENNIIUS, a Greek rhetorician and historian, was a son of Polemaeus and born in the Attic demos of Hermes. (Buech. Corp. Inscrip. i. n. 360, p. 459, &c.) He lived in the third century after Christ, and took up a strong position on the neighbouring hills. Though the city itself was taken by the barbarians, and Dexippus with his band was cut off from it, he made an unexpected descent upon Peiraeus and took vengeance upon the enemy. (Dexipp. Esc. de Bell. Sisig. p. 26, &c.; Treb. Poll. Gallien. 13.)

We are not informed whether Dexippus wrote any rhetorical works; he is known to us only as an historical author. Photius (Bibl. Cod. 82) has preserved some account of three historical works of Dexippus. 1. Τά περὶ Ἀθηναίων, in four books. It was a history of Macedonia from the time of Alexander, and by way of introduction the author prefixed a sketch of the preceding history, from the time of Caranus to Alexander. (Comp. Euseb. Chron. 1.) 2. Σαβουνον ιστορίαν, or as Fanusius (p. 58) calls it, χρονικον ιστορίαν, was a chronological history from the mythical ages down to the accession of Claudius Gothicus. A. D. 268. It consisted probably of twelve books, the twelfth being quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Σαβουνος), and it is frequently referred to by the writers of the Augustan history. (Lamprid. Alex. Sec. 49; Capitolin. Maximian. Jun. 6, Tres Cord. 2, 9, Maximi, et Balbin. 1; Treb. Poll. Gallien. 15, Trie. Pyr. 32, Claud. 12; comp. Evagrius, Hist. Eccies. v. 24.) 3. Σαινότον, that is, an account of the war of the Goths or Scythians, in which Dexippus himself had fought. It commenced in the reign of Decius, and was brought to a close by Aurelian. Photius praises the style and diction of Dexippus, especially in the third work, and looks upon him as a second Thucydides, but this praise is highly exaggerated, and the fragments still extant shew, that his style has all the faults of the late Greek rhetoricians. The fragments of Dexippus, which have been considerably increased in modern times by the discoveries of A. Mai (Collect. Script. Vot. ii. p. 819, &c.), have been collected by L. Dekker and Niebuhr in the first volume of the Scriptores Historiae Byzantinae, Bonn, 1829, 8vo.

Dexter, Afranius, was consul suffectus in A. D. 93, in the reign of Trajan (Pln. Epist. v. 14) and a friend of Martial, (Epigr. vii. 27.) He was killed during his consulship. [L. S.]

Dexter, C. Domitius, was consul in A. D. 196, in the reign of Septimius Severus, who appointed him prefect of the city. (Sertian. Sever. 8: Fasti.)

DIA (Δια), a daughter of Deioneus and the wife of Ixion. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 39.) Her father is also called Eioneus. (Diol. iv. 69; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 62.) By Ixion, or according to others, by Zeus (Lyt. Fab. 155), she became the mother of Peirithous, who received his name from the circumstance, that Zeus when he attempted to seduce her, ran around her (συγκύλω) in the form of a horse. (Rusth. ad Hom. poem. 101.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. i. 144; Tzetz. ad Iacyph. 400.) Din is also used as a surname of Hebe or Gymnede, who had temples under this name at Phlius and Sicyon. (Strab. viii. p. 382; Paus. ii. 13. § 3.)

Diadematus, a surname of L. Cudellus Metellus, consul in B. c. 117.

Diademianus or Diademenus, M. Opellius, the son of M. Opellius Macrinus and Nonia Celus, was born on the 19th of September, A. D. 208. When his father was elevated to the purple, after the murder of Caracalla on the 8th of March, A. D. 217, Diademianus received the titles of Caesar, Princeps Iuventutis, Antonius, and eventually of Imperator and Augustus also. Upon the victory of Elagabalus, he was sent to the charge of Artabanus, the Parthian king, but was betrayed and put to death about the same time with Macrinus.

This child is celebrated on account of his surpassing beauty by Lampridius, who declares, that he showed resplendent like a heavenly star, and was beloved by all who looked upon him on account of his surpassing grace and comeliness. From his maternal grandfather he inherited the name of Diadumenus, which upon his quasi-adoption into the family of the Antonines was changed into Diadumenianus. (Dion Cass. Ixxviii. 4, 17, 19, 34, 38-40; Herodian. v. 9; Lamprid. Diadumen.; Capitolin. Morit. 10.) [W. R.]

DIAETHUS (Διάθους), the author of commentaries on the Homeric poems, which seem to have been chiefly of an historical nature, and are referred to in the Venetian scholia on the Iliad (Nos. 175, 161). [L. S.]

DIAEUS (Διαίος), a man of Megalopolis, succeeded Menalcidias of Lacedaemon as general of the Achaean league in b. c. 150. Menalcidias, having been assailed by Callocrates with a capital charge, saved himself through the favour of Diaeus, whom he bribed with three talents (Callocrates, No. 4, p. 569, b.); and the latter, being much and generally condemned for this, endeavoured to divert public attention from his own conduct to a quarrel with Lacedaemon. The Lacedaemonians had appealed to the Roman senate about the possession of some disputed land, and had received for answer that the decision waited upon the issue of life and death, rested with the great council of the Achaean. This answer Diaeus so far garbled as to omit the exception. The Lacedaemonians accused him of falsehood, and the dispute led to war, wherein the Lacedaemonians found themselves no match for the Achaean, and resorted accordingly to negotiation. Diaeus, affirming that his hostility was not directed against Sparta, but against her disturbers, procured the banishment of 24 of her principal citizens. These men fled for refuge and protection to Rome, and thither Diacus went to oppose them, together with Callocrates, who died by the way. The cause of the exiles was supported by Menalcidias, who assured the Spartans, on his return, that the Romans had declared in favour of their independence, while an equally positive assurance to the opposite effect was given by Diaeus to the Achaean,—the truth being that the senate had passed no final decision at all, but had promised to send commissioners to settle the dispute. War was renewed between the parties, b. c. 143, in spite of the prohibition of the Romans, to which, however, Diaeus, who was again general in b. c. 147, paid more obedience, though he endeavoured to bring over the towns round Sparta by negotiation. When the decree of the Romans arrived, which settled Sparta and severall, and served the Achaean league, Diaeus, who was advancing with his army, took a leading part in keeping up the indignation of the Achaean, and in urging them to the acts of violence which caused war with Rome. In the autumn of 147 he was succeeded by Critolaus, but the death of the latter before the expiration of his year of office once more placed Diaeus at the post of danger, according to the law of the Achaean, which provided in such cases that the predecessor of the deceased should resume his authority. The number of his army he swelled with emancipated slaves, and enforced strictly, though not impartially, the levy of the citizens; but the accumulation of the citizens was another reason for sending a portion of them to garrison Megara and to check there the advance of the Romans. He himself had taken up his quarters in Co-brated as a statesman and lawyer in his native place, and lived, according to Perizonius (ad Aelian. V. H. i. 23), at the time of Artaxerxes Mnemon. The foolish Aelian, who has preserved this statement, declines any further discussion of this relation, although he knew more about it. In the preface he thought it objectionable to say anything in praise of a man who was so hostile to the gods (Σωκράτης ἔσχαξεν Διαγόρας). But still he informs us, that Diagoras assisted Nicodorus in his legislation, which he himself praises as very wise and good. Wachsmuth (Hellen. Alterth. i. 2, p. 90) places this political activity of the two friends about the beginning of the Peloponnesian war.

We find Diagoras at Athens as early as B.C. 424, for Aristophanes in the Clouds (880), which were performed in that year, alludes to him as a well-known character; and when Socrates, as though it were a mistake, is there called a Melian, the poet does so in order to remind his hearers at once of Diagoras and of his attacks upon the popular religion. In like manner Hippon is called a Melian, merely because he was a follower of Diagoras. It can scarcely be doubted that Diagoras was acquainted with Socrates, a connexion which is described in the scholia on Aristophanes as if he had been a teacher of Socrates. Fifteen years later, B.C. 411, he was involved, as Diodorus (xiii. 6) informs us, by the democratic party in a lawsuit about impurity (βασιλείας τιμών ἐν δρέεσει), and he thought it advisable to escape its result by flight. Religion seems to have been only the pretext for that accusation, for the mere fact of his being a Melian made him an object of suspicion with the people of Athens. In B.C. 416, Meles had been conquered and cruelly treated by the Athenians, and it is not at all impossible that Diagoras, inquisitive at such treatment, may have taken part in the party-strife at Athens, and thus have drawn upon himself the suspicion of the democratic party, for the opinion that heterodoxy was persecuted at Athens, and that the priests in particular busied themselves about such matters, is devoid of all foundation. (Bernhardy, Gesch. d. Griech. Lit. i. p. 322.) All the circumstances of the case lead us to the conclusion, that the accusation of Diagoras was altogether and essentially of a political nature.

All that we know of his writings, and especially of his poems, shews no trace of irreligion, but on the contrary contains evidence of the most profound religious feeling. (Philodemus in the Heroulauten. ed. Drummond and Walpole, p. 164.) Moreover, we do not find that out of Athens the charge of δρέεσει was taken notice of in any other part of Greece. All that we know for certain on the point is, that Diagoras was one of those philosophers who, like Socrates, certainly gave offence by their views concerning the worship of the national gods; but we know what liberties the Attic community, although he knew he was in a state of war with immorality. There is also an anecdote that Diagoras, for want of other fire-wood, once threw a wooden statue of Heracles into the fire, in order to cook a dish of lentils, and, if there is any truth in it, it certainly shews his liberal views respecting polytheism and the rude worship of images. (Meier, l. c. p. 445.) In like manner he may have ridiculed the common notions of the people respecting the actions of the gods, and their direct and personal interference with human affairs. This, too, is alluded to in several very characteristic anecdotes. For example, on his flight from Athens by sea to Pallene he was overtaken by a storm, and on hearing his fellow-passengers say, that this storm was sent them by the gods as a punishment, because they had an atheistic bias, Diagoras advised them to trust their vessels at some distance which were struggling with the same storm without having a Diagoras on board. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 37.) This and similar anecdotes (Diog. Laert. vi. 59) accurately describe the relation in which our philosopher stood to the popular religion. That he maintained his own position with great firmness, and perhaps with more freedom, wit, and boldness than was advisable, seems to be attested by the fact, that he in particular obtained the epithet of ἄθεος in antiquity. Many modern writers maintain that this epithet ought not to be given to him, because he merely denied the direct interference of God with the world; but though atheists, in the proper sense of the word, have never existed, and in that sense Diagoras was certainly not an atheist, yet as he did not believe in the personal existence of the Athenian gods and their human mode of acting, the Athenians could hardly have regarded him as other than an atheist. In the eulogy on his friend Nicodorus he sang:

Κατὰ δαίμονα καὶ τίγχαν τὰ πάντα βρότους ἐστελέχεια.

But to return to the accusation of Diagoras, in consequence of which he was obliged to quit Athens. That time was one in which scepticism was beginning to undermine the foundations of the ancient popular belief. The trial of those who had broken down the statues of Hermes, the proclamation of the mysteries, and the accusation of Alcibiades, are symptoms which shew that the unbelief, nourished by the speculations of philosophers and by the artifices of the sophists, began to appear very dangerous to the conservative party at Athens. There is no doubt that Diagoras paid no regard to the established religion of the people, and he may occasionally have ridiculed it; but he also ventured on direct attacks upon public institutions of the Athenian worship, such as the Eleusinian mysteries, which he endeavoured to lower in public estimation. He is said to have prevented many persons from becoming initiated in them. These are the points of which the ancients accuse him (Craterus, op. Scol. Aristoph. l. c.; Tacit.; op. Suid.; Lysias, v. Auditor. p. 214; Joseph. c. Apion. ii. 37; Titian, adv. Grace. p. 164, a.), and this statement is also supported by the circumstance, that Melanthius, in his work on the mysteries, mentions the decree passed against Diagoras. But, notwithstanding the absence of accurate information, we can discover political motives through all these religious disputes. Diagoras was a Melian, and consequently belonged to the Doric race; he was a friend of the Doric Mantineia, which was opposed to each other in various points of their worship, and this spark of hostility was kindled into a glowing hatred by the Peloponnesian war. Diagoras fled from Athens in time to escape the consequences of the attacks which his enemies had made upon him. He was therefore punished by Sisetteus, that is, he was condemned, and the psephisma was engraved on a column, promising a prize for his head, and one talent to the person who should bring his dead body to Athens, and two talents to him who should deliver him alive to the Athenians. (SchoL. ad Aristoph. Av. 1015, 1073; Diod. xii. 36.) Melanthius, in his work on the mysteries, had preserved a copy of this psalmia. That the enemies of the philosopher acted on that occasion with great injustice and animosity towards him, we may infer from the manner in which Aristophanes, in his Birds, which was brought upon the stage in that year, spoke of the matter; for he describes that decree as having been framed in the republic of the birds, and ridicules it by the ludicrous addition that a prize was offered to any one who should kill a dead tyrant. Meier, with full justice, infers from this passage of Aristophanes, that the poet did not approve of the proceedings of the people, who were instigated by their leaders, had become frightened about the preservation of the constitution, and were thus misled to various acts of violence. The mere fact that Aristophanes could venture upon such an insinuation shows that Diagoras was by no means unknown to him.

That the enemies of the philosopher acted on that occasion with great injustice and animosity towards him, we may infer from the passage of Aristophanes, that the poet did not approve of the proceedings of the people, who were instigated by their leaders, had become frightened about the preservation of the constitution, and were thus misled to various acts of violence. The mere fact that Aristophanes could venture upon such an insinuation shows that Diagoras was by no means unknown to him.

From Athens Diagoras first went to Pallene, * in Achaia, which town was on the side of Lacedaemon from the beginning of the Peloponnesian war, and before any other of the Achaean towns. (Thucyd. ii. 9.) It was in vain that the Athenians demanded his surrender, and in consequence of this refusal, they included the inhabitants of Pallene in the same decree which had been passed against Diagoras. This is a symptom of that fearful passion and blindness with which the Athenian people, misguided as it was by demagogues, tore itself to pieces in those unfortunate trials about which those who had upset the Hermene. (Wachsmuth, t. c. i. 2, p. 192; Droyson, in his Introd. to the Birds of Aristoph. p. 240, &c.) For all that we know of Diagoras, his expressions and opinions, his accusation and its alleged cause, leads us to see in him one of the numberless persons who were suspected, and were fortunate enough to escape the consequences of the trial by flight. From Pallene he went to Corinth, where, as Suidas states, he died.

Among the works of Diagoras we have mention of a work entitled φύσις άλγος,† in which he is said to have theoretically explained his atheism, and to have endeavoured to establish it by arguments. This title of the work, which occurs also as a title among the works of Democritus and other Greek philosophers (Diog. Laërt. ix. 45, mentions the Φύσις άλγος of Democritus; and concerning other works of the same title, see Lobbeck, Antiq. p. 369, &c.), leads us to suppose that Diagoras treated in that work of the Phrygian divinities, who were received in Greece, and endeavoured to explain the mythuses which referred to them; it is probable also that he drew the different mysteries within the circle of his investigations, and it may be that his accusers at Athens referred to this work. The relation of Diagoras to the popular religion and theology of his age cannot be explained without going back to the opinions of his teacher, Democritus, and the intellectual movement of the time. The atomistic philosophy had substituted for a world-governing deity the relation of cause and effect as the sources of all things. Democritus explained the wide-spread belief in gods as the result of fear of unusual and unaccountable phenomena in nature; and, starting from this principle, Diagoras, at a time when the ancient popular belief had already been shaken, especially in the minds of the young, came forward with the decidedly sophistical doctrine, that there were no gods at all. His attacks seem to have been mainly directed against the dogmas of Greek theology and mythology, as well as against the established forms of worship. The expression of the Scholiast on Aristophanes (Ran. 329), that Diagoras, like Socrates, introduced new divinities, must probably be referred to the fact, that according to the fashion of the sophists, which is enunciated by Aristophanes in the Clouds, he substituted the active powers of nature for the activity of the gods. Many of the celebrated passages of Diagoras have come down to us as render it probable that he did this in a witty manner, somewhat bordering upon frivolity; but there is no passage to shew that his disbelief in the popular gods, and his ridicule of the established, rude, and materialistic belief of the people, produced anything like an immoral conduct in the life and actions of the man. On the contrary, all accounts attest that he discharged the duties of life in an exemplary manner, that he was a moral and very estimable man, and that he was in earnest when in the eulogy on Ariantus of Argos he said: Θεὸς, θεὸς μεν εἶναι τοῦτον, ἄλγος! We do not feel inclined, with Meier, to doubt the statement that he distinguished himself not only as a philosopher, but also as an orator, and that he possessed many friends and great influence; for though we find it in an author of only secondary weight (Dion Chrysost. Hom. IV in primum, Epist. ad Corinth. Op. v. p. 30, ed. Montf.), yet it perfectly agrees with the fate which Diagoras experienced for the very reason that he was not an unimportant man at Athens. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 654, &c.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. i. p. 1203; Thienemann, in Fullmann's Beliäg. zur Gesch. der Philos. xi. p. 15, &c.; D. L. Moulier, Disputatio de Diagora Melo, Heterod. 1638.) [A. S.]

DIA'GORAS (Διαγόρας), a Greek physician, who is quoted by Pliny as one of the authors from whom the materials for his Natural History were derived. (Index to books xii. xiii. xx. xxxv., and H. N. xx. 76.) He must have lived in or before the third century B.C., as he is mentioned by Erasistratus (apud Diocor. De Mat. Med. iv. 65, p. 557), and may perhaps be the native of Cyprus quoted by Erianos. (Gloss. Hippoc. p. 306.) One of his medical formulæ is preserved by Aetius (tetrab. H. serm. 3, c. 108, 353), and he may perhaps be the physician mentioned by an anonymous Arabic writer in Casiri. (Biblioth. Arabico-Hisp. Esc. vol. i. p. 207.) Some persons have identified him with the celebrated philosopher, the slave of Democritus; but there is no evidence that they were the same person, nor is the philosopher (as far as the writer is aware) anywhere said to have been a physician. [W. A. G.]

DIA'GORAS (Διαγόρας), the son of Damagetus, of the family of the Eratidæ at Ialysus in Rhodes, games. He was descended from Damagetus, king of Ialysus, and, on the mother's side, from the Messenian hero, Aristomenes. [Damagetus.] The family of the Eratidae ceased to reign in Rhodes after B.C. 669; but they still retained great influence. Diogoras was victorious in boxing twice in the Olympic games, four times in the Isthmian, twice in the Nemean, and once at least in the Pythian. He had therefore the high honour of being a pereisbaas, that is, one who had gained crowns at all the four great festivals. He also obtained many victories in games of less importance, as at Athens, Aegina, Megara, Pelleene, and Rhodes. There is a story told of Diogoras which displays most strikingly the spirit with which the games were regarded. When an old man, he accompanied his sons, Acusilus and Damagetus, to Olympia. The young men, having both been victorious, carried their father through the assembly, while the spectators showered garlands upon him, and congratulated him as having reached the highest point of human honour. The son of Diogoras and his descendants was celebrated by Pindar in an ode (Ol. vii.) which was inscribed in golden letters on the wall of the temple of Athena at Cnidus in Rhodes. Their statues were set up at Olympia in a place by themselves. That of Diogoras was made by the Megarian statuary, Callicles. The time at which Diogoras lived is determined by his Olympic victory, in the 79th Olympiad. (B.C. 464.) Pindar's ode concludes with forebodings of misfortune to the family of the Eratidae, which were realized after the death of Diogoras through the growing influence of Athens. [Dorula.] (Find. Ol. vii. and Schol. ; Pauly vii. 7, § 1. ; Cle. Thuc. i. 46 ; Miller, Dorulae, iii. 9, § 3; Clinton, F. H. pp. 234, 255; Krause, Olymp. p. 260, Oppian, i. 259, ii. p. 743.)

Diana, an original Italian divinity, whom the Romans completely identified with the Greek Artemis. The earliest trace of her worship occurs in the story about Servius Tullius, who is said to have dedicated to her a temple on the Aventine, on the sites of Sexilis. (Augustus.) It is added that, as Diana was the protectress of the slaves, the day on which that temple had been dedicated was afterwards celebrated every year by slaves of both sexes, and was called the day of the slaves (dies servorum; Fest. s. v. servorum dies ; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 100; Martini. xli. 67.) Besides that day of the slaves, we hear of no festival of Diana in early times, which may be accounted for by supposing that either she was a divinity of inferior rank, or that her worship had been introduced at Rome without being sanctioned or recognized by the government, that is, by the ruling patricians. The former cannot have been the case, as the goddess was worshiped by the plebeians and the Latins as their patron divinity; for a tradition related that the plebeians had emigrated twice to the Aventine, where stood the temple of Diana (Liv. ii. 32, iii. 51, 54; Martial, Anat. xxi.) and the temple to which Servius Tullius built on the Aventine was founded for the benefit of the Latin subjects, who assembled and sacrificed there every year. (Dionys. iv. 26; comp. Liv. i. 45; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 4.) The Sabines and Latins, who formed the main stock of the plebeians, were thus in all probability the original worshippers of Diana at Rome. Now as we know that the Aventine was first occupied by the conquered Sabines who were transplanted to Rome (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 657; Dionys. iii. 43), and as it is stated that shortly before the decemviral legislation the Aventine was assigned to the plebeians, and that the law ordaining this assignment was kept in the temple of Diana (Dionys. x. 32; Liv. iii. 54), it seems clear that Diana's worship was introduced at Rome by the Sabines and Latins on their becoming plebeians, and that she was accompanied by them in particular without the state taking any notice of her, or ordaining any festival in honour of her. Varro (de L. L. v. 74) moreover expressly attests, that the worship and name of Diana had come from the Sabines. Now, as the religion of the Latins and Sabines did not differ in any essential point from that of the Romans, we may ask what Roman divinity corresponded to the Sabine or Latin Diana? Diana loved to dwell in groves and in the neighbourhood of wells; she inspired men with enthusiasm and madness; she dreaded the very sight of male beings so much, that she fled from them when whipped by them; she herself remained a virgin (Horat. Epod. ii. 1. 454; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 3; Fest. s. v. Jesuvinia; Augustin, de Civ. Dei, vii. 16); and these characteristics at once shew a striking resemblance between Diana and Feronia or Fauna Fatua. This circumstance, and the fact that Diana was the goddess of the moon, also render it easy to conceive how the Romans afterwards came to identify Diana with the Greek Artemis, for Fauna Fatua bore the same relation to Picus and Fauna that Artemis bore to Apollo. (Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, p. 207, &c.; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, p. 367, &c.)

Dias (Δίας), of Ephesus, a Greek philosopher of the time of Philip of Macedonia. He belonged to the Academics, and was therefore considered a Sophist, that is, a rhetorician. When he saw the threatening position of Philip towards Greece, he prevailed upon the king to turn his arms against Asia, and advised the Greeks to accompany him on his expedition, saying that it was an honourable thing to serve abroad for the purpose of preserving liberty at home. (Philostr. Vit. Sophist, i. 3.) [L. S.]

Dialus (Δίαλυς), an individual, apparently at Rome, in the first century after Christ, who is mentioned by Martial (Epigr. i. 31, 40) as having been originally a surgeon, and having become afterwards a bearer in funerals (secipilo). [W.A.G.]

Dibutades, of Sicyon, was the reputed inventor of the art of modelling in relief, which an accident first led him to practise, in conjunction with his daughter, at Corinth. The story is, that the daughter traced the profile of her lover's face as thrown in shadow on the wall, and that Dibutades filled in the outline with clay, and thus made a face in relief, which he afterwards hardened with fire. The work was preserved in the Nymphaeum till the destruction of Corinth by Mummius. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 15. s. 48.) Pliny adds, that Dibutades invented the colouring of plastic works by adding a red colouring to the white clay (from the existence of this kind it seems to have been red sand), or modelling them in red chalk; and also that he was the first who made masks on the edges of the gutter tiles of the roofs of buildings, at first in low relief (prot Copa), and afterwards in high relief (cetopa). Pliny adds "Hinc et fastigia templorum orta," that is, the terra-cotta figures which Dibu-DICAERCHUS. (Δικαερχος), an Aetolian, who played a conspicuous part in the Aetolian war against the Romans. He was employed on several embassies, and afterwards engaged in the service of Philip of Macedon, who sent him out to conquer the Cyclades, and employed a fleet of twenty sail on that occasion. He appears to have been a most audacious and insolent person, for on his expedition against the Cyclades he erected altars to Δικαίοσεις and Παραπόμολος, wherever he landed. (Polyb. xvii. 10, xviii. 37, xx. 10, xxii. 14; Liv. xxxv. 12; Diod. Excerpt. de Vet. et Fil. p. 572; Brandstätter, Die Geschicht des Aetol. Landes, p. 273.)

DICAERCHUS (Δικαερχος). 1. A celebrated Peripatetic philosopher, geographer, and historian, and a contemporary of Aristotle and Theophrastus. He was the son of one Pheidias, and born at Messana in Sicily, though he passed the greater part of his life in Greece Proper, and especially Athens. He was a disciple of Aristotle (Cic. de Leg. iii. 6), and a friend of Theophrastus, to whom he dedicated some of his writings. Most of Aristotle's disciples are mentioned also among those of Plato, but as this is not the case with Dicaearchus, Omann (Beiträge zur Griech. u. Röm. Lit. ii. p. 1 &c.) justly infers that Dicaearchus was one of Aristotle's younger disciples. From some allusions which we meet with in the fragments of his works, we must conclude that he survived the year n. c. 296, and that he died about n. c. 285. Dicaearchus was highly esteemed by the ancients as a philosopher and as a man of most extensive information upon a great variety of things. (Cic. Tusc. ii. 18; de Off. ii. 6; Varro, de Re Rust. ii. 2.) His works, which were very numerous, are frequently referred to, and many fragments of them are still extant, which show that their loss is one of the most severe in Greek literature. His works were partly geographical, partly political or historical, and partly philosophical; but it is difficult to draw up an accurate list of them, since many which are quoted as distinct works appear to have been only sections of greater ones. The fragments extant, moreover, do not always enable us to form a clear notion of the works to which they once belonged. Among his geographical works may be mentioned—1. On the heights of mountains. (Plin. H. N. ii. 65; Geminus, Elem. Astron. 14.) Suidas (s. v. Δικαερχος) mentions καταστροφή τῶν ἐν Πελοποννήσῳ δρόμων, but the quotations in Pliny and Geminus shew that Dicaearchus' measurements of heights were not confined to Peloponnesus, and Suidas therefore probably quotes only a section of the whole work. 2. Γῆς περὶδος (Lydus, de Mens. p. 98. 17, ed. Bekker). This work was probably the text written in explanation of the geographical maps which Dicaearchus had constructed and given to Theophrastus, and which seem to have comprised the whole world, as far as it was then known. (Cic. Att. vi. 2; comp. Diog. Laërt. v. 51.) 3. Αναγραφή τῆς Ελλάδος. A work of this title, dedicated to Theophrastus, and consisting of 150 iambic verses, is still extant under the name of Dicaearchus; but its form and spirit are both unworthy of Dicaearchus, and it is in all probability the production of a much later writer, who made a metrical paraphrase of that portion of the Γῆς περὶδος which referred to Greece. Buttmann is the only modern critic who has endeavoured to claim the work for Dicaearchus in his "De Dicaearcho ejusque operibus quae inscribuntur Βίος Ελλάδος et Αναγραφή τῆς Ελλάδος," Naumburg, 1832, 4to. But his attempt is not very successful, and has been ably refuted by Omann. (Allgem. Schulwesen für 1838, No. 140, &c.) 4. Αναγραφή τῆς Ελλάδος was the title among the works of Dicaearchus, and contained an account of the geographical position, the history, and the moral and religious condition of Greece. It contained, in short, all the information necessary to obtain a full knowledge of the Greeks, their life, and their manners. It was probably subdivided into sections; so that when we read of works of Dicaearchus περὶ μοναρχίας, περὶ μονοστάτου στάτους, περὶ Διονυσίου στάτους, and the like, we have probably to consider them only as portions of the great work, Βίος τῆς Ελλάδος. It is impossible to make out the plan of the work in detail with any accuracy; but his attempt, however, has been made by M. C. Cremer's Melanodon, iii. 4, p. 173, &c.) We know that the work consisted of three books, of which the first contained the history and a geographical description of Greece, so as to form a sort of introduction to the whole work. The second gave an account of the condition of the several Greek states; and the third, of the private and domestic life, the theatres, games, religion, &c. of the Greeks. Of the second book a considerable fragment is still extant; but in its present form it cannot be considered the work of Dicaearchus himself, but it is a portion of an abridgment which some one made of the Βίος τῆς Ελλάδος. To this class of writings we may also refer—5. Δικαερχος. A work of this title, which referred to Greece. Buttmann thought it to have been a comparison of the constitutions of Pellene (Pallene), Corinth, and Athens (comp. Cic. Att. ii. 92), a work which has been the subject of much dispute. Passow, in a programme (Breslau, 1929), endeavoured to establish the opinion that it was a reply to Anaximenes's Τριφώναις or Τρισφωνίδος, in which the Lacedaemonians, Athenians, and Thebans, had been calumniated. Buttmann thought it to have been a comparison of the constitutions of Pellene (Pallene), Corinth, and Athens (comp. Cic. Att. ii. 2), and that Dicaearchus inflicted severe censure upon those states for their corrupt morals and their vicious constitutions. A third opinion is maintained by Omann (i. c. p. 6, &c.), who taking his stand on a passage in Photius (Bibl. Cod. 57) where an εἴδος Δικαερχον is mentioned in the three forms of government, the democratic, aristocratical, and monarchial, infers that Dicaearchus in his Τρισφωνίδος explained the nature of that mixed constitution, and illustrated it by the example of Sparta. This opinion is greatly supported by the contents of the fragments. Omann goes even so far as to think that the discussion on politics in the sixth book of Polybius is based upon... the Tragovse of Dicaneb. Cicero intended to make use of this work, which seems to have been written in the form of a dialogue, for his treatise de Gloria. (Ad Att. xiii. 30.) Among his philosophical works may be mentioned—7. Aetebi. in three books, which derived its name from the fact that the scene of the philosophical dialogue was laid at Mytilene in Lesbos. In it Dicaneb endeavoured to prove that the soul was mortal. (Cic. Tusc. i. 31.) Cicero (ad Att. xiii. 12) when mentioning this work probably means the Aetebi. Another philosophical work,—3. Koptmboi, which likewise consisted of three books, was a sort of supplement to the former. (Cic. Tusc. i. 10.) It is probably the same work as the one which Cicero, in another passage (de Off. ii. 5), calls "de Interitum Hominum." Some other works, such as Politeia Streprrifiei (Suid.), Olymipie. of or Argos (Athens. xiv. p. 620), Panaetia (Schol. ad Aristoph. Nymph. 564), and several others, seem to have been merely chapters of the Bla tis 8elafos. A work peri dr to el 8hewatice has no foundation except a false reading in Cicero (ad Att. xiii. 39), which has been corrected by Petersen in his Phaedri Epienei Fratg. p. 11.

There are lastly some other works which are of a grammatical nature, and are usually believed to have been the productions of our philosopher, viz. Perl. Alakaw (Athens. xi. pp. 460, 479, xv. pp. 666, 668), and Sthetiee tov 3emipef Xal Kaipoelma ywies (Sext. Empir. adv. Geomr. p. 310), but may have been the works of Dicaneb, a grammarian of Lacedaemon, who, according to Suidas, was a disciple of Aristarchus, and seems to be alluded to in Apollonius. (De Pronom. p. 320.) A valuable dissertation on the writings of Dicaneb is contained in Osann (L. c. p. 1, &c.), and the fragments have been collected and accompanied by a very interesting discussion by Maxi-nail. Fuhr, Dicenebi Menseni quae superant composito, edita et illustrata, Darmstadt, 1841, 4to. 2. Of Tarentum, is mentioned by Iamblichus (de Vit. Pythag. 36) among the celebrated Pythagorean philosophers. Some writers have been inclined to attribute to him the Bla which are mentioned among the works of the Peripatetic Dicaneb. (See Fuhr, l. c. p. 45, &c.) [L. S.] Dicaeogoles (Aliclewps), a writer of Chios, whose essays (Aciopb) are referred to by Athenaeus. (xi. p. 608, §.) [E. E.]

Dicaeogenes (Alicyopev), a Graecian tragic and dithyrambic poet, of whom nothing is known except a few titles of his dramas. One of these, the Cypria, is supposed by some to have been not a tragedy, but a cyclic epic poem. (Suid. s. v.; Aristot. Poet. 16, with Ritter's note, p. 199; Fab. Bibli. Crusc. ii. p. 295.) [P. S.]

Dicaeus (Alicwos), a son of Poseidon, from whom Dicaeus, a town in Thrace, is said to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Alcws.) [L. S.]

Dicytes (Alicwos), the personification of justice, was, according to Heliodorus (Theog. 501), a daughter of Zeus and Themis, the sister of Tithonos and Phoroneus. She was considered as one of the Horae; she watched the deeds of man, and approached the throne of Zeus with lamentations whenever a judge violated justice. (Hesiod. Op. 258, &c.) She was the enemy of all falsehood, and the protectress of a wise administration of justice (Orph. Hymn. 42, 61); and Hesychia, that is, tranquillity of mind, was her daughter. (Pind. Pyth. viii. 1; comp. Apollod. i. 3, § 1; Hygin. Fab. 188; Diod. v. 72.) She is frequently called the attendant or counsellor (€jv€i?v or €v€iv€s) of Zeus. (Soph. Oed. Col. 1877; Plut. Alex. 32; Arrian, Anab. iv. 9; Orph. Hymn. 61. 2.) In the tragedies, Dicytes appears as a divinity who severely punishes all wrong, and watching over the maintenance of justice and pierces the hearts of the unjust with the sword made for her by Aea. (Aeschyl. Choep. 639, &c.) In this capacity she is closely connected with the Erinnyes (Aeschyl. Eum. 510), though her business is not only to punish injustice, but also to reward virtue. (Aeschyl. Agam. 778.) The idea of Dicytes as justice personified is most perfectly developed in the dramas of Sophocles and Euripides. She was represented on the chest of Cypselus as a handsome goddess, dragging Adicia (Injustice) with one hand, while in the other she held a staff with which she bent her. (Paus. v. 18; comp. Socrates, Fragm. 179, 180, 181, &c.) [L. S.]

Dictes (Alicwos), a native of, Theban, was, with his countrymen to Q. Marcus Philippus and the other Roman commissioners at Chalcis (n. c. 171) to excuse the conduct of their state in having allied itself with Perseus. He went reluctantly, as being still an adherent to the Macedonian cause, for which he was accused at Chalcis, together with Neon and Ismenias, by the Theban exiles of the Roman party. Ismenias and he were thrown into prison, and there put an end to their own lives. (Polyb. xxvii. 1, 2; Liv. xiii. 38, 43, 44.) [E. E.]

Dicon (Alicwos), the son of Callimacrus, was victor in the foot-race five times in the Pythian games, thrice in the Isthmian, four times in the Nemean, and at Olympia once in the boys' foot-race, and twice in the men's: he was therefore a perpovs. His statues at Olympia were equal in number to his victories. He was a native of Caulonia, an Achaeian colony in Italy; but after all his victories, except the first, he caused himself, for a sum of money, to be proclaimed as a Synm-cusan. One of his Olympic victories was in the 99th Olympiad, n. c. 364. (Paus. vi. 3, § 5; Anth.

Dicaeus (Ailwos), a surname of Zeus, derived from mount Dicye in the eastern part of Crete. Zeus Dicyeus had a temple at Praus, on the banks of the river Poitesias. (Strab. x. b.

478.) [L. S.]

Dicyte (Alicwos), a nymph from whom mount Dicye in Crete was said to have received its name. She was beloved and pursued by Minos, but she threw herself into the sea, where she was caught up and saved in the nets (Biatovw) of fishermen. Minos then desisted from pursuing her, and ordered the district to be called the Diciaeum. (Serv. ad

Aen. iii. 171; comp. Briozomart. [L. S.]

Dicytyna. (Briozomarti.)

Dicytis (Alicwos), the name of three mythical persons. (Or. Mot. ill. 614, xiii. 335; Ael.

i. 9, § 6.) [L. S.]

Dicytis Cretensis. The grammarians and other writers who belong to the decline of the Roman empire, misled probably by the figments of the Alexandrian sophists, believed that various persons who flourished at the time of the Trojan war, Dictys Cretensis had committed to writing, in prose and verse, records of the principal events, and that Homer had derived from these sources the materials for his poem. In this number was included Dictys of Crete, a follower of Idomeneus, and his name is attached to a narrative in Latin prose, divided into sixteen books, entitled "Dictys Cretensis de Bello Trojano," or perhaps more accurately, "Ephemeris Boli Trojani," professing to be a journal of the leading events of the contest. To this is prefixed an introduction or prologue containing an account of the preservation and discovery of the work. We are here told that it was composed by Dictys of Gnossus at the joint request of Idomeneus and Meriones, and was inscribed in Phoenician characters on tablets of lime wood or paper made from the bark. The author having returned to Crete in his old age, gave orders with his dying breath that his book should be buried in the same grave with himself, and accordingly the MS. was enclosed in a chest of tin, and deposited in his tomb. There it remained undisturbed for ages, when in the thirteenth year of Nero's reign, the sepulchre was burst open by a terrible earthquake, the coffin was exposed to view, and observed by some shepherds, who, having ascertained that it did not, as they had at first supposed, contain a treasure, conveyed it to their master Eupraxis (or Eupraxides), who in his turn presented it to Rutilius Rufus, the Roman governor of the province, by whom both Eupraxis and the casket were despatched to the emperor. Nero, upon learning that the letters were Phoenician, summoned to his presence men skilled in that language, by whom the contents were explained. The whole having been translated into Greek, was deposited in one of the public libraries, and Eupraxis was dismissed loaded with rewards.

This introduction is followed by a letter addressed by a Q. Septimius Romanus to a Q. Arcadius Rufus, in which the writer, after giving the substance of the above tale, with a few variations, informs his friends, that the volume having fallen into his hands, he had been induced, for his own amusement and the instruction of others, to convert the whole, with some condensations, into the Latin tongue. It is worth remarking, that the author supposes the original Latin chronicle was the archetype, or, at all events, independent, and that the introduction and prefatory epistle were deliberate forgeries, devised for the purpose of attracting attention and securing respect in days of ignorance and credulity. Again, if we admit that this is really a translation from a Greek original, at what epoch and in what manner did that original first appear? Is the story of the presentation to Nero a pure fabrication? Are Septimius and Arcadius real personages? If they are, to what era do they belong? To these inquiries, which have been answered by different critics in most contradictory terms, we reply: 1. It is certain that a Greek history of the Trojan war bearing the name of Dictys was in circulation among the Byzantines named above, by some of whom, who had no knowledge of Latin, the epigrams were cited. 2. It is impossible to read the Latin Dictys without feeling convinced that it is a translation. The Grecians are numerous and palpable, so that no one who examines the examples adduced by Perizonius can entertain any doubt upon this head. 3. It is a translation, fairly executed, of the narrative used by the Byzantines. This is proved by its close correspondence with the fragments found in Malelas and others, while the want of absolute identity in particular passages is fully explained by the assumption that it was not a full and literal translation from a Greek original, at what epoch and in what manner did that original first appear? Is it not more probable that the Latin chronicle was the archetype, or, at all events, independent, and that the introduction and prefatory epistle were deliberate forgeries, devised for the purpose of attracting attention and securing respect in days of ignorance and credulity?
Cadmeian letters first employed by the Hellenes, and finally, availing himself of the happy accident which could scarcely fail to excite the most intense curiosity. According to these views, we may suppose the introduction to have been attached to the Greek copy by the first editor or transcriber, and there been altogether independent of the Latin letter of Septimius; and this idea is confirmed by the circumstance, that some MSS. contain the introduction only, while others omit the introduction and insert the letter. Those who wish to obtain full information upon the above and other topics connected with the subject, will find the whole evidence stated and discussed in the admirable dissertation of Perizonius, first printed in the edition of Smids, Astr. 1702, and inserted in almost all subsequent editions, and in the introduction of Dederich, the most recent commentator.

The compilations ascribed to Dictys and Dares [Dares], although destitute of any intrinsic value, are of considerable importance in the history of modern literature, since they are the chief fountains from which the legends of Greece first flowed into the romances of the middle ages, and then mingled with the popular tales and ballads of England, France, and Germany. The Tale of Troy, according to Dunlop, in his History of Fiction, was first versified by Bernoit de Saint More, an Anglo-Norman minstrel, who lived in the reign of our second Henry, and borrowed his groundwork of events from Dictys and Dares. This metrical essay seems in its turn to have served as a foundation for the famous chronicle of Guido dalle Colonne of Vienna, and other compilations of the 13th century, who published a romance in Latin prose upon the siege of Troy, according to Dunlop, in his History of Fiction, was first versified by Bernoit de Saint More, an Anglo-Norman minstrel, who lived in the reign of our second Henry, and borrowed his groundwork of events from Dictys and Dares. This metrical essay seems in its turn to have served as a foundation for the famous chronicle of Guido dalle Colonne of Vienna, and other compilations of the 13th century, who published a romance in Latin prose upon the siege of Troy, accepting also the Argonautic expedition and the war of the Seven against Thebes. In this strange medley, the history, mythology, and manners of the West and of the East, of the Greeks in the heroic age, and of the Arabian invaders of Christendom, are mingled in the most fantastic confusion. The compound was, however, well suited to the taste of that epoch, for it was received with unbounded enthusiasm, and speedily translated into many European languages. From that time forward the most illustrious houses eagerly strove to tire their pedigrees from the Trojan line, and the monarch chroniclers began to refer the origin of the various states whose fortunes they recorded to the arrival of some Trojan colony.

Under these circumstances, we need not feel surprised that Dictys Cretensis was among the earliest works which exercised the skill of the first typographers. That which is usually recognized as the editio princeps is a 4to. in Gothic characters, containing 68 leaves of 27 lines to the page, and is the editio princeps is a 4to. in Gothic characters, containing 68 leaves of 27 lines to the page, and is...
nucius Rufus. It has, therefore, been supposed that at the time of Cato's defeat, B.C. 114, T. Didius was praetor of Illyricum, and that in this capacity he repelled the Scordisci, who, after having defeated Cato, ranged over Macedonia. But this supposition is not without its difficulties, for in the first place, we know of no war in Illyricum at that time which might have required the presence of a praetor, and in the second place, it would be rather strange to find that T. Didius, who was praetor B.C. 114, did not obtain the consulship till 15 years later, especially as he had gained a victory and a triumph in his praetorship, whereas the ordinary interval between the praetorship and consulship is only the space of two years. According to Cicero (L. c.), T. Didius triumphed ex Macedonia, and he had therefore had the administration of Macedonia and not of Illyricum; moreover, Florus's account of the time of the victory of Didius over the Scordisci is erroneous, for we learn from the Chronicle of Eusebius (clxx. 2), that the victory of Didius over the Scordisci took place on the 6th of April, in the 2nd consulship of C. Marius, that is, in B.C. 100, and consequently 14 years later than the narrative of Florus would lead us to suppose. This also leaves us the usual interval of two years between the praetorship and the consulship, which Didius had in B.C. 98 with Q. Caecilius Metellus. In this year the two consuls carried the lex Caecilia Didia. (Schol. Bob. ad Cic. pro Sext. p. 310; Cic. pro Dom. 16, 20, pro Sext. 64, Philo. v. 8.) Subsequently Didius obtained the proconsulship of Spain, and in B.C. 93 he celebrated a triumph over the Celtiberians. (Fast. Triumph.; Cic. pro Plane. 25.) Respecting his proconsulship of Spain, we learn from Appian (His. 99, &c.), that he cut to pieces nearly 20,000 Vaccancas, transplanted the inhabitants of Termeus, conquered Colenda after a siege of nine months, and destroyed a colony of robbers by enticing them into his camp and then ordering them to be cut down. (Comp. Frontin. Strat. i. 8, § 5, ii. 10, § 1.) According to Sallust (ap. Gell. ii. 27; comp. Plut. Sertor. 3) Sertorius served in Spain as military tribune under Didius. Didius also took part in the Marisc war, which soon after broke out, and he fell in a battle which was fought in the spring of B.C. 89. (Appian, B. C. i. 40; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Ov. Fast. vi. 567, &c.) According to a passage in Plintarch (Sertor. 12) Didius was beaten and slain, ten years later, by Sertorius in Spain, but the reading in that passage is wrong, and instead of Δήον, or as some read it Ποίδος, we ought to read Ποίδησις. (Ruhnken, ad Vell. Pat. ii. 16.) There is a coin figured on p. 602, b, which refers to our T. Didius: the reverse shews a portico with a double row of pillars, and bears the inscription T. DIDIVS AVGVST. From this we see, that T. Didius received the title of imperator in Spain (Sallust. L. c.), and that after his return to Rome he restored or embellished the villa publica in the Campus Martius. The obverse shews the head of Concordia, her niola, and that of P. Catulus (Catullus), and below the inscription, it is written, "... in commemorating an act of the life of Didius, with whose family, as we may infer from the image of Concordia, Fonteius Capito was connected by marriage." (Eckhel, Doctr. Num. v. p. 130.)

3. T. Didius, perhaps a son of No. 2, was tribune of the people, in B.C. 95, with L. Aurelius Cotta. In the disputes arising from the accusation which one of their colleagues brought against Q. Caepio, Didius and Cotta were driven by force from the tribunal. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 47; comp. Cotta, No. 8.)

4. C. Didius, a legate of C. Julius Caesar, who sent him, in B.C. 46, to Spain against Cn. Pompeius. In the neighbourhood of Carte he gained a naval victory over Q. Attius Varus, and in the year following he sent out from Gades with a fleet in pursuit of Cn. Pompeius, who had taken to flight. Pompeius was compelled to land, and Didius took or burnt his ships. Didius himself likewise landed, and after Pompeius had been killed by Caesennius Lento, Didius was attacked by the Lusitanian soldiers of Pompeius, and fell under their strokes. (Dion Cass. xliii. 13, 31, 40; Hell. Hisp. 37, 40.)

5. Q. Didius, was governor of Syria in B.C. 31, a post to which he had probably been appointed by M. Antony; but, after the battle of Actium, he deserted Antony, and prevailed upon the Arabs to deliver the fleet which Antony had built in the Arabian gulf. (Dion Cass. li. 7.)

M. DIDIVS SALVIUS JULIANVS, afterwards named M. DIDIVS COMMODUS SEVERVS JULIANVS, the successor of Pertinax, was the son of Petronius Didius Severus and Clara Aemilia, the grandson or great-grandson of Salvius Julianus, so celebrated as a jurisconsult under Hadrian. Educated by Domitia Lucilla, the mother of M. Aurelius, by her interest he was appointed at a very early age to the vigintiregimentum, the first step towards public distinction. He then held in succession the offices of quaestor, aedile, and praetor, was governor of Bithynia, and in the spring of the year 37, 40.) According to Pliny (Hist. Nat. vi. 66), the governor of Syria in this year, in order to repress an insurrection among the Chauci, a tribe dwelling on the Elbe, was raised to the consulship. He further distinguished himself in a campaign against the Catti, ruled Dalmatia and Lower Germany, and was placed at the head of the comitissarit in Italy. About this period he was charged with having conspired against the life of Commodus, but had the good fortune to be acquitted, and to witness the punishment of his accuser. Bithynia was next consigned to his charge; he was consul for the second time in A.D. 179, along with Pertinax, whom he succeeded in the proconsulate of Africa, from which he was recalled to Rome and chosen praefectus vigilum.

Upon the death of Pertinax, the Praetorian assassins publicly announced that they would bestow the purple on the man who would pay the highest price. Flavius Sulpicianus, praefect of the city, father-in-law of the murdered emperor, being at that moment in the camp, to which he had been despatched for the purpose of soothing the troops, proceeded at once to make liberal proposals, when Julianus, having been roused from a banquet by his wife and daughter, arrived in all haste, and being unable to gain admission, stood before the gates, and that a loud voice was heard for the price. The bidding went on briskly for a while, the soldiers reporting by turns to each of the two competitors, the one within the fortifications, the other outside the rampart, the sun toned by his rival. At length, Sulpicianus having promised a donative of twenty thousand sestercies a head, the throne was about to be knocked down to him, when Julianus, no longer adding a small amount, shouted that he would give twenty-five thousand. The guards thereupon closed with the offers of Julianus, threw open their gates, shot him by the name of Commodus, and proclaimed him emperor. The senate was compelled to notify the election. But the populace, after the first confusion had subsided, did not tamely submit to the dishonour brought upon the state. Whenever the prince appeared in public he was saluted with groans, imprecations, and shouts of “robber and paricide.” The mob endeavoured to obstruct his progress to the Capitol, and even ventured to assail him with stones. This state of public feeling having become known, Pescennius Niger in Syria, Septimius Severus in Illyria, and Claudius Albinus in Britain, each having three legions under his command, refused to acknowledge the authority of Julianus, who for a time made vigorous efforts to maintain his power. Severus, the nearest and therefore most dangerous foe, was declared a public enemy; deputies were sent from the senate to persuade the soldiers to abandon him; a new general was nominated to supersede him, and a centurion dispatched to take his life. The praetorians, long strangers to active military operations, were marched into the Campus Martius, regularly drilled, and exercised in the construction of fortifications and field works. Severus, however, having secured Albinus by declaring him Caesar, advanced steadily towards the city, made himself master of the fleet at Ravenna, defeated Julianus Crispinus, the praetorian prefect, who had been sent forward to arrest his progress, and gained over to his party the ambassadors commissioned to seduce his troops. On the other hand, the praetorians, destitute of discipline, and sunk in debauchery and sloth, were alike incapable of offering any effectual resistance to an invader, and indisposed to submit to restraint. Matters being in this desperate state, Julianus now attempted negotiation, and offered to share the empire with his rival. But Severus turned a deaf ear to these overtures, and still pressed forwards, until Italy de¬serted to his arms. These proceedings. Forthwith a formal decree was passed proclaiming Severus emperor, awarding divine honours to Pertinax, and denouncing death to Julianus, who, deserted by all except one of his prefects and his son-in-law, Repentinus, was slain in the palace by a common soldier in the 61st year of his age and the third month of his reign.

Didius Gallus.

Dido (ΔIDO), also called Elissa, which is probably her more genuine name in the eastern traditions, was a Phoenician princess, and the reputed founder of Carthage. The substance of her story is given by Justin (xviii. 4, &c.), which has been embellished and variously modified by other writers, especially by Virgil, who has used the story very freely, to suit the purposes of his poem. (See especially books i. and iv.) We give the story as related by Justin, and refer to the other writers where they present any differences. After the death of the Tyrian king, Mutgo (comp. Joseph. c. Apian. i. 18, where he is called Matgenus; Serv. ad Aen. i. 343, 642, who calls him Methyes; others again call him Belus or Agenor), the people gave the government to his son, Pygmalon; and his daughter Dido or Elissa married his uncle, Aenas (Virg. Aen. i. 518), calls him Sichaeus, and Servius, on this passage, Sicharchus, a priest of Hercules, which was the highest office in the state next to that of king. Acrasia possessed extraordinary treasures, which he kept secret, but a report of them reached Pygmalon, and led him to murder his uncle. (Comp. Virg. Aen. i. 349, &c., where Sichaeus is murdered at an altar; whereas J. Malalas, p. 162, &c., ed. Bonn, and Eustath. ad Dionys. Perieg. 195, represent the murder as having taken place during a journey, or during the chase.) Hereupon, Dido, who according to Virgil and others was informed of her husband’s murder in a dream, pretended that, in order to forget her grief, she would in future live with her brother Pygmalon, while in secret she made all preparations for quitting her country. Finally, Pygmalon sent to assist her in the change of her residence were gained over by her, and having further induced some noble Tyrians, who were dissatisfied with Pygmalon’s rule, to join her, she secretly sailed away in search of a new home. The party first landed in the island of Cyprus, where their number was increased by a priest of Zeus, who joined them with his wife and children, and by their carrying off by force eighty maidens to provide the emigrants with wives. In the mean time, Pygmalon, who had heard of the flight of Dido, prepared to set out in pursuit of her; but he was prevented by her contrivance, for putting her mistress of the case, by the threats of the gods (Serv. ad Aen. i. 363, gives a different account of the escape of Dido); and she thus safely landed in a bay on the coast of Africa. Here she purchased (according to Serv. ad Aen. i. 367, and Eustath. l.c., of king Hierbas) as much land as might be covered with the hide of a bull; but she ordered the hide to be cut up into the thinnest possible strips, and with them she surrounded a great extent of country, which she called Byrus, from Βύρος, i.e. the hide of a bull. DIDYMUS.

DIDO.
Silius ItaL Pun. i. 25 ; Appian, Pun. 1.)
The number of strangers who flocked to the new colony from the neighbouring districts, for the sake of commerce and profit, soon raised the place to a town community. The kinsmen of the new colo¬ nists, especially the inhabitants of Utica, supported and encouraged them (Procop. Bell. Vandal, ii. 10); and Dido, with the consent of the Libyans, and under the promise of paying them an annual tri¬ bute, built the town of Carthage. In laying the foundations of the city, the head of a bull was found, and afterwards the head of a horse, which was a still more favourable sign. (Virg. Aen. i. 443, with Servius’s note; Sil. ItaL Pun. ii. 410, &c.) As the new town soon rose to a high degree of power and prosperity, king Hiarbas or Jarbas, who began to be jealous of it, summoned ten of the noblest Carthaginians to his court, and asked for the hand of Dido, threatening them with a war in case of his demand being refused. The deputies, who on their return dreaded to inform their queen of this demand, at first told her that Hiarbas wish¬ ed to have somebody who might instruct him and his Libyans in the manners of civilized life; and when they expressed a doubt as to whether any¬ body would be willing to live among barbarians.
Dido censured them, and declared that every citi¬ zen ought to bo ready to sacrifice everything, even life itself, if he could thereby render a service to his country. This declaration roused the courage of the ten deputies, and they now told her what Hiarbas demanded of her. The queen was thus caught by the law which she herself had laid down.
She lamented her fate, and perpetually uttered the name of her late husband, Acerbas; but at length she answered, that she would go whithersoever the fate of her new city might call her. She took three months to prepare herself, and after the Lapse of that time, she erected a funeral pile at the ex¬ treme end of the city: she sacrificed many animals under the pretence of endeavouring to soothe the spirit of Acerbas before celebrating her new nup¬ tials. She then took a sword into her hand, and havinff ascended the pile, she said to the people that she was going to her husband, as they desired,
and then she plunged the sword into her breast, and died. (Comp. Scrv. ad Aen. L 310, iv. 36, 335, 674.)
So long as Carthage existed. Dido was worshipped there ns a divinity. (Sil. Ital. Pun. i.
81, &c.) With regard to the time at which Dido is said to have founded Carthage, the statements of the ancients differ greatly. According to Servius {ad Aen. iv. 459), it took place 40 years be¬ fore the foundation of Rome, that is, in b. c. 794 ; according to Velleius Paterculus (i. 6), it was 65 years, and according to Justin (xviii. 6) and Orosius (iv. 6), 72 years, before the building of Rome.
Josephus (c. Apioji. i. 18 ; comp. Syncellus, p. 143) places it 143 years and eight months after the building of the temple of Solomon, that is, B. c.
861; while Eusebius (Chron. n. 971, ap. Syncell.
p. 345 ; comp. Chron. n. 1003) places the event 133 years after the baking of Troy, that is, in b. c.
1025; and Philistus placed it even 37 or 50 years before the taking of Troy. (Euseb. Ckron. n. 798; Syncell. p. 324; Appian, Pun. 1.) In the story constructed by Virgil in his Aencid, he makes Dido, probably after the example of Naevius, a contemorary of Aeneas, with whom she falls in love on is arrival in Africa. As her love was not re¬ turned, and Aeneas hastened to seek the new home

1007

which the gods had promised him, Dido in despair destroyed herself on a funeral pile. The anachro¬ nism which Virgil thus commits is noticed by several ancient writers. (Serv. ad Aen. iv. 459, 682, v. 4; Macrob. Sal. v. 17, vi. 2; Auson.
Ejngr. 118.)

DID YM ARCH US (Aiddyapxos), is mentioned by Antoninus Liberalis (23) as the author of a work on Metamorphoses, of which the third book is there quoted.
[L. S.J
DIDYMUS (AlSvpos).
1. A celebrated Alex¬
andrian grammarian of the time of Cicero and tho emperor Augustus. He was a disciple or rather a follower of the school of Aristarchus {’ApKrrdpxGios, Lehrs, de Arislarchi stud. Ilomcr. p. 18, &c.), and is said to have been the son of a dealer in salt fish.
He was the teacher of Apion, Heracleides Ponticus, and other eminent men of the time.
He is com¬ monly distinguished from other grammarians of the name of Didymus by the surname x<*AK€»"rf/>os, which he is said to have received from his indefa¬ tigable and unwearied application to study. But he also boro the nickname of /3t£A<oA<£0as, for, owing to the multitude of bis writings, it is said it often happened to him that he forgot what he had stated, and thus in later productions contradicted what he had said in earlier ones. Such contradic¬ tions happen the more easily the more a writer confines himself to the mere business of compiling;
and this seems to have been the case to a very great extent with Didymus, as we may infer from the extraordinary number of his works, even if it were not otherwise attested. The sum total of his works is stated by Athenacus (iv. p. 139) to have been 3,500, and by Seneca (Ep. 88) 4000. (Comp.
Quintil. i. 9. § 19.) In this calculation, however, single books or rolls seem to be counted ns separate works, or else many of them must have been very small treatises. The most interesting among his produc¬ tions, all of which nro lost, would have been those in which he treated on tho Homeric poems, the criticism and interpretation of which formed the most prominent portion of his literary pursuits. The greater part of what we now possess under tho name of the minor Scholia on Homer, which were at one time considered the work of Didymus, is taken from the several works which Didymus wrote upon Homer. Among them was one on the Homeric text as constituted by Aristarchus (ff€pl rijs 'Apurrdpxov SiopOwcrews), a work which would be of great importance to us, as he entered into the detail of the criticisms of Aristarchus, and re¬ vised and corrected the text which the latter had established.
But the studies of Didymus were not confined to Homer, for he wrote also commen¬ taries on many other poets apd prose writers of the classical times of Greece. We have mention of works of his on the lyric poets, and especially on Bacchylides (TheophyL Ep. 8 ; Ammon, s. v.
Nripcides) and Pindar, and the better and greater part of our scholia on Pindar is taken from tho commentary of Didymus. (Bockh, Praef. ad Schol.
Pind. p. xvii. &c.) The same is the case with tho extant scholia on Sophocles. (Richter, de Aeschyli Sophoclis et Euripidis interpretibus Graecis, p. 106,
&c.) In the scholia on Aristophanes, too, Didy¬ mus is often referred to, and we further know that he wrote commentaries on Euripides, Ion, Plirynichus (Athen. ix. p. 371), Cratinus (Hesych. s. v.
KopaaKis; Athen. xi. p. 501), Menander (Etymol.
Gud. p. 338. 25), and others. The Greek orators,

DIDYMUS.

Demostenes, Isaeus, Hyperides, Deinarchus, and others, were likewise commented upon by Didymus.
Besides these numerous commentators, we have mention of a work on the phonology of the tragic poets (περί τραγικῶν μὲν άξίων), of which the 26th book is quoted. (Mazarob. Sat. v. 18; 1 Harposcr. s. v. έρασικός.) A similar work (περί τραγικῶν) is ascribed by Hyparch to the phonon ology of the comic poets, and Hechychus made great use of it, as he himself attests in the epistle to Eulogius. (Comp. Rynol. M. p. 492, 53; 2 Schol. ad Apollon. Rhet. i. 1139, iv. 1058.) A third work of the same class was on words of ambiguous or uncertain meaning, and consisted of at least seven books; and a fourth treated on false or corrupt expressions. He further published a collection of Greek proverbs, in thirteen books (πρὸς τούς περί παρώνων συντεχνότας), from which is taken the greater part of the proverbs mentioned in the collection of Zenobius. (Schneide-win, Corpus Parocmiogr. Graec. i. p. xiv.) A work on the laws of Solon is mentioned by Plutarch (Sol. v. Al&vpos), viOavd, vcos)

Three works, bearing the name of Didymus, from which it might be inferred that he wrote on ngririous extracts bearing the name of Didymus, from the scholiasts who were satisfied with compiling or abridging the works of their predecessors.

In a preceding article, however, Suidas attributes
the scholiast who lived perhaps in the third century
A.D. 392, when Hieronymus wrote his work on illustrious ecclesiastical authors, Didymus was still alive, and professor of theology at Alexandria. He died in A.D. 396

Dimyus appears to have been acquainted even with Roman literature, for he wrote a work in six books against Cicero's treatise "de Re Publica.
(Anmian. Marcell. xxil. 16,) which afterwards induced Suetonius to write against Didymus.
(Suid. s. v. Τραγικός.) Didymus stands at the close of the period in which a comprehensive and independent study of Greek literature prevailed, and he himself must be regarded as the father of DIGITIUS. 1. An Italian, who served a marine (seclusus navicula) under the great P. Scipio Africanus. After the taking of New Carthage in n. c. 210, Sex. Digitius and Q. Trebius were rewarded by Scipio with the corona fasti and a crown of honour and a public entertainment in the theatre for their bravery with the Carthaginian mercenaries who arrived at Athens too late to sail for Syracuse with Demosthenes, and were, to save expense, at once dismissed. He made on the way descents upon Boeotia at Tanagra, and at Mycassium, the latter of which places he surprised, and gave up to the savage butchery of his barbarians. Boeotian forces came up with them, however, in their retreat to the ships, and cut down a considerable number.

Digitius himself (i. 23, §§ 2, 3) saw a statue of him at Athens, representing him as pierced with arrows; and an inscription containing his name, which was doubtless cut on the base of this statue, has been recently discovered at Athens, and is given on p. 890, a. This Digitius is probably the same as the Ditrephes mentioned by Aristophanes (Aesop, 798, 1440), satirized in one place as a leader of the fashion of chariot-driving; in another as a forward upstart, who had advanced himself, if the Schoolist understood the joke, to military office by the trade of basket-making. The date of the "Birds," n. c. 414, would be rather a confirmation of the identity.

DI'LLIUS APONI'ANUS. [Aponianus.]

DI'LLIUS VO'CULA. [Vocula.]

DINDYMENÉ (δινδυμήνη or δινδύμηνη), a surname of Cybele, derived either from mount Dindymus in Phrygia, where a temple was believed to have been built to her by the Argonauts (Apoll. Rhod. i. 985, with the Schol.; Strab. xii. p. 675; Callim. Ephry. 42; Horat. Carm. i. 16. 5; Catull. 63, 91; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 617), or from Dindyme, the wife of Macon and mother of Cybele. (Diod. iii. 58.)

DION. [Deinon.]

DIOCLEIDES (Διοκλέιδης), an Athenian, who, when the people were highly excited about the mutilation of the Hermae (n. c. 415, and ready to dismiss. He made on the way descents upon Boeotia at Tanagra, and at Mycassium, the latter of which places he surprised, and gave up to the savage butchery of his barbarians. (Diod. iii. 58.)

DION. [Deinon.]

DIOCLEIDES (Διοκλέιδης), an Athenian, who, when the people were highly excited about the mutilation of the Hermae (n. c. 415, and ready to dismiss. He made on the way descents upon Boeotia at Tanagra, and at Mycassium, the latter of which places he surprised, and gave up to the savage butchery of his barbarians. Diocles was put to death. (Andoc. p. 6—9; Thuc. vi. 69; Phryn. ap. Plut. Alex. 29; Diod. xiii. 2.) [E. E.]

DICOLEIDES (Διοκλείδης), of Abdera, is mentioned in Athenaeus (for this seems to be the meaning of the passage) as having admirably described the famous engine called Εἴρης (the City-taker), which was made by Ephialmenus the Athenian for Demetrius Poliorcetes at the siege of Rhodes. (Ath. v. p. 106, d.; Diod. xiii. 51; Wesseling, ad loc.; Plut. Demetr. 21; Vitruv. x. 22.) [E. E.]

DIOCLES (Διόκλης), the son of Orochles and father of Crethon and Orochles, was a king of Pherae. (Hom. ii. v. 540, &c.; Od. iii. 488; Paus. iii. 80, § 2.) [L. S.]

DIOCLES (Διόκλης), a Syracusan, celebrated for his code of laws. No mention of his name occurs in Thucydides, but according to Diodorus he wrote his code of laws. In this he took so prominent a part, that he threw his colleagues quite into the shade, and the code was ever after known as that of Diocles. We know nothing of its details, but it is praised by Diodorus for its conciseness of style, and the care with which it distinguished different offences and assigned to each its peculiar penalty. The best proof of its merit is, that it continued to be followed as a civil code not only at Syracuse, but in many others of the Sicilian cities until the island was subjected to the Roman power. (Diod. xiii. 35.)

The banishment of Hermocrates and his party (b. c. 410; see Xen. Hell. i. § 27) must have left Diocles undissipated leader of the commonwealth. The next year he commanded the forces sent by Syracuse and the other cities of Sicily to the relief of Himera, besieged by Hannibal, the son of Gisco. He was, however, unable to avert its fate, and withdrew from the city, carrying off as many as possible of the inhabitants, but in such haste that he did not stay to bury those of his troops who had fallen in battle. (Diod. xiii. 59—61.) This circumstance probably gave rise to discontent at Syracuse, which was increased when Hermocrates, having returned to Sicily and obtained some successes against the Carthaginians, sent back the bones of those who had perished at Himera with the highest honours. The revulsion of feeling thus excited led to the banishment of Diocles, b. c. 408. (Diod. xiii. 63, 75.) It does not appear whether he was afterwards recalled, and we are at a loss to connect with the subsequent revolutions of Syracuse the strange story told by Diodorus, that he stabbed himself with his own sword, to shew his respect for one of his laws, which he had thoughtlessly disregarded by coming armed into the place of assembly. (Diod. xiii. 33.) A story almost precisely similar is, however, told by the same author (xii. 19) of Chersones [CHERONENAS], which renders it at least very doubtful as regarding Diocles. Yet it is probable that he must have died about this time, as we find no mention of his name in the civil dissensions which led to the elevation of Dionysius. (Hubmann, Diodes Gesetzgeber der Syrakusier, Amberg, 1842.) [H. B.]

DIOCLES (Διόκλης). 1. A brave Athenian, who lived in exile at Megara. Once in a battle he protected with his shield a youth whom he loved, but he lost his own life in consequence. The Megarians rewarded the gallant man with the honours of a hero, and celebrated the festival of the Dioscleia, which they celebrated in the spring of every year. (Theocr. xii. 27, &c.; Aristoph. Acharn. 774; Plut. These. 10: Dist. of Ant. v. 2. Διοσκεία.)

2. The name of three wealthy Sicilians who were robbed by Verres and his satellites. (Cic. in Verr. iii. 56, 40, v. 7, iv. 16.) [L. S.]

DIOCLES (Διόκλης), literary. 1. Of Athens. See below.

2. Of Cnidus, a Platonic philosopher, who is mentioned as the author of Διαπραγματευμα, from which a fragment is quoted in Eusebius. (Funep. Econy. xiv. p. 731.)

3. Of Rhodes, a Greek Grammarian, who wrote upon the Homeric poems, and is mentioned in the Venetian Scholia (ad ii. xiii. 103) along with Dionysius Thrax, Aristarchus, and Chares on the subject of Greek accents. A dream of his is related by Artemidorus. (Omnir. iv. 72.)

4. Of Magnesia, was the author of a work entitled έπαρθερίδες των φιλόσοφων, and of a second on the lives of philosophers (περί βίων φιλόσοφων), of both of which Diogenes Laertius appears to have made great use. (ii. 62, vii. 13, 12, 20, 36, 37, 91, 92, 103, viii. 43, 162, 166, 179, 181, ix. 61, 65, x. 12.)

5. Of Perieges, the earliest Greek historian, who wrote about the foundation of Rome, and whom Q. Fabius Pictor is said to have followed in a great many points. (Plut. Rom. 3, 8; Fest. s. v. Romanus.) How long he lived before the time of Fabius Pictor, is unknown. Whether he is the same as the author of a work on heroes (περὶ ἱονών συνταγμάτων), which is mentioned by Plutarch (Quaest. Grœc. 40), and of a history of Persia (Περσικά), which is quoted by Josephus (Ant. Jud. x. 11, § 1), is likewise uncertain, and it may be that the last two works belong to Diocles of Rhodes, whose work on Aetolia (Αἰτωλία) is referred to by Plutarch. (De Flam. 22.)

6. Of Sybaris, a Pythagorean philosopher (Inamb. Vit. Pyth. 35), who must be distinguished from another Pythagorean, Diocles of Philus, who is mentioned by Inarchus (Vit. Pythag. 35) as one of the most zealous followers of Pythagoras. The latter Diocles was still alive in the time of Aristozenes (Diog. Laer. viii. 46), but further particulars are not known about him. [L. S.]

DIOCLES (Διόκλης), of Athens, or, according to others, of Philus, and perhaps in fact a Philian by birth and an Athenian by citizenship, was a comic poet of the old comedy, contemporary with Sannyrion and Philyllius. (Suidas.) The only plays of his are mentioned by Suidas and Eudocia (p. 182), and are frequently quoted by the grammarians Iamb. and Eusebius, &c. Inaddition (by others ascribed to Callias), Μελιτάνης, Θεοκράτης and Οὐράξος, which are only mentioned by Suidas and Eudocia, are suspicious titles. He seems to have been an elegant poet. (Meineke, Frag. Cons. Grœce. i. pp. 251-253, ii. pp. 838-841.) [P. S.]

DIOCLES (Διόκλης), a geometer of unknown
DIOCLÆNUS VALE'RIUS, was born near Salona in Dalmatia, in the year A. D. 245, of most obscure parentage; his father, according to the accounts commonly received, which are, however, evidently hostile, having been a freedman and provincial scribe, while the future emperor himself was indebted for liberty to a senator Anullus. Were this last statement true he must have been born while his parent was a slave; but this is impossible, for, as Niebuhr has pointed out, the Roman law, even as it stood at that period, would have prevented the son from being enlisted in the legion. From his mother, Diocletianus also derived his name, which, according to the accounts commonly received, was Latinized and expanded into the more majestic and sonorous DIOCLETIANUS, and attached as a cognomen to the high patrician name of Valerius. Having entered the army he served with high reputation, passed through various subordinate grades, was appointed to most important commands under Probus and Aurelian, in process of time was elevated to the rank of consular suffectus, followed Carus to the Persian war, and, after the death of that emperor on the banks of the Tigris (Carinus), remained attached to the court during the retreat in the honourable capacity of chief captain of the palace guards (domestici). When the fate of Numerianus became known, the troops who had met in solemn assembly at Chalcedon, for the purpose of nominating a successor, declared with one voice that the man most worthy of the sovereign power was Diocletianus, who, having accepted the preferred dignity, signified his necessity by slaying with his own hands Arrius Aper prefect of the praetorians, who was arraigned of the murder of the deceased prince, his son-in-law (Numerianus). The proceedings upon this occasion were characterized by an intemperate haste, which gave plausibility to the report, that the augurer of Numerianus, notwithstanding his solemn protestations of innocence and disinterested zeal, was less eager to satisfy the demands of justice than to avert suspicion from himself and to remove a formidable rival, especially since he did not scruple to confess that he had long anxiously sought to fulfill a prophecy delivered to him in early youth by a Gaulish Druidess, that he should mount a throne as soon as he had slain the wild-boar (Aper). These events took place in the course of the year 246, known in chronology as the era of Diocletian, or the era of the martyrs, an epoch long employed in the calculations of ecclesiastical writers and in the Christian calendar. After the ceremonies of installation had been completed at Nicomediea, it became necessary to take the field forthwith against Carinus, who was hastening towards Asia at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army. The opposing armies met near Margus in upper Moesia, and, after an obstinate struggle, victory declared for the conqueror used his triumph with praiseworthy and polite moderation. There were no proscriptions, no confiscations, no banish-attendants of the deceased monarch were permitted to retain their offices, and even the praetorian praefect Aristobulus was continued in his command. There was little prospect, however, of a peaceful reign. In addition to the inconstant spirit which prevailed universally among the soldiery, who had been accustomed for a long series of years to create and dethrone their rulers according to the suggestions of interest, passion, or caprice, the empire was threatened in the West by a formidable insurrection of the Bagaudae under Aelianus and Amandus [AELIANUS], in the East by the Persians, and in the North by the turbulent movements of the wild tribes upon the Danube. Feeling himself unable to cope single-handed with so many difficulties, Diocletian resolved to assume a colleague who should enjoy, nominally at least, equal rank and power with himself, and relieve him from the burden of undertaking in person distant wars. His choice fell upon the brave and experienced, but rough and unlettered soldier Maximianus [MAXIMIANUS HERCIULUS], whom he invested with the title of Augustus, at Nicomedia, in 286. At the same time the associated rulers adopted respectively the epithets of Jovius and Hercutilus, either from some superstitious motive, or, according to the explanation of one of the panegyrists, in order to declare to the world that while the elder possessed supreme wisdom to devise and direct, the younger could exert irresistible might in the execution of all projects.

The new emperor hastened to quell, by his presence, the disturbances in Gaul, and succeeded without difficulty in chastising the rebellious boors. But this achievement was but a poor consolation for the loss of Britain, and the glory of the two Augusti was dimmed by their forced acquiescence in the insolent usurpation of Carausius. [Carausius]

Meanwhile, dangers which threatened the very existence of the Roman dominion became daily more imminent. The Egyptians, ever factious, had now risen in open insurrection, and their leader, Achillius, had made himself master of Alexandria; the savage Blemmyes were ravaging the upper valley of the Nile; Julianus had assumed imperial ornaments at Carthage; a confederacy of five rude but warlike clans of Atlas, known as the Quingentseas or Quingententes, was spreading terror throughout the more peaceful districts of Africa; Tiridates, again expelled from Armenia, had been compelled once more to seek refuge in the Roman court; and Narses having crossed the Tigris, had recovered Mesopotamia, and openly announced his determination to re-unite the East and the West. To Carausius was assigned Britain, Gaul, and Spain, the chief seat of government being fixed at Treves; to Galerius were intrusted Illyricum, and the whole line of the Danube, with Sirmium for a capital; Maximian resided at Milan, as governor of Italy and Africa, together with Sicily and the islands of the Tyrrhenian Sea; while Diocletian retained Thrace, Egypt, Syria, and Asia in his own hands, and established his court at Nicomedia. The immediate results of this arrangement were most auspicious. Maximianus routed the Mauritanian hordes, and drove them back to their mountain fastnesses, while Julian being defeated perished by his own hands; Galerius, havinglikewise been driven away, was captured after a siege of eight months, and many thousands of the sedition citizens were slain, Basilis and Coptos were levelled with the ground, and all Egypt, struck with terror by the success and severity of the emperor, sank into abject submission. In Gaul an invading host of the Alemanni was repulsed with great slaughter after an obstinate resistance, Boulogne, the naval arsenal of Carausius, was forced to surrender, and the usurper having soon after been murdered by his chosen friend and minister, Allectus, the troops of Constantius effected a landing in Britain in two divisions, and tho whole island was speedily recovered, after it had been before lost to the Roman empire nearly ten years. In the East the struggle was more severe; but the victory, although deferred for a while, was even more complete and more glorious. Galerius, who had quitted his own province to prosecute this war, sustained in his first campaign, a terrible defeat in the plains of Carthae. The shattered army, however, was speedily recruited by large drafts from the veterans of Illyria, Moesia, and Dacia, and the Roman general, taught caution by experience, advanced wary through the mountains of Armenia, carefully avoiding the open country where cavalry might act with advantage. Persia was now ready to offer a steady course, he at length, with 25,000 men, fell unexpectedly upon the careless and confident foe. They were completely routed, and the harem of Narses, who commanded in person and escaped with great difficulty, fell into the hands of the conquerors. The full fruits of this victory were secured by the wise policy of Diocletian, who resolved to seize the opportunity of offering a peace by which he might receive a moderate but certain advantage. A treaty was concluded, by which the independence of Armenia was guaran-ted, and all Mesopotamia, together with five provincies beyond the Tigris and the command of the defiles of Caucasus, were ceded to the Romans.
For forty years the conditions of this compact were observed with good faith, and the repose of the East remained undisturbed.

The long series of brilliant achievements, by which the barbarians had been driven back from every frontier, were completed when Diocletian entered upon the twelfth year of his reign, and the games common at each decennial period were again celebrated, and all Mesopotamia, together with the most gorgeous which Rome had witnessed since the days of Aurelian.

But neither the mind nor the body of Dio-cletian, who was now fifty-nine years old, was able any longer to support the unceasing anxiety and toll to which he was exposed. On his journey to Nicoedia he was attacked by an illness, from which, after protracted suffering, he scarcely escaped with life, and, even when immediate danger was past, found himself so exhausted and depressed, that he resolved to abdicate the purple. This resolution seems to have been soon formed, and it was speedily executed. On the 15th of August 305, in the presence of the army and the people, he solemnly divested himself of his royal robes.

Passing over the military skill of Diocletian, we can scarcely refuse to acknowledge that the man who formed the scheme of reconstruction, a great empire, and executed his plan within so brief a space of time, must have combined a bold and capacious intellect with singular prudence and practical dexterity. That his plans were such as a profound statesman would approve may fairly be questioned, for it needed but little knowledge of human nature to foresee, that the ingenious but complicated machine would never work with smoothness after the regulating hand of the inventor was withdrawn; and, accordingly, his death was the signal for a succession of furious struggles among the rival Caesars and Augusti, which did not terminate until the whole empire was reunited under Constantine. Still the great social change was accomplished; a new order of things was introduced which determined the relation between the sovereign and the subject, until the final downfall of the Roman sway, upon principles not before recognized in the Western world, and which to this day exercise no small influence upon the political condition of Europe.

One of the worst effects, in the first instance, of the revolution, was the vast increase of the public expenditure, caused by the necessity of supporting two imperial and two vice-regal courts upon a scale of oriental splendour, and by the magnificence of edifices raised by the vanity or policy of the different rulers for the embellishment of their capitals or favourite residences. The amount of revenue required could be raised only by increased taxation, and we find that all classes of the community complained bitterly of the merciless exactions to which they were exposed. Yet, on the whole, Diocletian was by no means indifferent to the comfort and prosperity of his people. Various monopolies were abolished, trade was encouraged, the comfort and prosperity of his people. he commanded an army. In order to please the king, he caused all the senators of his native place to be massacred. He afterwards accompanied Mithridates to Pontus, and, after the fall of the king, Diodorus received the punishment for his cruelty. Charges were brought against him at Adramyttium, and as he felt that he could not clear himself, he starved himself to death in des¬ pair. (Facund. iv. 2.)

2. Of ALEXANDRIA, surnamed Valerius Pollio, was a son of Pollio and a disciple of Tulecetes. He wrote, according to Suidas (s. v. Πολύων) and Eu-docia (p. 136), a work entitled θερμών των θερμωνον παρά τοις ι ρήμοιν, and another άντική λέξι.
He lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian, and is perhaps the same as the Theodorus who is mentioned by Athenaeus (xiv.
Cod. 149) as the author of Αντική Γλώσσα.

3. Of ANTIQUOCH, an ecclesiastical writer who lived during the latter part of the fourth century after Christ, and belonged to a noble family. Dur¬ ing the time that he was a presbyter and archimundita at Antioch, he exerted himself much in introducing a better discipline among the monks, and also wrote several works, which shewed that he was a man of extensive acquirements. When Molettius, the bishop of Antioch, was sent into exile in the reign of the emperor Valens, Diodorus too had to suffer for a time; but he continued to exert himself in what he thought the good cause, and frequently preached to his flock in the open fields in the neighbourhood of Antioch. In a. d.
378 Molettius was allowed to return to his see,
and one of his first acts was to make Diodorus bishop of Tarsus. In a. d. 391 Diodorus attended the council of Constantinople, at which the general superintendence of the Eastern churches was entrusted to him and Pelagius of Laodiceia. (Socrat.
v. 8.) How long he held his bishopric, and in what year he died, are questions which cannot be answered with certainty, though his death appears to have occurred previous to a. d. 404, for he was sumamed Valerius Pollio, (Strab. xiii. p. 614.) died in despair. (Diog. Laert. ii. 111.) Ac¬

4. Of ASPENDUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, who probably lived after the time of Plato, and must have been still alive in Ol. 104, for he was an acquaintance of Stnemocles, the musician, who lived at the court of Ptolemy Lagi. Diodorus is described in the Cynic mode of living.

5. Of CRONUS, a son of Ameinias of Jasus in Caria, lived at the court of Alexand¬ to have given him the surname of Cronus on dialectic problem proposed by Stilpo, when the two philosophers were dining with the king.

the doctrines of Diodorus we possess only fragmentary information, and not even the titles of his works, We know nothing of the exact time when it was he who fully developed the dialectic art of the Megarics, which so frequently degenerated into mere shallow sophistry. (Cic. Acad. ii. 24, 47.) He seems to have been much occupied with the theory of proof and of hypothetical propositions. In the same manner as he rejected in logic the divisibility of the fundamental notion, he also maintained, in his physical doctrines, that space was indivisible, and consequently that motion was a thing impossible. He further denied the coming into existence and all multiplicity both in time and in space; but he considered the things that fill up space as one whole composed of an infinite number of indivisible particles. In this latter respect he approached the atomistic doctrines of Democritus and Diagoras.

He rejected in logic the divisibility of the fundamental notion, which is frequently quoted by Harpocration and the Socratics, and Chrysippus is said to have written a work, ἡ ἔρημος ἀνθρώπως, against the views of Diodorus. (Diog. Laert. ii. 111; Cic. de Fato 114.)

He made use of the false syllogism called Sorites, and is said to have invented two others of the same kind, viz. the ἐκκαλυπτόμενον and the κεπαρχοῦσα λέξης. (Diog. Laert. ii. 111.)

Language was, with him, as with Aristotle, the result of an agreement of men among themselves. (Lorsch, Sprachphilos. der Alt. i. p. 42; Deycks, de Megarico doctrina, p. 64, &c.)

7. Of Crito, a Pythagorean philosopher, who is otherwise unknown. (Iamblich. Vit. Pythag. 33.)

8. Of Elaeæ, is quoted as the author of elegies by Parmenides (Erol. 15), who relates from him a story about Daphne.

9. Of Ephesia, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 70) as the author of a work on the life and philosophy of Anaximander.

10. Surnamed Porphyrites, was probably a native of Athens, and wrote on topographical and geographical subjects. He lived at the time of and after Alexander the Great; for it is clear, from some fragments of his works, that he wrote at the time when Athens had only two phylae, that is, previous to B. c. 308; and Atheneus (xiii. p. 521) states that Diodorus was acquainted with the rhetorical Anaximander. We know only of two works of Diodorus Periegetes, viz. 1. Περὶ Μίλετου, which is frequently quoted by Herodotus and Strabo of Byzantium, and from which a considerable number of statements are preserved in consequence. 2. Περὶ μυκηνῶν, or on monuments. (Plut. Themist. 32, comp. Theo. 36. Cim. 16. Vit. X. Otr. p. 849; Athen. xiii. p. 591.) It is impossible that he may also be the author of a work on Miletus (περὶ Μιλέτου συγγραμμα, Schol. ad Plut. Mænas. p. 380; comp. Preller, Polemon. fragm. p. 170, &c.)

11. Of Priend, is mentioned as a writer upon agriculture, but is otherwise unknown. (Varro, de R. R. I. 1; Columella, i. 1; Plin. H. N. 16, lib. xv. xvii. &c.)

12. The Sicilian, usually called Diodorus Siculus, was a contemporary of Caesar and Augustus. (Eginæ, a. Drostei; Euseb. Chron. ad. 79. 86.) He was an inhabitant of the town of Agyrrium in Sicily, where he became acquainted with the Latin language through the great intercourse between the Romans and Sicilians. Respecting his life we know no more than what he himself tells us (i. 4). He seems to have made it the business of his life to write an universal history from the earliest down to his own time. With this object in view, he travelled over a great part of Europe and Asia to gain a more accurate knowledge of nations and countries than he could obtain from previous historians and geographers. For a long time he lived at Rome, and there also he made large collections of materials for his work by studying the ancient documents. He spent thirty years upon his work, which period probably includes the time he spent in travelling and collecting materials. As it embraced the history of all ages and countries, and thus supplied the place, as it were, of a whole library, he called it Βιβλιοθήκη, or, as Eusebius (Progr. Evang. i. 6) says, Βιβλιοθήκη ἑαυτοῦ. The time at which he wrote his history may be determined pretty accurately from internal evidence: he not only mentions Caesar's invasion of Britain and his crossing the Rhine, but also his death and apotheosis (i. 4, iv. 19, v. 21, 29); he further states (i. 44, comp. 33) that he was in Egypt in Ol. 191, that is, n. c. 20; and Scaliger (Annuale ad Euseb. p. 156) has made it highly probable that Diodorus wrote his work after the year n. c. 8, when Augustus corrected the calendar and introduced the intercalation every fourth year.

The whole work of Diodorus consisted of forty books, and embraced the period from the earliest mythical ages down to the beginning of J. Caesar's Gallic wars. Diodorus himself further mentions, that the work was divided into three great sections. The first, which consisted of the first six books, contains the history of the mythical times previous to the Trojan war. The first books of this section treat of the mythical times and the conceptions of the Greeks. The second section consisted of eleven books, which contained the history from the Trojan war down to the death of Alexander the Great; and the third section, which contained the remaining 23 books, treated of the history from the death of Alexander down to the beginning of Caesar's Gallic wars. Of this great work considerable portions are now lost. The first five books, which contain the early history of the Eastern nations, the Egyptians, Achaeiopians, and Greeks, are extant entire; the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth books are lost; but from the eleventh down to the twentieth the work is complete again, and contains, in the history from the second Persian war, n. c. 480, down to the year n. c. 320. The remaining portion of the work is lost, with the exception of a considerable number of fragments and the Excerpta, which are preserved partly in Photius (Bibl. Cod. 244), who gives extracts from books 31, 32, 33, 36, 37, 38, and 40; and partly in the Elogiae made at the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, from which they have successively been published by H. Stephens, Fulv. Ursinus, Valamea, and A. Mai. (Collect. Nova script. ii. p. 1, &c., p. 563, &c.)

The work of Diodorus is constructed upon the plan of annals, and the events of each year are placed.
by the side of one another without any internal connexion. In composing his Bibliotheca, Diodorus made use, independent of his own observations, of all sources which were accessible to him; and had he exercised any criticism or judgment, or rather had he possessed any critical powers, his work might have been of incalculable value to the student of history. But Diodorus did nothing but collect that which he found in his different authorities: he thus jumbled together history, fiction; he frequently misunderstood or mutilated his authorities, and not seldom contradicts in one passage what he has stated in another. The absence of criticism is manifest throughout the work, which is in fact devoid of all the higher requisites of a history. But notwithstanding all these drawbacks, the extant portion of this great compilation is to us of the highest importance, on account of the great mass of materials which are there collected from a number of writers whose works have perished. Diodorus frequently mentions his authorities, and in most cases he has undoubtedly preserved the substance of his predecessors. (See De Veyynch, s. v. Aristarchus of Samos.)

He exercised any criticism or judgment, or rather to be the same as the Diodorus referred to in two other passages of Athenaeus (xi. p. 501, xiv. p. 454). It may also be that he is the same as the grammarian whom Eustathius describes as a disciple or follower of Aristophanes of Byzantium. (Villonel, Prob. de l'Ant. iv. p. 260.)

16. Surnamed ΘΥΡΩΝ, lived about a.d. 278, and is described by Epiphanius (de Mon. ac Pond. 20) as a good man and of wonderful piety. He was presbyter in the village of Diodoris and a friend of bishop Archelaus. When Manes took refuge in his house, he was at first kindly received; but when Diodorus was informed, by a letter of Archelaus, of the heresies of Manes, and when he began to see through the cunning of the heretic, he had a dispute with him, in which he is said triumphantly to have refuted his errors. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 85.) A letter of Archelaus to Diodorus is still extant and printed in Valesius's edition of Socrates, p. 301, ii. p. 415.)

17. Of Tyre, a Peripatetic philosopher, a disciple and follower of Critolaus, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school at Athens. He was still alive and active there in a.d. 110, when L. Crassus, during his quaestorship of Macedonia, visited Athens. Cicero denies to him the character of a genuine Peripatetic, because it was one of his ethical maxims, that the greatest good consisted in a combination of virtue with the absence of pain, whereby a reconciliation between the Stoics and Epicureans was attempted. (Cic. de Orat. 1, ii. 52, de Fin. ii. 6, 11, iv. 18, v. 6, 6, 65, Acad. ii. 43; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 301, ii. p. 415.)

There are some more persons of the name of Diodorus, concerning whom nothing of interest is known. See the list of them in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 578, &c.

DIODORUS (Διόδωρος), of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy, is mentioned in an inscription (Böckh, i. p. 354), which fixes his date at the archonship of Diotimus (u. c. 354—353), when he exhibited two plays, entitled Νέκρος and Μανιάρεος, Aristocles being his actor. Sinadas (s. v.) quotes Athenaeus as mentioning his Αλήθειας in the tenth book of the Deipnosophistae, and his Ερίκτειας and Παννυχιαρίας in the twelfth book. The actual quotations made in our copies of Athenaeus are from the Αλήθειας (x. p. 431, c.) and a long passage from the Ερίκτειας (vi. pp. 235, c. 236, b., not xii.), but of the Παννυχιαρίας there is no mention in Athenaeus. A play under that title is ascribed to Ptoleu or to Plato. There is another fragment from Diodorus in Stobaeus. (Serm. lxxii. 1.) In another passage of Stobaeus (Serm. exxv. 8) the common reading, Διόδωρος, should be retained. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Grace. i. pp. 418, 419, iii. pp. 543—946.)

DIODORUS ZONAS (Ζώνας Ζωνασ) and DIODORUS the Younger, both of Sarkis, and chalcolithic amulets, were rhetoricians and epigrammatists. The elder was distinguished in the Mithridatic war. Strabo (xiii. pp. 627, 628) says, that he engaged in many contests on behalf of Asia, and when Mithridates invaded that province, Zo- nas was accused of inciting the cities to revolt from him, but was acquitted in consequence of the DIO'DORUS, defence which he made. Strabo adds, that the younger Diodorus, who was his own friend, composed historical writings, lyrics, and other poems, which were written in an antique style, on the 6th day of the sixth month of the year 4000 (A.D. 49).

The epigrams of the Diodori, of which there are several, were included by Philip of Thessalonica in his collection, and they now form a part of the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Adol. ii. 80, 185; Jacobs, ii. 67, 170.) There is considerable difficulty in assigning each of the epigrams to its proper author, and probably some of them belong to a third Diodorus, a grammarian of Tarsus, who is also mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 675), and as it seems, by other ancient writers. (Jacobs, xiii. 883, 884; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. pp. 300, 472, vi. pp. 369, 364.)

DIO'DORUS, comes and magister Scribionum, one of the commissioners appointed by Theodosius the younger, in A.D. 435, to compile the Theodosian code. Theodosius originally intended that, as an historical monument for the use of the learned, there should be compiled a general code of constitutions, supplementary to the Gregorian and Hormogenian codes. These three codes taken together were intended to comprise all the general constitutions of the emperors, not such only as were in actual force, but such also as were superseded or had become obsolete. In order, however, that in case of conflict, the reader might be able to distinguish the more modern enactment, which was to prevail over the more ancient one, the arrangement under each subject was to be chronological, and dates were to be carefully added. From this general code, with the help of the works and opinions of jurists, was to be formed a select code, excluding every thing not in force and containing the whole body of practical law. In A.D. 429, nine commissioners were appointed, charged with the task of compiling, first, the general historical, and then, the select practical code. The nine named were Antiochus, Procopius, Erotius, Neuterius. It will be observed that only three, (namely, Antiochus, Procopius, Erotius) who belonged to the first commission were nominated upon the second. In the constitution concerning the authority of the Theodosian code, eight only of the sixteen named upon the second commission are signalized as having been actively employed in the composition of the code. These eight are Antiochus, Maximinus, Martyrius, Sperantius, Appolodorus, Theodosius, Epigenius, and Procopius. (Cod. Theod. 1, tit. 1, a. 1, b. 5, l. 6, §§ 2; Const. de Theod. in Cod. Theod. & J. G.)

DIO'DORUS (Aidowpíros), a Greek physician, who must have lived some time in or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Pliny. (H.N. xxi. 39.) He may perhaps be the same person who is said by Galen (De Med. Mod. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142) to have belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and whose medical formulae he several times quotes. (De Compos. Medicin. sec. Locos, v. 8, vol. xlii. p. 834; x. vol. xliii. p. 361.)

DIO'DORUS, artists. 1. A silversmith, on whose silver image of a sleeping satyr there is an epigram by Plato in the Greek Anthology. (Anth. Plan. iv. 12, 248.) The idea contained in the epigram is applied by Pliny to a similar work of STRATONICUS.

2. A worthless painter, who is ridiculed in an epigram. (Anth. Pal. vi. 213.)

DIO'DOTUS (Aidóturos), the son of Eucratés (possibly, but not probably, the flax-seller of that name who is said to have preceded Cleon in influence with the Athenians), is only known as the orator who in the two discussions on the punishment to be inflicted on Mytilene (c. a. 427), took the most prominent part against Cleon's sanguinary policy. (Thuc. iii. 41.) These are the only things of his speech on the second day we may suppose ourselves to have in the language of Thucydidides (ili. 42-48). The expressions of his opponent lead us to take him for one of the rising class of professional orators, the earliest producer of the labours of the Sophists. If so, he is a singularly favourable specimen. Of his eloquence we cannot judge; but if, in other points, Thucydidides represents him fairly, he certainly on this occasion displayed the ingenuity of the Sophists, the tact of the practised debater, and soundness of view of the statesman, in the service of a cause that deserved and needed them all. He cautiously shifts the argument from the justice to the policy of the measure. Feelings which were already excited, the orator only wished a justification for indulging them. This he finds them in the certainty that revolt at any risk would be ventured; sufferings could not check, and would surely make it more obstinately persevered in; and in the exceeding inexpediency of confounding, by indiscriminate slaughter, their friends, the democratic party, with those who would in any case be their enemies,—a suggestion probably, at that time, far from obvious. To his skill we must ascribe the revocation of the preceding day's vote in Cleon's favour, and the preservation of Mytilene from massacre, and Athens from a great crime.

DIO'DOTUS (Aidóturos) I., King of Bactria, and founder of the Bactrian monarchy, which continued to subsist under a Greek dynasty for above one hundred and fifty years. This prince as well as his successor is called by Justin, Theodotus, but the form Diodotus, which occurs in Strabo (xi. p. 515) seems to have been that used by Trogus Pompeius (Pro!. Trogi Pompeii, lib. xii.), is confirmed by the evidence of an unique gold coin now in the museum at Paris. (See Wilson, Ariana, p. 219.)

Both the period and circumstances of the es-blishment of his power in Bactria are very uncertain. It seems clear, however, that he was at first satrap or governor of that province, under the Syrian monarch, and that he took advantage of his sovereign's being engaged in wars in distant parts of his dominions to declare himself independent. The remote and secluded position of his territory, and the revolt of the Parthians under Arsaces, almost immediately afterwards, appear to have prevented any attempts on the part of the Syrian monarch to reduce him again to subjection. At a later period, when Seleucus Callinicus undertook his expedition against Parthia, he appears to have entered into alliance with Diodotus, and may perhaps have confirmed him in the possession of his sovereignty, to secure his co-operation against Tiridates. Diodotus, however, died apparently just about this time. (Justin, xii. 4; Strab. x. p. 515; compare Wilson's Ariana, pp. 215—219; Droysen's Hellenismus, i. pp. 326, 412, 760; Raoul Rochette, Journ. des Savans, Oct. 1835.)

With regard to the date of the revolt of Diodotus, it appears from Strabo and Justin to have occurred in the second year of the reign of Antiochus II. in Syria, and to have been confirmed by the concurrent action of many others whose names are not given. (Justin, xii. 5, vol. xii. p. 104) as having used a medicine of Antonius Musa. (W. A. G.)

DIO'DOTUS II., the son and successor of the preceding, is called by Justin Theodotus, as well as his father. According to that author, he abandoned his father's policy, and concluded a treaty with the king of Parthia, Tiridates, by which he was joined against Seleucus Callinicus. (Justin, xii. 4.) The total defeat of the Syrian king probably secured the independence of Bactria, as well as that of Parthia; but we know nothing more of the history of Diodotus. The commencement of his reign may be dated somewhere about 240 B.C. (Wilson's Ariana, p. 217.) [E. H. B.]

DIO'DOTUS (Διόδωρος), literary. 1. Of Erythræ, was, according to Athenæus (x. p. 434), the author of ἐπιμελείας Ἀλεξάνδρου, from which we may infer that he was a contemporary of Alexander the Great.

2. A Greek grammarian, who, according to Diogenes Laëritius (ix. 15), commented on the writings of Heraclitus.

3. A Peripatetic philosopher, of Sidon, is mentioned only by Strabo (xvi. p. 757).

4. Surnamed Petronius, was the author of Anthologia Graeca and other works. He is often referred to by Pliny, and is the same as the physician mentioned below.

5. A Stoic philosopher, who lived for many years at Rome in the house of Cicero, who had known him from his childhood, and always entertained esteem for him. He instructed Cicero, and trained and exercised his intellectual powers, especially in dialectics. In his later years, Diodotus became blind, but he nevertheless continued to occupy himself with literary pursuits and with teaching geometry. He died in Cicero's house, in n. c. 59, and left to his friend a property of about 100,000 sesterces. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 4. xiii. 16, de Nat. Doctr. i. 3, Brut. 90, Acad. ii. 36, Tuscul. v. 39, ad Att. ii. 20.) [L. S.]

DIO'DOTUS (Διόδωρος), artists. 1. A statue, by whom Strabo (ix. p. 396, c) ascribes the Rhamnusian Nemesis of Aoracritus. There is no other mention of him.

2. A sculptor of Nicomedea, the son of Beuthus, made, with his brother Menodotus, a statue of Hercules (see Did. of Alexandria, p. 217.) [E. H. B.]

DIO'GAS (Διόγας), an intriguer (see Did. of Ant. s. v.), who lived in the first or second century A.D. (Justin, xii. 5, vol. xii. p. 104) as having used a medicine of Antonius Musa. (W. A. G.)

DIOGENEIA (Διογενεία), the name of two mythical beings. (Paus. i. 36. § 3; Apoll. iii. 15. § 1.) [L. S.]

DIO'GENES (Διόγενης), historical. 1. An Aca'manian. When Popullius in B.C. 170 went as ambassador to the Aetolians, and several statesmen were of opinion that Roman garrisons should be stationed in Aca'mania, Diogenes opposed their advice, and succeeded in inducing Popullius not to send any soldiers into Aca'mania. (Polyb. xxviii. 5.)

2. A son of Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, who fell in the battle of Chioacores, which his father lost against Sulla. (Appian, Mithrid. 49.)

3. A Carthaginian, who succeeded Hasdrubal in the command of a place called Nephesis, in Africa, where he was attacked by Scipio Africannus the Younger, who however left Lucullus to continue the attack, while he himself marched against Carthage. However, Scipio soon returned, and after a siege of twenty-two days, the place was taken: 70,000 persons are said to have been killed on that spot, and this victory of Scipio was the first great step towards the taking of Carthage, which had been supplied with provisions from Nephesis. The capture of the place, moreover, broke the courage of the Africans, who still espoused the cause of Carthage. (Appian, Pumn. 126.)

4. A person sent by Odropernes, together with Timotheus, as ambassador to Rome in B.C. 161, to carry to Rome a golden crown, and to renew the friendship and alliance with the Romans. The principal object of the ambassadors, however, was to support the accusation which was brought against Ariarathes; and Diogenes and his coadjudicator, Milthades, succeeded in their plan, and lies and calumnies gained the victory, as there was no one to undertake the defence of Ariarathes. (Polyb. xxix. 20.)

5. Prefect of Seleucia in the reign of Antiochus the Great. During the rebellion of Molon he defended the arx of Susa while the city itself was taken by the rebel. Molon ceased pushing his conquest further, and leaving a besieging corps behind him, he returned to Seleucia. When the insurrection was at length put down by Antiochus, Diogenes obtained the command of the military forces
DIOGENES.

There were two other Cynic philosophers of this name, one in the reign of Vespasian (Dion Cass. xiv. 15), and the other in the reign of Julian, who praises him in one of his Epistles (55, p. 410).

5. Of CYRUS. [DIOGENIANUS-]

6. The author of a work on Persia, of which the first book is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria. (Protrept. p. 19) It is uncertain whether he is the same as the Diogenes who is mentioned by Parmenides (Ero. 6) as the author of a work on Fallene.

7. LAERTIUS. See below.

8. ONOMAUS. See below.

9. A PHOENICIAN, a Peripatetic philosopher, who lived in the time of Simplicius. (Suid. s. v. φρεσκας). Whether he is the same as Diogenes of Abila in Phoenicia, whom Suidas and Stephanus Byzantius (s. v. Αβίλα) call a distinguished sophist, cannot be ascertained.

10. A PHIUSIAN, is described as an atheist, but is otherwise unknown. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 31; comp. Fast. Ethod. Od. iii. 301.)

11. Of PTOLEMAIS in Egypt, a Stoic philosopher, who held ethics the basis of his philosophy. (Diog. Laer. vii. 41.)

12. OF RHODES, a Greek grammarian, who used to hold disputations at Rhodes every seventh day. Tiberius once wanted to hear him; but as it was not the usual day for disputing, the grammarian bade him come again on the seventh day. Afterwards Diogenes came to Rome, and when he asked permission to pay his homage, the emperor did not admit him, but requested him to come again after the lapse of seven years. (Suet. Tiber. 32.)

13. Of Seleucia, an Epicurean philosopher, who has frequently been confounded with Diogenes the Babylonian, who was likewise a native of Seleucia. He lived at the court of Syria, and on terms of intimacy with king Alexander, the supposititious son of Antiochus Epiphanes. But he was put to death soon after the accession of Antiochus Theus, in b.c. 142. (Athen. v. p. 211.)

14. Of SYRION, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 81) as the author of a work on Peloponnesus.

15. Of SYNNA, an Eleatic philosopher, who was a disciple of Menedorus and Protagoras. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 301.)

16. Of TARSOs, an Epicurean philosopher, who is described by Strabo (xiv. p. 575) as a person clever in composing extempore tragedies. He was the author of several works, which, however, are lost. Among them are mentioned: 1. Ευχετακτα σχολαι, which was probably a collection of essays or dissertations on philosophical subjects. (Diog. Laer. x. 26, with Menage’s note.) 2. An abridgment of the Ethics of Epicurus (ἐπικονίων των ἐν τις κονίων φιλοσ. γνησιων), of which Diogenes Laërtius (xiii. 118) quotes the 12th book. 3. Περὶ πολλων γνησιων, that is, on poetical problems, which he undertook to solve, and which seem to have had especial reference to the Homeric poems. (Diog. Laer. vi. 81.) Further particulars are not known about him, though Gassendi (de Vit. Epicur. ii. 6) represents him as a disciple of Democritus the Lyconian.

There are several more literary persons of the name of Diogenes, concerning whom nothing is known. A list of them is given by Thierry, l. c. p. 97, &c. [L. S. ]
DIOGENES. APOLLONIATIS (Ἀυθαίρετος Ἀπολλονίατης), an eminent natural philosopher, who lived in the fifth century B.C. He was a native of Apollonia in Crete, his father's name was Apollodorus, and he was a pupil of Anaximenes. Nothing is known of the events of his life, except that he was once at Athens, and there got into trouble from some unknown cause, which is conjectured to have been the supposition that his philosophical opinions were dangerous to the religion of the state. (Diog. Laert. ix. § 57.) He wrote a work in the Ionic dialect, entitled Περὶ Φύσεως, "On Nature," which consisted of at least two books, and in which he appears to have treated of physical science in the largest sense of the words. Of this work he left a few short fragments remain, preserved by Aristotle, Diogenes Laërtius, and Simplicius. The longest of these is that which is inserted by Aristotle in the third book of his History of Animals, and which contains an interesting description of the origin and distribution of the veins. The following is the account of his philosophical opinions given by Diogenes Laërtius:—

He maintained that air was the principal element of all things; that there was an infinite number of worlds, and an infinite void; that air, densified and rarified, produced the different members of the universe; that nothing was produced from nothing, and similar dwellings. To these arguments is opposed the fact, that Plutarch, Arrian, Cicero, and Valerius Maximus, though they speak of Diogenes basking in the sun, do not allude at all to the tub; but more particularly that Epictetus (op. Arrian. iii. 24), in giving a long and careful account of his mode of life, says nothing about it. The great combatants on this subject in modern times are, against the tub, Heumann (Act. Philos. vol. ii. p. 58), and for it, Hase, whose dissertation de Dolari Habitatio Diogenis Cynici, was published by his rival. (Puez. vol. i. lib. iv. p. 586.) The story of the tub goes on to say that the Athenians voted the repair of this enormous tub, when it was broken by a mischievous urchin. Lucian, in telling this anecdote, appeals to certain spurious epistles, falsely attributed to Diogenes. In spite of his strange eccentricities, Diogenes appears to have been much respected at Athens, and to have been privileged to rebuke anything of which he disapproved with the utmost possible licence of expression. He seems to have ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits which did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of Ulysses, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves with the minute and similar matters; and for what lay immediately before them; orators for learning to say what was right, but not to practise it. Various sarcastic sayings of the same kind are handed down as his, generally shewing that unwise contempt for the common opinions and pursuits of men, which is so unlikely to reform them.

The removal of Diogenes from Athens was the result of a voyage to Aegina, in the course of which the ship was taken by pirates, and Diogenes carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. Here when he was asked what business he understood, he answered, "How to command men," and he begged to be sold to some one who needed a ruler. Such a purchaser was found in the person of Xenocrates of Corinth, over whom he acquired such unbounded influence, that he soon received from him his freedom, was entrusted with the care of his children, and passed his old age in his house. During his residence among them his celebrated interview with Alexander the Great is said to have taken place. The conversation between them is reported to have begun by the king's saying, "I am Alexander the Great," to which the philosopher replied, "And I am Diogenes the Cynic." Alexander then asked whether he could oblige him in any way, and received no answer except, "Yes, you..."
can stand out of the sunshine." Considering, however, that this must have happened soon after Alexander's accession, and before his Persian expedition, he could not have called himself the Great, which title was not conferred on him till he had gained his Eastern victories, after which he never returned to Greece. These considerations, with others, are sufficient to banish this anecdote, together with that of the tub, from the domain of history; and, considering what rich materials so peculiar a person as Diogenes must have afforded for amusing stories, we need not wonder if a few have come down to us of somewhat doubtful genuineness. We are told, however, that Alexander admired Diogenes so much that he said, "If I were not Alexander, I should wish to be Diogenes." (Plut. Alex. c. 14.) Some say, that after Diogenes became a resident at Corinth, he still spent every winter at Athens, and he is also accused of various scandalous offences, but of these there is no proof; and the whole bearing of tradition about him shews that, though a strange fanatic, he was a man of great excellence of life, and probably of real kindness, since Xenocrates compared his arrival to the entrance of a good genius into his house.

With regard to the philosophy of Diogenes there is little to say, as he was utterly without any scientific object whatever. His system, if it deserve the name, was purely practical, and consisted merely in teaching men to dispense with the simplest and most necessary wants (Diog. Laërt. vi. 79); and his whole style of teaching was a kind of caricature upon that of Socrates, whom he imitated in imparting instruction to persons whom he casually met, and with a still more supreme contempt for time, place, and circumstances. Hence he was sometimes called "the mad Socrates." He did not commit his opinions to writing, and therefore those attributed to him cannot be certainly relied on. The most peculiar, if correctly stated, was, that all minds are air, exactly alike, and composed of similar particles; that in the irrational parts, and Theophrastus—and the Italian, which was founded by Pythagoras, and ends with Epicurus. He reckons the Socratic school, with its various ramifications, as a part of the Ionic philosophy, of which he treats in the first seven books. The Elysians, with Heraclitus and the Sceptics, are included in the Italian philosophy, which occupies the eighth and ninth books. Epicurus and his philosophy, lastly, are treated of in the tenth book with particular minuteness, which has led some writers to the belief that Diogenes himself was an Epicurean. Considering the loss of all the numerous and comprehensive works of the ancients, in which the history of philosophers and of philosophy was treated of either as a whole or in separate portions, and a great number of which Diogenes himself had before him, the compilation of Diogenes is of incalculable value to us as a source of information concerning the history of Greek philosophy. About forty writers on the lives and doctrines of the Greek philosophers are mentioned in his work, and in all two hundred and eleven authors are cited whose works he made use of. His work has for a long time been the foundation of most modern histories of ancient philosophy; and the works of Brucker and Stanley, as far as the early history of philosophy is concerned, are little more than translations, and sometimes amplifications, of Diogenes Laërtius. The work of Diogenes contains a rich store of living features, which serve to illustrate the private life of the Greeks, and a considerable number of fragments of works which are lost. Montaigne (Essais, ii. 10) therefore justly wished, that we had a dozen Laërtius, that his work were more complete and better arranged. One must indeed confess, that he made bad use of the enormous quantity of materials which he had at his command in writing his work, and that he was unequal to the task of giving a history of Greek philosophy. His work is in reality nothing but a compilation of the most heterogeneous, and often directly contradictory, accounts, put together without plan, criticism, or connexion. Even some early scholars, such as H. Stephens, considered these biographies of the philosophers to be anything but worthy of the philosophers. His object evidently was to furnish a book which was to amuse its readers by piquant anecdotes, for he had no conception of the value and dignity of philosophy, or of the greatness of the men whose lives he described. The traces of carelessness and mistakes are very numerous; much in the work is confused, and there is much also that is quite absurd; and as far as philosophy itself is concerned, Diogenes very frequently did not know what he was talking about, when he abridged the theories of the philosophers.

The love of scandal and anecdotes, which had arisen from petty views of men and things, at a time when all political freedom was gone, and among a people which had become demoralized, had crept into literature also, and such compilations as those of Phileon, Polemenes Chennus, Athenaeus, Aelian, and Diogenes Laërtius display this taste of a decaying literature. All the defects of such a period, however, are so glaring in the work of Diogenes, that in order to rescue the compilation from total obscurity, a monograph was written, the result of which is, that the present work is a mutilated abridgment of the original production of Diogenes. (J. G. Schneider in F. A. Wolf's Lit. Anal. iii. p. 297.) Guanterius Burlaeus, who lived at the close of the 13th century, wrote a work "De Vita et Moribus Philosophorum," in which he principally used Diogenes. Now Burlaeus makes many statements, and quotes sayings of the philosophers, which seem to be derived from no other source than Diogenes, and yet are not to be found in our present text. Burlaeus, moreover, gives us several valuable various readings, a better order and plan, and several accounts which in his work are minute and particular, which are abridged in Diogenes in a manner which renders them unintelligible. From these circumstances Schneider infers, that Burlaeus had a more complete copy of Diogenes. But the hope of discovering a more complete MS. has not been realized as yet.

The work of Diogenes became first known in western Europe through a Latin translation made by Ambrosius, a pupil of Chrysoloras, which, however, is rather a free paraphrase than a translation. It was printed after Ambrosius's death. (Rome, before A.D. 1475; reprinted Venice, 1475; Brixen, 1493; Venice, 1493; and Antwerp, 1566.) From the Greek text only some portions were then printed in the editions of Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plato, and Xenophon. The first complete edition is that of Basel, 1533, 4to., ap. Frobenium. It was followed by that of H. Stephens, with notes, which, however, extend only to the ninth book, Paris, 1570, and of Isaac Casaubon, with notes, 1594. Stephens's edition, with the addition of Hesychius Milesius, de Vita Illustr. Philos., appeared again at Colon. Allbrog. 1515. Then followed the editions of Th. Aldobrandinus (Rome, 1594, fol.), corrected by a collation of new MSS., and of J. Pearson with a new Latin translation (London, 1664, fol.), which contains the valuable commentary of Menage, and the notes of the earlier commentators. All these editions were surpassed in some respects by that of Meibom (Amsterd., 1692, 2 vols. 4to.), but the text is here treated carefully, and altered by conjectures. This edition was badly reprinted in the editions of Longolius (1739 and 1759), in which only the preface of Longolius is of value. The best modern edition is that of H. G. Hübner, Leipzig, 2 vols. 8vo. 1828—1831. The text is here greatly improved, and accompanied by short critical notes. In 1831, the commentaries of Menage, Casaubon, and others, were printed in 2 vols. 8vo. uniformly with Hübner's edition. (Comp. P. Gassendi, Animadversiones in a librum Dioeg. Laërti. Lugdun. 1649, 3 vols. fol. 3rd edition, Lugdun. 1675; J. Bossius, Commentationes Laërtianae, Rome, 1788, 4to.; S. Battier, Observation in Diog. Laërt. in the Mus. Helvet. xv. p. 32, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. v. p. 564.)

Diogenes seems to have taken the lists of the writings of his philosophers from Hermippus and Alexandrian authors. (Stahr, Aristot. ii. p. 68; Brandis, in the Rhein. Mus. i. 5, p. 249; Trendelenburg, ad Aristot. de Anima. p. 123.) Besides the work on Greek philosophers, Diogenes Laërtius also composed other works, to which he himself (ii. 65) refers with the words ἐπὶ ἄλλοις ἐπικήρουσαν. The epigrams, many of which are interspersed in his biographies, and with reference to which Tzetzes (Chil. iii. 61) calls him an epicure, are ascribed by Diogenes Laërtius to Diogenes the Cynic. Aelian also composed other works, to which he himself (vi. 80) refers with the words ὡς ἐν ἄλλοις εἰπήκατο. The epigrams, many of which are interspersed in his biographies, and with reference to which Tzetzes (Chil. iii. 61) calls him an epicure, are ascribed by Diogenes Laërtius to Diogenes the Cynic. (vi. 80, or 73.) Others ascribe them to Philiscus of Aegina, a friend of Diogenes the Cynic (Menagius, ad Dioeg. Laërt. l. c., and others to Pasiphaon. Melanthus in Plutarcl. de Aud. Poet. i. p. 41, d.) complains of the obscurity of a certain Diogenes. Aelian (V. H. iii. 30, N. A. vi. 1) mentions a tragic poet Diogenes, who seems, however, to be a different person from either Diogenes the Cynic or Diogenes Oenomäus. (Suid. s. v.;Ath. xiv. p. 636, a.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 295.)

DIIOGENES (Diogenes), a Greek physician who might have lived 500 or before the first century after Christ, as he is quoted by Celsus. (De Medici. v. 19, 27, pp. 90, 104.) Some of his medical formulœ are preserved by Celsus (l. c.), Galen (de Comps. Medicin. sec. Locas. iii. 3, vol. xii. p. 686; ix. 7, vol. xiii. p. 313), and Aëtius (i. 8, 109, p. 135). He is probably not the same person with any of the other individuals of this name. [W. A. G.]
DIOGENES, artists. 1. A painter of some note, who lived in the time of Demetrius Poliorcetes. (Plin. xxxv. 11, s. 40. § 42.)

2. Of Athens, a sculptor, who decorated the Pantheon of Agrippa with some Caryatids, which were greatly admired, and with statues in the pediment, which were no less admirable, but which were not so well seen, on account of their position. It is very difficult to determine in what position the Caryatids stood. Pliny says, "in colonis." (Plin. xxxvi. 5, s. 4. § 11.)

DIOGENIUS (Διόγενιος), a grammarian, who is also called Diogenes (Suid. s. v. Διογένης), whence some have ventured upon the conjecture, that he is the same person as Diogenes Leukurtus, which seems to be supported by the fact, that Tzetzes (Chil. iii. 61) calls the latter Diogenianus; but all is uncertain and mere conjecture. Diogenianus of Cyzicus is called by Suidas the author of works on the seven islands of his native country, on the alphabet, on poetry, and other subjects. It cannot be determined whether the Diogenianus mentioned by Plutarch (Sympos. viii. 1), or the one from whom Eusebius (Princ. viii. 1), or the one from whom Eusebius conjectures Diogenianus of Cyzicus or not. (Bernhardy, ad Suid, i. p. 1378.)

DIOGENIUS (Διόγενιος) of Heraclea on the Pontus, a distinguished grammarian, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian. Suidas enumerates the following works of his:

1. Αἰτίας μαντηκαὶ κατὰ στοιχεῖον, in five books, being an abridgment of the Lexicon of Pamphilus.

2. An Anthology of epigrams, τῶν Συμπληρωμάτων ἀνθόλογον; and several geographical works. Suidas is not certain whether he was a native of the Pontic Heraclea, or whether he was not the same person as the physician Diogenianus of Heraclea Albane in Caria. Nothing is known of the contents or arrangement of his Anthology. His Lexicon seems to have been much used by Suidas and Hesychius; and indeed some suppose the Lexicon of Hesychius in his Polyglott to have been almost entirely taken from that of Diogenianus. A portion of it is still extant, containing a collection of proverbs, under the title Παροιμίων ταχύες.

The work is in alphabetical order, and contains 775 proverbs. It was first printed by Schottus, with the proverbs of Zenobius and Suidas, in his Παροιμίων ταχύες (v. p. 109); Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vi. Proleg. p. xlvii.; Leutsch and Schneidewin, in their Παροιμίων ταχύες (v. p. xxvii.).

DIOGENIUS, Fulvius, a consul under Macrinus remarkable for his imprudent freedom of speech. The passage in Dion Cassius which contains some particulars with regard to this personage is extremely defective. He may be the same with the Fulvius who was prefect of the city when Eligabulus was slain, and who perished in the massacre which followed that event. (Dion Cass. lxxxviii. vii. 23; xxiv. 23; 95.)

DIOGENETUS (Διογένης). 1. Admiral of Antiochus the Great, was commissioned, in B. C. 222.
At the funeral games of Patroclus he conquered in the chariot-race, and received a woman and a tripod as his prize. (xviii. 373, &c.) He also conquered the Telamonian Ajax in single combat, and won the sword which Achilles had offered as the prize. (xviii. 811, &c.) He is described in the Iliad in general as brave in war and wise in counsel (ix. 53), in battle furious as a mountain torrent, in the terror of the Trojans, whom he chased before him, as a lion chased goats. (v. 87, xi. 382.) He is strong like a god (v. 884), and the Trojan women during their sacrifices to Athena prayed to her to break his spear and to make him fall. (vi. 306.) He himself knows no fear, and refuses his consent when Ajax promises to take to flight, and he declares that, if all flee, he and his friend Sthenelus will stay and fight till Troy shall fall. (ix. 32, &c., comp. vii. 398, viii. 151; Philostr. Her. 4.)

The story of Diomedes, like those of other heroes of the Trojan time, has received various additions and embellishments from the hands of later writers, of which we shall notice the principal ones. After the expedition of the Helen (Hygin. Fab. 81; Apollod. iii. 10, § 8), and his love of Helen induced him to join the Greeks in their expedition against Troy with 30 ships. (Hygin. Fab. 97.) Being a relative of Theseus, who was slain by Achilles, he did not permit the body of the Amazon Penthesileia to be honourably buried, but dragged her by the feet into the river Scamander. (Tzetzes ad I. 393; Dict. Cret. iv. 3.) Philoctetes was persuaded by Diomedes and Odysseus to join the Greeks against Troy. (Soph. Philoct. 570, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 102.) Diomedes conspired with Odysseus against Palamedes, and under the pretence of having discovered a hidden treasure, they let him down into a well and there stoned him to death. (Diet. Cret. ii. 15; comp. Paus. x. 31, § 1.) After the death of Paris, Diomedes and Odysseus were sent into the city of Troy to negotiate for peace (Dict. Cret. v. 4), but he was afterwards one of the Greeks concealed in the wooden horse. (Hygin. Fab. 106.) When he and Odysseus had arrived in the arx of Troy by a subterraneous passage, they slew the guards and carried away the palladium (Virg. Aen. ii. 163), as it was believed that Ilium could not be taken so long as the palladium was within its walls. When, during the night, the two heroes were returning to the camp with their precious booty, and Odysseus was walking behind him, Diomedes saw by the shadow of his companion that he was drawing his sword in order to kill him, and then, to save himself alone the honour of having taken the palladium. Diomedes, however, turned round, seized the sword of Odysseus, and drove him along before him to the camp. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 823.) Diomedes, according to some, carried the palladium with him to Argos, where it remained until Ergacus, one of his descendants, took it away with the assistance of the Laconian Lentrus, who conveyed it to Sparta. (Plut. Quaest. Graec. 48.) According to others, Diomedes was robbed of the palladium by Demophon in Attica, where he landed one night on his return from Troy, without knowing where he was. (Paus. ii. 28, § 9.) A third tradition says, that Diomedes restored the palladium and the remains of Anchises to Aeneas, because he was informed by an oracle, that he should be exposed to unceasing sufferings unless he restored the sacred image to the Trojans. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166, iii. 407, iv. 427, v. 81.)

On his return from Troy, he had like other heroes to suffer much from the enmity of Aphiodes, but Athens still continued to protect him. He was first thrown by a storm on the coast of Lycia, where he was to be sacrificed to Ares by Argeiros, but Callirrhoe, the king's daughter, took pity upon him, and assisted him in escaping. (Plut. Parall. Gr. et Rom. 23.) On his arrival in Argos he met with an evil reception which had been prepared for him either by Aphiodes or Nauplius, for his wife Aegialeia was living in adultery with Hippolytus, or according to others, with Cometes or Clytaraenas. (Dict. Cret. vi. 2; Tzetzes ad I. 609; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 9.) He therefore quitted Argos either of his own accord, or he was expelled by the adulterers (Tzetzes ad Lyc. 609), and went to Aetolia. His going to Aetolia and the subsequent recovery of Argos are placed in some traditions immediately after the war of the Epigoni, and Diomedes is said to have gone with Alcmaeon to assist his grandson Oeneus in Aetolia against his enemies. During the absence of Diomedes, Agamemnon took possession of Argos; but when the expedition against Troy was resolved upon, Agamemnon from fear invited Diomedes and Aeneas back to Argos, and asked them to take part in the projected expedition. Diomedes alone accepted the proposal, and thus recovered Argos. (Strab. vii. p. 325, x. p. 462; comp. Hygin. Fab. 175; Apollod. i. 8, § 6; Paus. ii. 25, § 2.) According to another set of traditions, Diomedes did not go to Aetolia till after his return from Troy, when he was expelled from Argos, and it is said that he went first to Corinth, but being informed there of the distress of Oeneus, he hastened to Aetolia to assist him. Diomedes conquered and slew the enemies of his grandfather, and then took up his residence in Aetolia. (Dict. Cret. vi. 2.) Other writers make him attempt to return to Argos, but on his way home a storm threw him on the coast of Daunia in Italy. Daunus, the king of the country, received him kindly, and solicited his assistance in a war against the Messapians. He promised in return to give him a tract of land and the hand of his daughter Euippe. Diomedes defeated the Messapians, and distributed their territory among the Dorians who had accompanied him in Italy. Diomedes gave up his hostility against the Trojans, and even assisted them against Turnus. (Paus. i. 11; Serv. ad Aen. viii. 9.) He died in Daunia at an advanced age, and was buried in one of the islands off cape Garganus, which were called after him the Diomedean islands. Subsequently, when Daunus too had died, the Dorians were conquered by the Illyrians, but were metamorphosed by Zeus into birds. (Anton. Lib. 37; comp. Tzetzes ad Lyc. 602, 618.) According to Tzetzes, Diomedes was murdered by Daunus, whereas according to others he returned to Argos, or disappeared in one of the Diomedean islands, or in the country of the Heneti. (Strab. vi. p. 284.) A number of towns in the eastern part of Italy, such as Beneventum, Aquturnaticum, Argos Hippon (afterwards Argyriry or Arpi), Venusia or Aphrodisia, Campania, Vipurn, Capua, Salapia, Syrne, Sipula, Gaeta, and Brundisium, are believed to have been founded by Diomedes. (Serv. ad Aen. viii. 9, xi. 246; Strab. vi. pp. 283, 284; Plin. N. H. 3 v.) DIOMEDES.

H. N. iii. 20; Justin, xii. 3.) The worship and service of gods and heroes was spread by Diomede far and wide: in and near Argos he caused temples of Athena to be built (Plut. de Flam. 18; Paus. ii. 24. § 9); his armour was preserved in a temple of Athena at Luceria in Apulia, and a gold chain of his was shewn in a temple of Artemis in Peucetia. At Trozene he had founded a temple of Apollo Ephbaterius, and instituted the Pythian games there. He himself was subsequently worshipped as a divine being, especially in Italy, where statues of him existed at Argyripa, Metapontum, Thurii, and other places. (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. x. 12; Sclaylax, Periél. p. 6; comp. Strab. v. p. 214, &c.)

There are traces in Greece also of the worship of Diomede, for it is said that he was placed among the gods together with the Dioscuri, and that Athena conferred upon him the immortality which had been intended for his father Tydeus. It has been conjectured that Diomede is an ancient Pelasgian name of some divinity, who was afterwards confounded with the hero Diomede, so that the worship of the god was transferred to the hero. (Böckh, Explicit. ad Pind. Nem. x. p. 463.) Diomede was represented in a painting on the acropolis of Athens in the act of carrying away the Palladium from Troy (Paus. i. 22. § 6), and Polygnotus had painted him in the Lesche at Oeche (x. 29. § 1), and a statue of him by Brandisäter, Die Gesch. der Ath. Leit. p. 76, &c.

2. A son of the great Diomede by Euippe, the daughter of Danaus. (Anton. Lib. 37.)

3. A son of Ares and Cyrene, was king of the Bistones in Thrace, and was killed by Hercules on account of his mares, which he fed with human flesh. (Apollod. ii. 5; 8; Diosd. iv. 15; Serv. ad Aen. i. 756.) Hyginus (Fab. 250) calls him a son of Atlas by his own daughter Asteria. [L. S.]

DIOMEDES (Δίομηδες), a Greek grammarian, who wrote a commentary or scholia on the grammar of Dionysius Thrax, of which a few fragments are still extant. (Villoison, Anecd. pp. 99, 126, 172, 183, 186; Békker, Anecd. ii.) He seems also to have written on Homer, for an opinion of his Homer is refuted by the Venetian Scholastik on Homer (ad II. ii. 259). [L. S.]

DIOMEDES, the author of a grammatical treatise "De Oratore et Partibus Orationis et Vario Genere Mctorum libr. III." We are entirely ignorant of his history, but since he is frequently quoted by Priscian (e.g. lib. ix. pp. 861, 870, lib. x. 879, 889, 892), he must have lived before the commencement of the 6th century. The work is dedicated to a certain Athenasis, of whom we know nothing whatsoever. It is remarked elsewhere [CHARISIUS], that a close correspondence may be detected between the above work and many passages in the Institutiones Grammaticae of Charisius, and the same remark applies to Maximos Victorinus.

DIOMEDES, ST. (Διόμηδος), a physician, saint, and martyr, was born at Tarsus in Cilicia, of Christian parents. He lived at Tarsus for some time, and practised as a physician, but afterwards removed to Nicaea in Bithynia, where he continued till his death. We are told that he practised with great success, and used to endeavour, whenever he had an opportunity, to convert his patients to Christianity. For his efforts in this cause he was ordered to be brought before the emperor Diocletian, who at that time happened to be at Nicomedia in Bithynia, but died on his way thither, about the beginning of the fourth century after Christ. A church was built at Constantinople in his honour by Constantine the Great, which was afterwards adorned and beautified by the emperors Theodosius and Honorius. It was commemorated by the Roman and Greek churches on the 16th of August. (Acta Sanct.; Bzovius, Nomenclator Sanctorum Professio Mediorum, Carpozovia, de Medicis ab Ecclesia pro Sancis hâtis; Menelog. Graecorum.) [W. A. G.]

DIOMEON (Διόμηδων), an Athenian commander during the Peloponnesian war, came out early in the campaign of B. C. 412, the first after the Syracusean disaster, with a supply of 16 ships for the defence of Ionia. Chios and Miletus were already in revolt, and the Chians presently proceeded to attempt its extension to Lesbos. Diomond, who had captured on his first arrival the town of Chios, was soon after joined by Leon with ten from Athens, and the two commanders with a squadron of 25 ships now sailed for Lesbos. They recovered Mytilene at once, defeating the Chian detachment in the harbour; and by this blow were enabled to drive out the enemy and secure the whole island, a service of the highest importance. They also regained Chersonese, and from Lesbos and the neighbouring coast carried on a successful warfare against Chios. (Thuc. viii. 19—24.) In this service it seems likely they were permanently engaged until the occasion, in the following winter, when we find them, on the recommendation of Peisander, who with his oligarchical friends was then working for the recall of Alecibiades, placed in the chief command of the fleet at Samos, superseding Phrynichus and Scironides. After acting against Rhodes, now in revolt, they remained, apparently, during the period of inaction at the commencement of the season of B. C. 411, subordinate to Peisander, then at Samos. Hitherto he had trusted them: their appointment had been perhaps the result of their successful operations in Lesbos and Chios, and of a neutrality in party-matters: perhaps they had joined in his plan for the sake of the recall of Alecibiades, and now that this project was given up, they drew back, and saw moreover, as practical men, that the overthrow of democracy would be the signal for universal revolt to Sparta: Thusydides says that they were influenced by the honours they received from the democracy. For whatever reason, they now, on Peisander's departure, entered into communication with Thrasybulus and Thrasyllus, and, acting under their direction, crushed the oligarchical conspiracy among the Samians, and on hearing that the government of the Four Hundred was established in Athens, raised the standard of independent democracy in the army, and recalled Alecibiades. (viii. 54, 55, 78.)

Henceforth for some time they are not named, though they pretty certainly were among the commanders of the centre in the battle of Cynoscenn.
and during the whole period of the command of Alcibiades were probably in active service. When after the battle of Notium, b.c. 407, he was disgraced, they were among the ten generals appointed in his room. Diomedon in this command was employed at a distance from the main fleet; and when Callirrhous chased Conon into Mytilene, on the information, perhaps, of the galley which made its escape to the Helespont, he sailed for Lesbos, and lost 10 out of 12 ships in attempting to join his besieged colleague. In the subsequent glorious victory of Arginusae, he was among the commanders. So was he also among those unhappy six who returned to Athens and fell victims to the wild credulity of the people. It was in his behalf and that of Pericles, that his friend Euryplemus made the attempt, so nearly successful, to put off the trial. According to the account given in his speech, Diomedon, after the engagement, dissuaded his colleagues from naming those officers and this commission in their despair, for fear of their incurring the displeasure which thus in the end fell on the generals themselves. (Xenoph. Hiel. i. 5; 407, he was dis¬carded, they were among the ten generals appointed in his room. Diomedon in this command was employed at a distance from the main fleet; and when Callirrhous chased Conon into Mytilene, on the information, perhaps, of the galley which made its escape to the Helespont, he sailed for Lesbos, and lost 10 out of 12 ships in attempting to join his besieged colleague. In the subsequent glorious victory of Arginusae, he was among the commanders. So was he also among those unhappy six who returned to Athens and fell victims to the wild credulity of the people. It was in his behalf and that of Pericles, that his friend Euryplemus made the attempt, so nearly successful, to put off the trial. According to the account given in his speech, Diomedon, after the engagement, dissuaded his colleagues from naming those officers and this commission in their despair, for fear of their incurring the displeasure which thus in the end fell on the generals themselves. (Xenoph. Hiel. i. 5; § 16, 6; §§ 22, 29, 7; §§ 1, 16, 17, 29.) Diodorus, who hitherto had not mentioned his name, here relates that Diomedon, a man of great military skill, and distinguished for justice and other virtues, when sentence had been passed and he and the rest were now to be led to execution, came forward and bade the people be mindful of their duty, and to consider all human events, and to remember that every one of them was subject to change. (Steph. Byz. 8, w. Attic demos of Diomeia was believed to have derived its name. (Diod. xiii. 102.) [A. H. C.] DION, a king in Laconia and husband of Iphitea, from whom the Attic demos of Diomeia was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Kwnagrares, Dijmeia.)

DION, a Sicilian shepherd, who is said to have invented bucolic poetry, and was mentioned as such in two poems of Epicharmus. (Athen. xiv. p. 514.)

DION. 1027

DION, Kynegos of Laconia and husband of Iphitea, the daughter of Prognaeus. Apollo, who had been kindly received by Iphitea, rewarded her by conferring upon her three daughters, Orphe, Lyco, and Caryta, the gift of prophecy, on condition, however, that they should not betray the gods nor search after forbidden things. Afterwards Dionysus also came to the house of Dion; he was not only well received, like Apollo, but won the love of Caryta, and therefore soon paid Dion a second visit, under the pretext of consecrating a temple, which the king had erected to him. Orphe and Lyco, however, guarded their sister, and when Dionysus had reminded them, in vain, of the command of Apollo, they were seized with raging madness, and having gone to the heights of Taygetus, they were metamorphosed into rocks. Caryta, the beloved of Dionysus, was changed into a nut tree, and the Lacedaemonians, on being informed of it by Artemis, dedicated a temple to Artemis Caryatis. (Serv. ad Virg. Ecl. vili. 80; Caryatis.) [L. S.]

DION (Alcaeus), a Syracusan, son of Hipparimus. His father had been from the first a constant friend and supporter of the elder Dionysius, who had subsequently married his daughter Aristomache. These circumstances naturally brought Dion into friendly relations with Dionysius, and the latter having conceived a high opinion of his character and abilities, triumphed him with the greatest distinction, and employed him in many services of the utmost trust and confidence. Among others he sent him on an embassy to the Carthaginians, by whom he was received with the greatest distinction. (Plut. Dion, 3—5; Corn. Nep. Dion, 1.) Dion also married, during the lifetime of her father, Arcte, the daughter of Dionysius by Aristomache. Of this close connexion and favour with the tyrant he seems to have availed himself to amass great wealth, so that on the death of Dionysius he offered to equip and maintain 50 triremes at his own cost to assist in the war against Car- thage. (Plut. Dion, 6.) He made no opposition to the accession of the younger Dionysius to all his father's power, but his near relationship to the sons of the latter by his wife Aristomachus, as well as his dangerous pre-eminence in wealth and influence, rendered him an object of suspicion and jealousy to the youthful tyrant, to whom he also made himself personally disagreeable by the austerity of his manners. Dion appears to have been naturally a man of a proud and stern character, and having become an ardent disciple of Plato when that philosopher visited Syracuse in the reign of the elder Dionysius, he carried to excels the austerity of a philosopher, and viewed with undis¬guised contempt the debaucheries and dissolute pleasures of his nephew. From these he endeavoured to withdraw him by persuading him to invite Plato a second time to Syracuse; but the philosopher, though received at first with the utmost distinction, failed in obtaining a permanent hold on the mind of Dionysius; and the intrigues of the opposite party, headed by Philistias, were successful in procuring the banishment of Dion. (Plut. Dion, 7—14; Corn. Nep. Dion, 3 Diom. 6.) The circumstances attending this are variously reported, but it seems to have been at first merely an honourable exile, and he was allowed to receive the produce of his vast wealth. According to Plutarch, he retired to Athens, where he lived in habitual intercourse with Plato and his disciples, at times also visiting the other cities of Greece, and displaying his magnificence on all public occasions. But Plato having failed in procuring his recall (for which purpose he had a third time visited Syracuse), and Dionysius having at length confiscated his property and compelled his wife to marry another person, he finally determined on attempting the expulsion of the tyrant by force. (Plut. Dion, 15—21; Psued-Plat. Epist. 6; but compare Diom. xvi. 6.)

His knowledge of the general unpopularity of Dionysius, and the dislike of his subjects encouraged him to undertake this with forces apparently very insufficient. Very nearly all the numerous Syracusans exiles then in Greece could be induced to join him, and he sailed from Zacyn-thus with only two merchant ships and less than 1000 mercenary troops. The absence of Dionysius and of his chief supporter Philitus, who were both in Italy at the time, favoured his enterprise; he landed at Minoa in the Carthaginian territory, and being speedily joined by volunteers from all parts, advanced without opposition to Syracuse, which he entered in triumph, the whole city being abandoned by the forces of Dionysius, except the citadel on the island. (Diod. xvi. 9, 10; Plut. Dion. 22—28.) Dion and his brother Megacles were appointed commander of the Syracusans general-in-chief, and they proceeded to invest the citadel. Dionysius meanwhile returned, but having failed in a sally from the island, his overtures for peace were rejected, and Philistus, on whom he mainly depended, having been defeated and slain in a sea-fight, he determined to quit the city, and sailed away to Italy, leaving his son Apollocrates with a mercenary force in charge of the citadel. (b. c. 356.) But dissensions now broke out among the leaders, Hemeleides, who had lately arrived from the Peloponnese with a reinforcement of tricomes, and who had been appointed commander of the Syracusan fleet, sought to undermine the power of Dion; and the latter, whose mercenary troops were discontented for want of pay, withdrew with them to Leontini. The disasters of the Syracusans, however, arising from the incapacity of their new leaders, soon led to the recall of Dion, who was appointed sole general autocrat. Not long after, Apollocrates was compelled by famine to surrender the citadel. (Diod. xvi. 11—13, 16—20; Plut. Dion. 29—50.)

Dion was now sole master of Syracuse: whether he intended, as he was accused by his enemies, to retain the sovereign power in his own hands, or to establish an oligarchy with the assistance of the Corinthians, as asserted by Plutarch, we have no means of judging; but his government seems to have been virtually despotic enough. He caused his chief opponent, Hemeleides, to be put to death, and confiscated the property of his adversaries; but these measures only aggravated the discontent, which seems to have spread even to his own immediate followers. One of them, Calippus, an Athenian who had accompanied him from Greece, was induced by his increasing unpopularity to form a conspiracy against him, and having gained over some of his Zacynthian guards, caused him to be assassinated in his own house, b. c. 355. (Plut. Dion. 52—57; Corn. Nep. Dion. 6, 9; Diod. xvi. 31.) According to Cornelius Nepos, he was about 55 years old at the time of his death.

There can be no doubt that the character of Dion has been immoderately praised by some ancient writers, especially by Plutarch. It is admitted by his admirers, as he was accused by his enemies, to have been one of the ablest statesmen of ancient times. He is said to have been a man of a harsh and unyielding disposition, qualities which would easily degenerate into despotism when he found himself at the head of affairs. Even if he was sincere in the first instance in his intention of restoring liberty to Syracuse, he seems to have after wards abandoned the idea, and there can be little doubt that the complaints of the people, that they had only exchanged one tyrant for another, were well founded. (Plutarch, Dion; comp. Timol. c. P. Aemil. 2; Athen. xi. p. 506, e.) [E. H. B.]

DION (Διών). 1. Of Alexandria, an Academic philosopher and a friend of Antiochus. He was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Rome, to complain of the conduct of their king, Ptolemy Auletes. On his arrival at Rome he was poisoned by the king's secret agents, and the strongest suspicion of the murder fell upon M. Caecilius. (Cic. Acad. iv. 4, pro Caec. 10, 21; Strab. xvii. p. 786.)

2. Of Alexandria, apparently a writer on proverbs, who is mentioned by Zenobius (v. 54) and Apostolins. (xix. 24; comp. Suid. s. a, τά Διώνου γέροντα; Apostol. xv. 3; Suid. c. a, οὐδὲ Ἰράκτης; Schneidewin, Corp. Paroxymogr. i. pp. 119, 142.)

3. Of Chios, a flute player, who is said to have been the first who played the Bacchic spondees on the flute. (Athen. xv. p. 198, ed. Bipont.)

4. Of Colophon, is mentioned by Varro (De R. R. i. 1, 1), Columnella (i. 1), and Pliny among the Greek writers on agriculture; but he is otherwise unknown.

5. Of Gialosa in Sicily. Through the favour of Q. Metellus, he obtained the Roman franchise and the name of Q. Metellus Dion. His son had a large fortune left him, which incited the avarice of Verres, who annoyed him in various ways, and robbed him of his property. Dion is described as a very honest and trustworthy man. (Cic. in Ferr. i. 10, ii. 7, 3.)

6. Of Pergamus, is mentioned as the aecuver of Polemocrates. (Cic. pro Plaeco. 20.) A few more persons of the name of Dion are enumerated by Reimarus. (De Vit., Gr., Cassii Dion, 2.) [L. S.]

DION CASSIIUS COCEI'IANUS, the celebrated historian of Rome. He probably derived the gentle name of Cassius from one of his ancestors, who, on receiving the Roman franchise, had been adopted into the Cassius gens; for his father, Cassius Apmomannus, had already borne it. He appears to have adopted the cognomen of Coccianus from Dion Chrysostomus Coccianus, the orator, who, according to Reimarus, was his grandfather on his mother's side. Dion Cassius Coccianus, or as he is more commonly called Dion Cassius, was born, about A. D. 155, at Nicaea in Bithynia. He was educated with great care, and was trained in the rhetorical schools of the time, and in the study of the classical writers of ancient Greece. After the completion of his literary studies, he appears to have accompanied his father to Cilicia, of which he had the administration, and after his father's death, about A. D. 180, he went to Rome; so that he arrived there either in the last year of the reign of M. Aurelius, or in the first of that of Commodus. He had then attained the senatorial age of twenty-five, and was raised to the rank of a Roman senator; but he did not obtain any honours under Commodus, except the aedilship and questorship, and it was not till A. D. 193, in the reign of Pertinax, that he gained the office of praetor. During the thirteen years of the reign of Commodus, Dion Cassius remained at Rome, and devoted his time partly to pleading in the courts of justice, and thus assisting his friends, and partly in collecting materials for a history of Commodus, of whose actions he was a constant eye-witness. After the fall of this emperor, Dion, with the other senators, voted for the elevation of Pertinax, A. D. 193, who was his friend, and who immediately promoted him to the praetorship, which however he did not enter upon till the year following, the first of the reign of Septimius Severus. During the short reign of Pertinax Dion Cassius enjoyed the emperor's friendship, and... conducted himself on all occasions as an upright and virtuous man. The accession of Septimius Severus raised great hopes in Dion of being further promoted; but these hopes were not realized, notwithstanding the favour which Severus showed him in the beginning of his reign. Soon after the accession of Severus, Dion wrote a work on the dreams and prodigies which had announced the elevation of this emperor, and which he presented to Severus, who thanked him for it in a long epistle. The night after he had received this epistle, Dion was called upon in a dream to write the history of his own time, which induced him to work out the materials he had already collected for a history of Commodus. A similar dream or vision afterwards led him to write the history of Septimius Severus and Caracalla. When the history of Commodus was completed, Dion read it to the emperor, who received it with so much approbation, that Dion was encouraged to write a history of Rome from the earliest times, and to insert in it what he had already written about the reign of Commodus.

The next ten years, therefore, were spent in making the preparatory studies and collecting materials, and twelve years more, during the greater part of which he lived in quiet retirement at Capua, were employed in composing the work. It was his intention to carry the history as far down as possible, and to add an account of the reigns of the emperors succeeding Severus, so far as he might witness them. Reimarus conceives that Dion began collecting his materials in A. D. 201, and that after the death of Severus, in A. D. 211, he commenced the composition of his work, which would thus have been completed in A. D. 222.

The reason why Severus did not promote Dion is probably owing to the emperor's change of opinion respecting Commodus; for, during the latter part of his reign, he admired Commodus as much as he had before detested him; and what Dion had written about him could not be satisfactory to an admirer of the tyrant. Dion thus remained in Italy for many years, without any new dignity being conferred upon him. In the reign of Caracalla, it became customary for a select number of senators to accompany the emperor in his expeditions and travels, and Dion was one of them. He may have been present with the emperor's court during the untimely death of that prince. Dion, however, did not return to Rome, but went to Nicaea in Asia, and to have entrusted to him the administration of the free cities of Pergamus and Smyrna, which had shortly before revolted. Macrinus, however, appears to have again called him to Asia, and to have entrusted to him the administration of the free cities of Pergamus and Smyrna, which had shortly before revolted. Dion went to this post about A. D. 218, and seems to have remained there for about the years, on account of the various points which had to be settled. At the expiration of his office, however, he did not return to Rome, but went to Nicaea in Bithynia. On his arrival there he was taken ill, but notwithstanding was raised, during his absence, to the consulship, either A. D. 219 or 220. After this he obtained the proconsulship of Africa, which, however, cannot have been earlier than A. D. 224. After his return to Italy, he was sent in A. D. 226, as legate to Dalmatia, and the year after to Pannonia. In the latter province he restored strict discipline among the troops, and on his return to Rome, the praetorians began to fear lest he should use his influence for the purpose of interfering with their conduct likewise, and in order to prevent this, they demanded of the emperor Alexander Severus to put him to death. But the emperor not only disregarded their clamour, but raised Dion, A. D. 229, to his second consulship, in which Alexander himself was his colleague. Alexander also conferred other distinctions upon him, and undertook to do his own purse to defray the expenses which the dignity of consul demanded of Dion. However, as Dion could not feel safe at Rome under these circumstances, the emperor requested him to take up his residence somewhere in Italy at a distance from the city. After the expiration of his consulship, Dion returned to Rome, and spent some time with the emperor in Campania; but he appears at length to have become tired of the precarious life at Rome, and under the pretext of suffering from a bad foot, he asked and obtained permission to return to his native place, and there to spend the remainder of his life in quiet retirement. At Nicaea Dion completed his history, and there he also died. The time of his death is unknown. Respecting his family nothing is recorded, except that in two passages he just mentions his wife and children; and it may be that the Dion Cassius whom we find consul in A. D. 291 was a grandson of our historian. The account we have here given of the life of Dion Cassius is derived from scattered passages of his own work, and from a short article in Suidas.

The following list contains the works which are attributed by the ancients to Dion Cassius: 1. The work on dreams and prodigies, which we mentioned above, is lost. Dion had probably written it only to please the emperor, and he seems afterwards to have regretted its publication; for, although he is otherwise rather credulous and fond of relating prodigies, yet in his history he mentions those which have reference to Septimius Severus only very cursorily. 2. The history of the reign of Commodus, which he afterwards incorporated in his history of Rome. On the reign of the emperor Trajan. This work is mentioned only by Suidas; and, if it really was a distinct work, the substance of it was incorporated in his Roman history. 4. A history of Persia is likewise mentioned only by Suidas; but is probably a mistake, and Suidas confounds Dion with Deimon, who is known to have written a work on Persia. 5. Erodicas, that is, Itineraries, is mentioned by Suidas; but it is very doubtful whether it was a work of Dion Cassius, or of his grandfather, Dion Chrysostomus, whose extensive travels may have led him to write such a work. 6. A life of Arrian is altogether unknown, except through the mention of Suidas. 7. Geiza is attributed to Dion Cassius by Suidas, Jomandes, and Freculphus; while from Philostratus (Vit. Soph. i. 7) we might infer, that Dion Chrysostomus was its author. 8. The History of Rome (Ῥωμαία ἱστορία), the great work of Dion Cassius, consisted of 80 books, and was further divided into decades, like Livy's Roman history. It embraced the whole history of Rome from the earliest times, that is, from the landing of Aeneas in Italy down to A. D. 229, the year in which Dion quitted Italy and returned to Nicaea.
The excerpts, which A. Mai has published from a Vatican MS, and which belonged to a work containing the history from the time of Valerian down to the time of Constantine the Great, bear indeed the name of Dion Cassius, but are in all probability taken from the work of a Christian writer, who continued the work of Dion, and A. Mai is inclined to think that this continuation was the work of Joannes Antiochenus. Dion Cassius himself (xxii. 18) intimates, that he treated the history of republic Rome briefly, but that he endeavoured to give a more minute and detailed account of those events of which he had himself been an eyewitness. Unfortunately, only a comparatively small portion of this work has come down to us entire. Of the first thirty-four books we possess only fragments, and the Excerpta, which Ursinus, Valetus, and A. Mai have successively published from the collections made by the command of Constantine Porphyrogenitus. A few more fragments have recently been published by F. Hase (Liliosis Cassii librorum deperditorum Fragmenta, Bonn, 1840, 8vo.), who found them in a Paris MS. It must further be observed, that Zonaras, in his Annales, chiefly, though not solely, followed the authority of Dion Cassius, so that, to some extent, his Annales may be regarded as an epitome of Dion Cassius. There is a considerable fragment commonly considered as a part of the 35th book, which however more probably belongs to the 36th, and from this book onward to the 54th the work is extant complete, and embraces the history from the wars of Lucullus and Cn. Pompey against Mithridates, down to the death of Augustus, A. C. 10. The subsequent books, from 55 to 60, have not come to us in their original form, for there are several passages quoted from these books which are not now to be found in them; and we therefore have in all probability only an abridgment made by some one either before or after the time of Xiphilinus. From book 61 to 80 we have only the abridgment made by Xiphilinus in the eleventh century, and some other epitomes which were probably made by the same person who epitomized the portion from the 55th to the 60th book. A considerable fragment of the 71st book was found by A. Mai in a Latin translation in the Vatican library, of which a German version was published anonymously (Braunschweig, 1832, 8vo.), but its genuineness is not quite established. Another important fragment of the 75th book was discovered by J. Morelli, and printed first at Bas¬sano, and afterwards (1800) at Paris, in folio, uniform with Reimarus's edition of Dion Cassius.

Notwithstanding these great losses, we possess a sufficient portion of the work to enable us to form a correct estimate of its value. It contains an abundance of materials for the later history of the republic and for a considerable period of the empire, for some portions of which it is our only source of information. In the first of the fragments published by A. Mai, Dion distinctly states, that he had read nearly everything which has ever been written on the history of Rome, and that he did not, like a mere compiler, put together what he found in other writers, but that he weighed his authorities, and exercised his judgment in selecting what he thought fit for a place in his work. This assertion of the author himself is perfectly justified by the nature and character of his history, for it is manifest everywhere that he had acquired a thorough knowledge of his subject, and that his notions of Roman life and Roman institutions were far more correct than those of some of his predecessors, such as Dionysius of Halicarnassus. Whenever he is led into error, it is generally owing to his not having access to authentic sources, and to his being obliged to satisfy himself with secondary ones. It must also be borne in mind, as Dion himself observes (iii. 19), that the history of the empire presented much more difficulties to the historian than that of the republic. In those parts in which he relates contemporary events, his work forms a sort of medium between real history and mere memoirs of the emperors. His object was to give a record as complete and as accurate as possible of all the important events; but his work is not on that account a dry chronological catalogue of events, for he enlivens, like Thucydides, Polybius, and Tacitus, to trace the events to their causes, and to make us see the motives of men actions. In his endeavours to make us see the connexions of occurrences he sometimes even neglects the chronological order, like his great models. But with all these excellences, Dion Cassius is the equal neither of Thucy¬dides nor of Tacitus, though we may admit that his faults are to a great extent rather those of his age than of his individual character as an historian. He had been trained in the schools of the rhetori¬cians, and the consequences of it are visible in his history, which is not free from a rhetorical tinge, especially in the speeches which are introduced in it. They may not be pure inventions, and may have an historical groundwork, but their form is rhetorical; though we must own that they are among the best rhetorical productions of the time. In the formation of his style he appears to have endeavoured to imitate the classic writers of ancient Greece; but his language is nevertheless full of pecu¬liarities, barbarisms, and Latinisms, probably the consequence of his long residence in Italy; and the praise which Photius (Bibl. Cod. 71) bestows upon him for the clearness of his style, must be greatly modified, for it is often harsh and heavy, and Dion seems to have written as he spoke, without any attempt at elegance or refinement. (See the excel¬lent essay of Reimarus, Du Vite et Scriptis Cassii Dionis, appended to his edition; R. Wilmans, De Foibus et Auctore Dionis, Berlin, 1852, 8vo.; Schlosser, in a dissertation prefixed to Lorenz's German translation of Dion, Jena, 1826, 3 vols. 8vo.; and the brief but admirable character¬istic of Dion by Niebuhr in his "Lectures on Roman Hist." edited by Dr. Schmitz, i. pp. 72—78.)

The work of Dion Cassius was first published in a Latin translation by N. Leonicenus, Venice, 1526; and the first edition of the Greek original is that of R. Stephens (Paris, 1548, fol.), which contains from book 35 to 60. H. Stephens then gave a new edition with a Latin translation by Xylander. (Geneva, 1551, fol.) The epitome of Xiphilinus from book 60 to 80 was first printed in 1526; and Hannan, 1606, fol.) After the fragments and codexes collected by Ursinus and Valetus had been published, J. A. Fabricius formed the plan of preparing a complete and comprehensive edition of Dion Cassius; but his death prevented the completion of his plan, which was carried out by his son-in-law, H. S. Reimarus, who published his edition at Hamburg, 1750—52, in 2 vols. fol.
The Greek text is not much improved in this edition, but the commentary and the indices are of very great value. The Latin translation which it contains is made up of those of Xylander and Leunclavius. A more recent edition is that of Sturz, in 9 vols. (Leipzig, 1824, 8vo.), the ninth volume of which (published in 1843) contains the "Excerpta Vaticana," which had first been discovered and published by A. Mai. (Script. Vet. Not. Collect. ii. p. 185, &c., p. 537, &c.)

DION CHRYSSOSTOMUS, that is, Dion the gold-mouthed, a surname which he owed to his great talents as an orator. He bore also the surname Cocceianus (Plin. Epist. x. 85, 86), which he derived from the emperor Cocceius Nerva, with whom he was connected by intimate friendship. (Orat. xlv. p. 513.) Dion Chrysostomus was born at Prusa in Bithynia, about the middle of the first century of our era, and belonged to a distinguished equestrian family. Reimarus has rendered it very probable that a daughter of his was the mother of Dion Cassius, the historian. His father, Pasicrates, seems to have bestowed great care on his son Dion's education and the early training of his mind; but he appears to have acquired part of his knowledge in travels, for we know that he visited Egypt at an early period of his life. At first he occupied himself in his native place, where he held important offices, with the composition of speeches and other rhetoric-sophistical essays, but on receiving the futility of such pursuits he abandoned them, and devoted himself with great zeal to the study of philosophy: he did not, however, confine himself to any particular sect or school, nor did he give himself up to any profound speculations, his object being rather to apply the doctrines of philosophy to the purposes of practical life, and more especially to the administration of public affairs, and thus to bring about a better state of things. The Stoic and Platonic philosophies, however, appear to have had the greatest charms for him. Notwithstanding these useful and peaceful pursuits, he was looked upon in his native place with suspicion and hostility (Orat. xlv. p. 212, &c.), which induced him to go to Rome. Here he drew upon himself the hatred of Domitian, who had so great an aversion to philosophers, that by a seminatus-consulatum all were expelled from Rome and Italy, and Dion found himself obliged to quit Rome in secret. (Orat. xlv. p. 215, xiii. p. 418.) On the advice of the Delphic oracle, it is said, he put on the attire of a beggar, and with nothing in his pocket but a copy of Plato's Phaedon and Demosthenes's oration on the Embassy, he undertook a journey to the countries in the north and east of the Roman empire. He thus visited Thrace, Myasia, Scythia, and the country of the Getae, and owing to the power and wisdom of his orations, he met everywhere with a kindly reception, and did much good. (Orat. xxxvi. p. 74; comp. xiii. p. 418.)

In A. D. 96, when Domitian was murdered, Dion used his influence with the army stationed on the frontier in favour of his friend Nerva, and seems to have returned to Rome immediately after his accession. (Orat. xlv. p. 202.) The emperor Trajan, entertained the highest esteem for Dion, and showed him the most marked favour, for he is said to have often visited him, and even to have allowed him to ride by his side in his golden triumphal car. Having thus received the most ample satisfaction for the unjust treatment he had experieneced before, he returned to Prusa about A. D. 100. But the petty spirit he found prevailing there, which was jealous of his merits and distinctions, and attributed his good actions to impure motives (Orat. l. p. 254, &c.), soon disgusted him with his fellow-citizens, and he again went to Rome. Trajan continued to treat him with the greatest distinction: his kindly disposition gained him many eminent friends, such as Apollonius of Tyana and Ephraem of Tyre, and his oratory the admiration of all. In this manner he spent his last years, and died at Rome about A. D. 117.

Dion Chrysostomus is one of the most eminent among the Greek rhetoricians and sophists. This is the opinion not only of the ancients who have written about him, such as Philostratus, Synesius, and Photius, but it is also confirmed by the eighty orations of his which are still extant, and which were the only ones known in the time of Photius, who, however, enumerates them in a somewhat different order from that in which they now stand. These orations are for the most part the productions of the last years of his life, and are very like essays on political, moral, and philosophical subjects rather than real orations, of which they have only the form. We find among them ἴδια ψηφίας καὶ δικαιοσύνης ἡ ἄνω τοιούτων, on the troubles to which men expose themselves by deserting the path of nature, and on the difficulties which a sovereign has to encounter; essays on slavery and freedom; on the means of attaining eminence as an orator; further, political discourses addressed to various towns which he sometimes praises and sometimes blames, but always with great modern virtue and wisdom; on subjects of ethics and practical philosophy, which he treats in a popular and attractive manner; and lastly, orations on mythical subjects and show-speeches. Besides these eighty orations we have fragments of fifteen others. Suidas, in enumerating the works of Dion Cassius, mentions one on the Getæ, which Cusaobon was inclined to attribute to Dion Chrysostomus, on account of a passage in Philostratus (Vit. Soph. i, 7), who says, "how fit Dion (Chrysostomus) was for writing history, is evident from his Getæ." There are extant also five letters under the name of Dion, and addressed to one Rufus. They are published in Boissonade's Ad Marini Vit. Prod. p. 85, &c., and some critics are inclined to consider them as productions of Dion Chrysostomus. All the extant orations of Dion are distinguished for their refined and elegant style; the author most successfully imitated the classic writers of Greece, such as Plato, Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Aeschines. His ancient study of these models, combined with his own eminent talents, his firm and pleasing voice, and his skill in extempore speaking, raised him at once above all contemporary rhetoricians. His style is throughout clear, and, generally speaking, free from artificial embellishment, though he is not always able to escape from the influence of the Asiatic school of rhetoric. His sentences are often interrupted by the insertion of parenthetical clauses, and his proemia are frequently too long in proportion to the other parts of his discourses. "Dion Chrysostomus," says Niebuhr (Lectura in Rom. Hist. ii. p. 263, ed. Schmidt), "was an author of uncommon talent, and it is much to be regretted that he belonged to the rhetoricians of that unfortunate age. It makes one sad to see him waste his brilliant oratorical powers on insignificant subjects. Some of his works are written in an excellent and beautiful language, which is pure Attic Greek and without affectation: it is clear that he had made the classical language of Athens his own, and he handled it as a master. He appears in all he wrote as a man of an amiable character, and free from the vanity of the ordinary rhetoricians, though one perceives the silent consciousness of his powers. He was an unaffected Platonic philosopher, and lived with his whole soul in Athens, which was to him a world, and which made him forget Rome, its emperor, and everything else. All this forms a very charming feature in his character. Whenever he touches upon the actual state of things in which he lived, he shows his master-mind. He was the first writer after Tiberius that greatly contributed towards the revival of Greek literature. (Comp. Philostratus, Vit. Soph. i. 7; Photius, Bihd. The death of Dionysius must have taken place in a. c. 306 or 305, as, according to Diodorus, he died at the age of 32, and after a reign of 32 years, for which others say 33 years. (Diod. xvi. 88, xx. 70; Athen. xii. p. 549; Sallust, V. H. ix. 13; Meunon, ap. Phot. Cod. 224.)

[DIONYSIUS (Διονύσιος) the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse, must have been born in B. C. 451 or 450, as we are told that he was twenty-five years old when he first obtained the sovereignty of Syracuse. (Cic. Tuscul. v. 20.) We know nothing of his early life, but that his father's name was Hermocrates, and that he was born in a private but not low station, so that he received an excellent education, and began life in the capacity of a clerk in a public office. (Cic. Tuscul. v. 20; Diod. xiii. 91, 96, xiv. 66; Isor. Philipp. § 73; Dem. c. Lept. § 141, p. 506; Polyaen. Strateg. v. 2, § 2.) He appears to have early taken part in the political dissensions which agitated Syracuse after the destruction of the great Athenian armament, and having joined in the attempt of Hermocrates, the leader of the aristocratical party, to effect by force his restoration from exile, was so severely wounded as to be left for dead from the spot. (Diod. xiii. 91, 96, xiv. 71.) We know almost nothing of him serving as a private citizen of the opposite party. (Diod. xiii. 95, 96.)

His first operations in the war against the Carthaginians were, however, unsuccessful. Having advanced with a large army to the relief of Gela, then besieged by Himilco, he was defeated, and deemed it prudent to retire, taking with him the inhabitants both of Gela itself and the neighbouring Camarina. This reverse gave a severe shock to his popularity, of which his enemies at Syracuse availed themselves to attempt to overthrow his power. For a moment they were masters of the city, but Dionysius disconcerted their plans by the suddenness of his return, and compelled them to quit the city, though not until his unfortunate wife had fallen a victim to their cruelty. (Diod. xiii. 103—118, xiv. 44; Plut. Dion, 3.) He soon afterwards gladly accepted the overtures of the Carthaginian general Himilco, whose army had suffered greatly from a pestilence, and concluded peace with Carthage B. C. 405. (Diod. xiii. 114.)

He was now able to devote his whole attention to strengthening and consolidating his power at home. He converted the island of Ortygia into a strong fortress, in which he took up his own residence, and allowed no one but his own immediate dependents to dwell; and while he courted the favour of the populace by assigning them lands and houses, he augmented their numbers by admitting many aliens and newly-freed slaves to the rights of citizenship. These measures naturally gave umbrage to the higher class of citizens who formed the heavy-armed infantry, and they took advantage of an expedition on which he led them against the Sicelians to break out into open revolt. They were instantly joined by the exiles who had established themselves at Acta, and Dionysius was compelled to take refuge in the island which he had so recently fortified. From this danger, however, he managed to extricate himself by the aid of a body of Campanian mercenaries, seconded by the dissensions which broke out among his enemies. Some of these submitted to him on favourable terms; the rest retired to Acta. (Diod. xiv. 7—9.) From this time his authority at Syracuse appears to have been undisputed. He soon after took advantage of the harvest time to disarm those citizens whom he had still cause to fear, and reduced the fortress of Acta, which had been the stronghold of the exiles, disaffected to his government. (L. c. 10, 14.)

His arms were next directed against the Chalcidian cities of Sicily. Narax, Catana, and Leontini, successively fell into his power, either by force or treachery. The inhabitants were either the measures of Dionysius soon rendered it such; and we may date from this period the commencement of his reign, or tyranny, which continued without interruption for 38 years. His first step was to procure, on the ground of an attempt on his life, whether real or pretended, the appointment of a body-guard, which he speedily increased to the number of 1000 men. He then exacted 200 sesterces from each of the fortress of Acta, which had been the stronghold of the exiles, disaffected to his government. (L. c. 10, 14.)

He then exacted 200 sesterces from each of sold as slaves or compelled to migrate to Syracuse. Naxos was utterly destroyed, and Catana occupied by a colony of Campanian mercenaries, c. 403. (Diod. xiv. 14, 15.) For several years after this he appears to have been occupied in strengthening his power and in preparations for renewing the war with Carthage. Among these may be reckoned the great works which he at this time erected,—the docks adapted for the reception of several hundred ships, and the wall of 30 stadia in length, enclosing the whole extent of the Epipolae, the magnificence of which is attested by its existing remains at the present day. (Diod. xiv. 18, 42; Smith's Sicily, p. 167.)

It was not till n. c. 397 that Dionysius considered himself sufficiently strong, or his preparations enough advanced, to declare war against Carthage. He had in the mean time assembled a large army of auxiliary and mercenary troops, and a fleet of two hundred ships, remarkable for the number of quadriremes and quinqueremes which were seen in it for the first time. The Carthaginians had been greatly weakened by the ravages of a pestilence in Africa, and were unprepared for war. Dionysius was immediately joined not only by the Greeks of Gela, Agrigentum, Himera, and Selinus, which had become tributary to Carthage by the treaty of 405, but by the Sicilians of the interior, and even the Sicanians, in general the firm allies of Carthage. He thus advanced without opposition from one end of Sicily to the other, and laid siege to Motya, one of the chief strongholds of the Carthaginians, which fell into his power after a long and desperate resistance, prolonged till near the close of the summer. Segesta, however, successfully resisted his efforts, and the next year (n. c. 396) the arrival of a great Carthaginian armament under Himilco changed the face of affairs. Motya was quickly recovered; the Sicanians and Sicelians abandoned the Syracusan alliance for that of the enemy, and Himilco advanced unopposed as far as Messana, which he carried by assault, and utterly destroyed. The Syracusan fleet under Leptines, the brother of Dionysius, was totally defeated; and the latter, not daring to risk a battle, withdrew with his land forces, and shut himself up within the walls of Syracuse. Abandoned by the other Sicelians, and beset by Carthaginians both by sea and land, his situation appeared to be desperate. It is even said that he was on the point of giving up all for lost, and making his escape, but was deterred by one of his friends observing, "that sovereign power was an honourable winding-sheet." (Isocrat. Archidam. § 49; Aelian. V. H. iv. 8; but compare Diod. xiv. 8.) A pestilence shortly after broke out in the Carthaginian camp, which a second time proved the salvation of Syracuse. Dionysius ably availed himself of the state of weakness to which the enemy was thus reduced, and by a sudden attack both by sea and land, defeated the Carthaginian army, and burnt great part of their fleet. So he was enabled to secure a secret capitulation, by which the Carthaginians themselves were allowed to depart unmolested, abandoning both their allies and foreign mercenaries, who, thus left without a leader, were quickly dispersed. (Diod. xiv. 41—76.)

No peace was concluded with Carthage upon this occasion; but the effects of their late disastrous expedition, and the revolt of their subjects in Africa, prevented the Carthaginians from renewing hostilities against Syracuse until the summer of 393, when Mago, who had succeeded Himilco to the command, having renewed the alliance with the Sicelians, advanced towards Messana, but was defeated by Dionysius near Abacaenum. The next year (n. c. 392) he marched against the Syracusan territory with a much greater force; but Dionysius having secured the alliance of Agyris, tyrant of Agyrium, was enabled to cut off the supplies of the enemy, and thus reduced them to such distress, that Mago was compelled to treat for peace. The Syracusans also were weary of the war, and a treaty was concluded, by which the Carthaginians abandoned their Sicelian allies, and Dionysius became master of Tauromenium: in other respects, both parties remained nearly as before. (Diod. xv. 80, 85, 86.)

This treaty left Dionysius at leisure to continue the ambitious projects in which he had previously engaged against the Greek cities in Italy. Already, before the Carthaginian war, he had secured the alliance of the Locrians by marrying Doris, the daughter of one of their principal citizens. Rhegium, on the contrary, had been uniformly hostile to him, and was the chief place of refuge of the Syracusan exiles. (Diod. xiv. 40.) Hence Dionysius established at Messana, after its destruction by Himilco, a colony of citizens from Locri and its kindred city of Medma, to be a stronghold against Rhegium. (xiv. 78.) His designs in this quarter attracted so much attention, that the principal Greek cities in Italy, which were at the same time hard pressed by the Lucanians of the interior, concluded a league for their common defence at once against the barbarians and Dionysius. The latter retaliated by entering into alliance with the Lucanians, and sending a fleet to their assistance under his brother Leptines, n. c. 390. (xiv. 91, 100—102.) The next year he gained a decisive victory over the combined forces of the Italian Greeks at the river Helorus; and this success was followed by the reduction of Caulonia, Hipponium, and finally, after a siege protracted for nearly eleven months, of Rhegium itself. (n. c. 397. (xv. 105—108, 111.) The inhabitants of the conquered cities were for the most part removed to Syracuse, and the remainder roused to a spirit of resistance.

Dionysius was now at the summit of his greatness, and during the twenty years that elapsed from this period to his death, possessed an amount of power and influence far exceeding those enjoyed by any other Greek before the time of Alexander. In Sicily he held undisputed rule over the eastern half of the island, while the principal cities of the interior and those along the north coast, as far as Cephaloedium, were either subject to him, or held by his close and dependent allies. (xiv. 78, 98.) In Italy it is difficult to estimate the precise extent of his influence: direct dominion he had apparently none. But his allies, the Locrians, were masters of the whole southern extremity of the peninsula, and his powerful fleets gave him the command both of the Tyrrhenian and Adriatic seas. In the former he repressed the piracies of the Etruscans, and, under pretence of retaliation, led a fleet of 60 triremes against them, with which he took the town of Pyrgi, the port of Caero, and plundered its wealthy temple of Matuta. (Diod. xv. 14; Strob. v. p. 226; Pseud.-Aristot. Oeconom. ii, 2.) On this occasion he is also said to have assailed Corsica (Strab. 1. 14; Diod. x. 13, 14), where he kept up a considerable naval force, and another at Adria in Picenum. (Eutz. Magn. s. e. Abdias.) Ancomia too was probably founded by him at the same time. (Flin. H. N. iii. 13; Strab. v. p. 241; Arnold's Rome, vol. i. p. 437.) With the same view he sent a squadron to assist the Lacedaemonians in the war with the Athenians, and in establishing themselves at Corecyra, a. c. 373. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2, §§ 4, 33.) The extent of his commercial relations may be inferred from his importing horses for his chariots from the Venetian tribes at the head of the Adriatic, (Strab. v. p. 212.) As early as a. c. 402 he is mentioned as sending large supplies of corn to relieve a scarcity at Rome. (Liv. iv. 53; Niebuhr, Rom. Hist. ii. p. 564.) At the same time he took every opportunity of extending his relations with foreign powers, and strengthening himself by alliances. Thus we find him assisting the Illyrians against their neighbours the Molossians (Diod. xiv. 13), and concluding a treaty with the Gauls, who had lately made their appearance in Italy, and who continued from this time to furnish a considerable part of his mercenary troops. (Justin. xx. 5; Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 30, 31.) In Greece itself he cultivated the friendship of the Lacedaemonians, to whose support he had been greatly indebted in the earlier days of his rule (Diod. xiv. 10, 70); and among the last acts of his reign was the sending an auxiliary force in two successive years to support them against the increasing power of the Thebans. (Xen. Hell. vii. 1. §§ 20, 23; Diod. xv. 70.) He also conciliated, but by what means we know not, the favour of the Athenians, so that they bestowed upon him the freedom of their city. (Epist. Philipp. ap. Dom. p. 176, ed. Bekk.)

Dionysius indeed appears to have been again the aggressor in a fresh war which broke out in a. c. 368, and in which he a second time advanced with his army to the extreme western point of Sicily, and laid siege to Lilybaeum. Hostilities were however suspended on the approach of winter, and before they could be resumed Dionysius died at Syracuse, a. c. 367. His last illness is said to have been brought on by excessive feasting; but according to some accounts, his death was hastened by his medical attendants, in order to secure the succession for his son. (Diod. xv. 74; Plut. Dion. 6; Corn. Nep. Dion. 2.) After the death of his first wife, Dionysius had married almost exactly at the same time—some said even on the same day—Doris, a Locrian of distinguished birth, and Aristomache, a Syracusan, the daughter of his old patron and supporter Hipparius. (Diod. xiv. 44; Plut. Dion. 3.) By the former he had three children, of which the eldest was his successor, Dionysius. Aristomache bore him two sons, Hipparius and Nysaeus, and two daughters, Sophrosyne and Arete. (Plut. Dion. 6; Corn. Nep. Dion. 1; Athen. x. pp. 453–60.)

The character of Dionysius has been drawn in the blackest colours by many ancient writers; he appears indeed to have become a sort of type of a tyrant, in its worst sense, and it is probably that many of the extravagances of his rule, his cruelty, his venality, and other later writers, are grossly exaggerated; but the very circumstance that he was so regarded in opposition to Gelon and others of the other tyrants (see Plut. Dion. 3) is in itself a proof that the opprobrium was not altogether undeserved. He was undoubtedly a man of great energy and activity of mind, as well as great personal courage; but he was altogether unscrupulous in the means which he employed to attain his ends, and had no thought beyond his own personal aggrandizement. Thus while he boasted that he left to his son an empire held to the utmost possible of extension, and strengthened himself by alliances, and was obliged to have recourse to every kind of expedient to amass money. (Aristot. Pol. v. 11; Pseud-Aristot. Oeconom. ii. 2. The statements of the latter must be received with caution, but they are conclusive as to the general fact.) Diodorus tells us that, when his power became firmly established, he abated much of his former severity (xiv. 45), and he gave a signal instance of clemency in his treatment of the Italian Greeks who had fallen into his power at the battle of the Helorus. (Diod. xiv. 105.) But it is probable that the long possession of absolute power had an injurious effect upon his character, and much apparent inconsistence may be accounted for in this manner. In his latter years he became extremely suspicious, and apprehensive of treachery even from his nearest friends, and is said to have adopted the most excessive precautions to guard against it. Many of these stories have however an air of great exaggeration. (Cic. Tusc. v. 20; Plut. Dion. 9.)

Though his government was oppressive in a financial point of view, Dionysius seems to have contributed much to the greatness of Syracuse itself, both by increasing the population with the inhabitants removed from many conquered cities, and by adorning it with splendid temples and other public edifices, so as to render it uncontestably the greatest of all Greek cities. (Diod. xv. 12; Isocrat. Passer. 145.) At the same time he displayed his magnificence by sending splendid deputations to the Olympic games, and rich presents both to Olympia and Delphi. (Diod. xiv. 109, xvi. 57.) Nor was he without literary ambition. In the midst of his political and military cares he devoted himself assiduously to poetry, and not only caused his poems to be publicly recited at the Olympic games, but repeatedly contended for the prize of tragedy at Athens. Here he several times obtained the second and third prizes; and, finally, just before his death, bore away the first prize at the Lenaeis, with a play called "The Ransom of Hector." These honours seem to prove that his poetry could not have been altogether so contemnible as it is represented by later writers; but only the titles of some of his dramas and a few detached lines are preserved to us. He is especially contemptible as it is represented by later writers; and is rather an apology than a history, and is given in Arnold's History of Koine. The reign is now extant. Diodorus is our chief, indeed, our sole, authority for the events of his life: the occurrences of which he availed himself to occupy the adamantium. The story of his having caused him to be sold as a slave, as well as of the sallies of his troops having been repulsed, are probably gross exaggerations, they may well have been so far founded in fact, that his intercourse with these persons was interrupted by some sudden burst of capricious violence. (Diod. xiv. 109; xv. 74; Tacit. Chil. v. 178—185; Cic. Tusc. v. 22; Lucian, adv. Indoct. § 15; Hadius, ap. Pindar. p. 532, b. ed. Bekker.) Diodorus is our chief, indeed, our sole, authority for the events of his life: the occurrences of which he availed himself to occupy the adamantium. The story of his having caused him to be sold as a slave, as well as of the sallies of his troops having been repulsed, are probably gross exaggerations, they may well have been so far founded in fact, that his intercourse with these persons was interrupted by some sudden burst of capricious violence. In accordance with the same spirit we find him seeking the society of men distinguished in literature and philosophy, entertaining the poet Philoxenus, who were at this time numerous in Italy and Sicily, and inviting Plato to Syracuse. He however soon after sent the latter away from Sicily in disgrace; and though the story of his having caused him to be sold as a slave, as well as of the sallies of his troops having been repulsed, are probably gross exaggerations, they may well have been so far founded in fact, that his intercourse with these persons was interrupted by some sudden burst of capricious violence. (Diod. xiv. 109; xv. 74; Lucian, adv. Indoct. § 15; Tacit. Chil. v. 178—185.) The history of Dionysius was written by his friend and contemporary Philistius, as well as by Biphorus and Timaeus; but none of these authors is now extant. Diodorus is our chief, indeed, almost our sole, authority for the events of his reign. An excellent review of his government and character is given in Arnold's History of Rome. (Vol. i. c. 21.) Mitford's elaborate account of his reign is rather an apology than a history, and is very inaccurate as well as partial. [E. H. B.]

DIONYSIUS (Διόνυσιος) the Younger, tyrant of Syracuse, son of the preceding, succeeded his father in the possession of supreme power at Syracuse, B. C. 367. Something like the form of a popular election, or at least the confirmation of his power by the people, appears to have been thought necessary; but it could have been merely nominal, as the amount of his mercenary force and the fortifications of the citadel secured him the virtual sovereignty. (Diod. xiv. 74.) Dionysius was at this time under thirty years of age: he had been brought up at his father's court in idleness and luxury, and studiously precluded from taking any part in public affairs. (Plut. Dion. 9.) The consequences of this education were quickly manifested as soon as he ascended the throne: the ascendency which Dion, and through his means Plato, obtained for a time over his mind was undermined by flatterers and the companions of his pleasures, who persuaded him to give himself up to the most unbounded dissipation. Of the public events of his reign, which lasted between eleven and twelve years (Diod. xvi. 75; Clinton, F. H. ii. p. 268), we have very little information: he seems to have succeeded to his father's influence in the south of Italy as well as to his dominion in Sicily, and to have been the acknowledged master of the whole of the Adriatic, for which end he founded two cities in Apulia. We also find him sending a third auxiliary force to the assistance of the Lacedaemonians. (Xen. Hell. vii. 4. § 12.) But his character was peaceful and indolent; he hastened to conclude by a treaty the war with the Carthaginians, in which he found himself engaged on his accession; and the only other war that he undertook was one against the Lucanians, probably in defence of his Italian dominions, which had been quickly bought to close. (Diod. xvi. 6.) Philistius, the historian, who, after having been one of his father's chief supporters, had been subsequently banished by him, enjoyed the highest place in the confidence of the younger Dionysius, and appears to have been changed with the conduct of all his military enterprises. Notwithstanding his advanced age, he is represented as rather encouraging than repressing the excesses of Dionysius, and joining with the party who sought to overthrow the power of Dion, and ultimately succeeded in driving him into exile. The banishment of Dion contributed to render Dionysius unpopular among the Syracusans, who began also to despise him for his indolent and dissolute life, as well as for his habitual drunkenness. Yet his court seems to have been at this time a great place of resort for philosophers and men of letters: besides Plato, whom he induced by the most urgent entreaties to pay him a second visit, Aristippus of Cyrene, Eudoxus of Cnidus, Spesippus, and others, are stated to have spent some time with him at Syracuse; and he cultivated a friendly intercourse with Archytas and the Pythagoreans of Magna Graecia. (Plut. Dion. 18—20; Diog. Laërt. ii. 21, 23; Aelian, V. H. iv. 18, vii. 17; Pseud.-Plat. Epist. 6.) Much doubt indeed attaches to all the stories related by Plutarch and other late writers concerning the intercourse of Plato with Dionysius, but they can hardly have been altogether destitute of foundation.

Dionysius was absent from Syracuse at the time that Dion landed in Sicily: the news of that event and of the sudden defection of the Syracusans reached him at Caulonia, and he instantly returned to Syracuse, where the citadel still held out for him. But his attempts at negotiation having proved abortive, the sallies of his troops having been repulsed, and the fleet which Philistius had brought to his succour having been defeated, he despaired of success, and sailed away to Italy with his most valuable property, leaving the citadel of Syracuse in charge of his son, Apollocrates, B. C. 355. (Diod. xvi. 11—13, 16, 17; Plut. Dion. 26—37.) Dionysius now repaired to Locri, the native city of his mother, Doris, where he was received in the most friendly manner by the inhabitants—a confidence of which he availed himself to occupy the citadel with an armed force, and thus to establish himself as tyrant of the city. This position he continued to hold for several years, during which period he is said to have treated the inhabitants with the utmost cruelty, at the same time that he indulged in the most extravagant licentiousness. (Justin, xxi. 2, 3; Clearch. ap. Athen. xii. p. 541; Strab. vi. p. 239; Aristot. Pol. v. 7.) Meanwhile the revolutions which had taken place at Syracuse seem to have prepared the way for his return. The history of these is very imperfectly known to us: but, after the death of Dion, one tyrant followed another with great rapidity. Callias, the murderer of Dion, was in the same year driven from the city by Hippaurus (son of the elder Dionysius by Aristoaches, and therefore nephew of Dion), who reigned but two years: mother of Dion's nephews, and was in possession of it when Dionysius presented himself before Syracuse with a fleet, and 340. (Diod. xvi. 31, b. after his expulsion, became master of the city by treachery. According to Plutarch, this took place in the tenth year of his life in a private condition, and is said to have abandoned all hope of ultimate success, to treat with him rather than the opposite party. He accordingly surrendered the fortress of Ortygia into the hands of Dionysius, and succeeded in gaining possession of the greater part of the city, and blockading the tyrant anew in the fortress on the island. It was in this state of things that Timoleon arrived in Sicily. His arms were not indeed directed in the first instance against Dionysius, but against Hieras and his Carthaginian allies; but his rapid successes and the general respect entertained for his character induced Dionysius, who was still blockaded in the citadel, and appears to have abandoned all hope of ultimate success, to treat with him rather than the opposite party. He accordingly surrendered the fortress of Ortygia into the hands of Timoleon, on condition of being allowed to depart in safety to Corinthus, n. 334. (Diod. xvi. 65-70; Plut. Timol. 8—13.) Here he spent the remainder of his life in a private condition, and is said to have frequented low company, and sunk gradually into a very degraded and abject state. According to some writers, he was reduced to support himself by keeping a school; others say, that he became one of the attendants on the rites of Cybele, a set of mendicant priests of the lowest class. His weak and voluptuous character render these stories by no means improbable, although it seems certain that he was in the first instance allowed to take with him a considerable portion of his wealth, and must have occupied an honourable position, as we find him admitted to familiar intercourse with Philip of Macedon. Some anecdotes are preserved of him that indicate a ready wit and considerable showiness of observation. (Plut. Timol. 14, 15; Justin, xxi. 5; Clearch. ap. Athen. xii. p. 541; Aelian, V. H. vi. 12; Cic. Tusc. iii. 12.) There are no authentic coins of either of the two Dionysii: probably the republican forms were still so far retained, notwithstanding their virtual despotism, that all coins struck under their rule bore the name of the city only. According to Müller (Archd. d. Kunst. p. 128), the splendid silver coins, of the weight of ten drachmas, commonly known as Syracusan medallions, belong for the most part to the period of their two reigns. Certain Punic coins, one of which is represented in the annexed cut, are commonly ascribed to the younger Dionysius, but probably on the authority of Goltzus (a noted falsifier of coins and their inscriptions), who has published a similar coin with the name Dionysius. (E. H. B.)

DIONYSIUS (Διονύσιος), literary. The number of persons of this name in the history of Greek literature is very great. Meursius was the first that collected a list of them and added some account of each (Gronov. Theor. Anti. Graec. s. p. 577, &c.); his list has been still further increased by Jonsius (Hist. Philos. Script. iii. 6, p. 42, &c.), and by Fabricius (Bild. Gr. iv. 405), so that at present upwards of one hundred persons of the name of Dionysius are known. The list afforded by Suidas is full of the utmost confusion. The following list contains all, with the exception of those mentioned in an isolated passage merely.

1. AELIUS DIONYSIUS, a Greek rhetorician of Halicarnassus, who lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian. He was a very skilful musician, and wrote several works on music and its history. (Suid. s. v. Διονύσιος.) It is commonly supposed that he was a descendant of the elder Dionysius of Halicarnassus, the author of the Roman Archaeology. Respecting his life nothing further is known. The following works, which are attributed to him by the ancients: 1. A Dictionary of Attic words (Άττικα ἄρματα) in five books, dedicated to one Scymnus. Photius (Bild. Cod. 152) speaks in high terms of its usefulness, and states, that Aelius Dionysius himself made two editions of it, the second of which was a great improvement upon the first. Both editions appear to have existed in the time of Photius. It seems to have been owing to this work that Aelius Dionysius was called sometimes by the surname of Atticinus. Meursius was of opinion that our Dionysius was the author of the work περὶ διήλων ῥημάτων καὶ ἕναλημπτῶν λέξεων, which was published by Aldus Manutius (Venice, 1496) in the volume entitled " Horti Adonidis;" but there is no evidence for this supposition. (Comp. Schol. Venet. ad Hirt. xv. 705; Villonos, Prolegom. ad Hom. II. p. xxix.)

2. A history of Music (μουσικὴ ἰστορία) in 36 books, with accounts of citharoedci, nulete, and poets of all kinds. (Suid. l. c.) 3. Ρυθμικὴ υποτηνύμα, in 24 books. (Suid. l. c.) 4. Μουσικῆς πατείας διατριβά, in 22 books. (Suid. l. c.) 5. A work in five books on what Plato had said about music in his πολετεία. (Suid. l. c.; Eudoc. p. 131.)

2. Bishop of Alexandria, was probably a native of the same city. He was born of pagan parents, who were persons of rank and influence. He studied the doctrines of the various philosophical sects, and this led him at last to embrace Christianity. Origen, who was one of his teachers, had probably great influence upon this step of his pupil. After having been a presbyter for some time, he succeeded, about a.d. 232, Heracles as the head of the theological school at Alexandria, and after the death of Heracles, who had been mixed to the bishopric of Alexandria, Dionysius.
succeeded him in the see, A. D. 247. During the persecution of the Christians by Decius, Dionysius was seized by the soldiers and carried to Taposiris, a small town between Alexandria and Canopus, probably with a view of putting him to death there. But he escaped from captivity in a manner which he himself describes very minutely (ap. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. vi. 46), and had, however, to suffer still more severely in A. D. 257, during the persecution which the emperor Valerian instituted against the Christians. Dionysius made an open confession of his faith before the emperor's praetext Aemilianus, and was exiled in consequence to Cepho, a desert district of Libya, whether he was compelled to proceed forthwith, although he was severely ill at the time. After an exile of three years, an edict of Gallienus in favour of the Christians enabled him to return to Alexandria, where henceforth he was extremely zealous in combating heretical opinions. In his attacks against Sabellius he was carried so far by his zeal, that he uttered things which were themselves incompatible with the tenets of faith; but when he was taken to Cairo by Dionysius, bishop of Rome, who convoked a synod for the purpose, he readily owned that he had acted rashly and inconsiderately. In A. D. 265 he was invited to a synod at Antioch, to dispute with Paulus of Samosata, but being prevented from going thither by old age and infirmity, he wrote a letter to the synod on the subject of the controversy to be discussed, and soon after, in the same year, he died, after having occupied the see of Alexandria for a period of seventeen years.

The church of Rome regards Dionysius as a saint, and a synod for the purpose, lie readily owned that he had acted rashly and inconsiderately. In A. D. 265 he was invited to a synod at Antioch, to dispute with Paulus of Samosata, but being prevented from going thither by old age and infirmity, he wrote a letter to the synod on the subject of the controversy to be discussed, and soon after, in the same year, he died, after having occupied the see of Alexandria for a period of seventeen years. The church of Rome regards Dionysius as a saint, and celebrates his memory on the 16th of October. We learn from Epiphanes (Haeres. 69), that at Alexandria a church was dedicated to him. Dionysius wrote a considerable number of theological works, consisting partly of treatises and partly of epistles addressed to the heads of churches and to communities, but all that is left us of them consists of fragments preserved in Eusebius and others. A complete list of his works is given by Cave, from which we mention only the most important. 1. On Promises, in two books, was directed against Nepos, and two considerable fragments of it are still extant. (Euseb. H. E. iii. 29, vii. 24.) 2. A work addressed to Dionysius, bishop of Rome, in four books or epistles, against Sabellius. Dionysius here excused the hasty assertions of which he himself had been guilty in attacking Sabellius. A great number of fragments and extracts of it are preserved in the writings of Athanasius and Basilius. 3. A work addressed to Timotheus, "On Nature," of which extracts are preserved in Eusebius. (Praep. Evang. xiv. 23, 27.) Of his Epistles also numerous fragments are extant in the works of Eusebius. All that is extant of Dionysius, is collected in Gallandi's Bibl. Patr. iii. p. 491, &c., and in the separate collection by Simon de Magistris, Rome, 1796, fol. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 95, &c.) 5. Of Alexandria, a son of Glaucus, a Greek grammianian, who flourished from the time of Nero to that of Trajan. He was secretary and librarian to the emperors in whose reign he lived, and was also employed in embassies. He was the author of the "Argonautica," and a pupil of the philosopher Charesmon, whom also succeeded him in Alexandria. (Athen. xi. p. 501; Suid. s. v. Σωφρος; Eudoc. p. 133.)

4. Of Antioch, a sophist, who seems to have been a Christian, and to be the same person as the one to whom the nineteenth letter of Aeneas of Gaza is addressed. He himself is the reputed author of 46 letters, which are still extant. A Latin version of them was first printed by G. Cognatius in his Epistolae Antioch. (1554, 12mo, and afterwards in J. Buchler's "Thesaurus Epist. Locom.," 1606, 12mo. The Greek original was first edited by H. Stephens, in his Collection of Greek Epistles, Paris, 1577, 8vo. Meursius is inclined to attribute these Epistles to Dionysius of Miletus, without, however, assigning any reason for it.

5. Surnamed Areopagita, an Athenian, who is called by Suidas a most eminent man, who rose to the height of Greek erudition. He is said to have first studied at Athens, and afterwards at Heliopolis in Egypt. When he observed in Egypt the eclipse of the sun, which occurred during the crucifixion of Jesus Christ, he is said to have exclaimed, "either God himself is suffering, or he desires to be accounted with some one who is suffering." On his return to Athens he was made one of the council of the Areopagus, whence he derives his surname. About A. D. 50, when St. Paul preached at Athens, Dionysius became a Christian (The Acts, xvii. 34), and it is said that he was not only the first bishop of Athens, but that he was installed in that office by St. Paul himself. (Euseb. H. E. iii. 4, iv. 23; Suidas.) He is further said to have died the death of a martyr under most cruel tortures. Whether Dionysius Areopagita ever wrote anything, is highly uncertain; but there exists under his name a number of works of a mystical-Christian nature, which contain ample evidence that they are the productions of some Neo-Platonist, and can scarcely have been written before the fifth or sixth century of our era. Without entering upon any detail about those works, which would be out of place here, we need only remark, that they exercised a very great influence upon the formation and development of Christianity in the middle ages. At the time of the Carlowingian emperors, those works were introduced into western Europe in a Latin translation made by Sanctus Eriega, and gave the first impulse to that mystic and scholastic theology which afterwards maintained itself for centuries. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vii. p. 7, &c.; Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Lit. im Karoling. Zeitalter, § 167.) 6. A son of Arelius, the teacher and friend of Augustus, who also profited by his intercourse with the sons of Asiae, Dionysius, and Niceanor. (Sueton. Aug. 89; comp. Arelius.) 7. Surnamed Ascalaphus, seems to have written an epos of the Theodora, a satirical poem on Eros. (Etym. M. s. v. Διονυσιος; Athen. xi. p. 475.) 8. Of Argos, seems to have been a historian, as he is quoted by Clemens of Alexandria (Strum. i. p. 189) respecting the time at which Troy was taken. (Comp. Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ii. 1.) 9. Of Athens, is quoted by the Scholion on Apollonius Rhodius (ii. 279) as the author of a work entitled κείμενα, that is, on conception or birth, which also mentioned in the Etymologicon Magnus (s. v. Προφητεύοντος), where, however, the reading κείμενα should be corrected into κείμενα, and not into κείμενον, as Sylburg proposes. 10. A freedman of Atticus, whose full name is...
DIONYSIUS.

therefore was T. Pomponius Dionysius. Both Cicero and Atticus were very much attached to him. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 8, 11, 13, 15.)

11. A native of Bruttium, a dialectic or Megaric philosopher, who was the teacher of Theodorus the atheist. (Strab. xii. p. 566; Diog. Laërt. ii. 98.)

Cicero and Atticus were very much attached to Such a person as this Dionysius of Byzantium, therefore was T. Pomponius Dionysius. Both writers have believed that our Dionysius of Byzantium is the same as the one whose Periegesis is still extant, but this opinion is without foundation, and based only on the opinion of Suidas. The Dionysius from Byzantium seems to have existed complete down to the 16th century, for P. Gyllius in his work on the Thracian Bosporus gave a considerable portion of it in a Latin translation. G. J. Vossius obtained a copy of a fragment of it, which his son Isaac had taken at Florence, and that fragment, which is now the only part of the Anaplus known to us, is printed in Du Cange's Constantiopolis Christiana, in Hudson's Geogr. Minor. vol. iii., and in Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. iv. p. 664, note l. (Comp. Bernhardy in his edition of Dionys. Perieg. p. 492.)

12. Of Byzantium, appears to have lived before the time of the emperor Severus, that is, before A.D. 197, and is mentioned by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Νησαρίας) and Suidas as the author of an Ανανύσ Βοστρόμων. Suidas further calls him an epic poet, and states that he also wrote on the species of poetry called Σύρος. Some writers have believed that our Dionysius of Byzantium is the same as the one whose Periegesis is still extant, but this opinion is without foundation, and based only on the opinion of Suidas. The Dionysius of Byzantium appears to have lived before the time of Augustus, who sent him to the east that he might record all the exploits of his glorious reign. (Phln. H. N. vi. 31.)

15. Of Charax. In Susiana on the Arabian gulf, lived in the time of Augustus, who sent him to the east that he might record all the exploits of his grandson on his Parthian and Arabian expedition. (Phln. H. N. vi. 31.)

16. Dionysius Cassius. [Cassius, p. 626.]

17. A slave of Cicero, who was a person of considerable literary attainments, for which reason Cicero employed him to instruct his son Marcus, and was greatly attached to him. Cicero praises him in several passages for his attachment, learning, and honesty, and appears to have rewarded his virtues by emancipating him. At a later period, however, he complains of his want of gratitude, and at last he felt obliged to dismiss him, though he very much regretted the loss of so able a teacher. Subsequently, however, the parties became reconciled. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, 17, 18, v. 3, ix. 3, 12, 15, vi. 1, 2, vili. 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 18, 26, viii. 4, 5, 10, x. 2, xii. 2, 23, ad Fam. vii. 24, 30.) A son of this Dionysius is mentioned by Seneca. (Contr. i. 4.)

20. Of Colophon, forged conjointly with Zopyrus some works which they published under the name of Menippus, the Cynic. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 106; Schol. ad Aristoph. Nub. 1299.)

21. Of Corinth, an epic poet, who wrote some metrical works, such as Advice for Life (ωρθόδοξα), on Causes (εφεύρων; Suid. s. v. Λειβαντία); Plut. Anam. 17), and Meteorologies. In prose he wrote a commentary on Hesiod. Suidas also mentions a periegesis of the earth, but this is in all probability the production of a different person, Dionysius Periegetes. (Eudoc. p. 152.) Some also believe that he was the author of a metrical work, Αίων, which was likewise the work of a different person. (Bernhardy, in his edit. of Dionys. Perieg. p. 492, &c.)

22. Bishop of Corinth in the latter half of the second century after Christ, distinguished himself among the prelates of his time by his piety, his eloquence, and the holiness of his life. He not only watched with the greatest care over his own diocese, but shewed a deep interest in the welfare of other communities and provinces, to which he addressed admonitory epistles. He died the death of a martyr, about A.D. 178. None of his numerous epistles is now extant, but a list of them is preserved in Eusebius (H. E. iv. 23) and Hieronymus (de Script. 27), and a few fragments of them are extant in Eusebius (ii. 23, iv. 23). In one of them Dionysius complains that during his lifetime some of his epistles had been interpolated by heretics for the purpose of supporting their own views. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 44.)

23. An Epicurean philosopher, who succeeded Polybius as the head of the Epicurean school at Athens. He himself was succeeded by Basilides, and must therefore have lived about B. C. 200. (Diog. Laërt. x. 25.) Brucker confounds him with the Stoic surnamed Μεταθέαμος, who afterwards abandoned the Stoics and went over to the Cyrenaics. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 4.)
24. A Greek grammarian, who instructed Plato when a boy in the elements of grammar. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 5; Appuleius, de Dogmat. Plat. i. 2; Olympiod. Vit. Plat. p. 6, ed. Fischer.) He is probably the same person as the Dionysius who is mentioned in the beginning of Plato’s dialogue Eaorvol.

25. Of Halicarnassus, the most celebrated among the ancient writers of the name of Dionysius. He was the son of one Alexander of Halicarnassus, and was born, according to the calculation of Dodwell, between B.C. 78 and 54. Strabo (xiv. p. 636) calls him his own contemporary. His death place took place soon after B.C. 7, the year in which he completed and published the two works on rhetoric at Halicarnassus. Respecting his parents and education we know nothing, nor any thing about his position in his native place before he emigrated to Rome; though some have inferred from his work on rhetoric, that he enjoyed a great reputation at Halicarnassus. All that we know for certain is, the information which he himself gives us in the introduction to his history of Rome (i. 7), and a few more particulars which we may glean from his other works. According to his own account, he went to Italy immediately after the termination of the civil wars, about the middle of Oct. 187, that is, B.C. 29. Henceforward he resided at Rome, and the twenty-two years which followed his arrival at Rome were mainly spent by him in making himself acquainted with the Latin language and literature, and in collecting materials for his great work on Roman history, called Archaeologia.

We may assume that, like other rhetoricians of the time, he had commenced his career as a teacher of rhetoric at Halicarnassus; and his works bear strong evidence of his having been similarly occupied at Rome. (De Comp. Verbal. 20, Rhetor. 10.) There he lived on terms of friendship with many distinguished men, such as Q. Aelius Tubero, and the rhetorical Caecilius; and it is not improbable that he may have received the Roman franchise, but his Roman name is not mentioned anywhere. Respecting the little we know about Dionysius, see F. Matthiæ, de Dionysii Halicarn. praefat. 1772, 4to. Dodwell, de Actis Dionysii in Reiske’s edition of Dionysius, vol. i. p. xlvi. &c.; and lastly, of some philosophers and orators. This τεχνὸς ἐρωτεύεται is edited separately with very valuable prolegomena and notes by H. A. Schott, Leipzig, 1804, 8vo. 2. Περὶ σωθῆσαι ὁμογενῶς, addressed to Rufius Mellitus, the son of a friend of Dionysius, was probably written in the first year or years of his residence at Rome, and at all events previous to any of the other works still extant. It is, however, notwithstanding this, one of high excellence. In it the author treats of oratorical power, and on the combination of words according to the different species and styles of oratory. There are two very good separate editions of this treatise, one by G. H. Schäfer (Leipzig, 1809, 8vo), and the other by F. Gyller (Jena, 1815, 8vo), in which the text is considerably improved from MSS. 3. Περὶ μισεῖας, addressed to a Greek of the name of Demetrius. Its proper title appears to have been ὑπομηνία & περὶ τῆς μισείας. (Dionys. Jud. de Thucyd. 1, Epist. ad Pomp. S.)

The work as a whole is lost, and what we possess under the title of τῶν ἀρχαίων σκηνῶν is probably nothing but a sort of epitome containing characteristics of poets, from Homer down to Euripides, of some historians, such as Herodotus, Thucydides, Philestides, Xenophon, and Theopompos, and lastly, of some philosophers and orators. This epitome is printed separately in Frotscher’s edition of the Book of Quintilian (Leipzig, 1826, p. 271, &c.), who mainly follows the opinions of Dionysius. 4. Περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ὑπομηνία addressed to Ammaenus, contains criticisms on the most eminent Greek orators against certain writers led him to express opinions which at a mature age he undoubtedly regretted. Still, however this may be, he always evinced a well-founded contempt for the shallow sophistries of ordinary rhetoricians, and strives instead to make rhetoric something practically useful, and by his criticisms to contribute towards elevating and ennobling the minds of his readers. The following works of this class are still extant: 1. Τέχνη ὑπομηνίας, addressed to one Eucheocrates. The present condition of this work is by no means calculated to give us a correct idea of his merits and of his views on the subject of rhetoric. It consists of twelve, or according to another division, of eleven reflections or sermons on rhetoric in general and on whatever, and have the appearance of being put together merely by accident. The treatise is therefore generally looked upon as a collection of rhetorical essays by different authors, some of which are genuine productions of Dionysius, who is expressly stated by Quintilian (iii. i. § 10) to have written a manual of rhetoric. Schott, the last learned editor of this work, divides it into four sections. Chap. 1 to 7, with the exclusion of the 6th, which is certainly spurious, may be entitled περὶ τῶν ὄργων, and contains some incoherent comments upon epideictic oratory, which are anything but in accordance with the known views of Dionysius as developed in other treatises; in addition to which, Nicosthenes, a rhetorician of the age of Aelius Aristides, is mentioned in chap. 2. Chapters 8 and 9, περὶ ἐπομηνίας τῶν treat on the same subject, and chap. 3 may be the production of Dionysius; whereas the 9th certainly belongs to a late rhetorician. Chapter 10, περὶ τῶν ἐπομηνίας is a very valuable treatise, and probably the work of Dionysius. The 11th chapter is only a further development of the 10th, just as the 9th chapter is of the 8th. The τέχνη ἐρωτεύεται is edited separately with very valuable prolegomena and notes by H. A. Schott, Leipzig, 1804, 8vo. 2. Περὶ σωθῆσαι ὁμογενῶς, addressed to Rufius Mellitus, the son of a friend of Dionysius, was probably written in the first year or years of his residence at Rome, and at all events previous to any of the other works still extant. It is, however, notwithstanding this, one of high excellence. In it the author treats of oratorical power, and on the combination of words according to the different species and styles of oratory. There are two very good separate editions of this treatise, one by G. H. Schäfer (Leipzig, 1809, 8vo), and the other by F. Gyller (Jena, 1815, 8vo), in which the text is considerably improved from MSS. 3. Περὶ μισεῖας, addressed to a Greek of the name of Demetrius. Its proper title appears to have been ὑπομηνία & περὶ τῆς μισείας. (Dionys. Jud. de Thucyd. 1, Epist. ad Pomp. S.)

The work as a whole is lost, and what we possess under the title of τῶν ἀρχαίων σκηνῶν is probably nothing but a sort of epitome containing characteristics of poets, from Homer down to Euripides, of some historians, such as Herodotus, Thucydides, Philestides, Xenophon, and Theopompos, and lastly, of some philosophers and orators. This epitome is printed separately in Frotscher’s edition of the Book of Quintilian (Leipzig, 1826, p. 271, &c.), who mainly follows the opinions of Dionysius. 4. Περὶ τῶν ἀρχαίων ὑπομηνία addressed to Ammaenus, contains criticisms on the most eminent Greek orators and historians, and the author points out their excelsences as well as their defects with a view to promote a wise imitation of the classic models, and thus to preserve a pure taste in those branches of literature. The work originally consisted of six sections, of which we now possess only the first three, on Lysias, Isocrates, and Isaeus. The other sections treated of Demosthenes, Hyperides, and Aeschines; but we have only the first part of the fourth section, which treats of the orontorical power of Demosthenes, and his superiority over other orators. This part is known under the title περί Λυσίαν ή Ισαίαν ή Ισακίαν, which has become current ever since the time of Sylburg, though it is not found in any MS. The beginning of the treatise is mutilated, and the concluding part of it is entirely wanting. Whether Dionysius actually wrote upon Hyperides and Aeschines, is not known, for in these, as in other instances, he may have intended and promised to write what he could not afterwards fulfill either from want of leisure or inclination. There is a very excellent German translation of the part relating to Demosthenes, with a valuable dissertation on Dionysius as an aesthetic critic, by A. G. Becker. (Wolffenbüttel and Leipzig, 1829, 8vo.) 5. A treatise addressed to Ammaeus, entitled Επιστολή πρὸς Ἀμμαίους πρώτη, which title, however, does not occur in MSS., and instead of πρώτη it ought to be called εὐστολὴ δευτέρα. This treatise or epistle, in which the author shews that most of the orations of Demosthenes had been delivered before Aristotle wrote his Rhetoric, and that consequently Demosthenes had derived no instruction from Aristotle, is of great importance for the history and criticism of the works of Demosthenes. 6. Επιστολὴ πρὸς Ἐνδορκίον, was written by Dionysius with a view to justify the unfavourable opinion which he had expressed upon Plato, and which Pompeius had censured. The latter part of this treatise is much mutilated, and did not perhaps originally belong to it. See Vitus Loers, de Dionys. Hyl. judicio de Platoni oratione et genera dicendi, Treves, 1840, 4to. 7. Περὶ τοῦ θεοκρίτου χαρακτήρος καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν τοῦ συγγραφέων θεωρημάτων, was written by Dionysius at the request of his friend Q. Aelius Tubero, for the purpose of explaining more minutely what he had written on Thucydides. As Dionysius in this work looks at the great historian from his rhetorical point of view, his judgment is often unjust and incorrect. 8. Περὶ τῶν τοῦ θεοκρίτου θεωρημάτων, is addressed to Ammaeus. The last three treatises are printed in a very good edition by C. G. Krüger under the title Dionysii Historiographicae, i.e. Επιστολα et Καταλογος, Q. Ael. Tub., et Ammaeus, Halle, 1823, 8vo. The last of the writings of this class still extant is—9. Δεδομένα, a very valuable treatise on the life and orations of Delarchus. Besides these works Dionysius himself mentions some others, a few of which are lost, while others were perhaps never written; though at the time he mentioned them, Dionysius undoubtedly intended to compose them. Among the former we may mention χρηστηρίζεις τῶν θεωρημάτων (Dionys. de Compos. Verb. 1), of which a few sheets were still extant; and Πραξιναία ἐπὶ τῆς πολιτικῆς φιλοσοφίας πρὸς τοῖς καταρτισθέντας κατ' ἐκκλής. (Dionys. Jud. de Thucyd. 2). A few other works, such as "on the orations unjustly attributed to Lysias" (Lys. 14), "on the tropical expressions in Plato and Demosthenes" (Dem. 32), and περὶ τῆς ἐκλογῆς τῶν διηματων (de Compos. Verb. 1), were probably never written, as no ancient writer besides Dionysius makes any mention of them. The work περὶ θεμηρίδων, which is extant under the name of Demetrius Phalereus, is attributed by some to Dionysius of Halicarnassus; but there is no evidence for this hypothesis, any more than there is for ascribing to him the βίος Ομηροῦ which is printed in Gulo's Ομηροῦ Μυθολογία.
ness, and to show that Rome had not become great by accident or mere good fortune, but by the virtues and wisdom of the Romans themselves. With this object in view, he discusses most carefully everything relating to the constitution, the religion, the history, laws, and private life of the Romans; and his work is for this reason one of the greatest importance to the student of Roman history, at least so far as the substance of his discussions is concerned. But the manner in which he dealt with his materials cannot always be approved of: he is unable to draw a clear distinction between a mere mythus and history; and where he perceives inconsistencies in the former, he attempts, by a rationalistic mode of proceeding, to reduce it to what appears to him sober history. It is however a groundless assertion, which some critics have made, that Dionysius invented facts, and thus introduced direct forgeries into history. He had, moreover, no clear notions about the early constitution of Rome, and was led astray by the nature of the institutions which he saw in his own day; and he thus transferred to the early times the notions which he had derived from the actual state of things—a process by which he became involved in inextricable difficulties and contradictions. The numerous speeches which he introduces in his work are indeed written with great artistic skill, but they nevertheless shew too manifestly that Dionysius was a rhetorician, not an historian, and still less a statesman. He used all the authors who had written before him on the early history of Rome, but he did not always exercise a proper discretion in choosing his guides, and we often find him following authorities of an inferior class in preference to better and sounder ones. Notwithstanding all this, however, Dionysius contains an inexhaustible treasure of materials for those who know how to make use of them. The style of Dionysius is very good, and, with a few exceptions, his language may be called perfectly pure. See Ph. F. Schulin, de Dionys. Hist. Histo- rico, praeceptor Historiae Juris Ponte, Heidelberg, 1821, 4to.; An Inquiry into the Credit due to Di- onys. of Hal. as a Critic and Historian, in the Class. Journ. vol. xxxiv.; Kriger, Profess. Ad Historiogr. p. 78; Schmitz, Lectures on the Hist. of Rome, 1st ed. (Leipzig, 1746–53), ed. Schmilis.

The first work of Dionysius which appeared in print was his Archacologia, in a Latin translation by Lupas Biragus (Trevisio, 1460), from a very good Roman MS. New editions of this translation, with corrections by Glareanus, appeared at Basel, 1532 and 1549; whereupon R. Stephens first edited the Greek original, Paris, 1546, fol., together with some of the rhetorical works. The first complete edition of the Archacologia and the rhetorical works together, is that of Fr. Syburg, Frankfurt, 1566, 2 vols. fol. (reprinted at Leipzig, 1691, 2 vols. fol.) Another reprint, with the introduction of a few alterations, was edited by Huiuson, (Oxford, 1704, 2 vols. fol.) whose version is a very inferior performance. A new and much improved edition, though with many bad and arbitrary emendations, was made by J. Reiske, (Leipzig, 1774, &c.) in 6 vols. 8vo., the last of which was edited by Morus. All the rhetorical works, with the exception of the τέχνη προφατική and the πεπλωμένα δραματία, were edited by E. Gros, (Paris, 1826, &c.) in 3 vols. 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. iv. p. 382, &c.; Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Bereit, § 68.)

26. Of Hierapoli, in Egypt, is mentioned by Artemidorus (Oncir. ii. 71) as the author of a work on dreams.

27. Of Heraclea, a son of Theopantus. In early life he was a disciple of Heracleides, Alexinus, and Menedemus, and afterwards also of Zeno the Stoic, who appears to have induced him to adopt the philosophy of the porch. At a later time he was afflicted with a disease of the eyes, or with a nervous complaint, and the unbearable pains which it caused him led him to abandon the Stoic philosophy, and to join the Eleatics, whose doctrine, that _shadow and the absence of pain was the highest good, had more charms for him than the austere ethics of the Stoa. This renunciation of his former philosophical creed drew upon him the name of μεταβολησως, i.e. the renegade. During the time that he was a Stoic, he is praised for his modesty, abstinence, and moderation, but afterwards we find him described as a person greatly given to sensual pleasures. He died in his eightieth year of voluntary starvation. Diogenes Laërtius mentions a series of works of Dionysius, all of which, however, are lost, and Cicero censures him for having mixed up verses with his prose, and for his want of elegance and refinement. (Diog. Laërt. vii. 166, 167, v. 92; Athen. vii. p. 201, x. p. 437; Lucian, Dis Accus. 20; Censorin. 15; Cie. Acad. ii. 22, de Fina. v. 31, Thucyd. ii. 11, 35, iii. 9.)

28. A disciple of Heracleetus, is mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ix. 15) as the author of a commentary on the works of his master.

29. An Hieracleuss, who seems to have lived in the later period of the Roman empire, and is quoted by Jornandes. (De Reb. Civ. 19.)

30. Surnamed Λαμψ, that is, the lamic poet, is mentioned by Suidas (v. 'Αρσαραγάρας) among the teachers of Aristophanes of Byzantium, from which we may infer the time at which he lived. Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. v. p. 674) quotes an hexameter verse of his, and according to Atheneus (vii. p. 284), he also wrote a work on dialectics. Plutarch (de Mus. 15) quotes him as an authority on harmony, from which it has been inferred that he is the author of a work on the history of music, of which Stephanus of Byzantium (s. t. s. "Τεσαφά" quotes the 23rd book.

31. Of Miletus, a distinguished rhetorician, who taught his art in Asia between the years a. c. 79 and 77, at the time when Cicero, then in his 29th year, visited the east. Cicero on his excursions in Asia was accompanied by Dionysius, Aeschylus of Caidus, and Xenoleos of Adimytyum, who were then the most eminent rhetoricians in Asia. (Cic. Brut. 91; Plut. Civ. 4.)

32. Of Miletus, one of the earliest Greek historians, and according to Suidas (v. 'Εκατοτα), a contemporary of Heractaeus, that is, he lived about b. c. 520; he must, however, to judge from the titles of his works, have survived b. c. 485, the year in which Dareius died. Dionysius of Miletus wrote a history of Dareius Hystaspis in five books. Suidas further attributes to him a work entitled ἡ μέτα Δαρείου in five books, and also a work Περίσταθν in the Ionic dialect. Whether they were actually three distinct works, or whether the two last were the same, and only a continuation of the first, cannot be ascertained on account of the inextricable confusion which prevails in the articles Δαρείους of Suidas, in consequence of which our Dionysius has often been confounded with

33. Of Mirageus, a sophist of the time of the emperor Hadrian. He was a pupil of Isaeus the Asiarian, and distinguished for the elegance of his orations. He was greatly honoured by the cities of Asia, and more especially by the emperor Hadrian, who made him prefect of a considerable province, raised him to the rank of a Roman eques, and assigned to him a place in the museum of Alexandria. Notwithstanding these distinctions, Dionysius remained a modest and unassuming person. At one time of his life he taught rhetoric at Lesbos, but he died at Ephesus at an advanced age, and was buried in the marketplace of Ephesus, where a monument was erected to him. Philostratus has preserved a few specimens of his oratory. (Vit. Soph. i. 20, § 2, c. 22; Dion Cass. xlix. 3; Endec. p. 130; Suidas.)

34. Of Mithile, was surmamed Syctobrachion, and seems to have lived shortly before the time of Cicero, if we may believe the report that he instructed M. Antoninus Gnipho at Alexandria (Suet. de Istit. Gram. 7), for Suetonius expresses a doubt as to its correctness for chronological reasons. Artemon (ap. Athen. xii. p. 415) states, that Dionysius Syctobrachion was the author of the historical work which was commonly attributed to the ancient historian Xanthus of Lydia, who lived about 400. From this it has been inferred, that our Dionysius must have lived at a much earlier period. But if we conceive that Dionysius may have made a revision of the work of Xanthus, it does not follow that he must needs have lived very near the age of Xanthus. Suidas attributes to him a metrical work, the expedition of Dionysius and Athena Aiovvoou, and a prose work on the Argonauts in six books, addressed to Parmenon. He was probably another of the historical Cycle, which Suidas attributes to Dionysius of Miletus. The Argonautis is often referred to by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, who likewise several times confounds the Mytilenean with the Milesian (i. 1293, ii. 207, 1144, iii. 290, 242, iv. 199, 226, 229, 1153), and this work was also consulted by Diodorus Siculus. (iii. 52, 66.) See Bernhardy, ad Dionys. Periy., p. 498; Welecker, Der Ep. Cycles, p. 87.

36. Of Persamus, surmamed Atticus, a rhetorician, who is characterized by Strabo (xiii. p. 629) as a clever sophist, an historian, and logographer, that is, a writer of orations. He was a pupil of Apollodorus, the rhetorician, who is mentioned among the teachers of Augustus. (Comp. Sene. Contrv. 1. 1.) Weiske (ad Longin. p. 218) considers him to be the author of the work πεπόνων commonly attributed to Longinus; but there is nothing probable, if anything, to support this view. (Westermann, Gesch. d. Griech. Bered. § 90, note 9.)

37. Of Phaselis, is mentioned in the scholi on Pindar, and was probably a grammarian who wrote on Pindar. The anonymous author of the life of Nicander speaks of two works of his, viz. "on the Poetry of Antimachus," and "on Poets." (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. xi. p. 787, ed. Heyne; ad Pth. ii. 20.)

38. Surmamed Periegetes, from his being the author of a περίγραφα της γῆς, in hexameter verse, which is still extant. Respecting the age and country of this Dionysius the most different opinions have been entertained, though all critics are agreed in placing him after the Christian era, or in the time of the Roman emperors, as must indeed be necessarily inferred from passages of the Periegesis itself, such as v. 355, where the author speaks of his dòwres, that is, his sovereigns, which can only apply to the emperors. But the question as to which emperor or emperors Dionysius there alludes, has been answered in the most different ways: some writers have placed Dionysius in the reign of Augustus, others in that of Nero, and others again under M. Aurelius and L. Vettius Verus, or under Septemviri Materni; but Eustathius, his commentator, was himself in doubt about the age of his author. But these uncertainties have been removed by Bernhardy, the last editor of Dionysius, who has made it highly probable, partly from the names of countries and nations mentioned in the Periegesis, partly from the mention of the Huns in v. 780, and partly from the general character of the poem, that its author must have lived either in the latter part of the third, or in the beginning of the fourth, century of our era. With regard to his native country, Suidas refers from the enthusiastic manner in which Dionysius speaks of the river Rhibus (795, &c.), that he was born at Byzantium, or somewhere in its neighbourhood; but Eustathius (ad v. 3) expressly calls him an African, and these authorities certainly seem to deserve more credit than the mere inference of Suidas. The Periegesis of Dionysius contains a description of the whole earth, so far as it was known in his time, in hexameter verse, and the author appears chiefly to follow the views of Eratosthenes. It is written in a terse and neat style, and enjoyed a high degree of popularity in ancient times, as we may infer from the fact, that two translations or paraphrases of it were made by Romans, one by Rufus Festus Avienus [Avienus], and the other by the grammarian Priscian. [Priscianus.] Eustathius wrote a very valuable commentary upon it, which is still extant, and we further possess a Greek paraphrase and scholia. The first edition of the Periegesis appeared at Ferrara, 1512, 4to, with a Latin translation. A. Manutius printed it at Venice, 1513, 8vo, together with Pindar, Calimachus, and Lyceophon. II. Stephens incorporated it in his "Poetae Principes Heroidis Carminibus," Paris, 1566, fol. One of the most useful among the subsequent editions is that of Edw. Thwaites, Oxford, 1697, 8vo, with the commentary of Eustathius, the Greek scholi and paraphrase. It is also printed in the fourth volume of Hudson's Geogr. Minor. 1712, 8vo, from which it was reprinted separately, Oxford, 1710 and 1717, 8vo. But all the previous editions are superseded by that of O. J. Bopp (Leipz. 1829, 8vo), which forms vol. i. of a monumental collection of the minor Greek geographers; it is accompanied by a very excellent and learned dissertation and the 3 x 2 ancient commentators. Besides the Periplus, Eustathius states that other works also were attributed to our Dionysius, viz. AitndiB, ōvpfriB, and Baoorati. Concerning the first, compare the Scholiast on v. 714; Maxim. ad Dionys. Areopag. de Myst. Theol. 2; and Bernhardy (L. c.), p. 502. Respecting the ōvpfriB, which some attribute to Dionysius of Philadelphia, see Bernhardy, p. 503. The Baoorati, which means the same as Baoorata (Suid. s. a. Zçptρρηγας) is very often quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium. (See Bernhardy, pp. 507, 508 and 513.)

39. Bishop Dionysius, is called a ἵππος τε καὶ διάφορος ὁριστῷ by his contemporary, Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria. (Ap. Euseb. H. E. vii. 7.) He is believed to have been a Greek by birth, and after having been a presbyter, he was made bishop of Rome in A. D. 259, and retained this high dignity for ten years, till A. D. 269. During his administration of the Roman diocese, some bishops brought before him charges against Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, for being guilty of heretical opinions in his controversies with Sabellius. The bishop of Rome therefore convoked a synod, and with its consent he declared, in a letter to the accused, that he was guilty of heresies, and gave him a gentle reprimand. A fragment of this letter is preserved in Athanasius (de D. Synod. N. C. c. 421), and it was this letter which induced Dionysius of Alexandria to write his work against Sabellius, which was addressed to the bishop of Rome. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 97.)

40. Surnamed SCOTTOBACHON. See No. 34.

41. Of SIDON, a Greek grammarian, who is sometimes simply called Sidonius. (Schol. Venet. ad Hom. ii. i. 424, xiv. 40.) He seems to have lived shortly after the time of Aristarchus, and to have founded a school of his own. (Schol. ad H/ii. i. 8.) He is frequently referred to in the Venetian Scholia, and also by Eustathius on Homer, as one of the critical commentators of the poet. (Comp. Varro, de L. L. x. 10, ed. Müller; Villonius, Proleg. ad Hom. ii. p. xxix.)

42. Of SMOY. See below.

43. A Greek philosopher, against whom Chrysippus wrote a work, but who is otherwise unknown. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 43; Endec. p. 138.)

44. Surnamed ΘΡΑΙΚ, or the Thracian, a celebrated Greek grammarian, who unquestionably derived his surname from the fact of his father Teres being a Thracian (Suidas); and it is absurd to believe, with the author of the Etymologicon Magnum (p. 277. 53), that he received it from his rough voice or any other circumstance. He himself, according to some, a native of Alexandria (Suidas), and, according to others, of Byzantium; but he is also called a Rhodian, because at one time he resided at Rhodes, and gave instructions there (Strab. xiv. p. 635; Athen. xi. p. 489), and it was at Rhodes that Tyrannion was among the pupils of Dionysius. Dionysius also staid for some time at Rome, where he was engaged in teaching, about A. D. 80. Further particulars about his life are not known. He was the author of numerous grammatical works, manuals, and commentaries. We possess under his name a τέχνη γραμματική, a small work, which however became the basis of all subsequent grammars, and was a standard book in grammar schools for many centuries. Under such circumstances we cannot wonder that, in the course of time, such a work was much interpolated, sometimes abridged, and sometimes extended or otherwise modified. The form therefore, in which it has come down to us, is not the original one, and hence its great difference in the different MSS.

It was first printed in Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. iv. p. 20 of the old edition. Villonius (Anecd. ii. 99) then added some excerpts and scholia from a Venetian MS., together with which the grammar was afterwards printed in Fabricius, Bibli. Gr. vi. p. 311 of Harles’s edition, and somewhat better in Bekker’s Anecdota, ii. p. 627, &c. It is remarkable that an Armenian translation of this grammar, which has recently come to light, and was probably made in the fourth or fifth century of our era, is much more complete than the Greek original, having five additional chapters. This translation, which was published by Giribed in the Mémoires et Découvertes sur les antiquités nationales et étrangères, 1824, Bvo. vii., has increased the doubts about the genuineness of our Greek text; but it would be going too far to consider it, with Götting, (Prog. ad Theod. Gram. p. v. &c.; comp. Lersch, de Sprachphilos. der Alten, ii. p. 61, &c.) as a mere compilation made by some Byzantine grammarian at a very late period. The groundwork of what we have is unquestionably the production of Dionysius Thrax. The interpolations mentioned above appear to have been introduced at a very early time, and it was probably owing to them that some of the ancient commentators of the grammar found in it things which could not have been written by a disciple of Aristarchus, and that therefore they doubted its genuineness. Dionysius did much also for the explanation and criticism of Homer, as may be inferred from the quotations in the Venetian Scholia (ad Hom. ii. ii. 262, iv. 460, xii. 20, xiii. 103, xvii. 86, 741, xviii. 207, xvii. 110), and Eustathius. (Ad Hom. pp. 854, 869, 1040, 1299.)

He does not, however, appear to have written a regular commentary, but to have inserted his remarks on Homer in several other works, such as that against Cnutes, and the τεχνή νοηματος. (Schol. Ven. ad Hom. ii. i. 5.) In some MSS. there exists a treatise τεχνή τόου παραγωγής, which has been wrongly attributed to our grammarian: it is, further, more than doubtful whether he wrote a commentary on Euripides, as has been inferred from a quotation of the Scholiast on that poet. His chief merit consists in the impulse he gave to the study of systematic grammar, and in what he did for a correct understanding of Homer. The Bythmol. contains several examples of his etymological, prosodical, and exegetical attempts. (pp. 363. 18, 747. 20, 365. 20.) Dionysius is also mentioned as the author of μελέτας and of a work on Rhodes. (Steph. Byz. s. c. Ταπάς; comp. Græfian, Gesch. der klass. Philol. i. p. 402, &c.)

45. A son or disciple of Tyronius, a Greek grammarian, who lived about A. D. 50. (Steph. Byz. s. s. Ταπάς, Μπίναιος, &c.) He was the author of a work Περί διάφωνων, which consisted of at least eleven books, and is often referred to by Stephanus of Byzantium and Harpocrateon. (Comp. Athen. vi. p. 255, xi. p. 502, xiv. p. 641.)

[DIONYSIUS (Aσιορίσιος), of Sinope, an Athenian comic poet of the middle comedy. (Athen. xi. p. 497, d. 497, e. c. xiv. p. 615, e.; Schol. Hom. ii. xi. 515.) He appears, from indications in the fragments of his plays, to have been younger than Archestratus, t, to have flourished about the same time as Nicostratus, the son of Aristophanes, and] to have lived till the establishment of the Macedonian supremacy in Greece. We have the titles and some fragments of his Ἀντικύκλεις (Ath. xiv. p. 664, d.), which appears to have been translated by Naevius, Θεμάραφας (a long passage in Athen. ix. p. 404 c.), Οἰνωνίους (Athen. viii. p. 301, c., xiv. p. 815, e.), Ἀνδρός (Schol. Hom. Ill. xi. 515; Bostath. p. 859, 49), Ζωγραφος ἢ Ζωγράφος (Athen. pp. 467, d., 457, d.; Stob. Serm. exx. 8.) Mæsius and Fabriuces are wrong in assigning the Ζωγραφος to Dionysius. It belongs to Polkonius.

4. The works executed by Dionysius were statues of Contest (Ἄγωνα) carrying ἀληθείας (Dict. of Ant. s. c.), of Dionysius, of Orpheus, and of Zeus without a beard. (Paus. v. 26. §§ 3—6.) He also made a horse and charioteer in bronze, which were among the works dedicated at Olympia by Phormis of Maenalus, the contemporary of Gelo and Hero. (Paus. v. 27. § 1.)

2. A sculptor, who made the statue of Hera which Octavian afterwards placed in the portico of Octavia. (Plin. xxxvi. 5, s. 4. § 10.) Junius takes by Phormis of Maenalus, the contemporary of Gelo and Hero. (Paus. v. 27. § 1.)

3. Of Colophon, a painter, contemporary with Polygnotus of Thasos, whose works he imitated in their accuracy, expression (μετρον), manner (χρόνος), in the treatment of the form, in the delicacy of the drapery, and in every other respect except in grandeur. (Aelian. V. H. iii. 4.) Plutarch (Timoec. 36) speaks of his works as having strength and tone, but as forced and laboured. Aristotle (Poet. 2) says that Polygnotus painted the likenesses of men better than the originals, Pausan made them worse, and Dionysius just like him (ἐμαθείως). It seems from this that the pictures of Dionysius were deficient in the ideal. It was no doubt for this reason that Dionysius was called Ἀνθρωπόγραφος, like Demetrius. It is true that Pliny, from whom we learn the fact, gives a different reason, namely, that Dionysius was so called because he painted only men, and not landscapes (xxxv. 10. s. 37); but this is only one case out of many in which Pliny's ignorance of art has caused him to give a false interpretation of a true fact. Silius applies this passage to the later Dionysius (No. 4), but without any good reason.

4. A painter, who flourished at Rome at the same time as Sopolis and Lala of Cyzicus, about b.c. 84. Pliny says of him and Sopolis, that they were the most renowned painters of that age, except Lala, and that their works filled the picture galleries (xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 43). [P. S.]

DIONYSIUS (Ἀνδρός), the name of several physicians and surgeons, whom it is sometimes difficult to distinguish with certainty.

1. A native of Arōs (but of which place of this name does not appear), who must have lived in or before the ninth century after Christ, as he is quoted by Photius (Bibl. 751, 211, pp. 129, 168, ed. Bekker), but how much earlier he lived is uncertain. It is not known whether he was himself a physician, but he wrote a work entitled Διατριβακα, in which he discussed various medical questions. It consisted of one hundred chapters, the heads of which have been preserved by Photius, and shew that he wrote both in favour of each proposition, and also against it. The title of his book has been supposed to allude to his teaching his readers to argue on both sides of a question, and thus to catch their hearers, as it were, in a net.

2. A native of Cyprianus, of Egypt, who was mentioned by Hermogenes Philo in his lost History of Medicine. Stephanus Byzantinus (s. n. Kypri) calls him Ἰάσσυρας λάρυγκας. His date is uncertain, but if (as Meursius conjectures) he is the same person who is quoted by Caesarius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. ii. 13, p. 416), he may be supposed to have lived in the third century B.C. (Meursius, Dionysius, &c. in Opera, vol. v.)

3. A native of Mileus, in Caria, must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, as he is quoted by Galen, who has preserved some of his medical formulae. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, iv. 7, vol. xiii. p. 741; De AnÆsel, ii. 11, vol. xiv. p. 171.) He may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Galen without any distinguishing epithet. (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. iv. 9, vol. xii. p. 760.)

4. Son of Oxymachus, appears to have written some anatomical work, which is mentioned by Rufus Ephesiensis. (De Appell. Part. Corp. Hum. p. 42.) He was either a contemporary or predecessor of Eudemus, and therefore lived probably in the fourth or third century B.C.

5. Of Samos, whose medical formulae are quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iv. 13, vol. xiii. p. 745), is supposed by Meursius (l. c.) to be the same person as the son of Musonius; but, as Kühn observes (Additam. ad Elench. Medic. Vet. a Fabricio in "Bibl. Graecos," exhib. fascie. xiv. p. 7), from no other reason, than because both are said to have been natives of Samos (nor is even this certain). Sometimes from the writings of the son of Musonius there is no ground for believing him to have been a physician, or even a collector of medical prescriptions.

6. Sallustius Dionysius, is quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 26), and therefore must have lived in or before the first century after Christ.

7. Cassius Dionysius. [Cassius, p. 626.]

8. Dionysius, a surgeon, quoted by Serbonius Largus (Compos. Medicam. c. 212, ed. Rhod.). The second century, which lived probably at or before the beginning of the Christian era.

9. A physician, who was a contemporary of Galen in the second century after Christ, and is mentioned as attending the son of Celsus, to whom Galen wrote a letter full of medical advice, which is still extant. (Galen, Pro Puro Epiilept. Consil., in Opera, vol. xi. p. 357.)

10. A fellow-pupil of Heracleides of Tarentum, who must have lived in or before the first century of the Methodici, and who lived probably in the second century of the Methodici, and who lived probably in the first century B.C. (Galen, de Med. Med. i. 17, vol. x. p. 53; Introduct. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684.)

11. The physician mentioned by Galen (Com-

p. 751) as a commentator on the Aphorism of Hippocrates, must have lived in or before the second century after Christ, but cannot certainly be identified with any other physician of that name.

13. A physician whose medical formulae are mentioned by Celsus (De Med. vi. 6. 4; 10. 9; pp. 119, 130), must have lived in or before the first century after Christ, and may perhaps be the same person as No. 3, or 8.

14. A physician at Rome in the fifth century after Christ, who was also in deacon's orders, and a man of great piety. When Rome was taken by Alaric, A.D. 410, Dionysius was carried away prisoner, but was treated with great kindness, on account of his virtues and his medical skill. An epitaph on him in Latin elegiac verse is to be found in Barcinon, Asccl. Ecles. ad ann. 410, § 41. [W. A. G.]

DIONYSOCLES (Διονύσωκλῆς), of Tralles, is mentioned by Strabo (xiv. p. 649) among the distinguished rhetoricians of that city. He was probably a pupil of Apollodorus of Pergamum, and consequently lived shortly after or at the time of Strabo. [L. S.]

DIONYSODO'rus (Διόνυσοδώρος). 1. A Bocotian, who is mentioned by Diodorus Siculus (xxv. 95) as the author of a history of Greece, which came down as far as the reign of Philip of Macedonia, the father of Alexander the Great. It is usually supposed that he is the same person as the Dionysodorus in Diogenes Laertius (ii. 42), who denied that the plane which went by the name of Socrates, was the production of the philosopher. (Comp. Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 917.) It is uncertain also whether he is the author of a work on rivers (ποιήμα ποταμων, Schol. ad Eurip. Hippol. 122), and of another entitled θεοὶ καὶ γης γεγραφηκες ἥμαρτσινα, which is quoted by a Scholiast. (Ad Eurip. Rhod. 504.)

2. A Greek rhetorician, who is introduced in Lucian's Symposeion (c. 6). Another person of the same name is mentioned, in the beginning of Plato's dialogue "Enthydemus," as a brother of Rthydemus. (Comp. Xenoph. Memor. iii. 1. § 1.)

3. Of Troezen, a Greek grammarian, who is referred to by Plutarch (Arat. 1) and in the work of Apollonius Dyscolus on "On Pronouns." [L. S.]

DIONYSODORUS (Διόνυσοδώρος), a geometr of Cydus, whose mode of cutting a sphere by a plane in a given ratio is preserved by Eutocius, in his comment on book ii. prop. 5, of the sphere and cylinder of Archimedes. A species of conical section is attributed to him, and Pliny (H. N. ii. 109) says, that he had an inscription placed on his tomb, addressed to the world above, stating that he had been to the centre of the earth and found it 42 thousand stadia distant. Pliny calls this a striking instance of Greek vanity; but, as Weidler remarks, it is as near a guess as any that was made for a long time afterwards. (Weidler, Hist. Astron. p. 133; Heiblommer, in verb. [A. D. M.])

DIONYSODORUS. [Moscotton.]

DIONYSODOTUS (Διονύσοδωτος), a lyric poet of Lacedaemon, who is mentioned along with Alcamen, and whose poems were very popular at Sparta. (Athen. x. p. 676.)

DIONYSUS ( Διόνυσος), the mournful, beautiful, but effeminate god of wine. He is also called both by Greeks and Romans Bacchus (Βάκχος), that is, the noisy or riotous god, which was originally a mere epithet or surname of Dionysus, but does not occur till after the time of Herodotus. According to the common tradition, Dionysus was the son of Zeus and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes (Hom. Hymn. vi. 56; Eurip. Bacch. init.; Apollod. iii. 4. § 3); whereas others describe him as a son of Zeus by Demeter, Io, Diome, or Arge. (Dion. iii. 106, &c. Plut. de Plm. 16.) Diocorus (iii. 67) farther mentions a tradition, according to which he was a son of Ammon and Amaltheia, and that Ammon, from fear of Rhen, carried the child to a cave in the neighbourhood of mount Nysa, in a lonely island formed by the river Triton. Ammon there entrusted the child to Nysa, the daughter of Aristaeus, and Athena likewise undertook to protect the boy. Others again represent him as a son of Zeus by Persephone or Iris, or describe him simply as a son of Lethe, or of Indus. (Diod. iv. 4; Plut. Synag. vii. 5; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. ii. 8.) The same diversity of opinions prevails in regard to the native place of the god, which in the common tradition is said to be born in Libya, Crete, Damascus in Samos, Naxos, Elis, Eleutherome, or Teos, mentioned as his birthplace. (Hom. Hymn. xxv. 8; Diod. iii. 65, v.75; Nonnus, Dionys. iv. 6; Theocr. xxxvi. 33.) It is owing to this diversity in the traditions that ancient writers were driven to the supposition that there were originally several divinities which were afterwards identified under the one name of Dionysus. Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 23) distinguishes five Dionys, and Diocorus (iii. 63, &c.) three.

The common story, which makes Dionysus a son of Semele by Zeus, runs as follows: Hera, jealous of Semele, visited her in the disguise of a friend, or an old woman, and persuaded her to request Zeus to appear to her in the same glory and majesty in which he was accustomed to approach his own wife Hera. When all entreaties to desist from this request were fruitless, Zeus at length complied, and appeared to her in thunder and lightning. Semele was terrified and overpowered by the sight, and being seized by the fire, she gave premature birth to a child. Zeus, or according to others, Hermes (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1137) saved the child from the flames: it was sewed up in the thigh of Zeus, and thus came to maturity. Various epithets which are given to the god refer to that occurrence, such as παρακτητης, μοιραγὼν, μοιραγωγὸς and ἱμηρικός. (Strab. xiii. p. 528; Diod. iv. 5 Eurip. Bacch. 289; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 310; Orv. Met. iv. 11.) After the birth of Dionysus, Zeus entrusted him to Hermes, or, according to others, to Persephone or Rhen (Orph. Hymn. xvi. 6; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μηδεστωρες), who took the child to Ino and Athamas at Orchomenus, and persuaded them to bring him up as a girl. Hera was now urged on by her jealousy to throw Ino and Athamas into a state of madness, and Zeus, in order to save his child, changed him into a ram, and carried him to the nympha of mount Nysa, who brought him up in a cave, and were afterwards rewarded for it by Zeus, by being placed as Hyades among the stars. (Hymn. Phb. 182; Theon. ad Aret. Phan. 177; comp. Hyades.)

The inhabitants of Brasae, in Laconia, according to Pausanias (iii. 54. § 9), told a similar story about the birth of Dionysus. When Cadmus heard, they said, that Semele was mother of a son by Zeus, he put her and her child into a chest, and DIONYSUS.

threw it into the sea. The chest was carried by the wind and waves to the coast of Brasiae. Semele was found dead, and was solemnly buried, but Dionysus was brought up by Ino, who happened at the time to be at Brasiae. The plain of Brasiae was, for this reason, afterwards called the garden of Dionysus.

The traditions about the education of Dionysus, as well as about the personages who undertook it, differ as much as those about his parentage and birthplace. Besides the nymphs of mount Nysa in Thrace, the nurses, Lydace, Bassaree, Maeclae, Mimallones, (Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 982, 1816), the nymph Nysa (Diod. iii. 69), and the nymphs Philia, Coronis, and Cleis, in Naxos, whither the child Dionysus was said to have been carried by Zeus (Diod. iv. 52), are named as the beings to whom the care of his infancy was entrusted. Mystis, moreover, is said to have instructed him in the mysteries (Nom. Dionys. xlii. 140), and Hippia, on mount Tmolus, nursed him (Orph. Hymn. xviii. 4); Macris, the daughter of Aristaeus, received him from the hands of Hermes, and fed him with honey. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. iii. 1.) On mount Nysa, Bromie and Bacche too are called his nurses. (Serv. ad Virg. Buc. ii. 13.) Mount Nysa, from which the god was believed to have derived his name, was not only in Thrace and Libya, but mountains of the same name are found in different parts of the ancient world where he was worshipped, and where he was believed to have introduced the cultivation of the vine. Hermes, however, is mixed up with most of the stories about the infancy of Dionysus, and he was often represented in works of art, in connexion with the infant god. (Comp. Paus. iii. 18, § 7.)

When Dionysus had grown up, Hera threw him also into a state of madness, in which he wandered about through many countries of the earth. A tradition in Hyginus (Post. Astr. ii. 23) makes him go first to the oracle of Dodona, but on his way thither he came to a lake, which prevented his proceeding any further. One of two asses he met there carried him across the water, and the grateful god placed Parnassus. Pentheus, who then ruled at Thebes, as the introduction of the vine, which Dionysus was believed to have discovered, (εικερθεναι απαλαιον.) He now traversed all Asia. (Strab. xvi. p. 687; Eurip. Bacch. 13.) When he arrived at the Euphrates, he built a bridge over the river, but a tiger sent to Zeux carried him across the river Tigris. (Paus. x. 29; Plut. de Flam. 24.) The story of this part of his wanderings has in all ages been connected with his expedition to India, which is said to have lasted three, or, according to some, even 82 years. (Diod. iii. 63, iv. 3.) He did not in those distant regions meet with a kindly reception everywhere, for Myrmmaths and Dercades, with their three chiefs Blemys, Orontes, and Orundses, fought against him. (Steph. Byz. s. n. Βακχες, Γάτος, Γλυρες, Δάρδα, Ἐκρας, Ζέβιον, Μέλιον, Πασόν, Σίβα.) But Dionysus and the host of Pans, Satyrs, and Bacchic women, by whom he was accompanied, conquered his enemies, taught the Indians the cultivation of the vine and of various fruits, and the worship of the gods; he also founded towns among them, gave them laws, and left behind him pillars and monuments in the happy land which he had thus conquered and civilized, and the inhabitants worshipped him as a god. (Comp. Strab. xi. p. 505; Arrian, Ind. 5; Diod. ii. 38; Philostr. Vit. Apollon. ii. 9; Virg. Aen. vi. 895.) Dionysus also visited Phrygia and the goddess Cybele or Rhea, who purified him and taught him the mysteries, which according to Apollodorus (iii. 5. § 1.) took place before he went to India. With the assistance of his companions, he drove the Amazons from Ephesus to Samos, and there killed a great number of them on a spot which was, from that occurrence, called Panemus. (Plut. Quaest. Gr. 66.) According to another legend, he united with the Amazons to fight against Cymus and the Titans, who had expelled Ammon from his dominions. (Diod. iii. 70, &c.) He is even said to have gone to Iberia, which, on leaving, he entrusted to the government of Pan. (Plut. de Flam. 16.) On his passage through Thrace he was ill received by Lycurgus, King of the Edones, and leaped into the sea to seek refuge with Thetis, whom he afterwards rewarded for her kind reception with a golden urn, a present of Hephaestus. (Horn. Od. ii. 43.) He then proceeded through Syria, pieces. (Thocrit. Id. xxvi.; Eurip. Bacch. 1142; Od. xxiv. 74; Schol. ad Horn. ii. xiii. 91.) Dionysus with a host of women came from Iberia, which, on leaving, he entrusted to the temple of Dionysus Cresins, because the god was believed to have had a connection with the temple of Dionysus (Diod. iv. 52). The most famous legend is that of the story of the education of Dionysus, which according to some, even 52 years. (Diod. iii. 22.) Afterwards, how-into serpents, and himself into a lion; he filled the vessel with ivy and the sound of flutes, so that the sailors, who were seized with madness, leaped into the sea, where they were metamorphosed into dolphins. (Apollod. iii. 5, § 3; Hom. Hymn. vi. 44; Ov. Met. iii. 582, &c.) In all his wanderings and travels the god had rewarded those who had received him kindly and adopted his worship; he gave them vines and wine.

After he had thus gradually established his divine nature throughout the world, he led his mother out of Hades, called her Thynne, and rose with her into Olympus. (Apollod. i. a.) The place, where he had come forth with Semele from Hades, was shown by the Troezenians in the temple of Artemis Soteira (Paus. ii. 31. § 2); the Argives, on the other hand, said, that he had emerged with his mother from the Alcyonian lake. (Paus. ii. 37. § 5; Clem. Alex. Adm. od Gr. p. 22.) There is also a mystical story, that the body of Dionysus was cut up and thrown into a cauldron by the Titans, and that he was restored and cured by Rhea or Demeter. (Paus. vii. 37. § 3; Diod. iii. 62; Plut. N. D. 28.) Various mythological beings are described as the offspring of Dionysus; but among the women, both mortal and immortal, who won his love, none is more famous in ancient history than Ariadne. [Ariadne.]

The extraordinary mixture of traditions which we have here occasion to notice, and which might still be considerably increased, seems evidently to be made up out of the traditions of different times and countries, referring to analogous divinities, and transferred to the Greek Dionysus. We may, however, remark at once, that all traditions which have reference to a mystic worship of Dionysus, are of a comparatively late origin, that is, they belong to the period subsequent to that in which the Homeric poems were composed; for in those poems Dionysus does not appear as one of the great divinities, and the story of his birth by Zeus and the Bacchic orgies are not alluded to in any way:

Dionysus is there simply described as the god who teaches man the preparation of wine, whence he is called the "drunken god" (xapsa évtois), and the sober king Lycurgos will not, for this reason, tolerate him in his kingdom. (Hom. il. vi. 132, &c.; Od. xviii. 406, comp. xi. 325.) As the cultivation of the vine spread in Greece, the worship of Dionysus likewise spread further; the mystic worship was developed by the Orphics, though it probably originated in the transfer of Phrygian and Lydian modes of worship to that of Dionysus. After the time of Alexander's expedition to India, the celebration of the Bacchic festivals assumed new and more their wild and distinctive character.

As far as the nature and origin of the god Dionysus is concerned, he appears in all traditions as the representative of some power of nature, whereas Apollo is mainly an ethical deity. Dionysus is the productive, overflowing and intoxicating power of nature, which carries man away from his usual quiet and sober mode of living. Wine is the most natural and appropriate symbol of that power, and it is therefore called the "fruit of Dionysus," (vóyaπa νοαδρος; Pind. Fragm. 89, ed. Böckh.) Dionysus is, therefore, the god of wine, the inventor and teacher of its cultivation, the originator of the Bacchant revels, and the disperser of grief and sorrow. (Bacchyl. ap. Athen. ii. p. 40; Pind. Fragm. 5; Eur. Bacch. 772.) As the god of wine, he is also both an inspired and an inspiring god, that is, a god who has the power of revealing the future to man by oracles. Thus, it is said, that he had as great a share in the Delphic oracle as Apollo (Eurip. Bacch. 200, and he himself had an oracle in Thrace. (Paus. iii. 30. § 5.) Now, as prophetic power is always combined with the healing art, Dionysus is, like Apollo, called the "Great healer" (Eustath. ad Dion. p. 1894), and at his oracle of Amphiclia, in Phocis, he cured diseases by revealing the remedies to the sufferers in their dreams. (Paus. x. 33. § 5.) Hence he is invoked as a ἑσθὸς ἔσχησις against raging diseases. (Soph. Oed. Tygr. 210; Lyoc. 206.) The notion of his being the cultivator and protector of the vine was easily extended to that of his being the protector of trees in general, which is alluded to in various epithets and surnames given him by the poets of antiquity (Paus. i. 31. § 2, vi. 21. § 2), and he thus comes into close connexion with Demeter. (Paus. vii. 20. § 1; Pind. Isthm. vii. 3; Theocr. xx. 39; Diod. iii. 64; Ov. Fast. iii. 736; Plut. Quaest. Gr. 36.) This character is still further developed in the notion of Diocles being the "law-giver and law-teacher of civilization, a law-giver, and a lover of peace. (Eurip. Bacch. 420; Strab. x. p. 468; Diol. iv. 4.) As the Greek drama had grown out of the dithyrambic choruses at the festivals of Dionysus, he was also regarded as the god of tragic art, and as the protector of theatres. In later times, he was worshipped also as a ζήσεων, which may have arisen from his resemblance to Demeter, or have been the result of an amalgamation of Phrygian and Lydian forms of worship with those of the ancient Greeks. (Paus. vii. 37. § 3; Arnob. adv. Gent. v. 19.)

The orgiastic worship of Dionysus seems to have been first established in Thrace, and to have thence spread southward to Mount Helicon and Parnassus, to Thesla, Naxos, and throughout Greece, Sicily, and Italy, though some writers derive it from Egypt. (Paus. ii. 2. § 4; Diol. i. 97.) Respecting his festivals and the mode of their celebration, and especially the introduction and suppression of his worship at Rome, see Dict. of Ant. s. e. Αγρίερα, Άδαντα, Άδας, Άδεσ, and Dionysia.

In the earliest times the Greeks, or Chariites, were the companions of Dionysus (Pind. Od. viii. 20; Phlt. Quaest. Gr. 36; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 424), and at Olympia he and the Chariites had an altar in common. (Schol. ad Pind. Od. v. 10; Paus. iv. 14 in fin.) This circumstance is of great interest, and points out the great change which took place in the course of time in the mode of his worship, for afterwards we find him accompanied in his expeditions and travels by Bacchantic women, called Leneae, Maenades, Thyiaides, Minalones, Clodinces, Basarassae or Basaridies, all of whom are represented in works of art as raging with madness or enthusiasm, in vehement motions, their heads thrown backwards, with dishevelled hair, and carrying in their hands thyrsus-staffs (entwined with ivy, and headed with pine-cones), cymbals, swords, or serpents. Silent, Pans, slyrs, centaurs, and other beings of a like kind, are also the constant companions of the god. (Strab. x. p. 468; Diol. iv. 4; &c. Catull. 64. 236; Athen. iv. 233; Isthm. vii. i. 32. § 7.)

The temples and statues of Dionysus were very numerous in the ancient world. Among the saentices which were offered to him in the earliest times, human sacrifices are also mentioned. (Paus. vii. § 1, ix. § 1.) The animal most commonly sacrificed to Dionysus was a ram. (Virg. Georg. i. 390, 395; Ov. Fast. i. 357.) Among the things sacred to him, we may notice the vine, ivy, laurel, and asphodel; the dolphin, serpent, tiger, lynx, panther, and ass; but he hated the sight of an owl. (Paus. viii. 39. § 4; Theocrit. xxvi. 4; Plut. Sympos. iii. 5; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 67; Virg. Eclog. v. 380, 395; Hygin. Pict. Astr. ii. 26; Philostr. Imag. ii. 17; Vit. Apollon. iii. 40.) The earliest images of the god were mere Hermes with the phallus (Paus. ix. 12. § 3), or his head only was represented. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 166.)

In later works of art he appears in four different forms: 1. As an infant handed over by Hermes to his nurses, or fondled and played with by satyrs and Baccae. 2. As a manly god with a beard, commonly called the Indian Bacchus. He there appears in the character of a wise and dignified oriental monarch; his features are expressive of sublime tranquillity and mildness; his beard is long and soft, and his Lydian robes (βασιλείας) are floating majestically around the head, and a diadem often adorns his forehead. 3. The youthful or so-called Theban Bacchus, was carried to ideal beauty by Praxiteles. His hair floats down in locks, and is sometimes neatly wound round the head, and a diadem often adorns his forehead. 4. As a manly god with a beard, a native of Nicaea, who, as we learn from Aristotle, sent him some valuable presents, which did not arrive, however, till after his death. (Arist. Rhet. ii. 8. § 11; comp. Phil. Ep. ad Ath. p. 160; Dem. Philipp. iii. p. 129, in Ep. Phil. p. 153; Pseudo-Dem. Philipp. iv. p. 140; Dio. xvi. 75; Arr. Anab. ii. 14; Paus. i. 29.)

DIOPHANES (Διόφανης). 1. Of Mytilene, one of the most distinguished Greek rhetoricians of the time of the Gracchi. For reasons unknown to us, he was obliged to quit his native place, and went to Rome, where he instructed Tiberius Gracchus, and became his intimate friend. After T. Gracchus had fallen a victim to the oligarchical faction, Diophanes and many other friends of Gracchus were also put to death. (Cic. Brut. 27; Strab. xiii. p. 617; Plut. T. Gracch. 8, 20.) Another much later rhetorician of the same name occurs in Porphyry’s life of Plotinus.

2. Is quoted as the author of a history of Pontus, in several books. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iii. 241; Eudoc. p. 31.)

DIOPHANES (Διώφανης) a native of Nicaea, in Bithynia, in the first century n. e., who abridged the agricultural work of Cassius Dioynusius for the use of King Deiotarus. (Varr. De Rer Rer. i. 1. 10; Colum. De Re Rer. i. 1. 10; Plin. H. N. Index to lib. viii.) His work consisted of six books, and was afterwards further abridged by Asinus Pollio. (Suid. s. v. Πολλιός.) Diophanes is quoted several times in the Collection of Greek Writers, De Re Rustica.

DIOPHANES MYRINAEUS, the author of a worthless epigram in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anál. ii. 259; Jacob, ii. 236.) Jacob thinks, that he is a late writer, and ought not to be identified with the Diophanes who is mentioned by Cicero and Plutarch as the instructor of Tibesious Graccus, nor with the Diophanes whom Varro mentions. (Jacobs, xiii. 899.) [P. S.]

DIOPHANTUS (Διόφαντος). 1. A native of Arabia, who however lived at Athens, where he was at the head of the sophistical school. He was a contemporary of Procrisius, whom he survived, and whose funeral oration he delivered in A. D. 368. (Eunapius, Diop. p. 127, &c., Procr. p. 109.)

2. An Attic orator and contemporary of Demosthenes, with whom he opposed the Macedonian party. He is mentioned as one of the most eminent speakers of the time. (Dem. de Fils. Leg. pp. 366, 403, 436, c. Lept. p. 498; Harpcrat. and Suid. s. v. Μελακονος.) Reiske, in the Index to Demosthenes, believes him to be the same as the author of the psephisma mentioned by Demosthenes (de Fils. Leg. p. 368), and also identical with the one who, according to Diodorus (xvi. 48), assisted the king of Persia in his Egyptian war, in a. d. 350.

3. Of Lacedaemon, is quoted by Fulgentius (Mythol. i. 1) as the author of a work on Antiquities, in fourteen books, and on the worship of the gods. Whether he is the same as the geographer, Diophantus, who wrote a description of the northern countries (Phal. Bde. Cod. 260, p. 464, b.), which is also quoted by Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἀθεας), or the Diophantus who wrote a work ωρευμ (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ασευμεν), cannot be decided.

4. A slave of Straton, who was manumitted by the will of his master. (Did. Læst. v. 63.) He seems to be the same as the Diophantus mentioned in the will of Lycon. (Id. v. 71.)

5. Of Syragna, a Pythagorean philosopher, who seems to have been an author, for his opinion on the origin of the world is adduced by Theodoretus. (Therop. iv. p. 795.) [L. S.]

DIOPHANTUS (Διόφαντος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy. (Antist. p. 115, 21: φερειν των νυνων ευλ του νυχευν, Διοφαντος Μεναυμενος.) [P. S.]

DIOPHANTUS (Διόφαντος), of Alexandria, the only Greek writer on Algebra. His period is wholly unknown, which is not to be wondered at if we consider that he stands quite alone as to the subject which he treated. But, looking at the impossibility of any mention of such a writer being omitted by Proclus and Pappus, we feel strongly inclined to place him towards the end of the fifth century of our era at the earliest. If the Diophantus, on whose astronomical work (according to Suidas) Hypath wrote a commentary, and whose arithmetic Thon mentions in his commentary on the Almagest, be the subject of our article, he must have lived before the fifth century: but it would be by no means safe to assume this identity. Apollonius, according to Montuich, places him at a. d. 356. The first writer who mentions him, (if it be not Them) is John, patriarch of Jerusalem, in his life of Johannes Damascus, written in the eighth century. It matters not much where we place him, as far as Greek Literature is concerned: the question will only become of importance when we have the means of investigating whether or not he derived his algebra, or any of it, from an Indian source. Celebrooks, as to this matter, is content that Diophantus should be placed in the fourth century. (See the Penny Cyclopaedia, art. Vigo Ganila.)

DIOPHANTUS.

It is singular that, though his date is uncertain to a couple of centuries at least, we have some reason to suppose that he married at the age of 33, and that in five years a son was born of this marriage, who died at the age of 42, four years before his father: so that Diophantus lived to 34. Bachet, his editor, found a problem proposed in verse, in an unpublished Greek anthology, like some of those which Diophantus himself proposed in verse, and composed in the manner of an epitaph. The unknown quantity is the age to which Diophantus lived, and the simple equation of condition to which it leads, given, when solved, the preceding information. But it is just as likely as not that the maker of the epigram invented the dates.

When the manuscripts of Diophantus came to light in the 16th century, it was said that there were thirteen books of the 'Arithmetica;' but no more than six have ever been produced with that title; besides which we have one book, 'De Multangulis Numeris,' on polygonal numbers. These books contain a system of reasoning on numbers by the aid of general symbols, and with some use of symbols of operation; so that, though the demonstrations are very much conducted in words at length, and arranged so as to remind us of Euclid, there is no question that the work is algebraical: not a treatise on algebra, but an algebraical treatise on the relations of integer numbers, and on the solution of equations of more than one variable in integers. Hence such questions obtained the name of Diophantine, and the modern works on that peculiar branch of numerical analysis which is called the theory of numbers, such as those of Gauss and Legendre, would have been said, a century ago, to be full of Diophantine analysis. As there are many classical students who will not see a copy of Diophantus in their lives, it may be desirable to give one simple proposition from that writer in modern words and symbols, annexing the algebraical phrases from the original.

Book i. qu. 30. Having given the sum of two numbers (20) and their product (96), required the numbers. Observe that the square of the half sum should be greater than the product. Let the difference of the numbers be 2t (sto β'); then the sum being 20 (ε) and the half sum 10 (λ), the greater number is found by adding to it the number 10 (τετράδεκτα ωρ η μικρον(επικεφαλής χρήσις καλ μ) and the less will be 10−ε (μνες του ισού, which he would often write μο 1 ο ισος). But the product is 96 (ε) which is also 100−ε² (ρ λειβης δωδεκάς μαρές, or ρ ν μα δα). Hence ε =2 (γενεα ε δός μο β') &c.

A young algebraist of our day might hardly be inclined to give the name of algebraical notation to the preceding, though he might admit that there was algebraical reasoning. But if he had consulted the Hindu or Mahommedan writers, or Cardan, Tartaglia, Stevinus, and the other European algebraists, who preceded Vieta, he would see that he must either give the name to the notation above exemplified, or refuse it to everything which preceded the seventeenth century. Diophantus declines his letters to represent the general term, as we now speak of m or (m+1) t; and μο is an abbreviation of ωοδος or μοιδος, as the case may be.

The question whether Diophantus was an original inventor, or whether he had received a hint from India, the only country we know of which could then have given one, is of great difficulty. We cannot enter into it at length: the very great similarity of the Diophantine and Hindu algebra (as far as the former goes) makes it almost certain that the two must have had a common origin, or have come one from the other; though it is clear that Diophantus, if a borrower, has completely recast the subject by the introduction of Euclid's form of demonstration. On this point we refer to the article of the Penny Cyclopaedia already cited.

There are many paraphrases, so-called translations, and abbreviations of Diophantus, but very few editions. Joseph Auria prepared an edition (Gr. Lat.) of the whole, with the Scholia of the monks Maximus and Philemon on the first two books; but it was never printed. The first edition is that of Xylander, Basle, 1575, folio, in Latin only, with the Scholia and notes. The first Greek edition, with Latin, and original notes, the Scholia being rejected as useless, is that of Bachet de Meziriac, 1621, folio. Fermat left materials for the second and best edition (Gr. Lat.), in which is preserved all that was good in Bachet, and in particular his Latin version, and most valuable comments and additions of his own (it being peculiarly his subject). These materials were collected by J. de Billy, and published by Fermat's son, Toulouse, 1670, folio. An English lady, the late Miss Aubry, prepared an edition with Latin, and original notes, the Scholia being rejected as useless,] of Galen (vol. xii. p. 845; xiii. 507, 605; xiv. 175, 181), and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the second century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

DIOGENES Laërtius, a painter, who is mentioned by Varro with Microm, the contemporary of Polygnotus, in such a manner as to imply that he lived at the same time. The text of the passage, however, is so corrupt, that the name is not made out with certainty. (Varro, L. L. ix. 12, ed. Muller; Micon.) [P. S.]

DIOGENES Laërtius (Διογένης Λαέρτιος). 1. A Byzantine grammarian, a brother of Hipparchus and Nicolaus, and a disciple of Luchares at Athens. He lived in the reign of the emperors Marcianus and Leo. (Suid. s. v. Niκόλαος; Eudoc. p. 309.)

2. Of Cyprus, a sceptic philosopher, and a pupil of Timon. (Diog. Laërt. i. 114, 115.)

3. A disciple of Isocrates, who is said by Atheneus (i. p. 11) to have interpolated the Homeric poems. Sidney (s. v. Οἰσορέτος) attributes to him a work entitled τὸν ἁλικὸν καὶ Οἰσορέτος Βίον, from which a fragment is quoted by Atheneus (i. p. 8 ; comp. Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1270.) The Οἰσορέτος Βίος, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 62) and Atheneus (xi. p. 507), may likewise have been his work, though everything is uncertain. We have further mention of a work on the constitution of Lacedaemon ascribed to Dioscorides (Athen. iv. p. 140; Pint. Lyr. 11, Ages. 85), and of another τὸν ἁλικὸν (Schol. ad Aristoph. A. 1283; Suid. and Phot. s. v. σκῦδας; Eudoc. p. 288), but whether they were the productions of the pupil of Isocrates, or of the Stoic Dioscorides is uncertain.

4. The father of Zeno of Tarsus, the Stoic, who succeeded Chrysippus. The latter dedicated to Dioscorides several of his works, as we learn from Diogenes (vii. 190, 193, 198, 200, 202) and Suidas (s. v. Ζήνος).

5. A writer on astrology, an opinion of whose is quoted by Censorinus. (De Dies Nat. 17; comp. Varro, de l. L. Frang. p. 389, ed. Bipont.) [L. S.]

Dioscorides (Διοκορίδης), the author of thirty-three epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Bruneck, Anal. i. 493 ; Jacobis, i. 244; xiii. 706, No. 142) seems, from the internal evidence of his epigrams, to have lived in Egypt, about the time of Ptolemy Euergetes. His epigrams are chiefly upon the great men of antiquity, especially the poets. One of them (No. 35) would seem, from its title in the Vatican MS., to be the production of a later writer. The epigrams of Dioscorides were included in the Garland of Meleager. (Jacobis, xiii. pp. 806, 807.) [P. S.]

Dioscorides, artists. [Dioscorides.]

Dioscorides (Διοκορίδης ή Διοκορίδης), the name of several physicians and botanical writers, whom it is not easy to distinguish from each other with certainty.

1. Pheidias or Pedanius (Πεδάνιος ή Πεδάνιος) Dioscorides, the author of the celebrated Treatise on Materia Medica, that bears his name. It is generally supposed, says Dr. Bostock, that he was a native of Anazarba, in Cilicia Comestris, and that he was a physician by profession. It appears pretty evident, that he lived in the [first or] second century of the Christian era, and as he is not mentioned by Pliny, it has been supposed that he was a little posterior to him. The exact age of Dioscorides has, however, been a question of much critical discussion, and we have nothing but conjecture which can lead us to decide upon it. He has left behind him a Treatise on Materia Medica, Pehl-Ta'as 'lärqec', in five books, a work of great labour and research, although his general principles (so far as they can be detected) appear to be those of the Dogmatic sect. The greater correctness of modern science, and the new discoveries which have been made, cause it now to be regarded rather as a work of curiosity than of absolute utility; but in drawing up a history of the state and progress of medicine, it affords a very valuable document for our information. His treatise consists of a description of all the articles then used in medicine, with an account of their supposed virtues. The descriptions are brief, and not frequently so little characterized as not to enable us to ascertain with any degree of accuracy to what they refer; while the practical part of his work is in a great measure empirical, although his general principles (so far as they can be detected) appear to be those of the Dogmatic sect. The great importance which was for so long a period attached to the works of Dioscorides, has rendered them the subject of almost innumerable commentaries and criticisms, and even some of the most learned of our modern naturalists have not thought it an unworthy task to attempt the illustration of his Materia Medica. Upon the whole, we must attribute to him the merit of great industry and patient research; and it seems but just to ascribe a large portion of the errors and inaccuracies into which he has fallen, more to the imperfect state of science when he wrote, than to any defect in the character and talents of the writer.
1052 DIOSEORIDES.

His work has been compared with that of Theophrastus, but this seems to be doing justice to neither party, as the objects of the two authors were totally different, the one writing as a scientific botanist, the other merely as a herbalist; and accordingly we find each of these celebrated men superior to the other in his own department.

With respect to the ancient writers on Materia Medica who succeeded Dioscorides, they were generally content to quote his authority without presuming to correct his errors or supply his deficiencies. That part of his work which relates to the plants growing in Greece has been very much illustrated by the late Dr. John Sibthorpe, who, when he elected one of the Radcliffe Travelling Fellows of the University of Oxford, travelled in Greece and the neighbouring parts for the purpose of collecting materials for a "Flora Graecia." This magnificent work was begun after his death, under the direction of the late Sir J. E. Smith (1806), and has been lately finished, in ten volumesfolio, by Professor Lindley. With respect to the plants and other productions of the East mentioned by Dioscorides, much still remains to be done towards their illustration, and identification with the articles met with in those countries in the present day. A few specimens of this are given by Dr. Royle, in his Essay on the Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine" (London 1837), and probably no man in England is more fitted to undertake the task than himself.

Besides the celebrated treatise on Materia Medica, the following works are generally attributed to Dioscorides: Περὶ Δαντὶγτρων Φαρμακῶν, De Venenis; Περὶ Τοξίκων, De Venenatis Animallibus; Περὶ Εὐτροφείων Αἰσθήσεως καὶ Συνθήκων Φαρμάκων, De Facile Parabiliibus tum Simplicibus quern Compositum Medicamentis: and a few smaller works, which are considered spurious. His first work appeared in a Latin translation (supposed to be by Petrus de Abano) in 1478, fol. Collo. In black letter. The first Greek edition was published by Aldus Manutius, Venet. 1499, fol., and is said to be very scarce. Perhaps the most valuable edition is that by J. A. Smemoens, Greek and Latin, Francof. 1558, fol., with a copious and learned commentary. The last edition is that by C. Semplici, in two folio folios. Lips. 1819, 1830, in Greek and Latin, with a useful commentary, forming the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth vols. of Kühn's Collection of the Greek Medical Writers.

The work of Dioscorides has been translated and published in the Italian, German, Spanish, and French languages; there is also an Arabic Translation, which is still in MS. in several European libraries. For further information respecting Dioscorides and the editions of his work, see Lc Clerc, libraries. For further information respecting Dioscorides, a Grammarians at Rome, who, if not actually a physician, appears, at any rate, to have given great attention to medical literature. He lived in the beginning of the second century after Christ, probably in the reign of Hadrian, A. D. 117—138, and superintended an edition of the works of Hippocrates, which was much esteemed. He is, however, accused by Galen of having made considerable alterations in the text, and of changing the old readings and modernizing the language. He was a relation of Artemidorus Capito, another physician, who was a relation of Dioscorides, much still remains to be done towards the Antiquity of Hindoo Medicine (London 1806), and probably no man in England is more fitted to undertake the task than himself.

2. Dioscorides Phacas (Ἀἰτωκόπος), a physician who was one of the followers of Herophilus (Galen, Gloss. Hippocr. proem. vol. xix. p. 63), and was elected Proconsul on account of the moles or freckles on his face. He is probably the same physician who is mentioned by Galen (Gloss. Hippocr. s. v. 'Ισίων, vol. xix. p. 105), and Paulus Aeginatural way, but in such a manner that Pollux was the first born. (Tzet. ad Lyco, 38, 511.) According to others again, Polydences and Helena only were children of Zeus, and Castor was the son of Tyndareus. Hence, Polydences was immortal, while Castor was subject to old age and death like every other mortal. (Pind. Nem. x. 80, with the Schol.; Theocrit. xxiv. 139; Apollod. iii. 10, § 7; Hygin. Fab. 77.) They were born, according to different traditions, at different places, such as Amyclae, mount Taygetus, the island of Peiphnos, or Thalamus. (Theocrit. xxii. 122; Verg. Gens. iii. 10. § 7; Ov. Met. x. 564; Hom. Hymn. xiii. 4; Paus. ii. 1, § 4, 29, § 2.)

The fabulous life of the Dioscuri is marked by three great events: 1. Their expedition against Athens. Theseus had carried off their sister Hellen from Sparta, or, according to others, he had promised Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphares, who had carried her off, to guard her, and he kept her in confinement at Aphidnae, under the superintendence of his mother Aethra. While Theseus was absent from Attica and Mencsthcus was endeavouring to usurp the government, the Dioscuri marched into Attica, and ravaged the country round the city. Academus revealed to them, that Hellen was kept at Amyclae (Herod. l. c. 73), and the Dioscuri took the place by assault.

They carried away their sister Hellen, and Aethra was made their prisoner. (Apollod. l. c.) Menes-theus then opened to them also the gates of Athens, and Aphiadnaus adopted them as his sons, in order that, according to their desire, they might become initiated in the mysteries, and the Athenians paid divine honours to them. (Plut. Theis. 31, &c.; Lycoph. 499.) 2. Their part in the expedition of the Argonauts, as they had before taken part in the Calydonian hunt. (Apollon. Rhod. l. c.; Paus. iii. 24, § 5; Hygin. Fab. 173.) During the voyage of the Argonauts, it once happened, that when the heroes were detained by a vehemence storm, and Orpheus prayed to the Samo-thracian gods, the storm suddenly subsided, and the Dioscuri gave the Argonauts their blessing. (Diod. iv. 43; Plut. de Plat. Philos. ii. 18; Sene. Quest. Nat. l. 1.) On their arrival in the country of the Bebryces, Polydences fought against Amycus, the gigantic son of Poseidon, and conquered him. During the Argonautic expedition they founded the town of Dioscurias. (Hygin. Fab. 175; P. Mela, i. 19; comp. Strab. xii. p. 496; Justin. xiii. 3; Plin. H. N. vi. 5.) 3. Their battle with the sons of Aphares. The Dioscuri were charmed with the beauty of the daughters of Leucippus, Phoebae, a priestess of Athena, and Hilethea or Elaeina, a priestess of Artemis: the Dioscuri carried them off, and married them. (Hygin. Fab. 303; Ov. Fast. iii. 200; Schol. ad Plut. Nem. x. 112.) Polydences became, by Phoebae, the father of Mnesaeus, Mnesinaus, or Asiusus, and Castor, by Hilethea, the father of Anogon, Anaxias, or Aulotheus. (Tzet. ad Lyco, 511.) Once the Dioscuri, in conjunction with Idas and Lynceus, the sons of Aphares, had carried away a herd of oxen from Arcadus, and it was left to Idas to divide the booty. He cut up a bull into four parts, and declared, that whichever of them should first succeed in eating his share should receive half the oxen, and the second should have the other half. Idas, thereupon, not only ate his own quarter, but devoured that of his brother's in addition, and then drove the whole herd to his home in Messene. (Pind. Nem. x. 60; Apollod. iii. 11. § 2; Lycoph. l. c.) The Dioscuri then invaded Messene, drove away the cattle of which they had been deprived, and much more in addition. This became the occasion of a war between the Dioscuri and the sons of Aphares, which was carried on in Messene, or Locaima. In this war, the details of which are related differently, Castor, the mortal, fell by the hands of Idas, but Pollux slew Lynceus, and Zeus killed Idas by a flash of lightning. (Pind. Apollod. l. c.; Tzet. ad Lyco. 1514; Theocrit. xxii. 149; Hygin. Fab. 80, Poet. Astr. ii. 22.) Polydences then returned to his brother, whom he found breathing his last, and he prayed to Zeus, to be permitted to die with him. Zeus left him the option, either to live as his immortal son in Olympus, or to share his brother's fate, and to live, alternately, one day under the earth, and the other in the heavenly abodes of the gods. (Hom. Il. iii. 243; Pind. Nem. x. in fin.; Hygin. Fab. 251.) According to a different form of the story, Zeus rewarded the attachment of the two brothers by placing them among the stars as Gemini. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. l. c.; Schol. ad Eurip. Orust. 469.)

These heroic youths, who were also believed to have reigned as Kings of Sparta (Paus. iii. 1 § 5), received divine honours at Sparta, though not till forty years after their war with the sons of Aphares. (Paus. iii. 13. § 1.) Müller (Dor. ii. 10. § 8) conceives that the worship of the Dioscuri had a double source, viz. the heroic honours of the human Tyndarides, and the worship of some ancient Peloponnesian deities, so that in the process of time the attributes of the latter were transferred to the former, viz. the name of the sons of Zeus, the birth from an egg, and the like. Their worship spread from Peloponnesus over Greece, Sicily, and Italy. (Paus. x. 33. § 3, 38. § 2.) Their principal characteristic was that of soal epwvapés, that is, mighty helpers of man, whence they were sometimes called heroes. (Plut. Thes. 33; Strab. v. p. 239; Aelian, V. H. i. 80, iv. 5; Aristoph. Lycistr. 1301; Paus. i. 31. § 1, viii. 21, in fin.) They were, however, worshipped more especially as the protectors of travellers by sea, for Poseidon had rewarded their brotherly love by giving them power over wind and waves, that they might assist the shipwrecked. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. l. c.; Eurip. Helen. 1611; Hom. Hymn. xiii. 9; Strab. i. p. 48; Horat. Carm. i. 8. 2.) Out of this idea arose that of their being the protectors of travellers in general, and consequently of the law of hospitality also, the violation of which was punished severely by them. (Paus. iii. 16. § 3; Böckh, Expl. ad Pind. p. 135.) Their character asavigyypóds and trwvdravov were combined into one, and both, whenever they did appear, were seen riding on magnificent white steeds. They were further regarded, like Hermes and Heracles, as the presidents of the public games (Pind. Ollilia. 36, Nem. x. 53), and at Sparta their statues stood at the entrance of the race-course. (Paus. iii. 14. § 7.) They were further believed to have invented the war-dance, and warlike music, and poets and bards were favoured by them. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 86; Val. Maxim. i. 8. § 7.) Owing to their warlike character, it was customary at Sparta for the two kings, whenever they went out to war, to be accompanied by symbolic representations of the Dioscuri (Sphēраρ

DIOSCURI.
DIOTIMA.

Diot. of Ant. s. v.), and afterwards, when one king only took the field, he took with him only one of those symbols. (Herod. v. 75.) Sepulchral monuments of Castor existed in the temple of the Dioscuri near Thermopylae (Pind. New. x. 58; Paus. iii. 20. § 1), at Sparta (Paus. iii. 13. § 1; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 5.), and at Argos. (Plint. Quaest. Gr. 23.) Temples and statues of the Dioscuri were very numerous in Greece, though more particularly in Pelofact form the nucleus of that dialogue. Some critics believe, that the whole story of Diotima is a mere fiction of Plato's, while others are inclined to see in it at least some historical foundation, and to regard her as an historical personage. Later Greek writers call her a priestess of the Lycean Zeus, and state, that she was a Pythagorean philosopher who resided for some time at Athens. (Lucian, Ennak. i. 27; Max. Tyr. Dissert. 8; comp. Hermann, Gesch. d. System. d. Platon. Eras. i. p. 523, note 591; Ast. Leben u. Schriften Platon. p. 315.)

DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος). 1. A grammarian of A.d.

DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος). 1. A grammarian of A.d.

DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος). 1. A grammarian of A.d.
DIOTIMUS (Διότιμος), a physician of Thebes, whose absurd and superstitious remedies are quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxvii. 23), and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. [P. S.]

DIOTOMENES (Διοτομήν), a Pythonic philosopher, who wrote a work τεταρτόν, of which three fragments are preserved in Stobaeus (tau. v. 69, xlix. 93, 130), and another τετάρτια, of which two considerable fragments are likewise extant in Stobaeus (xlviii. 61, 62). [L. S.]

DIOTREPHES (Διότρέφης), Thucyd. vii. 64), was sent, n. c. 411, by the oligarchical revolutionists in the Athenian army at Samos, to take charge of the subject states in the neighbourhood of Thrace, and took the first step in pursuance of their policy towards the allies by establishing oligarchy at Thasos. Nicostenus, the general who fell at Mantinea, was son of a Diotrephes (Thuc. iv. 119), which therefore perhaps was a Diotrephes, son of Nicostenus. If so, it is an additional reason for thinking him distinct from Diotrephes, the destroyer of Mycenessus. [DITOPHRESESE.]

DIOTREPHES (Διότρεφης), a rhetorician of high repute in his day (σοφοτάτης ἑπόδους), born at Antioch on the Maeander. Hybrias, who was contemporary with Strabo, was his pupil. (Strab. xiii. p. 630, xiv. p. 659.) [E. E.]

DIOXIPPE, (Διόξιππη), the name of four mythological beings. (Hygin. Fab. 154, 163, 181; Apollod. ii. § 5.) [L. S.]

DIOXIPPUS (Διόξιππος), an Athenian comic poet of the new comedy (Suid. s. a.), wrongly called Dexitippus in another passage of Suidas, and by Eudice (p. 132). Suidas and Eudice mention his Αὐτοπροσωπος, of which a line and a half are preserved by Athenaeus (iii. p. 100, e.), Ἰστοριγράφος (Ath. l. c.), which Vossius conjectures was intended to ridicule the fabulous Greek historians (de Hist. Graec. pp. 433, 434, ed. Westermann), Διαδεδομένου, of which nothing remains, and Φάλαγρος. (Ath. ix. p. 472, b., xi. pp. 496, f., 502, d.) To these must be added, from Suidas and Photius (s. v. Κρυσίων), the Θηριάρχης. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. i. p. 485, iv. pp. 541–543.) [P. S.]

DIOXIPPUS, physician. [DEXITIPPUS.]

DIPHILUS (Διφίλος), commanded the thirty-three Athenian ships which, at the time of the passage of the second armament to Sicily, were posted at Naupactus to prevent, if possible, the transport of reinforcements to the Samians. He was attacked near Erineus by a squadron, chiefly Corinthian, of slightly inferior numbers; and though the victory, in a technical sense, was, if anywhere, on his side, yet he sank but three of the enemy's ships, and had six of his own disabled; and that Phormio's countrymen should, in the scene of his achievements, effect no more, was, as was felt by both parties, a severe moral defeat. (Thuc. vii. 34.) [A. H. C.]

2. One of the principal Athenian comic poets of the new comedy, and a contemporary of Menander and Philonides, was a native of Sinope. (Strab. xii. p. 546; Anon. de Com. pp. xxx. xxxi.) He was a lover of the courteous Grattian, and seems sometimes to have attacked her in his comedies, when under the influence of jealousy. (Machon Cod. ap. Meineke, p. 580, a., 583, f.) He was not, however, perfectly constant. (Aleiph. Ep. i. 37.) He is said to have exhibited a hundred plays (Anon. l. c.), and sometimes to have acted himself. (Athen. xiii. p. 589, f.) Though, in point of time, Diphilus belonged to the new comedy, his poetry seems to have had more of the character of the middle. This is shown, among other indications, by the frequency with which he chooses mythological subjects for his plays, and by his bringing on the stage the poets Archilochus, Hipponax, and Sappho. (Ath. vi. p. 487, n., xiii. p. 599, d.) His language is simple and elegant, but it contains many departures from Attic purity. Respecting his metres, see αυτοκρατορικά (Uet. Crit. p. 444, f.).

The following are the names of Diphilus, of which we have fragments or titles: *Αγώνα (Ath. ix. p. 401, 5, xv. p. 700, d.), which was also ascribed to CALLIADES: *Αράηρ (Ath. xi. p. 499, d. e.; Poll. x. 72; Stob. Flor. ciii. 9); *Αλεξίρα (Eryth. Mag. p. 61, 10), which was also the title of a play of Antiphanes, by others ascribed to Alexis: *Αυστρασ (Suid. s. v. *Αυστρασ) *Ἀφροδιτίκης, of which there was a second edition by Callimachus under the title of *Ερωταῖα or *Ερωτική (Ath. x. p. 496, e., xv. 700, c.; Antiiatticista, pp. 95. 17, 100. 31, 101. 29): the principal character in this play seems to have been such as Pyrgopolines in the *Μῆλος *Γλέωνος of Phatus, which was perhaps taken from the play of Diphilus: *Ανδρόν (Schol. Ver. ad l. f. 127; corrupted in Eryth. Mag. p. 744. 48, and Eustath. p. 740. 30); *Ανασωκούσεως (Ath. xi. p. 499, c.; Antiiatt. p. 84. 25); *Αναστήσεως (Ath. ix. p. 370, e.); *Αποπταίνω, (Harpaecat. p. 41. 3; Antiiatt. p. 101. 10); *Αποστάσεως, also ascribed to Sosippus, whose name is otherwise unknown (Ath. iv. p. 192, c., 133. f.; Poll. x. 12); *Βαλανίων (Ath. x. p. 446, d.; Antiiatt. p. 108. 32); *Βουνίαρχος (Ath. x. p. 417, c.); *Γάιος (Ath. vi. p. 254. e., and perhaps in Diog. Laer. ii. 120, *Διαφόρον should be substituted for *Σεφόρον; see Menagi, ed. loc. and Meineke, Hist. Oeuv. pp. 423, 426); *Διαδώσεως (Erat. gloss. Harpaecat. p. 116); *Διμομαθάωνου (Ath. iii. l. c., e.); *Εγκαταλείφωσεν (Antist. p. 110. 18); *Εχθαρ (Ath. xiv. p. 645, a., and perhaps Poll. x. 72; see Meineke, p. 445); *Εὐφροσυνοφερός (Ath. vi. p. 223, a.); *Εὐλογισμούσα (Antist. p. 100. 12); *Εὐχαρος (Ath. vi. p. 226. c., 227. c., vii. p. 316, f.; Eryth. Mag. p. 490. 40, a gap being supplied from the Cod. Karen. ap. Bekker, Anecd. p. 1445; Harpaecat. p. 130. 22); *Εὐφροσυνίστορες (Ath. iv. p. 165, f.) or *Εὐφροσυνίστορες (Schol. Aristoph. Eq. 909; Photius and Suidas, s. v. *φρονίς); *Εὐφροσύνησας (Poll. x. 137): *Ευφροσύνη, or more correctly *Εὐπρόσωπος (Antist. p. 69); *Εὐπρόσωπος (Poll. x. 69); *Ζηγαφάες (Ath. vi. p. 230, f., viii. p. 291, f.; Stob. Flor. c. v. 5): *Ηρος (Ath. x. p. 431, e.); *Ηρός (Ath. ix. p. 371, a.); *Ομοίαρ (Stob. Flor. xii. 12); * Παρελίσκομαι (Ath. x. p. 458, b.); *Προφητικά (Poll. x. 38. 62); *Σεπρφάρες (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Comm. Graec. pp. 446, 449; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 434, ed. Westermann.); *Σεφόρος (Ath. vi. p. 307, f., comp. iv. p. 168, b.) DIRCIIAS.

5. A grammarian, of Lodicea, wrote upon the Theriaca of Nicander. (Ath. vii. p. 314, d., and in other passages: Casaubon, ad Ath. viii. c. 18, p. 847; Schol. ad Theocr. x. 1, p. 141.)

4. A tragedian, exhibited at Rome in the time of Cicero, whom he grievously offended by applying to Pompey, at the Apollinarian games (B.C. 59), the words " Nicht miseria tu es Magnus," and other allusions, which the audience made him repeat again and again. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 19, § 3; Val. Max. vi. 2, § 9.)

DIPHRIDAS, philosophers. 1. Of Bosphorus, a Megarian philosopher, a disciple of Euphantus and Stilpo. (Diog. Laert. ii. 113.)

2. A Stoic, of Bithynia, son of Demetrius, and contemporary with Panmetis. (Ibid. v. 84.)

3. Another Stoic, surnamed Labyrinthus, the teacher of Zeno, the son of Aristencetus. (Lucian, Contra Varnas, 22.)

DIPHRIDAS, architect, who wrote on mechanical powers. (Vitruv. viii. Pref.) He seems to have been the same who tried the patience of Cicero. (Epist. ad Q. F. iii. 1, 1, iii. 9.)

DIPHRIDAS. 1. A physician of Siphnus, one of the Cyclades, who was a contemporary of Lycyclus, king of Thrace, about the beginning of the third century B.C. (Athen. ii. p. 51.)

He wrote a work entitled, ΠΕΡΙ ΤΟΝ ΠΡΟΦΕΡΕΙΤΩΝ ΤΟΥ ΣΟΥΟΣ ΚΑΙ ΤΟΥ "ΓΕΝΝΗΤΟΥ." " On Diet fit for Persons in good and bad Health" (Athen. iii. §§ 54, p. 82), which is frequently quoted by Athenaeus, but of which nothing remains but the short fragments preserved by him. (I. §§ 51, 54, 55, 56, &c.)

2. A native of Lodicea, in Phrygia, mentioned by Athenaeus (vii. p. 314) as having written a commentary on Nicander's Theriaca, and who must, therefore, have lived between the second century before and the third century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

DIPHRIDAS (Διφρίδας), a Lacedaemonian, was sent out to Asia, in B.C. 391, after the death of Thibron, to gather together the relics of his army, and, having raised fresh troops, to protect the states that were friendly to Sparta, and prosecute the war with Struthus. With manners no less agreeable than those of his predecessor, he had more steadiness and energy of character. He therefore soon retrieved the affairs of Lacedaemon, and, having captured Tigranes, the son-in-law of Struthus, together with his wife, he obtained a large ransom for their release, and was thus enabled to raise and support a body of mercenaries. (Xen. Hell. iv. 8, §§ 21, 22.) Diphilus, the Ephor, who is mentioned by Plutarch (Ages. 17) as being sent forward to meet Aegialus, then at Naucratis in Thessaly, and to desire him to advance at once into Boeotia, b. c. 394. (Comp. Xen. Hell. iv. 3. § 9.) The name Diphilus, as it seems, should be substituted for Diphilas in Diod. xiv. 57. [B. E.]

DIPONENUS and SCYLLIS (Διπόνης καὶ Σκύλλις), very ancient Greek statuaries, who are always mentioned together. They belonged to the style of art called Daedalian. [DAEDALUS.] Pausanias says that they were disciples of Daedalus, and, according to some, his sons. (iii. 15, § 1, iii. 17, § 6.) There is, however, no doubt that they were real persons; but they lived near the end, instead of the beginning, of the period of the Daedalids. Plyn says that they were born in Crete, during the time of the Median empire, and before the reign of Cyrus, about the 50th Olympiad (b. c. 559): the succession of Cyrus was in b. c. 559. From Crete they went to Sicily, which was for a long time the chief seat of Greek art. There they were employed on some statues of the gods, but before those statues were finished, the artists, complaining of some wrong, betook themselves to the Aetolians. The Sicyonians were immediately attacked by a famine and drought, which, they were informed by the Delphic oracle, would only be removed when Dipoenus and Scyllis should finish the statues of the gods, which they were induced to do by great rewards and favours. The statues were those of Apollo, Artemis, Hera, and Athena (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4 § 1), whence it seems likely that the whole group represented the seizure of the tripod, like that of AMYCLAROS. Plyn adds that Ambreia, Argos, and Cleone, were full of the works of Dipoenus. (§ 2.) He also says (§ § 1, 2), that these artists were the first who used the white marble of Paros. (§ 3.) He adds, that they used the white marble of Pauros. Pausanias mentions, as their works, a statue of Athena, at Cleone (l. c.), and at Argos a group representing Castor and Pollux with their wives, Elaeira and Phoebus, and their sons, Anaxis and Musanis. The group was in ebony, except some few parts of the horses, which were of ivory. (Paus. ii. 22, § 6.) Clement of Alexandria mentions these statues of the Dioscuri, and also statues of Hercules of Tyrryn and Artemis of Myanthis, at Sicyon. (Protr. p. 42. 15; comp. Plin. l. c.) The disciples of Dipoenus and Scyllis were Teuthius and Angelion, Leucippos of Dorycleia and his brother Medon, Donatus, and Theocles, who were also disciples of Dipoenians. (Ibid. ii. 32, § 4, iii. 17, § 6, v. 17, § 1, vi. 19, § 9.) [P. S.]

DIRCE (Δηρές), a daughter of Helios and wife of Lycurgus. (Her. 184.)

She is supposed to have been the daughter of Cinyrus, the son of Ismender, and the People of Thessaly. (Hygin. Fab. 98.)

She is said to have had a daughter, named Diophile, who was the mother of Hercules. (Paus. x. 32, § 1.)

DIRCE. (Δηρές), a daughter of Helios and wife of Lycurgus. (Her. 184.)

She is supposed to have been the daughter of Cinyrus, the son of Ismender, and the People of Thessaly. (Hygin. Fab. 98.)

She is said to have had a daughter, named Diophile, who was the mother of Hercules. (Paus. x. 32, § 1.)
DIS, contracted from Dives, a name sometimes given to Pluto, and hence also to the lower world. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 26; Virg. Aen. vi. 127; comp. Plut.)

DIVUS, a physician, who may be supposed to have lived in the fifth century after Christ, and who is introduced by Macrobius in his Saturnalia (vii. 4) as discoursing on dietetics and the process of digestion. [W. A. G.]

DITALCO. [VIRIATHUS.]

DIVES, L. BARBIUS, was praetor in B.C. 189, and obtained the southern part of Spain for his province. On his way thither he was surrounded by Ligurians, who cut to pieces a great part of his forces: he himself was wounded, and escaped to Massilia, where however he died on the third day after. (Liv. xxxvii. 47, 50, 57.) [L. S.]

DIVES, L. CANULEIUS, was appointed praetor in B.C. 171, and obtained Spain for his province. But before he went to his post, several Spanish tribes sent embassies to Rome to complain of the avarice and insolence of their Roman governors. Hereupon L. Canuleius Dives was commissioned to appoint five recruiters of senators' rank to inquire into each particular case of extortion, and to allow the accused to choose their own pleaders. In consequence of the investigations which were thus commenced, two men who had been praetors in Spain withdrew into voluntary exile. The pleaders, probably bribed by the guilty, contrived to suppress the whole inquiry, as men of rank and influence were involved in it. L. Canuleius likewise is not free from the suspicion of having assisted the pleaders, for he joined them in dropping the matter, and forthwith assembled his troops, and proceeded to his province. After his arrival in Spain, another interesting embassy was sent to Rome. Roman armies had for many years been stationed in Spain, and numbers of the soldiers had married Spanish women. At the time when Canuleius was in Spain, the number of persons who had sprung from such marriages is said to have amounted to upwards of 4000, and they now petitioned the senate to assign to them a town, where they might settle. The senate decreed that they should give in their names to Canuleius, and that, if he would manumit them, they were to settle as colonists at Carteia, where they were to form a colonia libertorum. (Liv. xlii. 28, 31, xliii. 2, 3.) [L. S.]

DIVICO, a commander of the Helvetians in the war against L. Cassius, in B.C. 107. Nearly fifty years later, B.C. 58, when J. Caesar was preparing to attack the Helvetians, they sent an embassy to him, headed by the aged Divico, whose courteous speech is recorded by Caesar. (B. G. i. 13; comp. Oros. v. 15; Liv. Epit. 65.) [L. S.]

DIVITIACUS, an Aeduan noble, and brother of Dunnorix, is mentioned by Cicero (de Div. i. 41) as belonging to the order of Druids, and professing much knowledge of the secrets of nature and of divination. He was a warm adherent of the Romans and of Caesar, who, in consideration of his earnest entreaties, pardoned the treason of Dumnorix in B.C. 57, pardoned, at his intercession, the Bellovaci, who had joined with the rest of the Belgians in their conspiracy. (Cass. D. G. i. 3, 16-20, 31, 32, ii. 3, 14, 15, vi. 12, vii. 39; Plut. Cat. 19; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 34, &c.)

DIURPANEUS. [DIOCLETIANUS.]

DIUS, (Διος), a historian of the Phoenicians, of which a fragment concerning Solomon and Hiram is preserved in Josephus. (c. Apion. i. 17.) There was also a Pythagorean philosopher Dius, who wrote a work περί καλοληγιών, of which two fragments are preserved in Stobaeus. (Tit. iv. 16, 17.)

DIYLLES (Διύλλος), an Athenian, who wrote a history of Greece and Sicily in 26 or 27 books. It was divided apparently into several parts, the first of which extended from the seizure of the Delphic temple by Philemela (where the history of Callisthenes ended) to the siege of Perinthus, by Philip (B.C. 357—340), and the second from B.C. 340 to 336, the date of Philip's death. The work was continued by, according to Diodorus, L. Canuleius Dives; but he died in 298, from which period Pison, of Plataea, continued it. If we need to Casaubon's substitution of Αλέξων for Άλέξων, in Diog. Laert. v. 76, we must reckon also a work on drinking-parties among the writings of Diylles. The exact period at which he flourished cannot be ascertained, but he belongs to the age of the Ptolemies.

DIYLLES (Διύλλος), a Corinthian satyr, who, in conjunction with Anyclaus, excelled the greater part of the bronze group which the Phocians dedicated at Delphi. (Paus. x. 13. § 4; Anyclaus; Chionis.) [P. S.]

D'OCIMUS (Δ'Οκίμος), one of the officers in the Macedonian army, who after the death of Alexander supported the party of Perdiccas. After the death of Perdiccas he united with Attalus and Aetaetas, and was taken prisoner together with the former when their combined forces were defeated by Antigonus in Pisisida, n. c. 320. (Diod. xvii. 45, Polyen. iv. 6. § 7.) The captives were confined in a strong fort, but, during the expedition of Antigonus against Eumenes, they contrived to overpower their guards, and make themselves masters of the fortress. Dociimus, however, having quitted the castle to carry on a negotiation with Stattonius, the wife of Antigonus, was again made prisoner. (Diod. xix. 15. 20.) He appears after this to have entered the service of Antigonus, as we find him in 313 B.C. sent by that prince with an army to establish the freedom of the Greek cities in Caria. (Diod. xix. 75; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 358.) In the campaign preceding the battle of Ipsus, he held the strong fortresses of Synnada in Phrygia in charge for Antigonus, but was induced to surrender it into the hands of Lysimachus. (Diod. xx. 107; Pausan. i. 8. § 1.) It is probable that he had been given the command of the jointing district for some time, and he had founded there the city called after him Docimeium. (Steph. Byz. x. s. v., Σωκράτους, Drosen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. p. 665; Eckhel, iii. p. 151.) His name is not mentioned after the fall of Antigonus. [E. H. B.]

DOCIMUS or DOCI'MIUS. To a supposed Graeco-Roman jurist of this name has been sometimes attributed the authorship of a legal work in alphabetical order, called by Harmanopolus (§ 49) Tο μυστηριών κατά στοιχεῖον, and usually known by the name of Synopsis Minor. It is principally borrowed from a work of Michael Attalanta. A fragment of the work relating to the authority of the Leges Rhodiae, was published by S. Scharlusch (Basel 1856), at the end of the Naval Laws, and the same fragment appears in the collection of Leunclavins (J. G. R. ii. p. 472). Pardeissus has published some further fragments of the Synopsis Minor (Collection de Lois Maritime, i. pp. 164, 195—201), and Zachariae has given some extracts from it (Hist. Juv. G. It. p. 76); but the greater part of the work is still in manuscript.

But C. Servilius, the pontifex maximus, before inaugurating him, demanded of him to resign his office of duumvir navalis. When Dolabella refused to obey this command, the pontifex inflicted a fine upon him. Dolabella appealed against it to the people. Several tribes had already given their vote that Dolabella ought to obey, and that he should be released from the fine if he would resign the office of duumvir navalis, when some sign in the heavens broke up the assembly. This was a fresh reason for the pontiff's refusing to inaugurate Dolabella. As duumvir navalis and his colleague, C. Furias, had to protect the eastern coast of Italy with a fleet of twenty sail against the Illyrians. (Liv. xli. 42. ; Suet. Iul. vii.; Brut. de Leg. Agr. ii. 14; Tacit. de Ord. 34; Gellius, xx. 23; Ascon. in Synon. p. 29, in Corneli. p. 73, ed. Orelli.)

DOLFAMELLA, sometimes written Dolabella, the name of a family of the patrician Cornelii gens. (Rubinius, ad Vell. Pat. ii. 43.)

1. P. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA MAXIMUS, was consul in B.C. 263 with Cn. Domitius Calvins, and in that year conquered the Senoncs, who had defeated the praetor L. Cæcilius, and murdered the Roman ambassadors. Owing to the loss of the consular Fasti for that time we do not hear of his triumph, though he undoubtedly celebrated his victory by a triumph. In B.C. 279 he, together with C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius went to Pyrrhus as ambassadors to effect an exchange of prisoners. (Ptol. ii. 6; Florus, i. 13; Appian, Samni. 6; Gall. 11; Dionys. Excerpt., p. 2344, ed. Reiske, and p. 75, ed. Frankfurt.)

2. CN. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, was inaugurated in B.C. 262 as rex sacrorum in the place of M. Marcius, and he held this office until his death in B.C. 189. (Liv. xxvii. 36, xl. 42.)

3. L. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, was duumvir navalis in B.C. 160. In that year his kinsman, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, the rex sacrorum, died, and our Dolabella wanted to become his successor. But C. Servilius, the pontifex maximus, before inaugurating him, demanded of him to resign his office of duumvir navalis. When Dolabella refused to obey this command, the pontifex inflicted a fine upon him. Dolabella appealed against it to the people. Several tribes had already given their vote that Dolabella ought to obey, and that he should be released from the fine if he would resign the office of duumvir navalis, when some sign in the heavens broke up the assembly. This was a fresh reason for the pontiff's refusing to inaugurate Dolabella. As duumvir navalis and his colleague, C. Furias, had to protect the eastern coast of Italy with a fleet of twenty sail against the Illyrians. (Liv. xl. 42; xli. 5.)

4. CN. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, was curule tribune in B.C. 165, in which year he and his colleague, Sex. Julius Caesar, laid the Heereyn of TreFLASHLIP at the festival of the Megalas. In B.C. 159 he was consul with M. Fulvius Nobilior. (Title of Terent. Heeyp.; Suet. Vit. Ter.vent. 5.)

5. CN. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, a grandson of No. 4, and a son of the Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, who was put to death in B.C. 100, together with the tribune Appuleius Saturninius. During the civil war between Marius and Sulla, Dolabella sided with the latter, and in B.C. 81, when Sulla was dictator, Dolabella was raised to the consulship, and afterwards received Macedonia for his province. He there carried on a successful war against the Thracians, for which he was rewarded on his return with a triumph. In B.C. 77, however, young Julius Caesar charged him with having been guilty of extortion in his province, but he was acquitted. (Oras. v. 17; Plat. Sulla, 26; Appian, B. C. i. 100; Suet. Cæs. 4, 49, 53; Vell. Pat. ii. 49; Aureo. Vict. de War. 85; Val. Max. viii. 9; 99 2.95. 192; Tacit. in Pison. 75; in Pis. Leg. Agr. 34; Tacit. de Ord. 34; Gallius, xx. 28; Ascon. in Synon. p. 29, in Cornel. p. 73, ed. Orelli.)

6. CN. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, was praetor urbannus, in B.C. 81, when the cause of P. Quintius was tried. Cicero charges him with having acted on that occasion unjustly and against all established usages. The year after he had Cicilia for his province, and C. Malleolius was his quaestor, and the notorious Verres his legate. Dolabella not only tolerated the extortions and robberies committed by them, but shared in their booty. He was especially indulgent towards Verres, and, after Malleolus was murdered, he made Verres his proconsul. After his return to Rome, Dolabella was accused by M. Aemilius Scarrna of extortion in his province, and on that occasion Verres not only deserted his accomplice, but furnished the accuser with all the necessary information, and even spoke himself publicly against Dolabella. Many of the crimes committed by Verres himself were thus put to the account of Dolabella, who was therefore condemned. He went into exile, and left his wife and children behind him in great poverty. (Cic. pro Quint. 2. 8; in Verr. i. 4, 15, 17, 29; Ascon. in Cornel. p. 110, ed. Orelli, who however confounds him with No. 5.)

7. P. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, was praetor urbannus, in B.C. 67; if is usually supposed, this be the year in which Cicero spoke for Aulus Cociina. (Cic. pro Coci. 8.) He seems to be the same person as the Dolabella who is mentioned by Valerius Maximus, (viii. 1, Ambuscas, § 2,) as governor of Asia, with the title of proconsul. (Comp. Gall. ii. 7, where he bears the praenomen Cocius; Amm. Marc. xxix. 8.)

8. P. CORNELIUS DOLFAMELLA, perhaps a son of No. 7, was one of the most profligate men of his time. He was born about B.C. 70, and is said to have been guilty, even in early youth, of some capital offences, which might have cost him his life, had not Cicero defended and saved him with great exertions. In B.C. 31, he was appointed a member of the college of the quindecimviri, and the year following he accused Appius Claudius of having violated the sovereign rights of the people. While this trial was going on, Fabius, the wife of Dolabella, left her husband. She had been compelled to take this step by the conduct of her husband, who, hoped by a marriage with Tullia, the daughter of Cicero, to prevent Cicero from assisting App. Claudius in his trial by favourable testimonies from Cilicia. Cicero himself, on the other hand, was anxious to oblige App. Claudius, and was therefore by no means inclined to give his own daughter in marriage to the accuser of Claudius; he had, besides, been contemplating to bring about a marriage between Tullia and Tib. Claudius Nero. But Cicero's wife was gained by Dolabella, and, before Cicero could interfere, the engagement was made, and the marriage soon followed. Cicero seems to have been grieved by the affair, for he knew the vicious character of his son-in-law; but Clodius endeavoured to console him by saying, that the vices of Dolabella were mere youthful ebullitions, the time of which was now gone by; and that if there remained any traces of them, they would soon be corrected by Cicero's influence, and the virtuous conduct of Tullia. App. Claudius was acquitted in the mean time, and as thus the great outward obstacle was removed, Cicero tried to make the best of what he had been unable to prevent. In his letters written about that time, and afterwards, Cicero speaks of Dolabella with admiration and affection, and he may have really hoped that his son-in-law would improve; but the consequences of his former recklessness and licentiousness, even if he had wished to mend, drove him to new acts of the same kind. The great amount of debts which he had contracted, and the urgent demands of his creditors, compelled him in c. 49 to seek refuge in the camp of Caesar. This was a severe blow to Cicero, who speaks of the step with great sorrow. When Caesar marched into Spain against Pompey's legates, Dolabella had the command of Caesar's fleet in the Adriatic, but was unable to effect anything of consequence. After the battle of Pharsalus, in which he had taken a part, Dolabella returned to Rome. He was accordingly made tribune in the time of his consulship had come to its close. But he did not proceed straightway to Syria; for, being greatly in want of money, he marched through Greece, Macedonia, Thrace, and Asia Minor, collecting services, or that proscriptions, like those of Sulla, had been compelled to take this step by the conspiracy of Cassius and Brutus; but no sooner did Antony open the treasury to Dolabella, and give him Syria for his province, with the command against the Parthians, than all his republican enthusiasm disappeared at once. As Cassius had likewise a claim to the province of Syria, Dolabella left Rome before the year of his consulship had expired. He had hoped that Caesar would liberally reward his services, or that proscriptions, like those of Sulla, would afford him the means of obtaining money; but in vain. His creditors were as loud and troublesome in their demands as before, and he at last had recourse to a new expedient. He caused himself to be adopted into the plebeian family of Cn. Lentulus—in whose he is afterwards sometimes called Lentulus—in order to be able to obtain the tribuneship. He was accordingly made tribune in c. 48; and, in spite of the decree of the senate, that everything at Rome should remain unchanged till Caesar's return from Alexandria, Dolabella came forward with a petition, that all debts should be cancelled, and with some other measures of a similar character. His colleagues, Asinius and L. Trebellius, opposed the scheme, and vehement and bloody struggles ensued between the two parties which were thus formed at Rome. Antony, who had been left behind by Caesar as his vicegerent, and bore no hostility towards Dolabella, did not take any strong measures against him till he was informed of an amour existing between his wife Antonia and Dolabella. The day on which Dolabella's rogations were to be put to the vote, a fresh tumult broke out in the city, in which the party of Dolabella was defeated; but peace was nevertheless not quite restored till the autumn, when Cae-Cicero, who certainly loved him when she was expecting to become mother of a second child by him. It is difficult to account for this mode of acting on the part of Cicero, unless we suppose that his desire to keep upon good terms with a man who possessed influence with Caesar outweighed all other considerations. Cicero's fondness for him continued for a short time after Caesar's murder, that is, so long as Dolabella played the part of a republican; but a change took place in Cicero's feelings as soon as Dolabella allied himself with Antony, and at the time when his crimes in Asia became known, Cicero spoke of him with clemency. Vitellius, too, became alarmed through great distance, and at which the Argonauts landed and offered up sacrifices. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 584 ; Orph. Arg. 459.) There are two other mythical personages of this name. (Hom. Il. xvi. 525, &c., Hygin. Fab. Proef. p. 2.)

DOMITIA, a sister of Cn. Domitian Ahenobarbus [Ahenobarbus, No. 10], and consequently an aunt of the emperor Nero. She was the wife of Crispus Passienus, who, as the gods of marriage, were believed to conduct the bride into the house of the bridegroom. (August. de Civ. Dei, vi. 8, ix. 6.)

DOMITIA LEPIDA, a sister of Cn. Domitian Ahenobarbus [Ahenobarbus, No. 10], and of Domitia, and, consequently, like her an aunt of the emperor Nero. She was married to M. Valerius Messalla Barbatus, by whom she became the mother of Messallina, the wife of the emperor Claudius. There existed a rivalry of female vanity between her and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. Both women were equally bad and vicious in their conduct; Agrippina however succeeded, in a. d. 55, in inducing her son to sentence his aunt to death. (Tac. Ann. xi. 37, &c., xii. 64, &c.; Suet. Claud. 26, Nov. 7.)

DOMITIA INGINA, a daughter of Domitian Corbulo, was married to L. Lania Aemilius, from whom she was carried away by Domitian about the time of Vespasian's accession. Immediately after Vespasian's return from the east, Domitian lived with her and his other mistresses on an estate near the Mons Albanus. Subsequently, however, he married her, and in a. d. 73 she bore him a son. But she was unfaithful to him, and kept up an adulterous intercourse with Paris, an actor. When this was discovered, in a. d. 83, Domitian repudiated her on the advice of Ursus, and henceforth lived with Julia, the daughter of his brother. Soon after, however, he formed a reconciliation with Domitia, because he said the people wished it; but he nevertheless continued his intercourse with Julia. Domitia never loved Domitia, and she knew of the conspiracy against his life; as she was informed that her own life was in danger, she urged the conspirators on, and Domitian was murdered in a.d. 96. (Dion Cass. iv. 3, ivii. 3, 15; Suet. Domit. 3, 22.) The coin annexed contains on the obverse the head of Domitia, with the legend Domitia Augusta. From the inscription reads as follows:

"DOMITIA gens, plebeian, the members of which towards the end of the republic were looked upon as belonging to one of the most illustrious gentes. (Cic. Phil. l. ii. 29; Plin. H. N. vii. 57; Val. Max. vi. 2, § 8.) During the time of the republic, we meet with only two branches of this gens, the Areobard and Calvinii, and, with the exception of a few unknown personages mentioned in isolated passages of Cicero, there is none without a cognomen. [L. S.]

DOMITIANUS, or with his full name T. Flavius Domitianus Augustus, was the younger of Vespasian's sons by his first wife Domitia. He succeeded his elder brother Titus as emperor, and reigned from a.d. 81 to 96. He was born at Rome, on the 24th of October, a.d. 52, the year in which his father was consul designate. Suetonius relates that Domitian in his youth led such a wretched life, that he never used a silver vessel, and that he prostituted himself for money. The position which his father then occupied precludes the possibility of ascribing this mode of life to poverty; and, if the account be true, we must attribute this conduct to his bad natural disposition. When Vespasian was proclaimed emperor, Domitian, who was then eighteen years old, happened to be at Rome, where he and his friends were persecuted by Vitellius; Sabinius, Vespasian's brother, was murdered, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that Domitian escaped from the burning temple of the capitol, and concealed himself until the victory of his father's party was decided. After the fall of Vitellius, Domitian was proclaimed Caesar, and obtained the city praetorship with consular power. As his father was still absent in the east, Domitian and Mucianus under¬took the administration of public affairs, although he was invested with the consulship seven times during the reigns of his father and brother. The early death of Titus, in a.d. 81, was in all probability the work of Domitian. Suetonius states that Domitian ordered the sick Titus to be left entirely without a cognomen : Domitian hated his brother, and made several attempts upon his life. Titus behaved with the utmost forbearance towards him, but followed the example of his father in not allowing Domitian to take any part in the administration of public affairs, although he was invested with the consulship seven times during the reigns of his father and brother. The early death of Titus, in a.d. 81, was in all probability the work of Domitian. Suetonius states that Domitian ordered the sick Titus to be left entirely alone, before he was quite dead; Dion Cassius says that he accelerated his death by ordering him while in a fever to be put into a vessel filled with snow; and other writers plainly assert, that Titus was poisoned or murdered by Domitian.

On the ides of September, a.d. 81, the day on which Titus died, Domitian was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. During the first years of his reign he continued, indeed, to indulge in strange passions, but Suetonius remarks that he manifested a pretty equal mixture of vices and virtues. Among the latter we must mention, that he kept a very strict superintendence over the governors of provinces, so that in his reign they are said to have been juter than they ever were afterwards. He also enacted several useful laws: he forbade, for example, the castration of male children, and restricted the increasing cultivation of the vine, whereby the growth of corn was neglected. He endeavoured to correct the frivolous and licentious conduct of the higher classes, and shewed great liberality and moderation on many occasions. He further took an active part in the administration of justice; which conduct, praised by Cicero and Pliny, who esteemed it a great duty to prevent the crimes of the people. He openly made justice the slave of his cruelty and tyranny; for, during the latter years of his reign he acted as one of the most cruel tyrants that ever disgraced a throne, and as Suetonius remarks, his very virtues were turned into vices. The cause of this change in his conduct appears, independent of his natural bias for what was bad, to have been his boundless ambition, injured vanity, jealousy of others, and cowardice, which were awakened and roused by the failure of his undertakings and other occurrences of the time. In A.D. 54 he undertook an expedition against the Chatti, which does not seem to have been altogether unsuccessful, for we learn from Frontinus (Strateg. l. 3), that he constructed the frontier wall between the free Germans and those who were subject to Rome, so that he must at any rate have succeeded in confining the barbarians within their own territory. After his return to Rome he celebrated a triumph, and assumed the title of Germanicus. In the same year Agricola, whose success and merits excited his jealousy, was recalled to Rome on the pretence of the purpose of celebrating a triumph; but he was never sent back to his post, which was given to another person.

The most dangerous enemy of Rome at that time was Decebalus, king of the Dacians. Domitian himself took the field against him, but the real management of the war was left to his generals. Simultaneously with this war another was carried on against the Marcomanni and Quadi, who had refused to furnish the Romans with the assistance against Decebalus, which they were bound to do by a treaty. The Romans were defeated by them, and the consequence was, that Domitian was obliged to conclude peace. with Decebalus on very humiliating terms. A.D. 87. [DECEBALUS.] Another dangerous occurrence was the revolt of L. Antonius in Upper Germany; but this storm was luckily averted by an unexpected overflow of the Rhine over its banks, which prevented the German auxiliaries, whom Antonius expected, from joining him; so that the rebel was easily conquered by L. Appius Norbanus, in A.D. 91. An insurrection of the Nasamones in Africa was of less importance, and was easily suppressed by Faccus, the governor of Numidia.

But it is the cruelty and tyranny of Domitian that have given his reign an unenviable notoriety. His natural tendencies burst forth with fresh intensity after the Dacian war. His fear and his injured pride, and vanity, led him to delight in the misfortunes and sufferings of those whom he hated and envied; and the most distinguished men of the time, especially among the senators, had to bleed for their excellence; while, on the other hand, he tried to win the populace and the soldiers by large donations, and by public games and fights in the circus and amphitheatre, in which even women appeared among the gladiators, and in which he himself took great delight.

For the same reason he increased the pay of the soldiers, and the sums he thus expended were obtained from the rich by violence and murder; and when in the end he found it impossible to obtain the means for paying his soldiers, he was obliged to reduce their number. The provinces were less subject to Rome, so that he must at any rate have made himself less accessible to the Christians also. As in all similar cases, the tyrant's own cruelty brought about his ruin. Three officers of his court, Parthenius, Sigerius, and Entellus, whom Domitian intended to put to death (this secret was betrayed to them by Domitia, the emperor's wife, who was likewise on the list), formed a conspiracy against his life. Stephanus, a freedman, who was employed by the conspirators, contrived to obtain admission to the emperor's bed-room, and gave him a letter to read. While Domitian was perusing the letter, in which the conspirators' plot was revealed to him, Stephanus plunged a dagger into his abdomen. A violent struggle ensued between the two, until the other conspirators arrived. Domitian fell, after having received seven wounds, on the 18th of September, A.D. 96. Apollonius of Tyana, who was then at Ephesus, at the moment Domitian was murdered at Rome, is said to have run across the market-place, and to have exclaimed, "That is right, Stephanus, slay the murderer!"

There are few rulers who better deserve the name of a cruel tyrant than Domitian. The last three years of his reign form one of the most frightful periods that occur in the history of man; but he cannot be called a brutal monster or a madman like Caligula and Nero, for he possessed talent and a cultivated mind; and although Pliny and Quintilian, who place his poetical productions by the side of those of the greatest masters, are obviously guilty of servile flattery, yet his poetical works cannot have been entirely without merit. His fondness and esteem for literature arc attested by the quinquennial contest which he instituted in honour of the Capitolinc Jupiter, and one part of which consisted of a musical contest. Both prose writers and poets in Greek as well as in Latin received their productions, and the victors were rewarded with golden crowns. He further instituted the pension for distinguished rhetoricians, which Quintilian enjoyed; and if we look at the comparatively flourishing condition of Roman literature during that time, we cannot help thinking that it was, at least in great measure, the consequence of the influence which he exercised, and of the encouragement which he afforded. It is extremely probable that we still possess one of the literary productions of Domitian in the Latin paraphrase of Aratus's Phaenomena, which is usually attributed to Germanicus, the grandson of Augustus. The arguments for this opinion have been clearly set forth by Rutgersius (Var. Locd. iii. p. 276), and it is also adopted by Niebuhr. (Tac. Hist. iii, 59, &c., iv. 2, &c., Apric. 29, 42, 48; Suet. Domit. i. 35; Dion Cass. lib. xvi. and xvi.; Juvenal, Satdr. 1. Quintil. iv. 1. § 2, &c., x. 1. § 91, &c.; Niebuhr, Lectures on Roman Hist. ii. pp. 294-295.) [L. S.]

DOMITIUS, L. DOMITIUS. A few coins are extant in second brass, which exhibit on the obverse a laurell'd head, with the legend, IMP. C. L. DOMITIUS. DOMITIAN. AVG.; on the reverse, the representation of a Genius, with GEMINO POPULI ROMANI, and below, the letters ALRE, indicating that they were struck at Alexandria. We find also a very rare Alexandrian third brass, with a rayed head, and the words DOMITIANOC. CEB. These pieces have been generally supposed to belong to the Domitians mentioned by Trebellius Pollio, as the general who vanquished the two Macrini, who is described as a man of lofty ambition, deducing his origin from the son of Vespasian, and is believed to be the same with the Domitianus put to death by Aurelianus, according to Zosimus, in consequence of a suspicion that he was meditating rebellion. Eckhel, however, has demonstrated, from numismatical considerations, that the Latin medals, at least, cannot be earlier than the epoch of Diocletian, or his immediate successors, and therefore must commemorate the usurpation of some pretender unknown to history. (Trebell. Poll. Calam. duo, c. 2; Trigint. Tyrann. c. 12; Zosim. i. 49; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 41.) [W. R.]

DOMITILLA, FLAVIA. 1. The first wife of Vespasian, by whom he had three children, Titus, Domitian, and a daughter Domitilla. She had originally been the mistress of a Roman eques, Statilius Capella, and a freedwoman. Subsequently however she received the Latianus and was at last imperatrix. She as well as her daughter died before Vespasian was proclaimed emperor. (Suet. Vesp. 3.) Her portrait is given in the coin annexed, which was struck after her death.

2. The wife of Flavius Clemens. [Clemens, T. Flavius.] Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. viii. 25) calls her a sister of the emperor Domitian, which is impossible, as Domitilla, the sister of Domitian, had died even before Vespasian's accession. Dion Cassius (lvi. 14) calls her merely a μυστερική of Domitian, and it has been conjectured that in Philostratus we must read διακρητή instead of διακρητή. It may be that our Domitilla was a daughter of Vespasian's daughter of the same name. After the murder of her husband Clemens, Stephanus, the freedman and murderer of Domitian, was her procurator. DOMNA, JU'TILA, daughter of Bassianus, wife of the emperor Septimius Severus, mother of Caracalla and Geta, grand-aunt of Elagabalus and Alexander. (See the stemma of Caracalla.) Born of obscure parents in Emaus, she attracted the attention of her future husband long before his elevation to the purple, in consequence, we are told, of an astrol-ogical prediction, which declared that she was destined to be the wife of a sovereign. Already cherishing ambitious hopes, and trusting implicitly to the infallibility of an art in which he possessed no mean skill, Severus, after the death of Marcius, wedded the humble Syrian damsel, with no other dowry than her horoscope. The period at which this union took place has been a matter of controversy among chroniclers, since the statements of ancient authorities are contradictory and irreconciliable. Following Dion Cassius as our surest guide, we conclude that it could not have been later than A. D. 175, for he records that the marriage couch was spread in the temple of Venus, adjoining the palatium, by the empress Faustina, who in that year quitted Rome to join M. Aurelius in the east, and never returned. Julia, being gifted with a powerful intellect and with a large measure of the udroit cunning for which her countrywomen were so celebrated, exercised at all times a powerful sway over her superstitious husband, persuaded him to take up arms against Pescennius Niger and Clodius Albinus, thus pointing out the direct path to a throne, and after the prophecy had been completely fulfilled, maintained her dominion unimpaired to the last. At one period, when hard pressed by the emnity of the all-powerful Philippus, she is said to have devoted her time almost exclusively to philosophy. By her commands Philostratus undertook to write the life of Apollonius, of Tyana, and she was wont to pass whole days surrounded by troops of grammarians, rhetoricians, and sophists. But if she studied wisdom she certainly did not practise virtue, for her profligacy was a matter of common notoriety and reproach, and she is said even to have conspired against the life of her husband, who from gratitude, weakness, fear, or apathy, quietly tolerated her enormities. After his death, her influence became greater than ever, and Caracalla entrust the most important affairs of state to her administration. At the same time, she certainly possessed no control over his darker passions, for it is well known that he murdered his own brother, Geta, in her arms, and when she ventured to give way to grief for her child, the fraticide was scarcely withheld from turning the dagger against his mother also. Upon learning the successful issue of the rebellion of Macrinus, Julia at first resolved not to survive the loss of her son and of her dignities, but having been kindly treated by the conqueror, she for a while indulged in bright anticipations. Her proceedings, however, excited a suspicion that she was tampering with the troops; she was abruptly commanded to return to Rome, and, in a formal resolution, she abstained from food, and perished. A. D. 217. Her body was transported to Rome, and deposited in the sepulchre of Caius and Lucius Cæsar, but afterwards removed by her sister, DOMNINIUS.

Mammaea, along with the bones of Geta, to the cemetery of the Antonines. There can be little doubt that Donma was her proper Syrian name, analogous to the designations of Maco, Soemarias, and Manemaco, borne by other members of the same family. The idea that it is to be regarded as a contraction for domina, and was employed because the latter would have been offensive to a Roman ear, scarcely requires refutation. (See Reimarus on Dion Cass. lxxiv. 3.)

One accusation, of the foulest description, has been brought against this princess by several ancient historians. Spartianus and Aurelius Victor expressly affirm that Julia not only formed an incestuous connexion with Caracalla, but that they were positively joined in marriage: the story is repeated by Eutropius and Orosius also, while Herodian hints at such a report (iv. 16), when he relates that she was nicknamed Jocasta by the licentious rabble of Alexandria. But the silence of Dion Cassius, who was not only alive, but occupied a prominent public station during the whole reign, on the subject, is a sufficient reason for rejecting the tale altogether. It is absolutely impossible that he should have been ignorant of such a rumour, if actually in circulation, and it is equally certain, from the tone of his narrative, that he would not have suppressed it had it been deserving of the slightest credit. On the other hand, the vouchers for the fact are in themselves totally destitute of authority upon all points which admit of doubt or controversy, and in the present case were so ill-informed as to suppose that Julia was only the step-mother of Caracalla. COIN OF DOMNA JULIA.

2. Of Laodiceia, in Syria, was a disciple of Syrianus, and a fellow-pupil of Proclus the Lyceian, and must, therefore, have flourished about the middle of the fifth century after Christ. He appears to have been peculiarly bigoted to his own opinions, and is said to have corrupted the doctrines of Plato by mixing up with them his private notions. This called forth a treatise from Proclus, intended as a statement of the genuine principles of Platonism (Πραγματεια καταρκτικα τοι των θεωρηματων τοι το Παλατωνος), a work which Fabricius, apparently by an oversight, ascribes to Dominus himself. (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 171; Damasc. op. Suet. s. v. Δομνίνος.)

DOMNINUS (Domninus, Domnus). 1. A Graeco-Roman jurist, who probably flourished shortly before Justinian, or in the commencement of that emperor's reign. He may be the same person who was addressed a rescript of the emperor Zeno. (Basil. vii. p. 711, Cod. 10, tit. 3, s. 7.) He was a commentator upon the Gregorian, Hortogenian, and Theodosian Codes. (Reis, ed Theophylact, pp. 1243, 1245. Theodorus, a contemporary of Justinian, calls him his "very learned teacher" (Basil. vi. p. 217); but Zacharias imagines that Domininus could scarcely have been, in a literal sense, the teacher of Theodorus, who survived Justinian, and lived under Tiberius. (Zacharias, Anecdota, p. xlviii.) By Suarex (Notit. Basili. § 42), Domininus is called Leo Domininus; but this seems to be a mistake. (Assemian, Bibl. Jur. Orient. lib. ii. c. 20, p. 405.) By Nic. Comp., the same writer, (Domninus, Surius, pp. 372, 402), a Domininus, Nonius, Jctus, is quoted as having commented upon the Novellae Constitutions of Constantinus and Leo; but the untrustworthiness of Papadopoli, in this case, is exposed by Heinbach. (Anecdota, i. p. 222.)

The names Donmas and Dominus are sometimes confounded in manuscripts. They are formed from the word Dominus, and, like other words denoting title (as Petricus), became converted into family names. (Menage, Ann. Jur. p. 171.)

A jurist Dominus is mentioned by Libanius, who addressed letters to him. (Liban. Ep. iii. 277, 1124, ed. Wolff.)

[J. T. G.]

DOMNUS [Domninus].

DOMNUS (Δομνίνος), is mentioned in the Commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates that are incorrectly attributed to Orbihasius (p. 8, ed. Basili. 1533), as having written a commentary on this work. He was probably quite a late author, perhaps living in the fifth or sixth century after Christ; but it is uncertain whether he was the same person as either of the following physicians of the same name.

2. A Jewish physician, the tutor to Gesius, in the fourth century after Christ, by whom his own reputation was eclipsed, and his pupils enticed away. (Suid. s. v. Ætorus.)

3. A heathen physician at Constantinople, in the fourth century after Christ, of whose death, in the time of the plague, an account is given by St. Ephraem Syrus. (Opera, vol. i. p. 124, ed. Rom. 1859, ed.)

DONATIUS VALENS. [Valens].

DONATUS, was bishop of Casa Nigrum, in Numidia, in the early part of the fourth century (A. D. 312), and from him, together with another prelate of the same name, the successor of Majorinius in the disputed election to the see of Carthage, the Donatists derived their appellation. This was the first important schism which distracted the Christian church; and, although in a great measure confined within the limits of Africa, proved, for three centuries, the source of great confusion,andalsobloody. The circumstances which gave rise to the division, and the first steps in the dispute, are given in another article. [Cassellius.] Condemned, punished, but eventually tolerated by Constantine, fiercely persecuted by Constan-}

oration Urbi Romea, was a celebrated grammarian and rhetorician, who taught at Rome in the middle of the fourth century, and was the preceptor of Saint Jerome. His most famous work is a system of Latin Grammar, which has formed the groundwork of most elementary treatises upon the same subject, from the period when he flourished down to our own times. It has usually been published in the form of two or more distinct and separate tracts: 1. Ars s. Editio Prima, de literis, spoliis, pellibus, et tonis; 2. Editio Secundia, de octo partibus arcanis; to which are commonly annexed, De barbarizno; De solemnibus; De consistencia; De metaphysica; De schematismis; De tropis; but in the recent edition of Lindemann these are all more correctly considered as constituting one connected whole, and are combined under one general title, taken from the Sasanian MS. preserved in the Royal Library of Berlin, Donati Ars Grammatica tribus libris comprehensive. It was the common school-book of the middle ages; insomuch, that in the English of Longlande and Chaucer a donat or donet is equivalent to a lesson of any kind, and hence came to mean an introduction in general. Thus among the works of Bishop Pecock are enumerated The Donat into Christian religion, and The Flower to the Donat, while Gravere quotes an old French proverb, Les diables cestoient encore leur Donat, i. e. The devils were but yet in their grammar. These, and other examples, are collected in Warton's History of English Poetry, sect. viii.

In addition to the Ars Grammatica, we possess introductions (enarrationes) and scholia, by Donatus, to five out of the six plays of Terence, those to the Hautontimorumenos having been lost. The prefaces contain a succinct account of the sources from which each piece was derived, and of the class to which it belongs; a statement of the time at which it was exhibited; notices respecting the distribution of the characters; and sundry particulars connected with stage technicalities. The commentaries are full of interesting and valuable remarks and illustrations of the grammar, contradictions, and, above all, the absurd and puerile traits here and there foisted in, it is manifest that they have been unmercifully interpolated and corrupted by later and less skilful hands. Some critics, indeed, have gone so far as to believe that Donatus never committed his observations to writing, and that these scholia are merely scraps, compiled from the notes of pupils, of dictata or lectures delivered viv voce; but this idea does not well accord with the words of St. Jerome in the first of the passages to which a reference is given at the end of this article.

Servius, in his annotations upon Virgil, refers, in upwards of forty different places, to a Donatus, who must have composed a commentary upon the Eclogues, Georgics, and Aeneid. "Scholia in Aeneida" bearing the name of Donatus, and corresponding, for the most part, with the quotations of Servius, are still extant, but, from their inferior tone and character, have been generally ascribed to Tibullus Claudius Donatus, who is noticed below. They are divided into twelve books, to which a supplemental thirteenth was to have been added; the concluding portions of the fourth and eighth, and the commencement of the sixth and twelfth, are wanting. Their chief object is to point out the beauties and skill of the poet, rather than to explain his difficulties; but the writer, in a letter subjoined to the twelfth book, announces his intention, about a life already far advanced be prolonged, of compiling, from ancient authorities, a description of the persons, places, herbs, and trees, enumerated in the poem.

The popularity of the "Ars Grammatica," especially of the second part, "De octo partibus Orationis," is sufficiently evinced by the prodigious number of editions which appeared during the infancy of printing, most of them in gothic characters, without date, or name of place, or of printer, and the typographical history of no work, with the exception of the Scriptures, has excited more interest among bibliographers, or given them more trouble. Even before the invention of printing from movable types, several editions seem to have been thrown off from blocks, and fragments of these have been preserved in various collections. The three parts will be found in the collection of Putschius (Grammaticae Latinae Autorum Antiquarum, Hanov. 4to. 1605), together with the commentary of Sergins on the præma and secunda edition; and that of Servius Marcius Honoratus, on the secunda edition only (see pp. 1735, 1743, 1757, 1773, 1829); and also in Lendner's "Corpus Grammaticorum Latinorum Veterum," vol. i. Lips. 1831.

Of the commentary on Terence, at least four editions, separate from the text, appeared during the fifteenth century. That which is believed to be the first is a folio, in Roman characters, without place, date, or printer's name, but was probably published at Cologne, about 1470—1472; the second at Venice, by Spira, fol. 1472; the third at Rome, by Sweynheym and Pannartz, fol. 1472; the fourth at Milan, by Zarotus, fol. 1476. It will be found attached to all complete editions of the dramatist.

The commentaries upon the Aeneid were first discovered by Jo. Jovianus Pontanus, were first published from the copy in his library, by Seipio Capucius, Neap. fol. 15, 15, and were inserted by G. Fabricius in the "Corpus Interpretum Virgilianorum." The text is very corrupt and imperfect, but it would appear that MSS. still exist which present it in a more pure and complete form, although these have never been collated, or at least given to the world. (See Burmann, in the pref. to his ed. of Virgil.) (Hieron. advers. Ref. vol. iii. p. 92, ed. Bas., in Æsebe. Chron. ad ann. ecev. p. e.; in Eccles. c. i.; see also Lud. Schopfen, De Terentio et Donato, 8vo, Bonn. 1824, and Specimen emend. in Ael. Donat. comment. Terent. 4to, Bonn. 1826. Omann, Beiträge zur Orychischen und Römischen Literaturgeschichte, Leip. 1839.)

DONTAS, TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS. We find prefixed to all the more complete editions of Virgil a life of the poet, in twenty-five chapters, bearing the title, "Tiberi Claudii Donatii et Tiberium Claudium Maximum Donaturn filium de P. Virgilii Maronis Vita." Nothing whatsoever is known with regard to this Donatus; but it has been conjectured that some grammarian, who flourished about the commencement of the fifth century, may have drawn up a biography which formed the groundwork of the piece we now possess, but which, in its actual shape, exhibits a worthless farrago of childish anecdotes and frivolous fables, compounded by ignorant and unskilful hands. Indeed, scarcely two MSS. can be found which present it in the same form; with this, however, there is a different aspect, and the earlier editors seem to have moulded it into its present form, by collecting and combining these various and often heterogeneous materials. [W. R.]

DONTAS (Δόντας), a Lacedaemonian statuary, was the disciple of Dipoenus and Scyllis, and therefore flourished about B. C. 550. He made the statues which were afterwards placed in the treasury of the Megarians at Olympia. They were of cedar inlaid with gold, and represent the contest of Hercules with Achelous, and containing figures of Zeus, Delaime, Acheiropoies, and Hercules, with Atlas assisting Achelous, and Athena supporting Hercules. The latter statue seems, however, not to have been part of the original group, but a separate work by Molon. (Comp. Paus. v. 17. 1.) The group in the pediment of the Megarian treasury, representing the war of the gods and the giants, seems also to have been the work of Donatas; but the passage in Pant. is not quite clear. (Paus. vi. 19. § 2; Büchel, Corp. Inscrip. i. p. 47, &c.) [P. S.]

DORCEUS (Δόρκεας), a son of Hippocoon, who had a heroon at Sparta conjointly with his brother Tebus. The well near the sanctuary was called Doreia, and the place around it Sebrion. (Paus. iii. 15. § 2.) It is probable that Doreus is the same personage as the Doryceleus in Apollod. (iii. 10. § 5), where his brother is called Tebrus. [L. S.]

DORIEUS (Δοριέας), eldest son of Anaxandrides, king of Sparta, by his first wife [Anaxandrides], was however born after the son of the second marriage, Cleomenes, and therefore excluded from immediate succession. He was accounted the first in personal qualities of Sparta's young men, and feeling it an indignity to remain under the rule of one so inferior to him in worth, and so narrowly before him in claim to the throne, he left his country hastily, and without consulting the oracle of Delphi, to establish for himself a kingdom elsewhere. He led his colony first, under the guidance of some Thessalians, to Libya: the spot he here chose, Cinyps by name, was excellent; but he was driven out ere long by the Libyans and Carthaginians, and led the survivors home. He now, under the sanction of the oracle, set forth to found a Hecaleia in the district pronounced to be the property of Hercules, and to have been reserved to him for any descendant who might come to claim it, Eryx, in Sicily. In his passage thitherward, along the Italian coast, he found the people of Croton preparing (u. c. 510) for their conflict with the Sybaris, and induced, it would seem, by the cohesion between Croton and Sparta (Müller, Dor. lix. 7, § 12), he joined in the expedition, and received, after the fall of the city, a plot of land, on which he built a temple to Athena, of the Crathis. Such was the story given to Herodotus by the remnants of the Sybarites, who were his fellow-citizens at Thurii, denied however by the Crotonians, on the evidence, that while Callias, the Eleean prophet, had received from them various rewards, still enjoyed there by his posterity, in return of his service in the war, nothing of the sort recalled the name of Dorieus. This, however, if Dorieus was but on his Sicilian colony, is quite intelligible. He certainly pursued his course to Eryx, and there seems to have founded his Hecaleia, but ere long, he and all his brother Spartans with him, a single man excepted [Eurytus], were cut off in a battle with the Egestaeans, and, as it seems, the Carthaginians. He left however behind him a son, Euryanax, who accompanied his cousin Pausanias in the campaign (b.c. 479) against Mardonius. Why this son did not succeed rather than Leonidas, on the death of Cleomenes, is not clear; Muller suggests, comparing Plut. Agis, c. 11, that a Heracleid, leaving his country to settle elsewhere lost his rights at home. (Herod. v. 41—60; ixi. 10, 53, 55; Diod. iv. 29; Paus. iii. § 4, and ii. p. 297.)

DORIEUS (Δορίεος), the son of Diogenes [Diogenes], one of the noblest of the noble Heraclidae family, the Euthids of Ialysus, in Rhodes. He was victor in the pankration in three successive Olympiads, the 87th, 88th, and 89th, b.c. 433, 428 and 424, the second of which is mentioned by Theocritus (iii. 8); at the Nemean games he won seven, at the Isthmian eight victories. He and his kinsman, Peisidorus, were styled in the announcement as Thurioteans, so that, apparently, before 424 at latest, they had left their country. (Paus. vi. 7.) The whole family were outlawed as heads of the aristocracy by the Athenians (Xen. Helt. i. 5; § 19), and the first refuge of the captive Thurioteans was Athens. (B.C. 424); and from this asylum they sailed for the Hellespont, he was sent joined by Scerdilaidas, the Illyrian,—the capture and burning of Cynactha, in Arcadia, and the boasted Phocis (Xen. Helt. i. 19.) and took refuge near Rhodes. (Diod. xiii. 38.) Some little time after the battle of Cynossema he entered the Hellespont with his squadron, now fourteen in number, to join the main body; and being des- cribed and attacked by the Athenians with twenty, was forced to run his vessels ashore, near Rhoe- teum. Here he vigorously maintained himself until Mindarus came to his succour, and, by the advance of the rest of the Athenian fleet, the action became general: it was decided by the sudden arrival of Alkibiades with reinforcements. (Xen. Helt. i. 2; Diod. xiii. 45.) Four years after, at the close of b.c. 407, he was captured, with two Thuriotean galleys, by the Athenians, and sent, no doubt, to Athens: but the people, in admiration of his athletic size and noble beauty, dismissed their ancient enemy, though already under sentence of death, without so much as ex- acting a ransom. (Xen. Helt. i. 5; § 19.) Pausa- nias, (i.c.), on the authority of Androtion, further relates, that at the time when Rhodes joined the Athenian league formed by Conon, Dorieus chanced to be somewhere in the reach of the Spartans, and was by them seized and put to death. [A. H. C.]

DORIEUS (Δορίεος), the author of an epigram upon the death of Diogenes (x. p. 412, L.) and in the Greek Anthology. (Bruneck, Austl. ii. 63; Jacobs, ii. 62.) Nothing more is known of him. [P. S.]

DORIEUS (Δορίεος), or DORIALUS (Δορίαλος), an Athenian tragic poet, who was ridiculed by Aristophanes. Nothing more is known of him. (Suid., Hesych., and Ktym. Mag. s. v. Δορίαλος; Aristoph. Lemb. Fr. 336, Dindorf, Schol. in Aristoph. Ran. v. 519; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. ii. p. 297.)

DORILLUS (Δορίλιλος), later Dorius.

DORYMACHUS (Δόριμαχος), a native of Trachonum, in Aetolia, and son of Nicostratus, was sent out, in b.c. 221, to Phigalea, on the Messenian border, with which the Aetolians had a league of amity between Ptolemy and Antiochus the Great, to whom the Aetolians were now looking for support against Rome. (Polyb. iv. 3—13, 16—19, 57, 58, 67, 77; v. i. 3, 4—9, 11, 17; ix. 42; xili. 1; xvili. 44; xii. 35.)

DORION (Δορίων). 1. A critic and grammarian in the time of Hadrian. He lived at Sardis, and was a friend of Dionysius of Miletus, the rhetorician. (Philolith. Φίλολ. ι. 23, § 4.)

2. A rhetorician referred to by the elder Seneca. (Suas. 2, Contr. i. 8, iv.)

3. Of Tyre, who was the author of a treatise on his favourite deli- cacy—fish. His profession and his propensity are referred to by Athcnaeus (viii. p. 337, a.; Meinke, Fragm. Com. vol. iii. p. 578.) He is mentioned too in a fragment of Machon, also preserved by Atheneaus (viii. p. 337, c.; Cassab. ad loc.) and there is an anecdote of him at the court of Nicoseon of Salamis (Athen. viii. p. 337, f.), which shews that he did not lose anything for want of asking. He was in favour of the Emperor Philip of Macedon, who had him in his retinue at Chersonae, in n. c. 338. (Athen. iii. p. 118, b.; vii. pp. 282, d.; 287, c.; 297, e.; 304, f.; 306, f.; 309, f.; 312, d.; 315, b.; 319, d.; 320, d.; 323, f.; 337, f.; x. p. 455, c.) There was a Dorion too, probably a different person, from whose work, called Παραγια, a mythological account of the origin of the word άναη, is quoted by Atheneaus (iii. p. 73, a.). [E. E.]

DORIS (Δόρης), a daughter of Oceanus and Theia, and the wife of her brother Nereus, by whom she became the mother of the Nereids. (Apollo. i. 2, § 2; Hesiod. Theog. 240, &c.; Οv. Met. lii. 269.) The Latin poets sometimes use the name of this marine divinity for the sea. (Virg. Eclog. x. 5.) One of Doris's daughters, or the Nereides, likewise bore the name of Doris. (Hom. Ι. xviii. 45.) [L. S.]

DORIS (Δόρης), a Lokrian, daughter of Xeneus, wife of the elder, and mother of the younger Dionysius. (Diod. xiv. 44; Plut. Dion. 3.) She died before her husband, whom seems to have lamented her loss in one of his tragedies. (Lucian. adv. Indect. § 15.) [E. H. B.]

DOROTHEUS (Δωροτός). A considerable number of works are mentioned by ancient writers as the productions of Dorotheus, without our being able to determine whether they belong to one or to different persons. The following, however, must be distinguished:—

1. The author of a work on the history of Alexander the Great, of which Athenaeus (vii. p. 376) quotes the sixth book. As Athenaeus mentions no characteristic to distinguish him from other persons of the same name, we cannot say who he was, or whether he is the author of any of the other works which are known only as the productions of Dorotheus: viz. a Sicilian history (Σικαλική), from the first book of which a fragment is preserved in Stobaeus (Flor. xii. 49) and Apostolius (Proverb. xx. 13); a history of Italy (Ιταλική), from the fourth book of which a statement is quoted by Plutarch (Parall. Min. 20; comp. Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 12); Παντοπαι. referendum by Atheneaus, who quotes the first book; and lastly, Περί των Παντοποιών, which is referred to by Plutarch. (Parall. Min. 25.)

2. Of Acalon, a Greek grammarians frequently referred to by Atheneaus, who quotes the 108th book of a work of his, entitled λέξεως συναγωγή. (Athen. vii. p. 329, ix. p. 410, xi. p. 481, xiv. p. 638; comp. Schol. ad Hom. Ι. ix. 90, x. 282; Eustath. ad Hom. Ι. xxiii. 230, p. 1297.) This work may be the same as the one περί των συναγωνισμῶν, which is quoted by Atheneaus (Cod. 156), which seems to have been only a chapter or section of the great work. Another work of his bore the title Παράστασεως και περί της παράστασεως καωδους ματών. (Athen. xiv. p. 662.)

3. Of Athenes, is mentioned among the authors consulted by Pliny. (H. N. Blench. lib. xii. and xiii.)

4. A Chaldarian, is mentioned as the author of a work περί Λίθου by Plutarch (de Fam. 25), who quotes the second book of it. He may be the same as the Dorotheus referred to by Pliny (H. N. xiii. 22), though the latter may also be identical with the Atheniens, No. 3.

5. Bishop of Martinople, lived about a. d. 431, and was a most obstinate follower of the party and heresies of Nestorius. (Hist. Lit. E. F. Gr. 444; Fabr. Bibl. Gr. xi. p. 108.)

6. Archimandrites of Palestine, lived about a. d. 600, and is said to have been a disciple of Johannes Monachus, on whom he waited during an illness, which lasted for several years. He is believed to have afterwards been made bishop of Brixia on account of his great learning. He wrote a work, in three books, on obscure passages in the Old and New Testament, which however is a mere compilation made from the works of Gregory the Great, for which reason it is printed among the works of the latter, in the Roman edition of 1591, and the subsequent ones. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 780.)

7. Of Sidon, was the author of astrological poems (συναχλήσαματα), of which a few fragments are still extant. They are collected in Litterae Catalog. Cod. MSS. Bibliales, Mot. i. p. 924, and in Cramer's Anecdotc, iii. pp. 167, 185. Manilius, among the Romans, and several Arab writers on astrology, have made considerable use of these Apotelesmata. Some critics are inclined to consider Dorotheus of Sidon as identical with the Chaldæan.

8. Of Tyre, has been frequently confounded with Dorotheus, a presbyter of Antioch in the reign of Diodocian, who is spoken of by Eusebius. (H. E. vii. 32.) He must further be distinguished from another Dorotheus, who was likewise a contemporary of Diodocian. (Euseb. H. E. viii. 1, 6.) Our Dorotheus is said to have flourished about a. d. 303, to have suffered much from the persecutions of Diodocian, and to have been sent into exile. When this persecution ceased, he resumed his see, in which he seems to have remained till the time of the emperor Julian, by whose emissaries he was seized and put to death, at the age of 107 years. This account, however, is not found in favor of his contemporaries, and occurs only in an anonymous writer who lived after the sixth century of our era, and from whom it was incorporated in the Martyrologin. Dorotheus is further said to have written several theological works, and we still possess, under his name, a "Synopsis de Vita et Morte Prophetarum, Apostolorum et Discipulorum Domini," which is printed in Latin in the third vol. of the Biblioth. Patrum. A specimen of the Greek original, with a Latin translation, is given by Cave (Hist. Lit. i. p. 115, &c.), and the whole was edited by Fabricius, at the end of his "Monumenta Variorum de Mosia, Prophetarum et Apostolorum Vita," 1714, Svo. It is an ill-digested mass of fabulous accounts, though it contains a few things also which are of importance in ecclesiastical history. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 115, &c.)

There are a few other ecclesiastics of this name, concerning whom little or nothing is known. A list of them is given by Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 452, note p.)

DOROTHEUS, a celebrated jurist of quaestorian rank, and professor of law at Berytus, was one of the principal compilers of Justinian's Digest, and was invited by the emperor from Berytus to Constantinople for that purpose. (Const. Hist. § 3.) He also had a share, along with Tribonian and Theophillus, in the composition of the "Legum Leonis et Constantini." He must have lived some time in or before the second century after Christ, and may perhaps be the same person who is mentioned by Pliny, and said to have been a native of Athens, and also the same as Dorotheus Helius, who is twice mentioned by Galen. (De Intell. Hist. lii. 14; vol. xiv. pp. 168, 167.) A physician of this name, who was a Christian, and also in deacon's orders, appears to have consulted Isidorus Pelusiotes, in the fifth century after Christ, on the reason why incorporeal beings are less subject to injury and corruption than corporal; to which question he received an answer in a letter, which is still extant. (Isid. Pelus. Epist. v. 191, ed. Paris, 1633.)

DOROTHEUS, a painter, who executed for Nero a copy of the Aphrodite Anadyomene of Apelles. He lived therefore about a. d. 60. (Plin. Varr. xxi. 10, s. 30, § 16; Apelles.)

DORPHAEUS. (Derculanus.)

DORSO, the name of a family of the patrician Fabii. 1. C. Fabius Dorso, greatly distinguished himself at the time when the Capitol was besieged by the Gauls, (b. c. 390.) The Fabian gens was accustomed to celebrate a sacrifice at a fixed time on the Quirinal hill, and accordingly, at the appointed time, C. Dorso, who was then a young man, descended from the Capitol, carrying the sacred things in his hands, passed in safety through the enemy's posts, and, after performing the sacrifice, returned in safety to the Capitol. (Liv. v. 46, 52; Val. Max. i. 1. § 11.) The tale is somewhat differently related by other writers. Dion Cassius (Fragn. 29, ed. Reim.) speaks of the sacrifice as a public one, which Fabius, whom he calls Caeso Fabius, had to perform in one of the palaestrae. (Plut. Mor. 4.) He also calls him a priest, who, as sent by Manlius, the commander on the Capitol, to celebrate the sacred rite on the Quirinal. Apian, on the other hand, who quotes Cassius Hemin as his authority, says that the sacrifice was performed in the temple of Vesta. (Cels. 6.) 2. M. Fabius Dorso, son probably of No. 1, was consul in b. c. 345 with Ser. Sulpisius Camerinus Rufus, in which year Camillus was appointed dictator to carry on the war with the Aurnici. He made war with his colleague against the Volsci and took Som. (Liv. vii. 28; Dion. xvi. 66.) 3. C. Fabius Dorso Licinus, son or grandson of No. 2, was consul in b. c. 273 with C. Claudius Carina, but died in the course of this year. It was in his consulship that colonies were founded at Caesa and Paestum, and that an embassy was sent by Ptolemy Philadelphia to Rome. (Vell. Pat. i. 14; Eutrop. ii. 15.)

DORUS (Δωρος), the mythical ancestor of the Dorians; he is described either as a son of Helen, by the nymph Oraeis, and a brother of Xuthus and Aeolus (Apollod. i. 7. § 3; Diod. iv. 60); or as a son of Apollo, by Phthia, and a brother of Laodamus and Polyipotes (Apollod. i. 7. § 6), DOSITHUS.

whereas Servius (ad Aen. ii. 27) calls him a son of Possidius. He is said to have assembled the people which derived its name from him (the Do-rians) around him in the neighbourhood of Par-nassa. (Samb. viii. p. 393; Herod. i. 56, comp. Müller, Dor. i. 1 § 1.)

DORIGELEIDAS (Δοριγέλειδας), a Lacedaemonian statuary, the brother of Medon, made the gold and ivory statue of Themis, in the temple of Hera at Olympia. He was a disciple of Dipoenus and Scyllis, and therefore flourished about n. c. 550.

(Paus. v. 17. § 1.)

DORIGYCLUS (Δοριγκλος), the name of two mythical personages. (Hom. ii. xi. 469; Virg.
Aen. v. 630.)

DORYLAS, the name of two mythical personages. (Ov. Met. v. 130, xii. 300.)

DORIPHORUS (Δοριφόρος), one of the most influential freedmen and favourites of the emperor Nero, who employed him as his secretary, and lavished enormous sums upon him. But in a. d.
63 Nero is said to have poison'd him, because he opposed his marriage with Popæa. (Tacit. Ann.
xiv. 65; Dion Cass. xii. 5.)

DOSITHOIUS (Δοσιθεύς), a Greek historian, of whom four works are mentioned: 1. Σαικλανδ, of which the third book is quoted. (Plut. Paral.
Min. 19.) 2. Ακαδημ, of which likewise a third book is quoted. (Plut. Paral. Min. 30.) 3. Πραδεγκ (ibid. 33, 34, 37, 40), and 4. Πελοπον.
( Ibid. 33; Steph. Byz. x. v. Δοσιθεύς.) But nothing further is known about him.

DOSITHUS (Δοσιθέως), of Colonus, a geometer, to whom Archimedes deducts his books on the sphere and cylinder, and that on spirals.
Censorinus is held to say (c. 18), that he improved
the octa-eteris of Eudoxus: and both Geminius and Polomy made use of the observations of the times of appearance of the fixed stars, which he made in the year b. c. 200. (Pliny (H. N. xviii.
p. 110.)

DOSITHUS, summan, probably from his occupation, Mägister, was a schoolmaster and grammarian, teaching Greek to Roman youths.
He lived under Septimius Severus and Ant. Carcalla, about the beginning of the third century of our era. This appears by a passage in his Ἐγγυς τικα τικα, where he states that he copied the Genealogy of Hyginus in the consilium of Maximus and Aprus, which occurred a. d. 207.

There is extant of this author, in two manuscripts, a work entitled Ἐγγυςτικα διαμε trothree books. Parts of it have never been published, and do not deserve to be published; for all that is the author's own is worthless, ill-expressed, and disfigured by excessive boastfulness. The first book (unpublished) consists of a Greek grammar, written in Latin, and treating of the parts of speech. The second book consists chiefly of imperfect vocabularies and glossaries, Greek-Latin and Latin-Greek. The glossaries were published by H. Stephanus, fol. 1573, and have since been several times reprinted. The third book contains translations from Latin authors into Greek, and vice versa, the Latin and Greek being placed on opposite columns. From the extracts thus preserved this part of the work deserves attention. It consists of six divisions, or chapters; 1. The first chapter is entitled Διά Ηρακλείνι Σεντ τουντις και Επιδολοες, and contains legal anecdotes of Hadrian, mostly without much point, his answers to petitioners, a letter written by him to his mother, and a notice of a law concerning parricide. The law referred to directs the murderer of his father to be sew'n alive in a sack, along with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and to be thrown into the nearest sea or river. Reinæus (De Jus. Varia, Lect. p. 90) refers this law to a later age than that of Hadrian, and thinks that it was first introduced by Constantine, a. d. 310 (Cod. 9, tit. 17), but this supposition is inconsistent either with the genuineness of the fragment, or with the date when Dositheus lived, as collected from his own testimony. The first Διά Ηρακλείνι Σεντ τουντις και Επιδολοες were first published by Goldastus, 8vo, 1001, and may be found in Fabricius. (Bibl. Graec. xii.
p. 514—544, edit. 1724.) The same work has been edited by Schulting, in his Jusprudentia Autijeustanta, and by Bickling in the Bonn Corpus Juris Romanæ Autijeustantia. 2. The second chapter contains eighteen fables of Aesop.
3. The third chapter has been usually entitled, after Pithoeus, Fragmentum Regularum, or, after Roever, Fragmentum veteris jurisconsulti de juris speciobus et de manumissionibus. Of this, the Latin text alone was first published by Goldastus, 8vo, 1601, Paris, 1573, at the end of his edition of the Colla-legium Mocienarum et Romanaarum. The Greek and Latin text together were published by Roever, 3vo, Lug. Bat. 1739. The Latin text appears in the Jusprudentia. of Schulting. The Greek and Latin together (revised by Beck, not, as is commonly stated, by Biener) are given in the Berlin Jus Civilis Autijeustantiam, and by Bocking in the Bonn Corp. Jus Rom. Autijeustant. There are able observations on this fragment by Curtius (Observ. xii. 31), and by Valckenari (Miscell. Observ.
x. p. 108). It has also been learnedly criticized by Schilling, in his unfinished Dissertatio Crítica de Fragmento Juri Romani Dositheuse, Lips. 1819, and by Leichmann, in his Versuch über Dosithoeus, 4to, Berlin, 1837. This fragment, which has recently excited considerable attention, contains some remarks upon the division of jus into civilis, naturale, and gentium, the division of persons into freeborn and freedmen, and the law of manumis-sions. It cannot be doubted that the Greek text has been translated from a Latin original. Schiling, against the probable inference to be derived from internal evidence, supposes it to have been a compilation, by Dositheus, from several jurists, and in this opinion is followed by Zimmerm (G. R.
DOSSENNUS.

(D. i. 72.) The fragment resembles the commencement of elementary legal works, as those of Ulpia. and Gaius, with which we are already acquainted; and it is not likely that a petty gram¬ marian would have employed himself in making a legal compilation. By Cujas and others, it has been attributed to Ulpian, but it seems, from some reasons, to have been of rather earlier date. It is, however, at least as late as Hadrian, for the author quotes Noratus Priscus and Julianus. As Dorthens himself calls the work Regulae, it is supposed by Lachmann, who supports his conjecture by strong arguments, to have been an extract from Paulli Regulorum Libri vii. The Latin text that has come down to us appears to be a miserable retranslation from the Greek, and must have been the conjectures as to the mode in which it was formed. Lachmann seems to have been success¬ ful in solving the enigma. He thinks that the Greek text was intended as a theme for re-transla¬ tion into Latin by the pupils of Dositheus, and that the present Latin text was formed by placing the words of the original text, out of their original order, under the corresponding words of the Greek version. Proceeding on this idea, Lachmann has attempted, and, on the whole, with success, out of the disjointed Latin, to restore the original. 4. The fourth chapter is imperfect, but contains extracts from the Genealogia of Hyginus, which were first published by Augustus van Staveren. 5. The fifth chapter, which wants the commencement, contains a narrative of the Trojan war, formed from summaries of books vii.—xxiv. of Homer's Iliad. 6. The sixth chapter contains a scholastic conversation of no value. The whole of the third book was published separately by Böcking, 16mo, 1832. [J. T. G.]

DOSITHIEUS (Δοσιθεύς), a Greek physician, who must have lived in or before the sixth century after Christ, as Aetius has preserved (Tetrab. ii. Serm. iv. cap. 65, p. 424) one of his medical for¬ mulae, which is called "veta· cledebrer," and which is also inserted by Nicolaus Myrepsus in his Antidoticarium. (Sect. xii. cap. 78, p. 792.) Another of his prescriptions is quoted by Paulus Aegidianus.

(De Re Med. vi. 11. 660.) [W. A. G.]

DOSSENNUS FABIUS, or DORSENNUS, an ancient Latin comic dramatist, censured by Horace on account of the exaggerated bofournity of his characters, and the mercenary carelessness with which his pieces were hastily produced. Two lines of this author, one of them from a play named Acharistio, are quoted by Pliny in proof of the estimation in which the Romans of the olden time held perfumed wines, and his epitaph has been preserved by Seneca—

"Hospes resiste et sophami Doesseni lege."

Munk, while he admits the existence of a Do¬ ssennus, whom he believes to have composed pediatores, maintains that this name (like that of Macceus) was appropriated to one of the standard characters in the Atellane farces. (Hor. Epist. ii.
1. 173, where some of the oldest MSS. have Dor¬
sennus; Plin. H. N. xiv. 15; Senee. Epist. 89; Munk, de Fabulis Atellan. pp. 28, 35, 122.) [W. R.]

DOSSENUS' N, L RUBRIUS, of whom there are several coins extant, but who is not mentioned by any ancient writer. A specimen of one of these coins is given below, containing on the obverse a head of Jupiter, and on the reverse a quad¬ riga, resembling a triumphal carriage, from which it may be inferred that this Doosennus had obtained a triumph for some victory.

DOTIS (Δοτίς), a daughter of Elatus or Aste¬ rions, by Amphicyone, from whom the Dositian plain, in Thessaly, was believed to have derived its name. Dotis was the mother of Philegas, by Ares. (Apolod. iii. § 5, where in some editions we have a wrong reading, Xepdras, instead of Δοτί sas; Steph. Byz. s. ii. Δότινα.)

[L. S.]

DOXIPATER, GREGORIUS, a Graeco-Ro¬ mans jurist, who is occasionally mentioned in the scholia on the Basilica. (Basil. vol. iii. p. 440, vii.
16. 217.) He is probably the same person with the Gregorius of Basil. ii. p. 566, and vii. p. 607.

Montfaucon (Patrolog. Graec. lib. i. c. 6, p. 62, lib. iv. c. 6, p. 392; Diur. Ital. p. 217; Bibl. MSS. p. 196), shows that a Doxipater, who was Diaconus Magnus Ecclesiast and Nomophylax (besides other titles and offices), edited a Nomo¬ canon, or synopsis of ecclesiastical law, at the com¬mand of Joannes Commenus, who reigned a. d.
1118—1143. The manuscript of this work is in the library of the fathers of St. Basil, at Rome. Pohl (ad Nostra Notitia, Basil. p. 139, n. 8) seems to make Montfaucon identify the author of this Nomocanon with the Lord Gregorius Doxipater, the jurist of the Basilica, who is not mentioned by Montfaucon.

Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. lib. v. c. 25) attributes the authorship of this Nomocanon to Doxipater Nilus, who, under Regerius, in Sicily, about a. d. 1143, wrote a treatise, de quibus Patricerchadis Sedulius, first published by Stephen le Moyne, in his Variaei Sacrae, l. p. 211. Fabricius is probably correct, and it is not likely that Doxipater Nilus and Gregorius Doxipater were the same person.

The unruly trustworth of Peppeolop (Praenest. Epist. i. p. 372), speaks of a Doxipater Sceularius, as the last of the Greek jurists, and cites his scholia upon the Novells of Isaacus Angelus, who reigned a. d.
1185—1195. (Heimhach. de Basil. Origii. p. 81.) [J. T. G.]

DOXIPATER (Δοξιπατήρ), or DOXIPA¬
TER, JOANNES, a Greek grammarian or rhetor¬ ician, under whose name we possess an extensive commentary on Aphthonius, which was printed for the first time by Aldus, in 1509, and again by Walz in his Rhetor. Graec. vol. ii. The commentary bears the title "Oμηλια εις Αφθονίον," and is extremely diffuse, so that it occupies upwards of 400 pages. It is full of long quotations from Plato, Thucydides, Diodorus, Plutarch, and from several of the Christian Fathers. The explanations given seem to be derived from earlier commentators of Aphthonius. There is another work of a similar character which bears the name of Doxipater. It is entitled Προ- λεγόμαι τις ἡγεμονίας, and, as its author men¬ DRACON.

DRACON (Δράκων), the author of the first written code of laws at Athens, which were called Seeroul, as distinguished from the ἔγχον of Solon. (Andoc. de Myst. p. 11; Ael. V. H. viii. 10; Periz. ad loc.; Menag. ad Diog. Laërit. i. 53.) In this code he affixed the penalty of death to almost all crimes—to petty thefts, for instance, as well as to sacrilege and murder—which gave occasion to the remarks of Herodicus and Demades, that his laws were not those of a man, but of a dragon (Δράκων), and that they were written not in ink, but in blood. We are told that he himself defended this extreme harshness by saying that small offences deserved death, and that he knew no such punishment for great men. (Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23, § 29; Plut. Sol. i. 17; Gall. xi. 15; Fabric. Bid. Græc. vol. ii. p. 23, and the authorities there referred to.) Aristotle, if indeed the chapter be genuine (Pol. ii. ad fin.; Götting. ad loc.), says that Dracon did not change the constitution of Athens, and that the only remarkable characteristic of his laws was their severity. Yet we know from Aeschines (c. Timarch. §§ 6, 7) that he provided in them for the education of the citizens from their earliest years; and, according to Pollux (viii. 125) he made the Ephetae a court of appeal from the ἀνεγραμμένοι δικαίωμα in cases of unintentional homicide. On this latter point Richter (Fabr. l. c.), Schumann, and C. F. Hermann (Pol. Att. § 103) are of opinion that Dracon established the Ephetae, taking away the cognizance of homicide entirely from the Areiopagus; while Müller thinks (Eumen. §§ 65, 66), with more probability, that the two courts were united until the legislation of Solon. From this period (c. 594) most of the laws of Dracon fell into disuse (Gell. l. c.; Plut. Sol. l. c.); but Andocidee tells us (l. c.), that some of them were still in force at the end of the Peloponnesian war; and we know that there remained unreported, not only the law which inflicted death for murder, and which of course was not peculiar to Dracon’s code, but that too which permitted the injured husband to slay the adulterer, if taken in the act. (Lys. de Cael. Erat. p. 94; Paus. ix. 36; Xenarch. ap. Athen. xii. p. 569, a.) Demosthenes also says (c. Thucur. p. 765) that many of these laws in the reign of Solon were annually held in honour for their good laws; and Pausanias and Suidas mention an enactment of the former legislator adopted by the Thasians, providing that any inanimate thing which had caused the loss of human life should be cast out of the country. (Paus. vi. 11; Suid. s. v. Nicew.) From Suidas we learn that Dracon died at Aegina, being smothered by the number of hats and clocks showered upon him as a popular mark of honour in the theatre. (Suid. c. c. Δράκων, πειραγεκρήσας; Kuster, ad Suid. s. v. Ἀρκεδώρα.) His legislation is referred by general testimony to the 39th Olympiad, in the fourth year of which (c. 621) Clinton is disposed to place it, so as to bring Eusebius into exact agreement with the other authorities on the subject. Of the immediate occasion which led to these laws we have no account. C. F. Hermann (l. c.) and Thirlwall (Greeks, vol. ii. p. 18) are of opinion, that the people demanded a written code to replace the mere customary law, of which the Ephratidae were the sole exponents; and that the latter, unable to resist the demand, gladly sanctioned the rigorous enactments of Dracon as adapted to check the democratic movement which had given rise to them. This theory certainly gets rid of what Thirlwall considers the difficulty of conceiving how the legislator could so confound the gradations of moral guilt, and how also (as we may add) he could fall into the error of making moral guilt the sole rule of punishment, as his own defence of his laws above mentioned might lead us to suppose he did. Yet the former of these errors is but the distortion of an important truth (Aristot. Pol. l. c. 13. § 6); while the latter has actually been held in modern times, and was more natural in the age of Dracon, especially if, with Wachsmuth, we suppose him to have regarded his laws in a religious aspect as instruments for appeasing the anger of the gods. And neither of these errors, after all, is more strange than his foreseeing that the severity of his enactments would defeat its own end, and would surely lead (as was the case till recently in England) to impunity. [E. E.]

DRACON (Δράκων), an Athenian of Pellenæ, to whom Dercyllides (c. 358) entrusted the government of Aetnaeus, which had been occupied by a body of Chian exiles, and which he had reduced after a siege of eight months. Here Dracon gathered a force of 3000 tagetores, and acted successfully against the enemy by the ravage of Myssis. (Xen. Hell. iii. 2; Isocr. Paneg. p. 70.)

DRACON (Δράκων). 1. A musician of Athens, who was a disciple of Damon, and the instructor of Plato in music. (Plut. de Mus. 17; Olympiad. Vit. Plat.)

2. A grammarian of Stratonicca, flourished in the reign of Hadrian. Suidas mentions several works of his, of which only one (περὶ μέτρων) is extant. It is said to be an extract from a larger work, and has been edited by Godfr. Hermann, Leipzig, 1812.

3. Of Coryra, a writer, whose work περὶ Αἰθέρ is quoted by Athenaeus (xv. p. 692, d.). Casabian (ad loc.) proposes περὶ Μήτηρ as a conjecture. [E. E.]

DRACON II. Was, according to Suidas (s. v. Δράκων), the son of Theslaus, and the father of Hippocrates (probably Hippocrates IV.). If this be correct, he was the twentieth of the family of the Asclepiadæ, the brother of Gorgias and Hippocrates III., and lived probably in the fourth century B. C.

DRACON III. is said by Suidas (s. v. Δράκων) to have been the son of Hippocrates (probably Hippocrates IV.), and to have been one of the physicians to Roxelana, the wife of Alexander the Great, in the fourth century B. C.

There is, however, certainly some confusion in Suidas, and perhaps the origin of the mistakes... may be his making Dracon I. and Dracon II. two distinct persons, in calling Dracon II. the grandson, instead of the son, of Hippocrates II. (W. A. G.

DRACONTIDES. (Dracontides), one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in B. C. 404. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 2.) He is in all probability the same whom Lysias mentions (c. Erat. p. 126), as having framed at that time the constitution, according to which the Athenians were to be governed under their new rulers; and he is perhaps also the disgraceful person alluded to by Aristophanes as having been frequently condemned in the Athenian courts of justice. (Pepys. 157; Schol. ad loc., comp. 438.) [E. E.]

DRACON'TIUS, a Christian poet, of whose personal history we know nothing, except that he was a Spanish presbyter, flourished during the first half of the fifth century, and died about A. D. 450. His chief production, entitled Hexaméron, in heroic measure, extending to 575 lines, contains a description of the six days of the creation, in addition to which we possess a fragment in 198 elegiac verses addressed to the younger Theodosius, in which the author implores forgiveness of God for certain errors in his greater work, and excuses himself to the emperor for having neglected to celebrate his victories. Although the Hexaméron is by no means destitute of spirit, and plainly indicates that the writer had studied carefully the models of classical antiquity, we can by no means adopt the criticism of Isidorus: "Dracontius composed heroic versions Hexaméron creationis mundi et humani, quod composuit, acripsit," if we are to understand that any degree of clearness or perspicuity is implied by the word acripsit, for nothing is more characteristic of this piece than obscurity of thought and perplexity of expression. Indeed these defects are sometimes pushed to such extravagant excess, that we feel disposed to agree with Barthius and other modern editors (Adoro. xxiii. 19), that Dracontius did not always understand himself.

It is to be observed that the Hexaméron consists under two forms. It was published in its original shape along with the Genesis of Claudius Marcius Victor, at Paris, 8vo. 1560; in the "Corpus Chnstianorum Pocrtarum," edited by G. Fabricius, Basel. 4to. 1564; with the notes of Weitzius, France 8vo. 1569; in the "Magna Bibliotheca Patrum," Colon. fol. 1618, vol. iv. par. 1; and in the "Bibliotheca Patrum," Paris, fol. 1624, vol. viii.

In the course of the seventh century, however, Eugenius, bishop of Toledo, by the orders of king Chindaswinth, undertook to revise, correct, and improve the Six Days; and, not content with repairing and beautifying the old structure, supplied what he considered a defect in the plan by adding an account of the Seventh Day. In this manner the performance was extended to 634 lines. The enlarged edition was first published by Sirmond along with the Opuscula of Eugenius, Paris, 8vo. 1619. In the second volume of Sirmond's works (Ven. 1723), p. 896, we read the letter of Eugenius to King Don swinth, in which we learn that the prelate engaged in the task by the commands of that prince; and in p. 903 we find the Elegy addressed to Theodosius. The Eugenian version was reprinted by Rivinus, Lips. 8vo. 1651, and in the "Bibliotheca Maxima Patrum," Lugdun. vol. ix. p. 754. More recent editions have appeared by F. Arevalus, Rom. 4to. 1701, and by J. B. Carpzovius, Helvet. 8vo. 1701.
conclusions with regard to the state of the language elsewhere, and from the style we can draw some conclusions with regard to the state of the language and the tone of literary taste at the commencement of the fourth century; but, considered as a whole, antiquity has bequeathed to us nothing more worthless.

Latinus Pacatus DREPIANUS was a native of Aquitan (Aquitaine), as we learn from himself and from Sidonius, the friend of Ausonius, who inscribes to him several pieces in very complimentary dedications, and the correspondent of Symmachus, by whom he is addressed in three epistles still extant. He was sent from his native province to congratulate Theodosius on the victory achieved over Maximus, and delivered the panegyric which stands last in the collection described above, at Rome, in the presence of the emperor, probably in the autumn of A.D. 391. If we add to these particulars the facts, that he was elevated to the rank of proconsul, enjoyed great celebrity as a poet, and was descended from a father who bore the same name with himself, the sources from which our information is derived are exhausted.

The oration, while it partakes of the vices which disfigure the other members of the family to which it belongs, is less extravagant in its hyperboles than many of its companions, and although the language is a sort of hybrid progeny, formed by the union of poetry and prose, there is a certain splendour of diction, a flowing copiousness of expression, and even a vigour of thought, which remind us at times of the florid graces of the Asiatic school. How far the merits of Drepanius as a bard may have justified the decision of the critics who pronounce him second to Virgil only (Auszun. Prof. Epigramm. Idyll. vii.), it is impossible for us to determine, as not a fragment of his efforts in this department has been preserved. He must not be confounded with Florus Drepanius, a writer of hymns.

The Epit. Principia of the Panegyrici Veteres is in quarto, in Roman characters, without place, date, or printer's name, but is believed to have appeared at Milan about 1462, and includes, in addition to the twelve orations usually associated together, the life of Agricola by Tacitus, and fragments of Petronius Arbiter, with a preface by Franc. Puteloanus, addressed to Jac. Antiquarius. Another very ancient impression in 4to., without place, date, or printer's name, containing the twelve orations alone, probably belongs to Venice, about 1499. The most useful editions are those of Schweizerius, 4to., Ven. 1726; of Jaegerus, which presents a new recension of the text, with a valuable commentary, and comprehends the poem of Corippus, 2 tom. 8vo., Nembr. 1789; and of Arizitaeus, which excludes Drepanius, with very copious notes and apparatus criticus, 2 tom. 4to., Traj. ad Rhin. 1790—97. The edition published at Paris, 12mo., 1643, with notes by many commentators, bears the title "XIV Panegyrici Veteres," in consequence of the addition of Panegyricus by Ausonius and Emnodius. In Illustration we have T. G. Walch, Dissertatio de Panegyricis veterum, 4to., Jenne, 1721; T. G. Moerlin, de Panegyricis veterum programma, 4to., Nembr. 1738; and Heyne, Conspectus XII Panegyricorum veterum, in his Opuscula Academica, vol. vii. p. 80. (Sidon. Apoll. Epist. viii. 12; comp. Panegyr.)

DROMICHAEITES.

DROMICHAETES (Ἀυριακήτης). 1. A king of the Gece, contemporary with Lysimachus, king of Thrace, and known to us only by his victory over that monarch. He first defeated and took prisoner Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus, but sent him back to his father without ransom, hoping thus to gain the favour of Lysimachus. The latter, however, therupon invaded the territories of Dromicaetes in person, with a large army; but soon became involved in great difficulties, and was ultimately taken prisoner with his whole force. Dromicaetes treated his captive in the most generous manner, and after entertaining him in regal style, set him at liberty again on condition of Lysimachus giving him his daughter in marriage and restoring the conquests he had made from the Gece to the north of the Danube. (Diod. xxxiv. 8, 19.)

DREPIANUS (Δρπαγαον), a fabulous leader of revolting slaves in Chios. The Chians are said to have been the first who purchased slaves, for which they were punished by the gods, for midst of the slaves thus obtained escaped to the mountains of the island, and from thence made destructive incursions into the possessions of their former masters. After a long and useless warfare, the Chians concluded a treaty with Drimacus, the brave and successful leader of the slaves, who put an end to the ravages. Drimacus now received among his band only those slaves who had run away through the bad treatment they had experienced. But afterwards the Chians offered a prize for his head. The noble slave-leader, on hearing this, said to one of his men, "I am old and weary of life; but you, whom I love above all men, are young, and may yet be happy. Therefore take my head, carry it into the town, and receive the prize for it." This was done accordingly; but, after the death of Drimacus, the disturbances among the slaves became worse than ever; and the Chians then, seeing of what service he had been to them, built him a heroum, which they called the heroon of the Ἰψως εὐερής. The slaves sacrificed to him a portion of their booty; and whenever the slaves meditated any outrage, Drimacus appeared to their masters in a dream to caution them. (Athien. vi. p. 265.) (L. S.)

DRIMACUS (Δριμάκος). 1. Of Mytilene, a victor in the Olympic games, who gained the prize in the paestumio in OL. 75. (Paus. vi. 6 § 2, 11. § 2.)

2. Of Stymphalus, twice won the prize at Olympia in the dolichos, but it is not known in what years. He also gained two prizes at the Pythian, three at the Isthmian, and five at the Nemean games. He is said to have first introduced the custom of feeding the athletes with meat. There was a statue of his at Olympia, which was the work of Pythagoras. (Paus. vi. 7 § 3; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8, 1.) (L. S.)

Dromicaêtes (Δρόμιχαῖτης). 1. A king of the Gece, contemporary with Lysimachus, king of Thrace, and known to us only by his victory over that monarch. He first defeated and took prisoner Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus, but sent him back to his father without ransom, hoping thus to gain the favour of Lysimachus. The latter, however, therupon invaded the territories of Dromicaetes in person, with a large army; but soon became involved in great difficulties, and was ultimately taken prisoner with his whole force. Dromicaetes treated his captive in the most generous manner, and after entertaining him in regal style, set him at liberty again on condition of Lysimachus giving him his daughter in marriage and restoring the conquests he had made from the Gece to the north of the Danube. (Diod. xxxiv. 8, 19.)

Pausania, indeed, gives a different account of the transaction, according to which Lysimachus himself escaped, but his son Agathocles having fallen INTO THE POWER OF THE ENEMY, HE WAS COMPelled TO PURCHASE HIS LIBERATION BY CONCLUDING A TREATY ON THE TERMS ALREADY MENTIONED. (PAUS. I. 9. $6.)

THE DOMINIONS OF DROMICHAEUS APPEAR TO HAVE EXTENDED FROM THE DANUBE TO THE CARPATHIANS, AND HIS SUBJECTS ARE Spoken OF BY PUSINNUS AS BOTH NUMEROUS AND WARLIKE. (PAUS. L. E.; STRAB. VII. pp. 304, 305; NICOBUR, Kleine Schriften, p. 379; DRAYSON, Nachfolger. Alexa. p. 509.)

3. One OF THE AUTHORS OF MITHRIDATES, PROBABLY A THRACIAN BY BIRTH, WHO WAS SENT BY HIM WITH AN ARMY TO THE SUPPORT OF ARECHALUS IN GREECE. (APPIAN. MITHR. 32, 41.) [E. H. B.]

DROMOCLEIDES (ΔΡΟΜΟΚΛΕΙΔΗΣ) OF SPHETUS, AN ATTIC ORATOR OF THE TIME OF DEMETRIUS PHALERCUS, WHO EXERCIRED A GREAT INFLUENCE UPON PUBLIC AFFAIRS AT ATHENS BY HIS SERVILE FLATTERY OF DEMETRIUS. (POLYAN. IV. 16.)

DROMON (ΔΡΟΜΟΝ) OF MITHRIDATES, PROBABLY A THRACIAN BY BIRTH, WHO WAS SENT BY HIM WITH AN ARMY TO THE SUPPORT OF ARECHALUS IN GREECE. (APPIAN. MITHR. 32, 41.) [E. H. B.]

DROMOCRIDES, OR, AS SOME READ, DROMOCLEIDES, IS MENTIONED BY FULGENTISUS (MYTHOL. II. 17) AS THE AUTHOR OF A THEOGONY, BUT IS OTHERWISE UNKNOWN. (FABR. BIBL. GREEC. I. p. 30.) [L. S.]

DRUSILLA. 1. LIVIA DRUSILLA, THE MOTHER OF THE EMPEROR TIBERIUS AND THE WIFE OF AUGUSTUS. (LIVIA.)

2. DRUSILLA, A DAUGHTER OF GERMANICUS AND AGrippina, WAS BROUGHT UP IN THE HOUSE OF HER GRANDMOTHER ANTONIA. HERE SHE WAS DEFLOWEERED BY HER BROTHER CAIUS (AFTERWARDS THE EMPEROR CALIGULa), BEFORE HE WAS OF AGE TO ASSUME THE VIRTUOUS ANTIPATRY, AND ANTONIA HAD ONCE THE MISFORTUNE TO BE AN EYE-WITNESS OF THE INCEST OF THESE HER GRANDCHILDREN. (SUET. CALIGL. 24.) IN A. D. 55, THE EMPEROR TIBERIUS DISPOSED OF HER IN MARRIAGE TO L. CAIUS LONGINUS (TAC. ANN. VI. 15), BUT HER BROTHER SOON AFTERWARDS CARRIED HER AWAY FROM HER HUSBAND'S HOUSE, AND OPENLY LIVED WITH HER AS IF SHE WERE HIS WIFE. IN THE BEGINNING OF HIS REIGN, WE FIND HER MARRIED TO M. AECILLUS LEPIDUS, ONE OF HIS MINIONS. THE EMPEROR HAD DEBAUCHED ALL HIS SISTERS, BUT HIS PASSION FOR DRUSILLA EXCEEDED ALL BOUNDS. WHEN SEIZED WITH ILLNESS, HE APPOINTED HER HEIR TO HIS PROPERTY AND KINGDOM; BUT SHE DIED EARLY IN HIS REIGN, WHEREUPON HIS GRIEF BECAME FRANTIC. HE BURIED HER WITH THE GREATEST POMP, GAVE HER A PUBLIC TOMB, SET UP HER GOLDEN IMAGE IN THE FORUM, AND COMMANDED THAT SHE SHOULD BE WORSHIPPED, BY THE NAME PANTHEA, WITH THE SAME HONOURS AS VENUS. LIVIUS GEMINUS, A SENATOR, AWARE THAT HE SAW HER ASCENDING TO HEAVEN IN THE COMPANY OF THE GODS, AND WAS REWARDED WITH A MILLION SESTERCES FOR HIS STORY. MEN KNOWN NOT WHAT TO DO. IT WAS IMPEITY TO MOURN THE GODDESS, AND IT WAS DEATH NOT TO MOURN THE WOMAN. SEVERAL SUFFERED DEATH FOR ENTERTAINING A RELATIVE OR GUEST, OR SALUTING A FRIEND, OR TAKING A BATH, IN THE DAYS THAT FOLLOWED HER FUNERAL. (DION. CAES. IIX. 11; SENS. CONSOL. AD POLYB. 56.)

3. JULIA DRUSILLA, THE DAUGHTER OF THE EMPEROR CAIUS (CALIGULA) BY HIS WIFE CAESONIN. SHE WAS BORN, ACCORDING TO Suetonius (CALIGL. 25), ON THE DAY OF HER MOTHER'S MARRIAGE, OR, ACCORDING TO DIS (IX. 29), THIRTY DAYS AFTERWARDS. ON THE DAY OF HER BIRTH, SHE WAS CARRIED BY HER FATHER ROUND THE TEMPLES OF ALL THE GODDESSES, AND PLACED UPON THE KNEE OF MINERVA, TO WHOM HER PATRONAGE SHE COMMENDED HER MAINTENANCE AND EDUCATION. JOSEPHUS (ANT. JUD. XI. 2) RELATES THAT CALIGULA PRONOUNCED IT TO BE A DOUBTFUL QUESTION WHETHER HE OR JUPITER HAD THE GREATER SHARE IN HER PATRONAGE. SHE GAVE EARLY PROOF OF HER LEGITIMACY BY THE FEROCITY AND CRUELTY OF HER DISPOSITION, FOR, WHILE YET AN INFANT, SHE WOULD TEAR WITH HER OWN NAILS THE EYES AND FACES OF THE CHILDREN WHO PLAYED WITH HER. ON THE DAY THAT HER FATHER WAS ASSASSINATED, SHE WAS KILLED BY BEING DASHED AGAINST A WALL, A. D. 41, WHEN SHE WAS ABOUT TWO YEARS OLD.

4. JULIA DRUSILLA, DAUGHTER OF HERODES AGrippa, KING OF THE JEWS, BY HIS WIFE CYPRUS, AND SISTER OF HERODES AGrippa II., WAS ONLY SIX YEARS OLD WHEN HER FATHER DIED IN A. D. 44. SHE HAD BEEN ALREADY PROMISED IN MARRIAGE TO EPIPHANES, SON OF ANTIochUS, KING OF COMAGENE, BUT THE MATCH WAS BROKEN OFF IN CONSEQUENCE OF EPIPHANES REFUSING TO PERFORM HIS PROMISE OF CONFORMING TO THE JEWISH RELIGION. HEREUPON Azius, King of EUnea, obtained Drusilla as his wife, and performed the condition of becoming a Jew. Afterwards, Felix, the procurator of Judaea, fell in love with her, and induced her to leave Azius—a course to which she was prompted not only by the fair promises of Felix, but by a desire to escape the annoyance to which she was subjected by the envy of her sister Berenice, who, though ten years elder, vied with her in beauty. She thought, perhaps, that Felix, whom she accepted as a second husband, would be better able to protect her than Azius, whom she divorced. In the Acts of the Apostles (xxiv. 24), she is mentioned in such a manner that she may naturally be supposed to have been present when St. Paul preached before her second husband in A. D. 60. Felix and Drusilla had a son, Agrippa, who perished in an eruption of Mount Vesuvius. (Josephus, Ant. Jud. xii. 7, xx. 5.)

TACITUS (HIST. V. 9) SAYS, THAT FELIX MARRIED DRUSILLA, A DAUGHTER OF CLEOPATRA AND ANTONY. THE DRUSILLA HE REFERS TO, IF ANY SUCH PERSON EVER EXISTED, MUST HAVE BEEN A DAUGHTER OF JUBA AND CLEOPATRA SELENE, FOR THE NAMES AND FATE OF ALL THE OTHER DESCENDANTS OF CLEOPATRA AND ANTONY ARE KNOWN FROM OTHER SOURCES; BUT THE ACCOUNT GIVEN BY JOSEPHUS OF THE PARENTAGE OF DRUSILLA IS MORE CONSISTENT THAN THAT OF TACITUS WITH THE STATEMENT OF HOLY WIT, BY WHICH IT APPEARS THAT DRUSILLA WAS A JEWESS. SOME HAVE SUPPOSED THAT FELIX MARRIED IN SUCCESSION TWO DRUSILLAS, AND CONTENTENCE IS LENT TO THIS OTHERWISE IMPOSSIBLE CONJECTURE BY AN EXPRESSION OF Suetonius (CLAud. 28), WHO CALLS FELIX TRIVM REGINARVM MARITVM. [J. T. G.]

DRUSUS, THE NAME OF A DISTINGUISHED FAMILY OF THE LIVIA GENUS. IT IS SAID BY Suetonius (Tib. 3), THAT THE FIRST LIVIUS DRUSUS ACQUIRED THE COGNOMEN men Drusus for himself and his descendants, by having slain in close combat one Drusus, a chief¬tain of the enemy. This Livius Drusus, he goes on to say, was praetor of Gaul, and, according to one tradition, on his return to Rome, brought from his province the gold which had been paid to the Senones at the time when the Capitol was besieged. This account seems to be as little deserving of credit as the story that Camillus prevented the gold from being paid, or obliged it to be restored in the first instance.

Of the time when the first Livius Drusus flour¬ished, nothing more precise is recorded than that M. Livius Drusus, who was tribune of the plebs in b.c. 122, was his abnepos. This word, which literally means grandson's grandson, may possibly mean indefinitely a more distant descendant, as atuens in Horace (Car. i. 1) is used indefinitely for an ancestor.

Pighius (Annales, i. p. 416) conjectures, that the first Livius Drusus was a son of M. Livius Denter, who was consul in b.c. 302, and that Livius Denter, the son, acquired the agnomen of Drusus in the campaign against the Senones under Cornelius Dolabella, in b.c. 283. It thinks that the descendants of this Livius Denter Drusus assumed Drusus as a family cognomen in place of Denter. There is much probability in this conjecture, if the origin of the name given by Suetonius be correct; for the Senones were so completely subdued by Dolabella and Domitius Calvinus (Appian. Gall. iv. fr. 11, ed. Schweigh.), that they seem to have been annihilated as an independent people, and we never afterwards read of them as being engaged in war against Rome. On this supposition, however, according to the ordinary duration of human life, M. Livius Drusus, the patruus senatus of b.c. 129, must have been, not the abnepos, but the adnepos, or grandson's grandson's son, of the first Drusus, and hence Pighius (i. c.) proposes to read in Suetonius adnepos in place of abnepos.

Suetonius (Tiib. 2) mentions a Claudius Drusus, who erected in his own honour a statue with a diadem at Appii Forum, and endeavoured to get all Italy within his power by overrunning it with his clientae. If we may judge from the position which this Claudius Drusus occupies in the text of Suetonius, he was not later than P. Claudius Pulcher, who was consul in b.c. 249. It is not easy to imagine any rational origin of the cognomen Drusus in the case of this early Claudius, which would be consistent with the account of the origin of the cognomen given by Suetonius in the case of the first Livius Drusus. The asserted origin from the chiefain Drausus may be, as Bayle (Dictionnaire, s. v. Drusus) surmises, one of those fables by which genealogists strive to increase the importance of families. The connexion of the family of Drusus with the first emperors probably reflected a retrospective lustre upon its republican greatness. (Virg. Aen. vi. 823.)

Stemma Drusorum.

3. C. Livius Drusus, Cons. b. c. 147.

4. M. Livius Drusus, Cons. b. c. 112; married Cornelia.

5. C. Livius Drusus.

8. M. Livius Drusus Libo, Consul b. c. 15; adopted by No. 7; married Pompeia?

10. L. Scribonius Libo Drusus, son of No. 8.

11. Nero Claudius Drusus (senior), afterwards Drusus Germanicus; married Antonia, minor.

12. Tiberius Nero Caesar (emperor Tiberius); m. 1. Vipsania Agrippina.

14. Livia; m. 1. C. Caesar; 2. No. 16.

15. Ti. Claudius Drusus Caesar (emperor Claudius); married 1. Urgulilla.

1. M. Livius Drusus, the father, natural or adoptive, of No. 2. (Fast. Capit.)

2. M. Livius M. F. Drusus Aemilianus, the father of No. 3. (Fast. Capit.) Some modern writers call him Aemilianus instead of Aemilius, for transcribers are not agreed as to the correct reading of the Capitoline marbles, which are broken into three fragments in the place where his name is mentioned under the year of his son’s consulship. (Compare the respective Fasti of Marliani, the fabricator Goltzianus, Sigonio, and Pinnaeus, ad A. u. c. 606.)

3. C. Livius M. Aemilius P. M. N. Drusus, was consul in B. C. 147 with P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus. Of his father nothing is known, but it may be inferred with much probability that M. Drusus Aemilianus belonged to the Aemilian gens, and was adopted by some M. Livius Drusus. It is possible, however, that M. Livius Drusus, the grandfather, had by different wives two sons named Marcus, and that one of them was the son of Aemilia, and was called, from his mother, Aemilius. (Dict. of Ant. p. 641, s. v. Nomen.)

There was a Roman jurist, named C. Livius Drusus, who has, by many writers, been identified with the subject of the present article. Cicero (Tusc. Qu. v. 36) mentions Drusus the jurist before mentioning Cn. Aufidius, and speaks of Drusus as from tradition (acceptum), whereas he remembered having seen Aufidius. The jurist Drusus, in his old age, when deprived of sight, continued to give advice to the crowds who used to throng his house for the purpose of consulting him. Hence it has been rather hastily inferred, that Drusus the jurist was anterior to Aufidius, and was never seen by Cicero, and could not have been the son of the Drusus who was consul in n. c. 147. Others are disposed to identify the jurist with the son, No. 5, and there is certainly no absurdity in supposing the son of one who was consul in n. c. 147 to have died at an advanced age before Cicero (born n. c. 106) happened to meet him, or was old enough to remember him. Seeing, however, that Cicero was an active and inquisitive student at 16, and considering the inferences as to age that may be collected from the years when No. 4 and No. 6, the brother and nephew of No. 5, held office, the argument founded upon Tusc. Qu. v. 36 seems to be rather in favour of identifying the jurist with our present No. 3; but, in truth, there are not sufficient data to decide the question. (Rutilius, Vitae JClorum 19; Guili. Grutius, de Vit. JClorum, 1. 4. § 8.)

The jurist, whether father or son, composed works of great use to students of law (Val. Max. viii. 7), although his name is not mentioned by Pomponius in the fragment de Origine Juris. There is a passage in the Digest (19. tit. 1. a. 37, § 1), where Celsius cites and approves an opinion, in which Sex. Aelius and Drusus coincide, to the effect that the seller might bring an equitable action for damages (arbitrium) against the buyer, to recover the expenses of the keep of a slave, whom the buyer, without due cause, had refused to accept. (Maianius, ad XXX JClus. ii. p. 85.)

Priscian (Ars Gram. lib. viii. p. 127, ed. Colon. 1626) attributes to Livius the sentence, “Insolvens libripos esse non potest, neque autestari.” It is probable that the jurist Livius Drusus is here meant, not only from the legal character of the fragment, but because Priscian, whenever he quotes Livius Andronicus or the historian Livy, gives a circumstantial reference to the particular work. (Dirksen, Bruchstücke aus den Schriften der Römischen Juristen, p. 45.)

4. M. Livius C. P. M. Aemilius P. M. N. Drusus, son of No. 3, was tribune of the plebs in the year B. C. 122, when C. Gracchus was tribune for the second time. The senate, alarmed at the progress of Gracchus in the favour of the people, employed his colleague Drusus, who was noble, well educated, wealthy, eloquent, and popular, to oppose his measures and undermine his influence. Against some of the laws proposed by Gracchus, Drusus interposed his veto without assigning any reason. (Appian, B. C. l. 25.) He then adopted the unfair and crooked policy of proposing measures like those which he had thwarted. He steered by the side of Gracchus, merely in order to take the wind out of his sails. Drusus gave to the senate the credit of every popular law which he proposed, and gradually impressed the populace with the belief that the optimates were their best friends. The success of this system earned for him the designation patrum senatus. (Suet. Tit. 3.)

Drusus was able to do with applause that which Gracchus could not attempt without censure. Gracchus was blamed for proposing that the Latins should have full rights of citizenship. Drusus was landed for proposing that no Latin should be disowned by rods even in time of actual military service. Gracchus, in his agrarian laws, reserved the grants of public offices, the argument founded upon Tusc. Qu. 3. (Suet. Augustus, 94.)

for settling 3000 poor citizens in each. He was applauded, and was assisted in carrying the measure. These twelve colonies are supposed by Niebuhr (Hist, of Rome, iv. p. 349) to be the same with those mentioned by Cicero (pro Caecina, 35). In all these measures, the conduct of Drusus was seen to be exempt from sordid motives of gain. He took no part in the foundation of colonies, reserved no portions of land to himself, and left to others the management of business in which the disbursement of money was concerned.

Drusus, on the other hand, was anxious to have the handling of money, and got himself appointed one of the founders of an intended colony at Carthage. The populace, ever suspicious in pecuniary matters, when they saw this, thought that all his fine professions were pretexts for private jobs. Besides, Drusus cleverly took advantage of his absence to wound him through the side of Fulvius Placcus. Placcus was hot-headed and indiscreet, and Drusus contrived to throw the obloquy of his indiscretion and misconduct upon Orthonius. Thus was the policy of the senate and Drusus completely successful. Orthonius was outbid and disgraced, and left to others the management of business in the colonies, reserved no portions of land to himself, and even forced them to retire from their own country, and even forced them to retire from part of their own country, and even forced them to retire from Thrace to the further or Dacian side of the Danube.

Fiorus, iii. 4.) Upon his return, he was welcomed with high honours (Liv. Epit. 138.), and his victory was received with the warmer satisfaction from its following close upon the severe defeat of Crassus in the same quarter. (Dion Cass. Fray. Petrec, 29, ed. Reinmar, i. p. 40.) It is very likely that he obtained a triumph, for Suetonius (Tib. 3) mentions three triumphs of the Livia gens, and only two (of Livius Salinator) are positively recorded. There is, however, no proof that Drusus triumphed. The Fasti Triumphales of this year are wanting, and Varrall (Num. Ant. Fam. Rom. ii. p. 52) has been misled into the quotation of a conjectural supplement as an authority. In a passage in Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 50), which has been relied upon as proving that Drusus triumphed, the words triumphale semen do not refer to the Drusus mentioned immediately before.

Plutarch (Quaest, Rom. vii. p. 119, ed. Reiske) mentions a Drusus who died in his office of censor, upon which his colleague, Armilianus Securus, refused to abdicate, until the tribunes of the plebs ordered him to be taken to prison. It is highly probable that our Drusus is intended, and that his censorship fell in the year b. c. 109, when the remains of the Capitoline marbles show that one of the censors died during his magistracy. (Fasti, p. 237, Basil. 1559.)

5. C. LIVIUS C. F. M. Armilianus n. DRUSUS, was a son of No. 3. Fighins (Annals, ii. 20), contrary to all probability, confounds him with Livius Drusus Claudianus, the grandfather of Tiberius. [See No. 7.] He approached his brother, No. 4, and only with a view to support his character and the weight of his eloquence. (Cic. Brut. 28.) Some have supposed him to be the jurist C. Livius Drusus, referred to by Cicero (Insc. Qu. v. 30) and Valerius Maximus (viii. 7), but see No. 3. Dio (Suid. Vent. Nov. Coll. ii. p. 115, ed. Mai) mentions the great power which the two Drusi acquired by the nobility of their family, their good feeling, and their courteous demeanour. It seems to have been thought, that they could do anything they liked, for, after a certain law had been passed, some one wrote under it in jest, "This law binds all the people but the two Drusi." It is far more likely that two brothers than that, as Mai supposes, a father and son (vls. No. 4 and No. 6) should be thus referred to; and, from the context, we doubt not that No. 4 and the present No. 5, contemporaries of the Gracchi, are designated.

6. M. LIVIUS M. F. C. N. DRUSUS, was a son of No. 4. His ambitious temper manifested itself with precocious activity. From boyhood he never allowed himself a holiday, but, before he was of an age to assume the toga virilis, he frequented the forum, busied himself in trials, and sometimes exerted his influence so effectually with the judges as to induce them to give sentence according to his wish. (Senec. de Brev. Vit. 6.) His character and morals in his youth were pure and severe (Cic. de Off. 23), but a self-sufficient conceit was conspicuous in his actions. When quaestor in Asia, he would not wear the insignia of office: "ne quid iapis esset insignius." (Aurel. Vict. de Vitr. II. 66.) When he was building a house upon the Palatine mount, the architect proposed a plan to prevent it from being overlooked. "No," said he, "rather construct it so that all my fellow-citizens may see everything I do." This house has a name in history: it passed from Drusus into the family of Nicias, and can be traced successively into the hands of Cicero, Censorinus, and Rutulius Silvius. (Vell. Paterc. ii. 15.) Velleius Paterculus slightly differs from Plutarch (Respa. General, Proceps, i. p. 194, ed. Reiske), in regarding this anecdote, and the reply to the architect has been erroneously attributed to an imaginary Julius Drusus Publicola, from a false reading in Plutarch of 'Ioi/Aios- for 'Ei/aios, and a false translation of the epithet 'Oivxwv els.
Drusus inherited a large fortune from his father, the consul; but, in order to obtain political influence, he was profuse and extravagant in his expenditure. The author of the treatise de Fœris Illustribus, usually ascribed to Aurelius Victor, says that, from want of money, he sometimes stooped to unworthy practices. Magnius, a prince of Mauretania, had taken refuge in Rome from the resentment of Bocchus, and Drusus was induced by a bribe to betray him to the king, who threw the wretched prince to an elephant. When Adherbal, son of the king of the Numidians (Micipsa), fled to Rome, Drusus kept him a prisoner in his house, hoping that his father would pay a ransom for his release. These two statements occur in no other author, and the second is scarcely reconcilable with the narrative of Sallust. The same author states, that Drusus was nobile, and gave magnificent games, and that when Remmius, his colleague in the aedilship, suggested some measure for the benefit of the commonwealth, he asked sarcastically, "What's our commonwealth to you?"

Pighius, however (Annales, iii. p. 82), and others, considering that M. Drusus, the son, died in his tribuneship—an office usually held before that of nobile—are of opinion, that Aurelius Victor has confounded several events of the father's life with those of the son.

It appears from Cicero (Brut. 62, pro Mil. 7), that Drusus was the uncle of Cato of Utica, and the great-uncle of Brutus. Those relationships were occasioned by successive marriages of his sister Livia. We agree with Manutius (ad De Fin. illi. 2) in thinking, in opposition to the common opinion, that she was first married to Q. Servilius Caepio (Caepio, No. 8, p. 535, a.), whose daughter was the mother of Brutus. The same author states, that Drusus was nobile, and gave magnificent games, and that when Remmius, his colleague in the aedilship, suggested some measure for the benefit of the commonwealth, he asked sarcastically, "What's our commonwealth to you?"

Cato of Utica; for Cato, according to Plutarch (Cato Min. 95), was perhaps the father of Q. Servilius Caepio who proposed this short-lived law (repealed by another lex Servilia of Servilia Glauceia) was perhaps the father of Q. Servilius Caepio, the brother-in-law of Drusus, but was certainly a different person and of different politics. (See p. 535, a.) The equites abused their power, as the senate had done before them. As farmers of the public revenues, they committed peculation and extortion with an habitual impiety, which assumed in their own view the complexion of a right. When accused, they were tried by accomplices and partisans, and would not be heard winter when wolf devour wolf." On the other hand, in prosecutions against senators of the opposite faction, the equites had more regard to political amimosity than to justice. Even in ordinary cases, where party feeling was not concerned, they allowed their judicial votes to be purchased by bribery and corrupt influence. The recent unjust condemnation of Rutillus Rufus had weakened the senate and encouraged the violence of the equites, when, in n. c. 91, Drusus was made tribune of the plebs in the consulate of L. Marcus Philippus and Sex. Julius Caesar. (Flor. i. c.)

Under the plea of an endeavour to strengthen the party of the senate, Drusus determined to gain over the plebs, the Latins, and the Italic socii. The ardour of his zeal was increased by the attack of the tribunes, the popularity of Sex. Julius Caesar, and the extraordinary combination of events was crowded into the years n. c. 95—91: viz. 1st. the birth of Cato; 2nd. the death of his father; 3rd. the second marriage of Livia; 4th. the births of at least three children by her second husband; 5th. her death; 6th. the rearing of her children in the house of Drusus; 7th. the death of Drusus. Q. Servilius Caepio was the rival of Drusus in birth, fortune, and influence. (Flor. iii. 17.) Originally they were warm friends. As Caepio married Livia, the sister of Drusus, so Drusus married Servilia, the sister of Caepio (γιόνιν ἐπαλληγαν, Dion Cass. Frag. Voeosam. 116, ed. Reimar. vol. I. p. 45). Dion Cassius may be understood to refer to ordinary combination of events; but, according to Pliny, a rupture was occasioned between them from competition in bidding for a ring at a public auction; and to this small event have been attributed the struggles of Drusus for pre-eminence, and ultimately the kindling of the social war. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 6.) The mutual jealousy of the brothers-in-law proceeded to such great lengths, that on one occasion Drusus declared he would throw Caepio down the Tarpeian rock. (De Fir. illi. 66.) of the objects of his restless and self-sufficient spirit to become the arbiter of parties, and he acted from immediate impulses, without considering nicely the result of his conduct. There was deep meaning in the witticism of Granius, the public crier, who, when Drusus saluted him in the ordinary phrase, “Quid agis, Grani?” asked in reply, “Immo vero, tu Drusae, quid agis?” (Cic. pro Pison. 14.)

To conciliate the people, Drusus renewed several of the propositions and imitated the measures of the Gracchi. He proposed and carried laws for the distribution of corn, or for its sale at a low price, and for the assigation of public land (leges frumentariae, agrariae, Liv. Epit. Ixxi.). The establishment of several colonies in Italy and Sicily, which had long been voted, was now effected. (Appian, de Bell. Civ. i. 35.) Nothing could surpass the extravagance of the largesses to which he persuaded the senate to accede. (Tac. Ann. ii. 27.) He declared that he had been so bountiful, that nothing was left to be given, by any one else, but air and dirt, “coelum aut coenum.” (De Vit. Ill. 66; Flor. iii. 17.) It was probably the explanation of the public treasury produced by such lavish expenditure that induced him to debase the silver coinage by the alloy of one-eighth part of brass. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 18.) Presumptuous, arrogant, and rash, he assumed a station to which he was not entitled by authority and experience, notwithstanding the splendour of his birth and the power of his eloquence. His energy went far (as energy like his always will do) in silencing opposition, and begetting submission to his will. Once, when the senate invited his attendance at their place of meeting, he sent a message in answer: “Let them come to me—to the Curia Hostilia, near the Rostra,” and they were so abject as to obey. (Val. Max. ix. 5: § 2: “Cum senatus ad eum missus, ut in Curiam veniret. “Quære non postum,” inquit, “ipse in Hostiliis, propinquum Rostris, id est, ad me venit?” This passage is remarkable for the opposition between Curia and Hostilia; whereas it is ordinarily stated that, in classical writers, Curia, without more, denotes the Curia Hostilia.)

Such conduct naturally produced a retraction of feeling among some proud men, who had a high sense of their own importance, saw the false position in which their party was placed, and disliked pushing extremity. In Cicero (de Orat. iii. 1, 2) we find a description of a scene full of turbulence and inconformity, where Philipps, the consul, inveighs against the senate, while Drusus and the orator Crassus withstood him to the face. From the pride of the senator at the time, the passage of the scene is exceedingly difficult to explain; but we believe that it occurred at a period in the career of Drusus when he had not yet identified himself with the formidable cabals of the Latins and Italians, and when, in spite of his popular measures, he still retained the confidence of the senate, from his resistance to the equites. We believe that the haughty Philipps upbraided the senate for their compliance to Drusus in favouring the plebs, and that it was the unmeasured rebuke of the aristocrat which raised the esprit de corps of the senator Crassus. We know from other sources that Philipps opposed the passing of the agrarian laws of Drusus, and interrupted the tribune while he was haranguing the assembly; whereupon Drusus sent one of his clients, instead of the regular vitor, to arrest the consul. (Val. Max. ix. 5: § 2; Florus, iii. 17, and Asut. de Vit. Ill. vary slightly from each other and from Valerius Maximus.) This order was executed with extreme violence, and Philipps was collared so tightly, that the blood started from his nostrils; upon which Drusus, taunting the luxurious epicureanism of the consul, cried out, “Pah! It is only the gravy of thrushes.” (Schottas, ad Asut. de Vit. Ill. 56.)

Having thus bought over the people (who used to rise and shout when he appeared), and having, by promising to procure for them all the rights of citizenship, induced the Latini and Italic socii to assist him, Drusus was able, by force and intimidation, to carry through his measures concerning the judicini (“legem judiciariorum partituri,” Liv. Epit. Ixxi.). Some writers, following Liv. Epit. Ixxi., speak of his sharing the judicini between the senate and the equites; but his intention seems to have been entirely to transfer the judicini to the senate; for, without any positive exclusion of the equites and lower orders, as long as senators were eligible, it is probable that no names but those of senators would be placed by the praetors upon the lists of judices. (Puchta, Inst. i. § 71.) We accept the circumstantial statement of Appian (B. C. i. 35), according to which the law of Drusus provided that the senate, now reduced below the regular number of 300, should be reinforced by the introduction of an equal number of new members selected from the most distinguished of the equites; and enacted that the senate, thus doubled in number, should possess the judicium. The law seems to have been silent as to any express exclusion of the equites; but it might be implied from its language that such exclusion was contemplated, and, so far as its positive enactment referred to the new members, they were entitled to be placed on the list of judices, qua senators, not qua equites. Nor was there any prospective regulation for supplying from the equestrian order vacancies in the judicial lists. To this part of the law was added a second part, appointing a commission of inquiry into the bribery and corruption which the equites had practised while in exclusive possession of the judicini. (Appian, i. 5; compare Cic. pro Rutil. Post. 7, pro Cluent. 56.)

After Drusus had so far succeeded, the reaction set in rapidly and strongly. The Romans, who were usually led as much by feeling as by calculation, required to be managed with peculiar tact and delicacy; but Drusus had a rough way of going to work, which, even in the moment of success, set in angry against him the vanity and pride of the senators; and in his measures themselves there appeared to be a species of triunviri, while which, it seemed intended to dispel new, was ultimately found to be unsatisfactory to all. It may be that he was actuated by a single-minded desire to do equal justice to all, and to remedy abuses wherever they might lurk, careless of the offence which his reforms might give; but even his panegyrists among the ancients do not view his character in this light. Whatever else was his motives (and we believe them to have been complex—nulla varie molobatur), he appeared to be the slave of many masters. Mob-popularity is at best but fleeting, and those of the people who had not been favoured with the distribution of lands were discontented at the lack of their mere fortunate competitors. The Roman populace hated the foreigners who were striving to obtain equal franchise with themselves. The great body of the equites, who were very numerous, felt all the invi delays in raising a select few to the rank of the ancient body. Moreover, they now suspected the ambition of Drusus, and did not choose to accept the transfer of the jurisdiction at his hands. The Latins and socii demanded of him with stern importunity the price of their recent assistance; and depriving them of those possessions which they had hitherto occupied by stealth or force. They even began to tremble for their property. (Apian. l. c.; Asconius, in C. pro Dom. iii. 66.)

In this state of affairs, the united dissatisfaction of all parties enabled the senate, upon the proposition of Philipps, who was augur as well as consul, to undo, by a few short lines, what had lately been done. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 6, 12.) The senate now, in pursuance of that anomalous constitution which practically allowed a plurality of supreme legislative powers, voted that all the laws of Drusus, being carried against the auspices, were null and void from the beginning. (Scacc. v. 12; Obsequ. 114.)

Weary and vexed with the expectation of danger and confusion that lay before him. (Senec. de Brut. v. t.) Then came the news of strange portents and fearful auguries which they had hitherto occupied by stealth or force. Hence the expression

But worse than all was the apprehended inqui
dation of Philipps, who was augur as well as consul, with the two-edged weapons of intrigue, sedition, and conspiracy, which he had neither force nor skill to wield. He was like the Gracchi with their lustre and void from the beginning. (Senec. de Brut.)

M. Drusi legibus populum non teneri.” (Cic. pro Cornel. fr. ii. vol. iv. p. 419; Asconius, in C. pro Cornel. p. 68, ed. Uroli.) The lex Cecilia Didia required that a law, before being put in the comitia, should be promulgated for three months (17 days), and directed that several distinct clauses should not be put to the vote in a lump. If we may trust the suspected oration pro Domus (c. 16 and c. 20), the senate resolved that, in the passing of the laws of Drusus, the provisions of the lex Cecilia Didia had not been observed.

The assassination of Drusus had far-reaching consequences. The political opponents of Drusus treated his death as a just retribution for his injuries to the state. This sentiment breathes through the same high spirit, says Seneca (Caes. ad Marc. ii. 14.)

Assassinated as he was in his own hall, the image of his father was sprinkled with his blood; and, while he was dying, he turned to those who surrounded him, and asked, with characteristic arrogance, based perhaps upon conscious honesty of purpose, "Friends and neighbours, when will the commonwealth have a citizen like me again?"

Though he was cut off in the flower of manhood, even rumoured that, to escape from inextricable distress, he probably does not mean that it was the very hand of Varrus which perpetrated the act.

Cornelia, the mother of Drusus, a matron worthy of her illustrious name, was present at the death-scene, and bore her calamity—a calamity the more bitter because unsweetened by vengeance—with the same high spirit, says Seneca (Cons. ad Marc. 16.), with which her son had carried his laws.

After the fall of Drusus, his political opponents treated his death as a just retribution for his injuries to the state. This sentiment breathes through a fragment of a speech of C. Carbo, the younger (M. Liv. 26.), which has been celebrated by Cic. (Corr. ii. 83.)

by a Livius Drusus. Hence he is supposed to have been adopted by Livius Drusus Claudianus [No. 7], whose name, date, want of male children, and political associations with the party opposed to Caesar, favour the conjecture. He is also supposed to have been the father of the Libo Drusus, or Drusus Libo [No. 10], who conspired against Tiberius. As Pompey the Great would appear or Drusus Libo [No. 10], who conspired against Tiberius. As Pompey the Great would appear, or Drusus Libo, the father, is supposed to have married a granddaughter of Pompey. Still there are difficulties in the pedigree, which have perplexed Lipsius, Gronovius, Ityckius, and other learned commentators on the cited passage in Tacitus. M. de la Nauze thinks that the father was a younger brother of Scribonia, the wife of Tiberius, and that he married his grandniece, the daughter of Sextus Pompeius. According to this explanation, he was about 26 years younger than his elder brother, L. Scribonius Libo, who was consul B. C. 34, and whose daughter was married to Sextus Pompeius. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 16; Appian, B. C. v. 139.)

There is extant a rare silver coin of M. Drusus Libo, bearing on the obverse a naked head, supposed by some to be the head of his natural, by others of his adoptive, father. On the reverse is a serra curulis, between cornucopiae and branches of olive, with the legend M. Livi L. P. Augustus, as he grew up, was more liked by the people than was his brother. He was free from dark reserve, and in him the character of the Claudian race assumed its most attractive, as in Tiberius its most odious, type. In everything he did, there was an air of high breeding, and the noble courtesy of his manner was set off by a peculiar beauty of person and dignity of form. He possessed in a high degree the winning quality of always exhibiting towards his friends an even and consistent demeanour, without capricious alternations of familiarity and distance, and he seemed adapted by nature to sustain the character of a prince and statesman. (Tac. Ann. vii. 15; Senec. Epist. 70.)

11. NERO CLAUDIUS DRUSUS (commonly called by the moderns Drusus Senior, to distinguish him from his nephew, the son of Tiberius), had originally the praenomen Decimus, which was afterwards exchanged for Nero; and, after his death, received the honourable agnomen Germanicus, which is appended to his name on coins. Hence care should be taken not to confound him with the celebrated Germanicus, his son. His parents were Livia Drusilla (afterwards Julia Augusta) and Tiberius Claudius Nero, and through both of them he inherited the noble blood of the Claudii, who had never yet admitted an adoption into their gens. From the adoption of his maternal grandfather [No. 7] by a Livius Drusus, he became legally one of the representatives of another illustrious race. He was a younger brother of Tiberius Nero, who was afterwards emperor. Augustus, having fallen in love with his mother, procured a divorce between her and her husband, and married her himself. Drusus was born in the house of Augustus three months after this marriage, in a. c. 38, and a suspicion prevailed that Augustus was more than a step-father. Hence the satirical verse was often in men's mouths, Tota euripousa kal triltiusa radia.

Augustus took up the boy, and sent him to Nero his father, who soon after died, having appointed Augustus guardian to Tiberius and Drusus. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 44; Vell. Pat. ii. 62; Suet. Aug. 62, Claud. 1; Prudent. de Simulacra Livica.)

Drusus, as he grew up, was more liked by the people than was his brother. He was free from dark reserve, and in him the character of the Claudian race assumed its most attractive, as in Tiberius its most odious, type. In everything he did, there was an air of high breeding, and the noble courtesy of his manner was set off by a peculiar beauty of person and dignity of form. He possessed in a high degree the winning quality of always exhibiting towards his friends an even and consistent demeanour, without capricious alternations of familiarity and distance, and he seemed adapted by nature to sustain the character of a prince and statesman. (Tac. Ann. vii. 15; Vell. Pat. iv. 97.)

It was known that he had a desire to see the commonwealth restored, and the people cherished the hope that he would live to give them back their ancient liberties. (Suet. Claud. 1; Tac. Ann. i. 33.)

He wrote a letter to his brother, in which he breached the notion of compelling Augustus to resign the empire; and this letter was betrayed by Tiberius to Augustus (Suet. Tib. 50.) But notwithstanding this indication that the affection of Tiberius was either a hollow pretence, or yielded to his sense of duty to Augustus, the brothers maintained during their lives an appearance, at least, of fraternal tenderness, which, according to Valerius Maximus (v. 5. § 3), had only one parallel—the friendship of Castor and Pollux! In the domestic relations of life, the conduct of Drusus was exemplary. He married the beautiful and illustrious...
Drusus. His name is the only one that has come down to us of the sons of Antonia, a daughter—and, according to the preponderance of authority (Antonia, No. 5), the younger daughter—of M. Antonius the triumvir by Octavia, the sister of Augustus. Their mutual attachment was unusually great, and the unsullied fidelity of Drusus to the marriage-bed became a theme of popular admiration and applause in a profligate age. It is finely referred to by Pedo Albinovannus in his beautiful poem upon the death of Drusus:

Tu concessus amor, tu solus et ultimus illi,
Tu requies fessae grata laboris eis.

He must have been young when he married; for, though he died at the age of thirty, he had several children who died before him, besides the three, Germanicus, Livilla, and Claudius, who survived their father.

He began public life early. In n. c. 19, he obtained permission, by a decree of the senate, to fill all magistracies five years before the regular time. (Dion Cass. liv. 10.) In the beginning of n. c. 16, we find him presiding with his brother at a gladiatorial show; and when Augustus, upon his departure for Gaul, took Tiberius, who was then praetor, along with him, Drusus was left in the city to discharge, in his brother's place, the important duties of that office. (Dion Cass. liv. 19.) In the following year he was made quaestor, and sent against the Rhinians, who were accused of having committed depredations upon Roman travellers and allies of the Romans. The mountainous parts of the country were inhabited by banditti, who levied contributions from the peaceful cultivators of the plains, and plundered all who did not purchase freedom from the attack by special agreement. Every chance male who fell into their hands was murdered. Drusus attacked and routed them near the Tridentine Alps, as they were about to make a foray into Italy. His victory was not decisive, but he obtained posthumous honours as his reward.

The Rhinians, after being repulsed from Italy, continued to infest the frontier of Gaul. Tiberius was then despatched to join Drusus, and the brothers jointly defeated some of the tribes of the Xantii and Vindelici, while others submitted without resistance. A tribute was imposed upon the country. The greater part of the population was carried off, while enough were left to till the soil without being able to rebel. (Dion Cass. liv. 22; Strab. iv. fin.; Pioius, iv. 12.) These exploits of the young step-sons of Augustus are the theme of a spirited ode of Horace.

On the return of Augustus to Rome from Gaul, in n. c. 13, Drusus was sent into that province, which had been driven into revolt by the exaction of the Roman governor, Licinius, who, in order to increase the amount of the monthly tribute, had divided the year into fourteen months. Drusus made a new assessment of property for the purpose of taxation, and in n. c. 12 quelled the tumults which had been occasioned by his financial measures. (Liv. Epit. cxvii. cxvii.) The Sambri and their allies, under pretence of attending an annual festival held at Lyons, at the altar of Augustus, had fomented the dissatisfaction of the Gallic chieftains. In the tumults which ensued, their troops had crossed the Rhine. Drusus now drove them back into the Batavian island, and pursued them in their own territory, laying waste the greater part of their country. He then followed the course of the Rhine, sailed to the ocean, sub-

Drusus was the first Roman general who penetrated to the German ocean. It is probable that he united the military design of reconnoitering the coast with the spirit of adventure and scientific discovery. (Tac. Germ. 34.) From the migratory character of the tribes he subdued, it is not easy to fix their locality with precision; and the difficulty of geographical exactness is increased by the alterations which time and the elements have made in the face of the country. Mammert and others identify the Dollart with the place where the fleet of Drusus went ashore; but the Dollart first assumed its present form in A. D. 1277, and Wilhelm (Feldzüge der Nero Claudius Drusus im Nördlichen Deutschland) makes the Jahe, westward of the mouth of the Weser, the scene of this misadventure. It is by no means certain by what course Drusus reached the ocean, although it is the general opinion that he had already constructed a canal uniting the eastern arm of the Rhine with the Yssel, and so had opened himself a way by the Zuiderzee. This opinion is confirmed by a passage in Tacitus (Ann. ii. 8), where Germanicus, upon entering the Fossa Drusiana, prays for the protection of his father, who had gone the same way before him, and then sails by the Zuiderzee (Laetus Pleves) to the ocean, up to the mouth of the Ems (Amisia). To this expedition of Drusus may perhaps be referred the naval battle in the Ems mentioned by Strabo (vii. init.), in which the Bructeri were defeated, and the subjugation of the islands on the coast, especially Byrachium (Borkum). (Strab. vii. 34; Phil. H. N. iv. 13.) Ferdinand Wachter (Enseh und Gruber’s Encyclopädie, s. v. Drusus) thinks, that the canal of Drusus must have been too great a work to be completed at so early a period, and that Drusus could not have had time to run up the Ems. He supposes, that Drusus sailed to the ocean by one of the natural channels of the river, and that the inconvenience he experienced and the geographical knowledge he gained led him to avail himself of the capabilities afforded by the Dollart for a safer junction with the ocean; that his works on the Rhine were probably begun in this campaign, and were not finished until some years afterwards. The precise nature of those works cannot now be determined. They appear to have consisted not only of a canal (fossa), but of a dyke or mound (agger, moles) across the Rhine. Suetonius seems to use even the word fossae in the sense of a mound, not a canal. “Terra Tiberiana fossis novi et immensi operis effict, quae nucre adhuc Drusinae vacuant.” (Claud. 1.) Tacitus (Ann. xii. 33) says, that Paulinus Pompeius, in A. D. 56, completed the agger corrosus Rheno which had been begun by Tiberius sixty-three years before; and afterwards relates that Civils, by destroying the moles formed by Drusus, allowed the waters of the Rhine to rush down and inundate the side of Gaul. (Hist. v. 10.) The most probable opinion seems to be, that Drusus dug a canal from the Rhine near Arnhem to the Yssel, near Doesberg (which bears a trace of his name), and that he also widened the bed of the narrow outlet which at that time connected the Locus Flevis with the ocean. These were his fossae. With regard to his anger or noles, it is supposed that he partly dammed up the south-western arm of the Rhine (the Vahalis or Waal), in order to allow more water to flow into the north-eastern arm, upon which his canal was situated. But this hypothesis as to the situation of the dyke is very doubtful. Some modern authors hold that the Yssel ran into the Rhine, and did not run into the Zuyderee, and that the chief work of Drusus consisted in connecting the Yssel with a river that ran from Zutphen into the Zuyderee.

He did not tarry long at Rome. On the commencement of spring he returned to Germany, subdued the Usipetes, built a bridge over the Lippe, invaded the country of the Sicambri, and passed on through the territory of the Cherusci as far as the Viaurges (Wesser). This he was able to effect from meeting with no opposition from the Sicambri, who were engaged with all their forces in fighting against the Chatti. He would have gone on to cross the Weser had he not been deterred (such were the ostensible reasons) by scarcity of provisions, the approach of winter, and the evil (such were the ostensible reasons) by scarcity of provisions, the approach of winter, and the evil forebodings, of which there was no lack. There had been horrible storms and inundations in the winter months, and the lightning had struck three temples at Rome. (Ib. l. 401; Dion Cass. iv.) He attacked the Chatti, won a hard-fought battle, penetrated to the country of the Suevi, gave the Marcomanni (who were a portion of the Suevi) a signal defeat, and with the arms taken as spoil erected a mound as a trophy. It was now thought by some who identify the Aliso with the Lise, to be Lisbom in the district of Paderborn; by others, who identify the Aim, to be the modern Elsen Neuhaus in the district of Munster. Drusus had breathing time to build three temples at Rome. (Ib. 1. 401; Dion Cass. iv. 21.) The course that Drusus took on his way to the Elbe cannot be determined. Florus (iv. 12) speaks of his making roads through (pauperi) the Hercynian forest, and Wilhelm (Poldische, etc. p. 59) thinks that he advanced through Thuringia. Drusus endeavoured in vain to cross the Elbe. (Dion Cass. iv. init.; Eutrop. iv. 13.) A miraculous event occurred: a woman of dimensions greater than human appeared to him, and said to him, in the Latin tongue, "Whether good or ill, insatiable Drusus? The Fates forbid thee to advance, Away! The end of thy deeds and thy life is nigh." Dion Cassius cannot help believing the fust of the apparition, seeing that the prophetic warning was so soon fulfilled! Thus deterred by the guardian Genius of the land, Drusus hastened back to the Rhine, after erecting trophies on the banks of the Elbe. Suetonius (Claud. i.) varies from Dion Cassius in the particulars of this legend, and some of the moderns endeavour to explain it by referring the denunciation to a German prophetess or Wala. On his retreat, wolves howled round the camp, and carried all before him to the Elbe. (Messalla Corvin. de Aug. Prop. 59; Ped. Albin. l. 17, 113; Aur. Vict. Epist. i.; Orosius, iv. 21.) The course that Drusus took on his way to the Elbe cannot be determined. Florus (iv. 12) speaks of his making roads through (pauperi) the Hercynian forest, and Wilhelm (Poldische, etc. p. 59) thinks that he advanced through Thuringia. Drusus endeavoured in vain to cross the Elbe. (Dion Cass. iv. init.; Eutrop. iv. 13.) Suetonius (Claud. i.) varies from Dion Cassius in the particulars of this legend, and some of the moderns endeavour to explain it by referring the denunciation to a German prophetess or Wala. On his retreat, wolves howled round the camp, two strange youths appeared on horseback among the intrenchments, the screams of women were heard, and the stars raged about in the sky. (Ped. Albin. l. 405.) Such were the superstitious fears which oppressed the minds of the Romans, who would rather flatter themselves that they were submitting to supernatural forces than avoiding the human might of dangerous enemies. Between the Elbe and the Solda (probably the Thurinian Saul), death overtook Drusus. According to the Epitomiser of Livy (ex. l. whose last books contained a full account of these transactions), the horse of Drusus fell upon his leg, and Drusus died of the fracture on the thirtieth day after the accident. Of the numerous writers who mention the death of Drusus, no one besides alludes to the broken leg. Suetonius, whose history is a rich receptacle of scandal, mentions the incredible report that Drusus was poisoned by Augustus, after having disobeyed an order of the emperor for his recall. It is indeed probable enough that the emperor thought he had advanced far enough, and that it would be unwise to exasperate into hostility the inoffensive tribes beyond the Elbe. Tiberius, Augustus, and Livia were in Pavia (Ticinum) when the tidings of the dangerous illness of Drusus reached them. Tiberius with extraordinary speed crossed the Alps, performing a journey of 200 Roman miles through a difficult and dangerous country, without stopping day or night, and arrived in time to close the eyes of his brother. (Plin. H. N. xii. 29; Val. Max. v. 5; Ped. Albin. l. 89; Senec. Consol. ad Polyc. 84.) Drusus, though at the point of death, had yet presence of mind enough to command, that Tiberius should be received with all the distinction due to a consular and an imperator.

The summer camp where Drusus died was called Scoderna, the Accursed. The corpse was carried in a marching military procession to the winter-quarters of the army at Mogontiacum (Meyence) upon the Rhine, Tiberius walking all the way as chief mourner. The troops wished the funeral to be celebrated there, but Tiberius brought the body to Italy. It was burnt in the field of Mars, and the ashes deposited in the tomb of Augustus, who composed the verses that were inscribed upon his sepulchral monument, and wrote in prose a memoir of his life. In a funeral oration held by Augustus in the Flaminian Circus, he exclaimed, "I pay the gods to make my adopted sons Celius and Lucius like Drusus, and to vouchsafe to me as honourable a death as his."

Among the honours paid to Drusus the cognomen Germanicus was deigned to him and his posterity. A marble arch with trophies was erected to his memory on the Appian Way, and the representation of this arch may be seen upon extant coins, as for example, in the coin annexed, which was struck by order of Augustus. He had a cenotaph on the Rhine, an altar near the Lippe (Tac. Ann. ii. 7), and Eusebius (Carmina ad A. D. 43) speaks of a Drusus, the nephew of the emperor Claudius, who had a monument at Meyence; but here Drusus Senior seems to be meant, and there is probably a confusion between the son and the father of Germanics. It is to the latter that the antiquaries of Meyence refer the Befelsteins and the Felsusteins. Besides the coins of Drusus, several ancient signet-rings with his effigy have been preserved (Lippert, D doctractol, i. No. 610-12, ii. No. 241 and No. 324); and among the bronzes found at Herculanum there is one which is supposed to contain a full-length likeness of Drusus.

In the preceding narrative the dates have been collected from Dion Cassins and the Epitomiser of Livy. In assigning the precise date of events not mentioned by those writers, it is often necessary to have recourse to uncertain conjecture. The misery that Drusus must have occasioned among the German tribes was undoubtedly excessive. Some antiquaries have imagined that the German impression "Das dich dcr Drus hole," may be traced to the traditional dread of this terrible conqueror. The country was widely devastated, and immense multitudes were carried away from their homes and transplanted to the Gallic bank of the Rhine. Such was the horror occasioned by the advance of the Romans, that the German women often dashed their babes against the ground, and then flung their mangled bodies in the faces of the soldiers. (Oros. vi. 21.) Drusus himself possessed great animal courage. In battle he endeavoured to engage in personal combat with the chieftains of the enemy, in order to earn the glory of the spolia opima. He had no contemptible foe to contend against, and though he did escape unscathed—though, as Varus soon had occasion to feel, the Germanic spirit was not quelled—he certainly accomplished an important work in subjugating the tribes between the Rhine and the Weser, and erecting fortresses to preserve his conquests. According to Florus, he erected upwards of fifty fortresses along the banks of the Rhine, besides building two bridges across that river, and establishing garrisons and guards on the Meuse, the Weser, and the Elbe. He impressed the Germans not less by the opinion of his intellect and character than by the terror of his arms. They who resisted had to dread his unflinching firmness and severity, but they who submitted might rely on his good faith. He did not, like his great-grandfather Varus, rush into opposition by tyrannous insubordination or wanton cruelty to the conquered. Whether, educated as he was in scenes of bloodshed, he would have fulfilled the expectations of the people, had he lived to attain the empire, it is impossible to pronounce. He was undoubtedly, in his kind, one of the great men of his day. To require that a Roman general, in the heat of conquest, should shew mercy to people who, according to Roman ideas, were ferocious and dangerous barbarians, or should pause to balance the cost against the glory of success, would be to ask more than could be expected of any ordinary mortal in a similar position. It is not fair to view the characters of one age by the light of another; for he who has lived, says Schiller, so as to satisfy the best of his own time, has lived for all times.

16. Drusus Caesar, commonly called by modern writers Drusus Junior, to distinguish him from his uncle Drusus, the brother of Tiberius (No. 11); was the son of the emperor Tiberius by his first wife, Vipsania, who was the daughter of Agrippa by Pomponia, the daughter of Atticus. Thus, his great-grandfather was only a Roman knight, and his descent on the mother's side was by no means so splendid as that of his cousin Germanicus, who and Scribonia; but his wife was neither so popular nor so prolific as Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus. However, she bore him three children—two sons, who were twins, and a daughter. Of the twins, one died shortly after his father, and the other, Tiberius, was murdered by the emperor Caligula. The daughter, Julia, was first married to Nero, son of Germanicus, and, after his death, she carried the noble blood of the Caesars into the quaternion family of the Brutidii, by uniting herself with C. Rubellius Blandus. (Tac. Ann. vi. 27; Juv. Sat. viii. 40.) As long as Germanicus lived, the court was divided between the parties of Germanicus and Drusus, and Tiberius artfully held the balance of favour between them, taking care not to declare which should be his successor. Notwithstanding so many circumstances which were likely to produce alienation and jealousy, it is one of the best traits in the character of Drusus, that he always preserved a cordial friendship for Germanicus, and, upon his death, was kind to his children. (Tac. Ann. ii. 48, iv. 4.) When Piso, relying on the ordinary looseness of his nature after the death of Germanicus, endeavoured to secure the protection of Drusus, Drusus replied to his overtures with a studied ambiguity, which appeared to be a lesson of the emperor's craft, for his own disposition was naturally frank and unguarded. (Ann. iii. 8.) Though he had not the dissimulation of Tiberius, he was nearly his equal in impurity and in cruelty. He delighted in slaughter, and such was his ferocity, that the sharpest sword-blades took from him the name of Drusine blades. (Dion Cass. vii. 13.) He was not only a drunkard himself, but he forced his guests to drink to excess. Plutarch relates how a physician was treated, who was detected in an attempt to keep himself sober by taking bitter almonds as an antidote to the effects of wine. (Sympos. i. 6.) Tiberius behaved harshly to his son, and often upbraided him, both in public and private, for his debaucheries, mingling threats of disinheritance with his upbrowings. (Ann. vi. 24–30.) After his return to Rome, he was made consul in A.D. 15, and, at the gladiatorial games which he gave in conjunction with Germanicus (his brother by adoption), he made himself so remarkable by his sanguinary taste for vulgar blood, as even to offend the squeamishness of Roman spectators. (Ann. i. 76.) He degraded the dignity of his office by his excesses, and by his fondness for players, whom he encouraged in their factions and riots, in opposition to his father's laws. In one of his ordinary ebullitions of passion, he pummelled a Roman knight, and, from this exhibition of his pugilistic propensities, obtained the nickname of Castor. (Dion Cass. iv. 14.) In the following year Tiberius sent him to Illyricum, not only to teach him the art of war, and to make him popular with the soldiery, but to remove him from the dissipations of the city. It is not easy to determine the exact scene of his operations, but he succeeded in fomenting dissension among the Germanic tribes, and destroyed the power of Maroboduus. For these successes an ovation was decreed to him by the senate. In the year A.D. 21, he was consul a second time, and the emperor was his colleague. In A.D. 22, he was promoted to the still higher dignity of the "tribunicia potestas," a title devised by Augustus to avoid the obloquy attending the name of king or dictator. By this title subsequent emperors counted the years of their reign upon their coins. It rendered the power of intercession and the sacrosanct character of tribunus plebis compatible with patrician birth. To confer it upon Drusus was clearly to point him out as the intended successor to the empire. (Ann. iii. 56.) On one occasion Drusus, who regarded Sejanus as a rival, gave way to the impetuosity of his temper, and struck the favourite upon the face. The ambition of Sejanus had taught him to aspire to the empire, and to plot against all who stood in his way. The desire of vengeance was now added to the stimulus of ambition. He turned to Livia, the wife of Drusus, seduced her affections, persuaded the adulteress to become the murderer of her husband, and promised that he would marry her when Drusus was got rid of. Her physician Eudemus was made an accomplice in the conspiracy, and a poison was administered to Drusus by the enmarched Lygus, which terminated his life by a lingering disease, that was supposed at the time to be the consequence of intemperance. (Suet. Tib. 62.) This occurred in A.D. 23, and was first brought to light eight years afterwards, upon the information of Apicata, the wife of Sejanus, supported by the confessions, elicited by torture, of Eudemus and Lygus. (Ann. iv. 3, 8, 11.) The funeral of Drusus was celebrated with the greatest external honours, but the people were pleased at heart to see the chance of succession revert to the house of Germanicus. Tiberius bore the death of his only son with a cool equanimity which indicated a want of natural affection. The annexed coin contains on the obverse the head of Drusus, with DRUSVS CAESAR TR. AUG. P. DIVI AUG. N., and on the reverse PONTIF. TRIBVN. POTEST. ITR. 17. NERO. [NERO.] 18. DRUSUS, a son of Germanicus and Agrippina. In A.D. 23, he assumed the toga virilis, and the senate went through the form of allowing him to be a candidate for the quaeatorship five years before the legal age. (Tac. Ann. iv. 4.) Afterwards, as we learn from Suetonius (Caligula, 12), he was made augur. He was a youth of an unamiable disposition, in which cunning and ferocity were mingled. His elder brother Nero was higher in the favour of Agrippina, and stood between him and the hope of succession to the empire. This produced a deep hatred of Nero in the envious and ambitious mind of Drusus. Sejanus, too, was anxious to succeed Tiberius, and sought to remove one of the way all who from their parentage would be likely to oppose his schemes. Though he already meditated the destruction of Drusus, he first chose to take advantage of his estrangement from Nero, and engaged him in the plots against his elder brother, which ended in the banishment and death of that wretched prince. (Ann. iv. 60.) Tiberius had witnessed with displeasure the marks of public favour which were exhibited towards Nero and Drusus as members of the house of Germanicus, and glad and worldlylyponsored the plans that were contrived for their destruction. He declared in the senate his disapprobation of the public prayers which had been offered for their health, and this indication was enough to encourage accusers. Aemilia Lepida, the wife of Drusus, a woman of the most obscure character, made frequent charges against him. (Ann. vi. 40.) The words which he spoke, when heated with wine or roused to anger, were reported to the palace, and represented by the emperor to the senate, in a.d. 30, in a document which contained every charge that could be collected, heightened by invective. Drusus, like his elder brother, was condemned to death as an enemy of the state; but Tiberius kept him for some years imprisoned in a small chamber in the lowest part of the palace, intending to put him forward as a leader of the people, in case any attempt to seize the supreme command should be made by Sejanus. Finding, however, that a belief prevailed that he was likely to become reconciled to Agrippina and her son, with his usual love of baffling expectations, and veiling his intentions in impenetrable obscurity, he gave orders, in a.d. 38, that Drusus should be starved to death. Drusus lived for nine days after this cruel sentence, having prolonged his miserable existence by devouring the tow with which his mattress was stuffed. (Suet. Tib. 54; Tac. Ann. vi. 23.)

An exact account had been kept by Actius, a centurion, and Didymus, a freedman, of all that occurred in his dungeon during his long incarceration. In this journal were set down the names of the slaves who had been killed or terrified him when he attempted to leave his chamber, the savage treatment administered to him by the centurion, his secret murmurs, and the words he uttered when perishing with hunger. Tiberius, after his death, went to the senate, inveighed against the shameful profiacy of his life, his desire to destroy his relatives, and his disaffection to the state; and proceeded, in proof of these charges, to order the journal of his sayings and doings to be read. This occurred a few days after he had been engaged to marry a daughter of Sejanus, and yet there were people who reported that he had been fraudulently put to death by Sejanus. (Suet. Claud., 27; Tac. Ann. iii. 29.)

24. CLAUDIA. [Claudia, No. 15, p. 762, b.]
25. DRUSILLA. [Drusilla, No. 3.]
26. DECIMUS DRUSUS. In Dig. 1. tit. 13, § 2, the following passage is quoted from Ulpius:—

"Ex quaestoribus quibus sollicitus provinciarum sortiri es Senatori-consulato, quod factum est Decimo Druso et Porcius Consulibus. It has been common supposed that Ulpius here refers to a general decree of the senate, made in the consulship he names, and directing the mode of allotting provinces to quaestors in general. We rather believe him to mean that it was usual for the senate, from time to time, to make special decrees relating to the allotment of provinces to particular quaestors, and that he intends to point out the mode of allotting which had been adopted in this case. (Comp. C. Philipp, ii. 20.)"

Had the former meaning been intended, Ulpius would probably have said ex Senatus-consulto, quod factum est. It is uncertain who Decimus Drusus was, and when he was consul. The brothers Kriigel, in the Leipzig edition of the Corpus Juris, erroneously refer his consulship to a. u. c. 745 (i. 9), when Nero Claudius Drusus (the brother of the emperor Tiberius) and Crispinus were consuls. Piglius (Annal, ad A. U. C. 677) proposes the unauthorized reading D. Bruto et Amelio for D. Drusus et Porcius, and in this conjecture is followed by Bich. (Hist. Jur. Rom. p. 208, ed. Gurn.) Ant. Augustinus (de Nom. Prop. Peaded. in Otto’s Thesaurus, i. p. 256) thinks the consulship must have occurred in the time of the emperors, but it is certain that provinces were assigned to quaestors, ex S. C., during the republic. The most probable opinion is that of Zepernick (Ad Sexcentam de Judicio Centurwirali, p. 100, n.), who holds that D. Drusus was consul suffectus with Lepidius Porcius in b. c. 137, after the forced abdication of Hostilius Marcius.

27. C. DRUSUS. Suetonius (August. 94) gives a miraculous anecdote of the infancy of Augustus, for which he cites an extant work of C. Drusus, —

"Ut scripsit apud C. Drusum certum. Of this writer nothing is known, but it is not unlikely that he was connected with the imperial family. [J. T. G.]

DRY·ADES, [Nymphar.]

DRYAS (Aegae), a son of Are, and brother of Tecerus, was one of the Calydonian hunters. He was murdered by his own brother, who had received an oracle, that his son Iys should fail by the hand of a relative. (Apollod. i. 8, § 2; Hygin.
DUBIUS. 1089

When the Frisians had occupied and taken in to cultivation a tract of land near the banks of the Rhine, Dubius Avitus demanded of them to quit it, or to obtain the sanction of the emperor.

Two ambassadors accordingly went to Rome; but,
although they themselves were honoured and disgusted by the Roman franchise, the Frisians were unwilling to leave the country they had occupied, and those who resisted were cut down by the Roman cavalry. The same tract of country was then occupied by the Amsivarii, who had been driven out of their own country by the Chauci, and implored the Romans to allow them a peaceful settlement. Dubius Avitus gave them a haughty answer, but offered to their leader, Boio-culus, who was a friend of Rome, a piece of land.
Boioculus declined the offer, which he looked upon as a bribe to betray his countrymen; and the Amsivarii immediately formed an alliance with the Tenchteri and Bructeri to resist the Romans by force of arms. Dubius Avitus then called in the aid of Curtilius Mancia and his army. He invaded the territory of the Tenchteri, who were so frightened that they renounced the alliance with the Amsivarii, and their example was followed by the Bructeri, whereby the Amsivarii were obliged to yield. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 54, 56; Plin.
H. N. xxxiv 18.)

DUCAS, MICHAEL (Michael, Μιχαήλ ὁ Δοκίας),
the grandson of another Michael Ducas, who lived during the reign of John Paleologus the younger, and a descendant of the imperial family of the Ducasae, lived before and after the capture of Constantinople by Sultan Mohammed II. in 1453.

This Michael Ducas was a distinguished historian, who held probably some high office under Constantine XI., the last emperor of Constantinople.

After the capture of this city, he fled to Dorino Gatcluzzi, prince of Lesbos, who employed him in various diplomatic functions, which he continued to discharge under Domenico Gatteluzzi, the son and successor of Dorino. In 1455 and 1456, he brought the tribute of the princes of Lesbos and Lemnos to Adrianople, and he also accompanied his master Domenico to Constantinople, where he was going to pay homage to Sultan Mohammed II.

Owing to the prudence of Dorino and Domenico, and the diplomatic skill of Ducas, those two princes enjoyed a happy dependence; but Domenico having died, his son and successor, Nicholas, recovered the hatred of Mohammed, who conquered Lesbos and united it to the Turkish empire in 1462. Ducas survived this event, but his further life is not known. The few particulars we know of him are obtained from his "History." This work begins with the death of John Paleologus I., and goes down to the capture of Lesbos in 1462;
it is divided into forty-five extensive chapters;
the first begins with a very short chronicle from Adam to John Paleologus I., which seems to have been prefixed by some monk; it finishes abruptly with some details of the conquest of Lesbos; the end is mutilated. Ducas wrote most barbarous Greek, for he not only made use of an extraordinary number of Turkish and other foreign words, but he introduced grammatical forms and peculiarities of style which are not Greek at all. He is the most difficult among the Byzantine historians, and it seems that he was totally unacquainted with the classical Greek writers. His defects, however, are merely in his language and style. He is a most faithful historian, grave, judicious, prudent, and impartial, and his account of the causes of the fall of the Greek empire is full of sagacity and wisdom. Ducas, Chalcondylas, and Phranza, are the chief sources for the last period of the Greek empire; but Ducas surpasses both of them by his clear narrative and the logical arrangement of his matters. He was less learned than Chalcondylas, but, on the other hand, he was without doubt thoroughly acquainted with the Turkish language, no small advantage for a man who wrote the history of that time. The edict princes of the work is by Bullaund (Bullialdus), "Historia Byzantina à Joanne Palaeologo I. ad Mehemetum II. Accessit Chronicon breve (χρονικόν στοιχείον), etc. Versiones Latina et Notis ab Ismael Bullialdo," Paris, 1648, fol., reprinted at Venice, 1729, fol. It has been also edited by Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1834, 8vo. Bekker perused the same Parisian codex as Bullaund, but he was enabled to correct many errors by an Italian MS., being an Italian translation of Ducas, with a continuation in the same language, which was found about twenty years ago by Leopold Ranko in one of the libraries at Venice. This MS. was first published by Mastodaxi in the 19th volume of the "Antologia." It also forms a valuable addition to the edition of Bekker. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. viii. pp. 23, 34; Hahnks, Script. Byzant. pp. 620—644; Hammer, Geschichte des Osman. Reiches, vol. ii. p. 69, not b. p. 22.)

DUCENNIIUS GEMINIUS. [Graecus.]

DUCETIUS (Δουκέτιος), a chief of the Sicelians, or Sicels, the native tribes in the interior of Sicily. He is styled king of the Sicelians by Diodorus (xi. 78), and is said to have been of illustrious descent. After the expulsion of the family of Gelen from Syracuse (b. c. 466), Ducetius succeeded in uniting all the Sicelians of the interior into one nation, and in order to give them a common centre founded the city of Palice in the plain below Menaemenon. (Diod. xi. 88.) He had previously made war on the Catanaeans, and expelled from that city the new colonists who had been sent there by Hiero, who thereupon took possession of Inessa, the name of which they changed to Menaemenon. When the tribunes for the next year were to be elected, the colleagues of Ducetius agreed among themselves to continue in office for another year; but the Syracusans also, who defeated him in a great battle. The consequence of this was that he was deserted by all his followers, and fearing to be betrayed into the hands of the enemy, he took the daring resolution of repairing at once to Syracuse as a suppliant, and placing himself at their mercy. The Syracusans spared his life, but sent him into an honourable exile at Corinth. (Diod. xii. 80, 91.) Here however he did not remain long, but having assembled a considerable band of colonists, returned to Sicily, and founded the city of Calcite on the north coast of the island. He was designing again to assert his supremacy over all the Sicelian tribes when his projects were interrupted by his death, about 440, b. c. (Diod. xii. 6, 59; Wesseling, ad loc.) [E. H. B.]

DULIA or DULLIA GENS, plebeian. The plebeian character of this gens is attested by the fact of M. Duilius being tribune of the plebs in b. c. 471, and further by the statement of Dio-

DULIUS. K. Duilius and two of his colleagues were plebeians. In Livy (iv. 3) we indeed read, that all the decemvirs had been patricians; but this must be regarded as a mere hasty assertion which Livy puts into the mouth of the tribune Camuleius, for Livy himself in another passage (v. 13) expressly states, that C. Duilius, the military tribune, was a plebeian. The only cognomen that occurs in this gens is LONGUS. [L. S.]

DULIUS. 1. M. DULIUS, was tribune of the plebs in b. c. 471, in which year the tribunes were for the first time elected in the comitia of the tribes. In the year following, M. Duilius and his colleague, C. Sicinus, summoned Appius Claudius Salibus, the consul of the year previous, before the assembly of the people, for the violent opposition he made to the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius. (Cassius, No. 2.) Twenty-two years later, b. c. 449, when the commons rose against the tyranny of the decemvirs, he acted as one of the champions of his order, and it was on his advice that the plebeians migrated from the Aventine to the Mons Sacer. When the decemvirs at length were obliged to resign, and the commons had returned to the Aventine, M. Duilius and C. Sicinus were invested with the tribuneship a second time, and Duilius immediately proposed and carried a rogation, that consuls should be elected, from whose sentence an appeal to the people should be left open. He then carried a plebeianism, that whoever should leave the plebs without its tribunes, or create any magistrate without leaving an appeal to the people open against his verdicts, should be scourged and put to death. M. Duilius was a noble and high-minded champion of his order, and meted throughout that turbulent period with a high degree of moderation and wisdom. He kept the commons as well as his more vehement colleagues within proper bounds, for after sentence had been passed on the decemvirs, and when the tribunes appeared to wish to carry their revenge still further, Duilius declared that there had been enough punishment and hostility, and that, in the course of that year, he would not allow any fresh accusation to be brought forward, nor any person to be thrown into prison. This declaration at once allayed the fears of the patri-against which a war had been carried on during his consulship, and which had been reduced the year after. (Liv. viii. 16; Dion. xvii. 28, where he is erroneously called Kalasos.)

4. M. DULIUS, was tribune of the plebs in b.c. 357, in which year he and his colleague L. Maenius, carried a rogation against which a war had been carried on during the year, and which prevented the irregular proceedings in the camps of the soldiers, such as the enactment of a law by the soldiers out of Rome, on the proposal of a consul. (Liv. vii. 16, 19.)

5. C. DULIUS, perhaps a brother of No. 4, was appointed, in b.c. 352, by the consuls a quingenarii, for the liquidation of debts, and he and his colleague conducted their business with such skill and moderation, that they gained the gratitude of all parties. (Liv. vii. 21.)

6. C. DULIUS, probably a grandson of No. 4, was consul with Cn. Cornelius Asina in b.c. 260. In that year the coast of Italy was repeatedly ravaged by the Carthaginians, whom the Romans could do nothing, as they were yet without a navy. The Romans then built their first fleet of one hundred quinqueremes and twenty triremes, using for their model a Carthaginian fleet of one hundred quinqueremes and twenty triremes, which had been thrown on the coast of Italy. The sum total of the Roman ships is stated differently, for, according to Orosius (iv. 7), it amounted to 130, and according to Florus (ii. 2) to 160. This fleet is said to have been built in the short space of sixty days. According to some authorities (Zonar. viii. 10; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Illustre, 36; Oros. I. c.), Dullius obtained the command of this fleet, whereas, according to Polybius (i. 229), it was given to his colleague Cn. Cornelius. The same writer states, that at first Cn. Cornelius sailed with 17 ships to Messana, but allowed himself to be drawn towards Lipam, and there fell into the hands of the Carthaginians. (Comp. Poly. 44. vi. 16, § 5.) Soon after, when the Roman fleet approached Sicily, Hannibal, the admiral of the Carthaginians, sailed out against it with 50 ships, but he fell in with the enemy before he was aware of it, and, after having lost most of his ships, he escaped with the rest. The Romans then, on hearing of the misfortune of Cn. Cornelius, sent to Dullius, who commanded the land army, and entrusted to him the command of their fleet. According to Zonaras (viii. 11), Dullius, who commanded the fleet from the beginning, when he perceived the disadvantages under which the clumsy ships of the Romans were labouring, devised the well-known grappling-irons (spondees), by means of which the enemy's ships were drawn towards his, so that the sea-fight was, as it were, changed into a land-fight. (Polyb. i. 22, &c.; Frontin. Strateg. ii. 3 § 24.) When Dullius was informed that the Carthaginians were ravaging the coast of Myile in Sicily, he sailed thither with his whole armament, and soon met the Carthaginians, whose fleet consisted of 180, or, according to Diodorus (xxii. 2, Excerpt. Vat.), of 200 sail. The battle which ensued off Myile and near the Liparean islands, ended in a glorious victory of the Romans, which they mainly owed to their grappling-irons. In the first attack the Carthaginians lost 30, or, according to Polybius (i. 229), they lost 25. This victory is said by Frontinus to have been the first naval victory which the Romans had ever gained, and the memory of it was perpetuated by a column which was erected in the forum, and adorned with the beaks of the conquered ships (Plin. N. N. xxvii. 6; Sil. Ital. Fum. vi. 665, &c.; Quintil. i. 7, § 12), while Dullius himself shewed his gratitude to the gods by erecting a temple to Janus in the forum Oltorium. (Tac. Ann. ii. 49; comp. a somewhat different account of the same event in Frontin. Strateg. i. 5, § 6.) Soon after, when the Romans had received the disadvantages under which the clumsy ships of their enemies, and entrusted to him the command of their fleet.
treaties of his brother, Diptichus, his life was spared, though Caesar had him closely watched. This occurred in B. C. 56. When Caesar was on the point of setting out on his second expedition, he suspected Dunmorix too much to leave him behind in Gaul, and he insisted therefore on his accompanying him. Dunmorix, upon this, fled from the Roman camp with the Aeduan cavalry, but was overtaken and slain. (Cass. B. G. i. 3, 9, 16—20, v. 6, 7; Plut. Caes. 13; Dion Cass. xxxviii. 31, 32.) [E. B.]

DURIS (Δυρίς), of Samos, a descendant of Alcibidas (Plut. Aecb. 32), and brother of Lynceus, lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphia. The early part of his life fell in the period when the Athenians sent 2000 drachmae to Samos, by whom the inhabitants of the island were expelled, B. C. 352. During the absence from his native country, Duris, when yet a boy, gained a victory at Olympia in boxing, for which a statue was erected to him there with an inscription. (Pans, at Olympia in boxing, for which a statue was erected to him there with an inscription. (Pans, b. C. 352.) (Pans, b. C. 352.)

... and his brother Lynceus are mentioned among the pupils of Theophrastus. (Athen. iv. p. 128.) After his return to Samos, he obtained the tyranny, though it is unknown by what means and how long he maintained himself in that position. He must, however, have survived the year B. C. 261, as in one of his works (ap. Plin. H. N. viii. 40) he mentioned an occurrence which belongs to that year. Duris was the author of a considerable number of works, most of which were of a historical nature, but none of them has come down to us, and all we possess of his productions consists of a number of scattered fragments. His principal work was—1. A history of Greece, η τῶν Ἐλλήνων ἱστορία (Dind. xv. 60), or, as others simply call it, ἱστορία. It commenced with the death of the three princes, Amyntas, the father of Philip of Macedonia, Agesiopolis of Sparta, and Jason of Pherae, that is, with the year B. C. 370, and carried the history down at least to B. C. 281, so that it embraced a period of at least 99 years. The number of books of which it consisted is not known, though their number seems to have amounted to about 29. Some ancient writers speak of a work of Duris entitled Μακεδονικά ἱστορία, and the question as to whether this was a distinct work, or merely a part of or identical with the ἱστορία, has been much discussed in modern times. Graevius (Hist. Anecdot. p. 217) and Clinton maintain, that it was a separate work, whereas Vossius and Droysen (Gesch. d. Nachfol. Alex. p. 671, &c.) have proved by the strongest evidence, that the Macedonian is the same work as the ἱστορία. 2. Περὶ Αγαθοδεξία ἱστορία, in several books, the fourth of which is quoted by Suidas. 3. Ξυλον ἄρος, that is, Annals of the history of Samos, is frequently referred to by the ancients, and consisted of at least twelve books. 4. Περὶ Ἐδουισίου καὶ Σιρσέλεους (Athen. iv. p. 194), seems to be the same as Περὶ ἐξηγήσεως. (Athen. xiv. p. 538.) 5. Περὶ νίκης (Eurip. M. p. 469, 49.) 6. Περὶ δούλου. (Tzet. ad Lyoph. 613; Photius, s. v. Σιλενοῦς στέφανος.) 7. Περὶ Ἕρωτος. (Dio. Laert. i. 38, ii. 19.) 8. Περὶ τριγυμνής (Plin. Eelch. lib. 33, 34), may, however, have been the same as the preceding work. 9. Διονύσιος, (Phot. s. v. Διονύσιος; Schol. ad Aristoph.)

Vesp. 1030.) Duris as an historian does not appear to have enjoyed any very great reputation among the ancients. Cicero (ad Att. vi. 1) says of him merely homo in historia satis dilectus, and Dionysius (de Coispp. Verb. 4) reckons him among those of his historians who bestowed no care upon the form of their compositions. His historical versatility also is questioned by Plutarch (Peric. 28; comp. Demosth. 19, Aelcb. 32, Eusm. 1), but he does not give any reasons for it, and it may be that Plutarch was merely struck at finding in Duris things which no other writer had mentioned, and was thus led to doubt the credibility of his statements. The fragments of Duris have been collected by J. G. Hulme, "Duris Samii quae supersunt," Traject. ad Rhen. 1841, 5vo. (Comp. W. A. Schmidts, de Fontib. vet. auctor. in enarrand. expedit. a Gallis in Maced. at Graec. suceptis p. 17, &c.; Panofka, Res Samiorum, p. 96, &c.; Hulmean, l. c. pp. 1 —66.)

DURIS ELA'ITES (Δυρίς Ελαίτης), that is, of Elaea in Acolis, the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (ii. 59, Brunck and Jacob), on the inundation of Ephesus, which happened in the time of Lyamachus, about 322 B. C. It is probably, from the nature of the event, that the poet lived near the time when it took place. Nothing more is known of him. He is a different person from Duris of Samos. (Jacob., xili. p. 889.) Diogenes Laërtius (i. 36) mentions a Duris who wrote on painting, whom Vossius (de Hist. Graec. p. 134, ed. Westermann) supposes to be the same who is mentioned by Piny (xxiii. Ind.), and in another passage of Diogenes (ii. 19). [P. S.]

M. DURMIUS, a triumvir of the mint under Augustus, of whom there are several coins extant. The first two given below contain on the obverse the head of Augustus; and the boar and the lion feeding upon the stag, in the reverses, have reference to the shows of wild beasts, in which Augustus took great delight. The reverse of the third coin contains a youthful head, and the inscription Ἀρώσην; probably refers to the games in honour of Virtus and Honor celebrated in the reign of Augustus. (Comp. Dion Cass. liv. 18; Eckhel, v. pp. 203, 204.) DURO'NIA GENs, plebeian. Of this obscure gens no cognomen, and only four members are known. viz.

1. Duronia, the mother of P. Aebutius. Her second husband was T. Sempronius Rutulus, who seems to have had a dislike to his stepson Aebutius.

2. M. Duronius, was praetor in B.C. 181, and obtained Apulia for his province, to which the Istri were added, for ambassadors from Tarcentum and Brundisium had complained of the piracy of those orgies, in B.C. 186. (Liv. xxxix. 9, 11, 19.)

3. M. Duronius, a Roman senator, who was ejected from the senate in B.C. 97 by the censors, M. Antonius, the orator, and L. Valerius Flaccus; the censors being accused of extortion, persecuting with especial hostility the bishop Theodorus, whom he drove into banishment, confiscating at the same time the revenues of the see. As he advanced in life, however, a singular change was wrought in his character by remorse or some motive now unknown. He became the obedient instrument of pope Gregory, the zealous champion of the rights of Rome, lavished his ill-gotten hoards on the endowment of monasteries, and ended his life in a cloister about A.D. 601. In youth he composed several poetical pieces, which are warmly lauded by Fortunatus of Poitiers; but the only productions of his pen now extant are the Vita S. Marii, abbot of Beyon, an abridgment of which is given in the Acts of the martyrdom, confiscating at the same time the revenues of the see. DYRRHA'CHiUS (Δυρρηχίος), a son of Poseidon and Melissa, from whom the town of Dyrrhachium derived its name; for formerly it was called Epidamnus, after the father of Melissa. (Paus. vi. 16, in fin.; Steph. Byz. a. n. Δυρρηχίος.) [L. S.]

DYSAULES (Δυσαύλης), the father of Teuctus and Eubulcus, and a brother of Celeus. According to a tradition of Philus, which Pausanias disbelieved, he had been expelled from Eleusis by Ion, and had come to Philus, where he introduced the Eleusinian mysteries. His tomb was shown at Celeae, which he is said to have named after his brother Celeus. (Paus. i. 14, § 2, ii. 14, § 2.) [L. S.]

DYSPONTEUS or DYSPO'N'TiUS (Δυσπόντιος), according to Pausanias (vi. 22, § 6), a son of Oenomaus, but according to Stephanus of Byzantium (ν. ν. Δυσπόντιος), a son of Pelops, was believed to be the founder of the town of Dysponentum, in Piatia. [L. S.]

'I have been for some time in the habit of using the Dictionaries of Antiquity and Ancient Biography, as well as the Dictionary of Ancient Geography, and I have no hesitation in saying, from my knowledge of them, that they are far superior to any other publications of the same sort in our language. They are works which every student of ancient literature ought to consult habitually, and which are indispensable to every person engaged in original researches into any department of antiquity.'

Sir G. Cornwallis Lewis, Bart.

'The Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography, edited by Dr. William Smith, is a work of so much utility to the study of ancient history, and of such general importance to classical education and the progress of knowledge, that its extensive circulation, wherever the English language is spoken or read, may confidently be anticipated.'

William Martin Leake, Esq., F.R.S.

'I have much pleasure in expressing my sense of the invaluable services rendered to the cause of Greek and Latin literature, and of classical education generally, by the great and laborious works of Dr. William Smith, which are extensively used, and with great profit, at Harrow, as in all the public schools of England.'

A New Classical Dictionary of Biography, Mythology, and Geography.

Partly based on the 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology.' By Dr. William Smith. Eighth Edition, with 750 Illustrations. 8vo, cloth, 18s.

The old Classical Dictionaries having become obsolete, from the vastly increased information which the researches of modern scholars have attained on historical subjects, this Dictionary is presented to the student as embodying the accurate particulars which recent discoveries have arrived at, respecting the manners, customs, history, and literature of antiquity.

The work contains articles on the most important names, Biographical, Mythological, and Geographical, occurring in the Greek and Roman classics.

The biographical portion comprises the various departments of History, of Literature, and of Art. All names of note are included, up to A.D. 476, and a few remarkable ones beyond that epoch. The Literary articles occupy considerable space, and embrace all Greek and Roman writers whose works either are extant, or, though lost, have exercised an important influence on learning. The best modern editions of the works of the several authors are indicated at the end of the articles relating to them. The history of Ancient Art has also a large space devoted to it.

In the Mythological articles, care has been taken to exclude all indecent allusions; and the Greek and Roman Mythology are kept distinct, by treating separately of the Greek divinities under their Greek names, and the Roman under their Roman names—a method adopted by modern authorities, both here and on the Continent, and calculated to remove and prevent many errors and misconceptions.

In the Geographical portion have been embodied all the latest discoveries of travellers relating to the identification of modern localities with ancient sites.

The work will also be found of great use to Biblical Students in elucidating points connected with the Geography of the Scriptures, and explaining the numerous allusions to classical subjects contained in the Sacred Writers. The Illustrations have reference to the Mythological, Biographical, and Geographical articles, and will, it is believed, add considerably to the value and usefulness of the work.

II

A Smaller Classical Dictionary of Biography, Mythology, and Geography.

This work is designed for junior students, and contains so much of the subjects of the larger Classical Dictionary as is necessary for understanding the Greek and Roman Classics generally read in schools. It is more adapted, in size as well as in price, to younger pupils; and, for their benefit, not only has the quantity of the syllables of each name been carefully marked, but the genitive cases have been inserted.

A new and pleasing feature is introduced into this volume, viz., the illustration of the Mythological articles by drawings from ancient works of art. These will give the young beginner a more vivid and adequate conception of the symbols and figures typical of the deities and heroes than he could possibly obtain in any other manner; and will thus enlist his interest in the objects of ancient Greek and Roman worship.

III

A Smaller Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities.

This work, intended to illustrate the classical authors usually read in schools, exhibits the results of the labours of modern scholars in the various subjects included under the general term of Greek and Roman antiquities. Such information, contained in the Larger Dictionary of Antiquities, as is not suited to junior students, is here omitted; and whatever articles are susceptible of it have been illustrated by woodcuts from ancient works of art.

The book, however, is designed not only for school use, but for the general English reader who, although unacquainted with the ancient classics in the original, frequently needs information on points connected with Greek and Roman antiquities.

The woodcuts are calculated to give a correct idea of the numerous objects described, of which but a vague notion could be conceived from the most minute verbal description; and these cuts have the advantage of authenticity, being taken exclusively from ancient inscriptions, paintings on vases, gems, coins, and pictures found at Pompeii, etc., as well as from actual relics of antiquity still existing. The pupil thus acquires a knowledge of the forms of the various kinds of ancient armour and weapons, instruments of music, apparatus for cooking and banqueting, articles of dress, plans of houses &c.

The Appendix consists of extensive tables of Greek and Roman coins, weights, and measures; the years corresponding to the Olympiads, the calendar, &c.
